56. ἴσαι.] By the ancient Versions and most early modern Commentators this is taken to mean convenientes, 'consistent,' 'such as tally,' implying agreement as to the words imputed. So E. V., 'agreed not together;' while Erasmus, Grotius, Hammond, Whitby, Heupel, and Campbell, render it 'non idonea erant,' 'were insufficient to establish the charges against him.' But, as Beza and Fritz. observe, the usus loquendi will not permit this sense; and the difficulty, which drove the above Commentators to adopt so forced an interpretation, is really by no means formidable: see my Recens. Synop. Lightfoot observes, that the Jewish Canons divided testimonies into three kinds; 1. a vain or discordant testimony; 2. a standing or presumptive testimony; 3. an even consistent testimony; the one here meant.

58. χειροποιήτον] i. e. 'the work of man.' This was added (says Grotius) lest Christ should seem to have spoken parabolically. Of the word χειροπ. examples are adduced by Wetstein; to which may be added a passage of Thucyd. ii. 77, where φλόξ χειροποιήτης is opposed to ἀπὸ ταυτομάτου πῦρ. Our Lord alluded to Is. xvi. 12. See note on Acts vii. 48, and compare infra xv. 29, John ii. 19.

60. ἀναστὰς—εἰς τὸ μέσον] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel the τὸ, from A, B, C, R (to which I could add not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies). But the τὸ is confirmed by supra iii. 3, ἔγειραι εἰς τὸ μέσον. Luke v. 19. vi. 8. John xx. 19, ἔστη εἰς τὸ μέσον, all sine vv. lectt. At Luke iv. 35, where the text. rec. is εἰς τὸ μέσον, the same editors retain τὸ, notwithstanding a great preponderance of external authority for εἰς μέσον; a very proper, though not a quite consistent, procedure.

61. ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Εὐλ.] scil. Θεοῦ, lit. the 'blessed Being who is daily praised in heaven and earth; the peculiar attribute of the Deity, to express the Divine nature. This title of the blessed One was in Hebrew tantamount to the Holy One, and both or either of them denotes the God of Israel. The two expressions are frequent in the Rabbinical writers.

65. ἐβαλλον] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἔλαβον, from 8 uncial and not a few cursive MSS. And Mr. Alford remarks that the sense must be, 'they took him in hand with, treated him with,' i. e. ραπίσματα. But what could induce that gentleman to treat his readers with such absurd stuff, founded on low English slang, or how he can venture to ascribe such to the Evangelist, I cannot imagine. He remarks that the ἐλαβον not being understood (how should it?) was corrected to ἐβαλλον,—whereas the truth is, that ἐβαλλον, or ἔβαλον, which may have been the original reading, was by the carelessness of the scribes altered to ἐλαβον,—a change of very frequent occurrence in all writers, and espec. in the Sept. and New Test., as Tisch. at least must well know, having learnt it in the best and really only effectual way, by actual collation. If it be thought requisite to justify the text. rec. and the propriety of its use by the Evangelist, one example may suffice—Suidas in v. τυμμή, where we have τυμμαῖς οὐ ταῖς τυχούσαις ἐβάλλετο.

68. For οὐκ—οὐδέ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read οὐτε—οὐτε, from B, D, L; and Alf. pronounces the text. rec. as derived from Matthew and Luke. But considering how slender is the authority for the alteration, and weighing the nature thereof, we can scarcely doubt that the reading in question was an alteration of the Critics; who did not perceive that the two terms are used here not by pleonasm, but with reference to the distinction between them, ἐπίστω, signifying intelligo, novi, and οἶδα, scio, denoting full and complete knowledge. So Acts xix. 15, τὸν Ἰησοῦν γινώσκω, καὶ τὸν Παῦλον ἐπίσταμαι. There may, however, be a sort of Hendiad. to denote full and complete knowledge, as in Eurip. Iph. T. 470, τὰς ἐνθάδε θυσίας ἐπιστάμεθα καὶ γινώσκουμεν,—and espec. in Jos. Antt. xv. 10. 5, ἀλλ' οὐ γὰρ οἶδά σε τοιούτων ἵεσθαι τὸ πᾶν ἐπιστάμενος, 'I do not well know from full acquaintance with the whole matter.' Finally, we may compare the Latin phrase non novi quæsit.

The reading here of the MSS. B, C, L, and a few others, σὺ τί λίγεις, instead of τί σὺ λίγεις, has been without reason received into the text by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., since propriety of language and the norma loquendi forbid the dis-severing of the σὺ from its verb. Mr. Alford may, indeed, urge that internal evidence would seem in favour of his reading, since the bad composition would attest its genuineness. But we are not to ascribe such unnecessarily, espec. when it can be proved to have arisen (as in a multitude of other places) from the carelessness of the scribes, which is the case here; for the position found in those MSS. seems to have solely arisen from the σὺ being originally absent from the most ancient MSS., and afterwards brought in, though (as in a multitude of other cases) in the wrong place.

70. ὁμοιάζει] i. e. 'is like the dialect of the Galileans,' which was broad and guttural. Of this word I know no other example; though the compounds παρομοίω, and προσομοίω, occur in the later writers. It indeed was not wanted, its place being supplied by ὁμοίω. It is indeed true, that the whole clause καὶ ἡ λαλιά σου ὁμοιάζει is absent from B, C, D, L, 3 cursives, and the Ital., Vulg., Copt., and Sahidic Versions, and is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., as an insertion from Math. It may have been such, but there is no proof that it is. I cannot find the least countenance for this reading in the Lamb. and Mus. copies; and the overwhelming amount of external authority,—confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version,—sufficiently vindicates the authenticity of the clause.

71. For ὀρνύειν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ὀρνύμαι, from B, E, L, S, U, V, X, and many cursives; to which I add that most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies have ὀρνύμαι, which may be the true reading, and the other introduced from the passage of Math.; but since ὀρνύμαι is confessedly the pure Class. Greek form, and ὀρνύειν an Hellenistic one (see Merid. Atticist.), it is far more probable that ὀρνύμαι was a correction of the Greek by the Alexandrian Critics.

72. For οὐ, many MSS., uncial and cursive (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), have δ, which is edited by Matth. and Scholz. But internal evidence is against it. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ὡς, from A, B, C, L, Δ, and 7 cursives. I add Trin. Coll. B, X, 16,—authority scarcely sufficient, though made up by internal evidence, which is quite in its favour. Accordingly, I have received it,—a procedure which I could confirm from many passages of Thucyd. and other Greek Class. writers, in which ὡς has been altered by the ever-meddling race of Critics to δ, or οὐ.

—ἐπιβαλὼν] On reconsidering this disputed and perplexing word, I still give the preference to the sense assigned by Casaub., Kypke, Wets., and others, 'turned his mind [to the sad occurrence],' 'reflected thereupon.' That ἐπιβάλλειν is used not only followed by νοῦν in that sense, but even absolutely, is placed beyond doubt by the examples adduced by Kypke and Wets. And the interpretation in question is recommended not only by its being quite agreeable to the usus loquendi, but by its simplicity and suitability to the context.

XV. 2. For εἶπεν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read λέγει, from B, D, and one cursive. And indeed internal evidence is quite in favour of the reading; but it cannot be adopted on such slender authority. I cannot agree with Mr. Alford that the εἶπεν was adopted from the passage of John. It was more likely to be used in order to get rid of the tautology, and there was no need to go to John to suggest the term. The two words are indeed very frequently interchanged, and it is sometimes a difficult matter to decide on the preference. Generally, however, λέγει is the genuine reading, espec. in the Gospels of St. John and St. Mark, and occasionally in St. Matthew.

4. καταμαρτυροῦσιν] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read κατηγοροῦσιν, from B, C, D, and one uncial; but wrongly. It was far more likely that καταμ. should be altered to κατηγορ. by the Critics in four MSS., than that κατηγορ. should have been altered to καταμ. from the passage of Matth. in all the copies but four; for why should it? It is altogether incredible.

7. For συσταςιαστῶν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read στασ., from B, C, D, K, and some six cursives, to which I can add nihil. It is plain that συστ. is the genuine reading, and that the other arose not so much from correction of a very unusual term (though occurring in Jos. Antt. xiv. 2. 1) to one quite usual, but because the abbreviation for συν (viz. σ) was absorbed in the σ following. Nothing can be further removed from common sense than Mr. Alford's mode of accounting for the term συστ.—namely, as 'a correction to include Barabbas among the seditious, as is expressed in Luke.'

8. ἀναβοήσας] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἀναβᾶς, from B, D, and some Latin copies, the Copt., and Sahid. Versions. But not a single cursive MS. has it; nor can I find the slightest countenance for it in the Lamb. and Mus. copies. It is strange that the experience in MSS. of one of the above Editors (Tisch.) not merely by chronicling their readings, but also by examining their contents, should not have suggested to him that this is one of thousands of portenta arising from the blunders of the scribes, who, as Matthæi long ago saw, mistook the somewhat unusual term ἀναβοήσας for some term with which they were better acquainted, probably ἀναβᾶς, which was sure to be altered to ἀναβᾶς, though that makes something little short of nonsense; for as to what Alford says, that 'it implies the rising of the crowd in their excited state,' it is risu quam refutationis dignus. I will only add, that Jackson of Leicester and Matthæi, two most competent judges, were of opinion that the reading was formed from the corrupt Latin copies. But it seems more probable that it existed in some copy or copies from which those Versions were formed. All the copies, however, of the Vulg. have not accensisset, for the Lamb. copy, of the 7th century, has accessisset; and that accensisset was in some copies of the Italic, we cannot doubt, since accensus is found in the Cod. Vercellensis of the Italic.

That the Pesch. Syr. Translators had ἀναβοήσας, is certain; and the authority of all the MSS. except two, and of the most ancient of the Versions, would seem to leave nothing to be said for ἀναβάς. Yet two self-constituted judges have ruled the question the other way; and all I can do is to move for a quo warranto?

11. ἀνέσεισαν] 'instigated,' as in Luke xxiii. 5, and often in the later Class. writers.

12. εἶπεν] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἔλεγεν, from B, C, and a few other MSS. And certainly internal evidence is in its favour; but it requires greater internal authority to warrant its adoption. Before βασιλέα Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. prefix τὸν, from A, B, C, D, L, Δ, and 3 cursives of the same Family—very insufficient authority, espec. since internal evidence is equally balanced; though propriety of language rejects the article after verbs of calling.

14. περισσοτέρως] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. adopt περισσῶς, from A, B, C, D, G, H, K, M, and a few cursives, though all one of the same Family as D; also 4 Lamb. and Mus. copies. It may be the genuine reading, and περισσοτέρως may have come from a marginal scholium, afterwards introduced into the text; or περισσῶς may have been brought in from Matth.; but the former is the more probable. However, there is manifestly no case for change.

15. τῷ ὄχλῳ τὸ ἱκανὸν ποιῆσαι] 'to satisfy [the wishes of] the people,' or, as Grotius explains it, agreeably to the usage of salut facere in Latin writers, 'to remove all causes of complaint on their part.' Exx. are adduced by Expositors from Polyb., Appian, and Diog. Laert. Nevertheless, it seems to have been an idiom introduced, with many others, into the Greek language from the Latin, after Greece and the East had fallen under the dominion of Rome. As Pilate's former administration had much disgusted the Jewish people, he, it seems, thought it necessary thus to appease them; yet they afterwards pursued him with persevering hostility, until they effected his ruin. And thus he lost all the benefit he hoped to derive by his base compliance on the present occasion, just as Felix did on the occasion narrated in Acts xxiv. 27.

17. ἐνδιδ.] So I have now edited, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., instead of ἐνδύουσιν, from B, C, D, F, Δ, and several cursives, confirmed by internal evidence; the rarity of ἐνδιδ. attesting its genuineness, and also its use being confined to Hellenistic and later Greek writers, as the Sept., Jos., Procop., Geopon., and the Middle form in Luke viii. 27. xvi. 19. The text rec. arose from an ignorant Scholiast.

18. βασιλεῦ] The reading βασιλεύοντ, adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from most of the uncials and several cursives (to which I add most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), is probably the genuine reading; the use of the Nomin. for Vocat. being an Hellenistic and later Greek idiom.

20. σταυρώσωσιν] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read -σουσι, from A, C, D, L, P, Δ, and 2 cursives; to which I can add no Lamb. MSS., though a few Mus. ones. This, however, is evidently not a case for change, any more than the ἀπὸ ἀγροῦ at the next verse; though I doubt not such was the original mode of writing. It occurs perpetually in Thucyd.

21. Ἀλεξ. καὶ P.] Persons probably well known, and then living at Rome; since Paul, Rom. xvi. 13, salutes Rufus there.

23. πικρ.] This is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, C, L, Δ, and the Copt. and Arm. Versions; but retained by Lachm., very properly, since it was less likely to be introduced into all the copies but four, and all the Versions but two (and those of the meanest), than to have been removed by Critics as superfluous.

24. σταυρώσαντες αὐτόν, διαμρ.] Tisch. and Alf. read, from B, L, the Copt. and Sahid. Verses, and some copies of the Ital., καὶ σταυρώσουσιν αὐτόν καὶ διαμρ.; while Lachm. retains the text. rec., very properly; for, though Alf. pronounces it a re-arrangement of construction, yet that is taking for granted what should be proved. The reading he adopts is also a re-arrangement of construction on the text. rec.; and surely it was more likely that the re-arrangement should have taken place in two copies, than in all the copies but two, and all the Versions but two or three.

25. ἦν δὲ ὥρα τρίτη καὶ ἐσταύρωσαν α.] A difficulty is here started, that the crucifixion is twice described by Mark as taking place. To avoid which, some would take the καὶ for ἐξ οὗ. But that signification is quite unauthorized. It is better, with others, to take ἐσταύρωσαν as an Aorist with a Pluperfect sense (on which see Winer's Gr. Gr.), thus: 'It was the third hour when they had crucified him.' Even this, however, is unnecessary, if σταυρώσαντες in the preceding verse be taken in a Present sense (and indeed the Cod. Vatic. has the present tense), thus: 'And on proceeding to crucify him, they divided his garments.' Now this indicates the commencement of action, namely, the stripping of our Lord. The next verse denotes the completion of action, and therefore fixes the time when it took place.

With respect to the seeming discrepancy between Mark and John, xix. 14, ὥρα ὥρα ἔκτη, as to the hour of the crucifixion, although such discrepancies 'are (as Fritz observes) rather to be patiently borne than removed by rash methods,' yet here we are, it should seem, not reduced to any great straits. For though the mode of reconciling the two accounts by a sort of management is not to be thought of; yet surely, when we have the testimony of several of the ancient Fathers, that an early corruption of number in one of these two passages had taken place, by a confusion of the ζ and τ, we cannot hesitate to adopt so simple and natural a mode of removing the discrepancy. And thus we may here read ἔκτη, which is found in the later Syr. and Æthiop. Verses, in 2 Mus. copies collated by Mr. Scrivener. But as there are strong reasons against supposing so late an hour as the sixth (see note on John xix. 14), it would seem best to suppose that Mark is quite exact in his statement of the time; for, besides the strong reasons against the sixth, there are strong reasons for supposing that Mark must have written τρίτη, inasmuch as he is so exact in his enumeration of the hour on the day of crucifixion, saying 'it was the third hour and (i. e. when) they crucified him,' i. e. led him away for crucifixion, and v. 33, when the sixth hour was come from that time there was darkness—until the ninth; and (v. 34) at the ninth hour Jesus expired. Hence, I doubt not, that the error rests on the passage of St. John, where we may suppose, as did Euseb., Theoph., and Severus, that there was a very early erratum in the copies by the substitution of τ for σ. Dr. Mill, indeed, sets himself to exclude this most natural mode of accounting for the discrepancy, by denying that the use of letters or figures for the words represented by them was so early as the age of the Evangelists. But that is quite overturned by the positive evidence of Greek inscriptions of about that age. Indeed, the learned Montfaucon, in his Palæographia Græca, p. 190, bears testimony to its use in MSS. of the most remote antiquity: and the celebrated Biblical Critic, Mr. Jackson, of Leicester, adduces in his manuscript Collectanea on the Greek Text, a long passage from St. Cyril of Jerusalem (of the 4th century), in which he adverts to this discrepancy between the accounts of the two Evangelists, and suggests their satisfactory reconciliation in this very way; and he is of opinion that the genuine reading in both Evangelists is ζ, i. e. τρίτη. In order to cut off the scruple of Matthew and others as to the fact of an actual resemblance between the ζ and the τ (or ἑπίσημον), I must mention that St. Cyril bears testimony to this strong similarity, and minutely describes in what it consisted, and how the confusion might arise. Moreover, Jackson adduces a passage from Irenæus C. Hæres. v. 30, from which it is quite certain that the numerals were in his age—the next after the Apostolic—expressed by letters of the alphabet used as the figures of an after age; and he testifies that this mode of expressing them was used in all the most ancient and exact MSS., which might easily carry the custom even beyond the Apostolic age. This ought to be sufficient to settle the question for ever. And the solution depending on this fact (for such it is) is surely better than supposing, with Mr. Alf., that "some different mode of calculation [what could that be?] has given rise to the present discrepancy;" for at that rate the question is treated as insoluble and never to be settled.

28. On again maturely considering the question as to the authenticity of this verse, which is rejected by Griesb., and is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., but retained by Lachm.—I am ready to admit that the authority for its removal is considerable (that derived from MSS. A, B, C, D, X, and not a few cursives; to which I add 5 ancient Lamb., and double that number of Mus. copies), and that internal evidence is rather against than in favour of the passage; yet when I consider that its presence in the great body of the MSS., and in all the Versions but the Sahidic, also the authority of Origen and Euseb., I must hesitate even to bracket, and protest against expunging this prophetic testimony, however sparing our Evangelist may be in adducing such.

30. καὶ κατάβα] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read καταβάς, from B, D, L, Δ, but without any cursive MSS. (nor can I adduce one);—authority insufficient to warrant the change,—espec. since internal evidence is not so much against it as Mr. Alf. may suppose, who pronounces it “a resolution of the Participle,” taking for granted what requires proof, and what, moreover, is against all probability—I mean the probability of such a resolution, so little essential, having taken place in all the copies but four. Nothing is more likely than that in these four copies the Critics altered the construction to what they deemed a more compact and neat one, and certainly one more Classical.

31. ὁμ. δέ] I still continue to bracket the δέ, which Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel, and which is absent from most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies. See note on Matt. xxvi. 35.

33. γενομένης δέ] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read καὶ γίνομ., from B, D, G, L, M, S, Δ, and 3 cursives; to which I can add nothing; yet internal evidence is rather in favour of the reading. But there is evidently no case for change.

34. λαμὰ] Such seems, on the whole, the most probable reading; but there is strong authority for λιμὰ and λιμὰ, and there is no certainty as to the genuine reading either here, or at the parallel passage of Matth., where see my note.

36. γεμίσας] For the purer Greek term used by Matth., πλήσας, see note supra iv. 36.

39. ὅτι οὕτω κράζας] This does not mean (as many explain) ‘that he had cried with such a loud voice;’ nor ‘that the Centurion felt wonder at his being so soon released from his torments;’ but that, on hearing such words as those at v. 34, pronounced so vehemently, and, as it were, from the bottom of the heart, by the crucified person,—and that he should, so immediately afterwards, be released from his torments,—the Centurion thence felt assured that he was not only a righteous person, but had the character which he claimed; namely, that of being ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ: on the force of which expression, see note on Matt. xxvii. 54.

Tisch. and Alf. have, indeed, cancelled the κράζας, from the B, D, and the Copt. and Arm. Versions; while Lachm. retains it; with reason, since the authority for its removal is next to nothing, and internal evidence quite in its favour.

Mr. Alf., indeed, regards the word as 'an explanatory gloss on οὕτως;' but a gloss it could not be; though that the οὕτως would require something to help it out I readily grant; yet that all the Revisers should thus help it out by the same word, and all the ancient Versions except two (and those omit also the οὕτως, and consequently do not come into count), is utterly incredible. To those who will see the eyes of their understanding it is plain that the κράζας was removed by the Critics.

⁴³ ἐλθὼν] This, for the common reading ἦλθεν, is found in many of the best MSS. (including not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies), and some Versions and Fathers, and is edited by Fritz., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; rightly, I think: since the common reading, as Fritz. observes, involves a very harsh ἀγνοῦν; and for the addition of καὶ before τολμήσας, which would make all right, there is very little authority: indeed, it was doubtless an emendation of the Critics. Fritz. thinks that ἦλθεν partly arose from Matt. xxvii. 57, and partly from the Greek Interpreters (as we find from Euthymius) terminating the sentence at Θεοῦ; and, having changed ἐλθὼν into ἦλθεν, then added καὶ before τολμ. Thus τολμήσας will be taken for the adverb τολμηρῶς; just as τολμῶντας is taken for τολμηροὶ in Thucyd. ii. 43, and Eurip. Phœn. 277. However, I would not venture to deny that it is possible ἐλθὼν may be the emendation, and ἦλθεν the original reading. But then the καὶ before τολμ. would be indispensable. And as we must, in either case, take what may have proceeded from emendation, it seems proper to give the preference to number and excellence of MSS., confirmed by internal evidence; and the result is in favour of ἐλθὼν.

— εὐσχήμων βουλ.] 'An honourable Councillor,' i. e. Senator, one of the Sanhedrim. How it comes to signify this, see my Lex. The word is used nearly in this sense at Acts xiii. 50. xviii. 12, and occasionally in Joseph. and Plut., where it is equiv. to spectabilis, 'respectable, of good condition and station in society.' Here, however, εὐσχ. is an epithet of distinction, as in the United States of America 'Honourable' is applied as a title to a member of the Senate.

— ὃς καὶ αὐτὸς ἦν προσδ. τὴν βασ., &c.] Here προσδ. has the same sense as at Luke ii. 25; and the expectation is to be understood of an expectation of the Messiah, in the person of Jesus; the sense here intended to be expressed being nearly equivalent to the ἐμαθήμενος τῷ Ἰησοῦ of Matthew, and the μαθητὴς ὢν τοῦ Ἰησοῦ of John. In εἰσῆλθε there is a sensus praesentis; the meaning being, as Fritz. renders, 'introit in prætorium, et ad Pilatum accessit.' So Diog. Laert. vi. 6, μαθὼν δὲ ὁ Κράτης εἰσῆλθε πρὸς αὐτόν.

⁴⁴ ἰθαύμασεν εἰ] Beza and others wrongly render the εἰ by an, as if there were a doubt; whereas εἰ is used with θαυμάζειν, as the Latin si with mirari (indeed with all verbs of wonder), to express what is not doubted, but wondered at. Thus the εἰ is for ὅτι, and we may render, 'wondered that he was already dead [so soon].' So Xenoph. Mem. i. 1, 13, ἰθαύμαζε δι, εἰ μὴ φανερόν αὐτοῖς ἴσται. Joseph. Bell. i. 25, 1, θαυμάζω δὲ—εἰ ἤ μὴ νῦν Ἀ., where the same mistake is made by the Translators, notwithstanding that the words following demand εἰ to be taken for ὅτι. Thus we may here render, 'that he were already dead!' The πάλαι is wrongly rendered in E. V. 'long.' There is, indeed, merely a repetition of the foregoing question, with the adoption of a more precise term, the sense being 'already.'

writing σῶμα, would almost immediately after write πτῶμα. Indeed, the MS. D has it at v. 43. Of course, the authority of three MSS. where internal evidence is so adverse, is next to nothing, espec. considering that πτῶμα is almost always found in one or more of that class; probably from provincialism.

46. The kai before καθαλὼν (on which see my Lex.) is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, D, L, and the Copt. Vers.; and internal evidence is against it, since whenever two Participles occur without a copula (an idiom frequent in the best writers) it is rarely but that a kai is presented in one or other of the MSS.

— ἐνείλησε] This term, used also by Matth. and Luke, is a term appropriate to the thing in question, said to occur no where else (though κατεῖλ. is found in Hdot. ii. 86): but I find it in Artemid. i. 13, οἱ ἀποθνήσκοντες ἐγγισμένοις ἐνείλονται ῥάκειν. On the whole narration of the burial of our Lord, see Pearson on the Creed, vol. i. p. 336, seqq.

— μνημεῖον δ ἦν, &c.] Comp. Matt. xii. 40. xxvi. 12. John xix. 41. Wolf, Salmas., Krebe., Schleusner, and others, are mistaken in taking these words to mean a monument constructed of hewn and polished stone, since, as appears from Matt. xxvii. 60, δ ἐλατόμησεν ἐν τῇ πέτρᾳ, it was merely a cave hewn out in the rock; that being the custom of the country, and of most of the Eastern nations.

47. For τίθεται, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from several of the most ancient MSS., τεθεῖται, which is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., and the ἐτίθη of Luke xxiii. 55, and is borne out by internal evidence, as existing in the greater probability that τεθεῖται, from the uncommonness of the form, should pass into τίθεται, than vice versa. I have now received the word.

XVI. 1. ἡγόρασαν] Render: 'bought,' i. e. bought and brought; not, 'had brought,' a rendering only adopted in order to reconcile this passage with Luke xxiii. 56, where it is said that the spices were prepared upon the evening of the Sabbath: but, as Townsend observes, 'it is only by a scrupulous adherence to the plain sense of Scripture, that difficulties are ever removed.' Now the researches of recent Harmonists, espec. Gressw., have established the fact,—which had escaped the earlier Expositors,—that there were two parties of women, to whom the two Evangelists refer respectively. Thus also we are enabled satisfactorily to remove a perplexity which had embarrassed the old Commentators: namely, how to reconcile ἀνατείλαντος τοῦ ἡλίου at v. 2 with the πρῶτ' ἀκούει ἐτι ὄσων at John xx. 1. These aromatic ointments were doubtless provided by the joint contributions of these pious women; a procedure, I apprehend, not unusual, as I infer from a passage of Artemid. iv. 22, ροσοῦντι δι' ποτηρὰ τὰ μύρα (the aromatic unguents) διὰ τὸ συνεισφέρεισθαι νεκρῷ.

4. ἦν γὰρ μέγας σφόδρα] The Commentators have been not a little perplexed with this clause, because it cannot be referred to what immediately precedes. To remove this difficulty, some would take γὰρ in the sense of δή. But it is better, with others, to suppose that the words have reference, not to the clause which immediately preceded, but to the one before that, τίς — μνημεῖον; the intermediate words being regarded as parenthetical. Yet the construction at καὶ ἀναβλέψασαι will not admit of the parenthesis; and thus the difficulty remains in its full force; and it would seem impossible to remove it, except by transposing the words, as is done by Newc. and Wakef. But for that there is no authority. I cannot but think that the γὰρ has reference to some clause; not, indeed, that which Whitby, Grot., and Roemmn. suppose, 'and this happened luckily for them;' but to something which may be supplied from the preceding context, thus: '[And well might they say, Who will roll, &c., and behold, with surprise, its removal:] for it was very great.' Mr. Alf. thinks the clause was meant to offer a reason why they could see that it was rolled away, on looking up, possibly at some distance. But its great size could be no reason why they should be enabled to see that it was rolled away: and to ascribe such a meaning (any thing but agreeable to sound sense) to the Evangelist, is both unjust and irreverent. Besides, it is not brought in as a minute circumstantial incident, but as one bearing on the thing described: and therefore something is left understood in the context to which the γὰρ is to be referred, similarly as in a multitude of passages of the New Test., of which one may suffice—supra v. 42, καὶ ἀνίστη καὶ περιπατεῖ· ἦν γὰρ ἰσὺν δώδεκα.

7. τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ] His disciples generally; meaning, however, chiefly the Apostles. The καὶ just after may be rendered 'and especially,' standing for καὶ μάλιστα, as in Acts, καὶ Μαρίᾳ. This use of καὶ is frequent in the Class. writers, from Homer downwards. On the reason why Peter is here espec. named, the Commentators differ in opinion; though they are in general (both ancient and modern) agreed that it was not from any pre-eminence which he had over the rest of the Apostles. Why Mr. Alf. should suppose the espec. mention of Peter to be merely official, as the primus inter pares, I know not. Whether he was so or not, is another question. That he is often distinguished from the rest of the Apostles, cannot be denied. See Matt. x. 2. But surely this (considering Peter's late sad lapse) could be no time to point at that primacy; and to suppose, with Mr. Alf., that others of the Apostles may have denied their Master besides Peter, is at once to forget all that belongs to ordinary respect, and to fail in that feeling of reverence which has ever been thought due to the Apostles of Christ. But to return to the point more immediately under consideration—the ancient Fathers, both Greek and Latin, are generally agreed, as also the most judicious modern Expositors, that the reason for this particular mention of Peter here (as it were by message) was to convey to the conscience-stricken disciple a comfortable assurance of pardon from that Divine Master whom he had thrice denied, and a gracious intimation that, notwithstanding his late offence, Christ still counted him among his disciples, and numbered him among his chosen. See Chrys., Theoph., Greg., Jerome, and Augustine.

8. ταχὺ] This is absent from most of the best MSS. (including all the best Lamb. and Mus.), and is cancelled by almost every Editor from Wets. downwards. It was, no doubt, introduced from Matt. xxviii. 8. The words οὐδενὶ οὐδὲν εἶπον must (as appears from the ἐφοβούντο just after) be understood of the time during their return, or shortly after, and of the persons whom they might then meet with. [Comp. John xx. 18.]

—εἶχε δὲ αὐτὰς] 'possessed them.' So Hom. II. c. 247, πάντας γὰρ ἔχε τρόμος.

9.—fin.] The authenticity of this remaining portion of the Gospel has been impugned by several writers, but defended by more. It is hardly necessary to present to the reader's notice the long-drawn statements for and against, which may be seen in the able Résumé of Dr. Davidson. Suffice it to briefly adduce the substance of the Arguments FOR the authenticity EXTERNAL. It is contained in all the MSS. and Versions, except as follows:—B, a copy of the Ital. Vers. marked K, the Verona MS. of the Ital. Vers., which wants all after the 7th verse. In D the portion from v. 15 to the end of the chap. is from another hand. Greg. Nyssen and Severus of Antioch attest that it was not in the more accurate MSS. of their day; and a similar statement is made by Euthym. It is absent from some MSS. of the Armenian Version. The state of the MS. L is such as to cast a shade over the authenticity. In Cod. A and not a few cursive MSS. the numbering of the Eusebian or Ammonian Sections does not go beyond v. 8. On the other hand, all the Gr. MSS. except B have the portion, all the Evangelistaria, and all the Synaxaria. All the Versions have it, even the Syriac of Jerusalem, and also the Cod. Vercell. of the Italic, of the 4th century. It is sanctioned by Irenæus, Hippolytus, Dionys. of Alexandria, Tatian, Celeus, Cyril of Jerusalem, Damascenus, Photius, Theophr., Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory, and Cassian. See more in Davidson, who with good reason maintains that the external arguments in favour of this portion outweigh those against its authenticity.

As respects internal arguments against the authenticity, for those the reader is referred to Dr. Davidson, who divides them into six heads, of which 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, have reference to particular passages, the result of which I have touched upon infra. To address ourselves to the four principal arguments as affecting generalities,—it is alleged by Dr. Davidson that the phraseology and style of the portion are adverse to its authenticity. The characteristic peculiarities of the Gospel, he says, do not appear in it, but, on the contrary, terms and expressions never employed by Mark are introduced; or terms instead of which others are used by him. Of these Dr. Davidson gives examples, and the representation will receive some notice infra. "Again," remarks Dr. Davidson, "the style of the whole is not that of the Gospel. Instead of the graphic detailed description by which the Evangelist is distinguished, we have an abrupt sententious manner, resembling that of brief notices extracted from larger accounts, and loosely linked together. In this representation there is some truth; but even that is exaggerated and over-coloured, and not a little existing only in imagination. And τῇ Μαγδαληνῇ, ἀφ' ἧς ἐκβεβλήκει ἑπτὰ δαιμόνια. ¹⁰ Ἐκείνη πορευθεῖσα ἀπήγγειλε τοῖς μετ' αὐτοῦ γενομένοις, πνευθούσι καὶ κλαίουσιν. ¹¹ Κάκεινοι, ἀκούσαντες ὅτι ζῇ καὶ ἐθεάθη ὑπ' αὐτῆς, ἠπίστησαν. ¹² Μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα δυσὶν ἐξ αὐτῶν, περιπατοῦσιν, ἐφανερώθη ἐν ἑτέρᾳ μορφῇ, πορευομένοις εἰς ἀγρόν. ¹³ Κάκεινοι ἀπελθόντες ἀπήγγειλαν τοῖς λοιποῖς· οὐδὲ ἐκείνοις ἐπίστευσαν.

when Dr. Davidson proceeds to add, "that the Section is suspicious even on external grounds, it was idle to deny, though the external testimony of itself preponderates in favour of its authenticity," he does not do justice to the strength of those arguments to which I may be expected to be more alive, when I state that the collation of so many hitherto uncollated MSS. (in none of which do I find the portion absent or noted with any marks of suspicion) must make a deep impression on my mind. As respects the internal considerations dwelt upon so much at large by Dr. Davidson, after making all allowance for the over-coloured representations above adverted to, I am ready to grant that on the whole internal evidence is rather against than for the authenticity. The manner, style, and phraseology, though not foreign to Mark, are scarcely agreeable to the style and phraseology of that Evangelist; though Dr. Davidson must admit that so short a paragraph as this cannot be expected to fully bring out a writer's characteristics in style or general phraseology. In fact, what I said in my Dissertation on the authenticity of the 84th chapter of the 3rd Book of Thucyd. applies to the present case. It is in vain, as I there have said, to prove the chapter to be not genuine, by lengthened critical discussions on its style and phraseology. These at least form matters of doubtful disputation, and can never settle any question of this kind. For instance, the laboured efforts of a heavy phalanx of Philologists to prove, or to disprove, the Pauline origin of the Epistle to the Hebrews from the phraseology alone, never produced any result; and if the question be, as I trust it is, now well-nigh settled by my efforts and those of Dr. Davidson, it is by going into the question on other grounds. In fact, the very objections made to the portion before us are such as were made to the above-mentioned 84th chapter, nay, even to the whole of the 8th Book of Thucyd.; but in vain, since the book, as also the above chapter, bears the stamp of the same mind as that which dictated the other seven books; and the same is in some measure true of this portion. And as that 84th chapter was, from some cause or other, written after the foregoing two chapters, and was left much in the rough, such, I apprehend, has been the case here. I have little doubt that the Evangelist himself added the Section at some time after the rest of the Gospel (which I cannot believe he could have intended to conclude with the words ἠφροβούντο γὰρ), and that, from some cause or other (probably severe sickness) he wound up his narrative summarily and with little of order or arrangement, and that, being prevented, owing to the foregoing cause, from completing the Gospel on the same plan as before, he subjoined a brief condensed statement by way of conclusion. Thus the difference of style and manner, as far as it exists, may readily be accounted for. In consideration, however, of the arguments against the authenticity adverted to by Dr. Davidson at ii. 1, 2, 3, 5, 6 (and which have, at any rate, some weight), I have thought fit, with some hesitation, to place the portion within brackets, but must protest against its being cancelled, as it is by Tisch. and Alf.; though not by Lachm., who here shows an unwonted caution, only to be accounted for by his viewing the question solely in reference to the external arguments as to the authenticity.

It is not a little remarkable that, while Mr. Alf. cancels the portion, he regards it as an 'authentic document, by whom written uncertain, but of great antiquity, and purporting to be a completion of the Gospel, but having the same claims to reception and reverence as the rest of the Gospel.' What that same claim to reverence and reception amounts to in Mr. Alford's estimation we are left to imagine. But at any rate it cannot come up to Canoncity, and considering what he unhesitatingly promulgates as to the 'origin, authorship (?), and authority of the three first Gospels,' it can scarcely fail to be so slender, as would hardly be grudged by the most thorough-going German Neologians and semi-infidels.

¹² ἐν ἑτέρᾳ μορφῇ] The best Expositors understand by this, visage and general appearance. Whatever the alteration in appearance might be, it was such as also to prevent our Lord's being immediately recognized by the two disciples who were going into the country. See Luke xxiv. 13.

¹³ οὐδὲ ἐκείνοις ἐπίστευσαν] This seems to be at variance with Luke xxiv. 33, 34, where it is said, that before they approached, Jesus had appeared to Simon, and that he had related it to the assembly. For even this they had not fully credited; nay, even when Jesus had come up, they, as Luke testifies, yet disbelieved. (Grotius.) In the passage of Luke, the Apostles and Disciples are indeed spoken of; but καλούντων does not denote all the Apostles and Disciples gathered together, but only some of them. Passages of this sort, in which what seems spoken by all is to be understood only of some, are not unfrequent in the New Test. There is therefore no real discrepancy between Mark and Luke. Some of the assembly it seems (as Luke says) believed that Jesus had risen from the dead; the rest denied implicit credit to the statements respecting that event: and no wonder, since various persons in the same company might be variously impressed. From this temporary diversity, however, of belief, we may well conclude that the persons in question were by no means credulous; and, as Gressw. remarks, all this tends to make us repose a firmer confidence in the testimony of those who so slowly and cautiously admitted belief.

14—18. This passage is so connected with the preceding matter as to render it highly probable, at least, that the occurrence took place in a private house in or near Jerusalem, on the very evening of our Lord's resurrection, and was that of which we have other relations in John xx. 19, 23, and Luke xxiv. 36, 49.

16. ὁ πιστεύσας—κατακριθήσεται.] By comparing this with the Commission given to the Apostles, Matt. xxviii. 20, and Luke xxiv. 47, it is plain that not only faith, but repentance, and obedience were to be preached in the name of Christ,—the sense being, that he who by true and lively faith embraces Christianity, and engages, in baptism, to obey its injunctions, and faithfully fulfil his engagements, shall obtain everlasting salvation. With respect to κατα-κριθήσεται, whether it be rendered 'damned' or 'condemned' (a point which has been disputed; and assuredly the word is very susceptible of the latter version), matters but little as to the ultimate sense; since, upon the lowest meaning that has been affixed to σωθήσεται (namely, the being put into a state of salvation), the contrary cannot but imply a state of present reprobation; which, if continued in, must assuredly terminate in perdition: and the condemnation, to take place at the day of Judgment, cannot but imply the being consigned to the curse, and the eternal woe consequent upon it. By 'not believing,' is meant either obstinately refusing assent to the evidence of the truth of the Gospel, however satisfactory; or not so believing the Gospel as to obey it, and thus holding the truth in unrighteousness. In the former case, he who believeth not must be condemned to eternal misery, because he rejects the only means whereby he can be saved.

17. σημεῖα δὲ, &c.] [Comp. Luke x. 17. Acts v. 16. viii. 7. xvi. 18. ii. 4. x. 46. 1 Cor. xii. 10, 28.] On the several particulars of our Lord's promise, so as to show their full force and exact fulfilment, see my remarks in my Recess. Synop. The exercise of the first gift—the Casting out of devils—is proved by the early Fathers,

Justin Martyr, Clemens Alex., Origen, Irenæus, Tertullian, &c. Of the second, Speaking with new tongues, which must be understood, in its full sense, of the miraculous communication of the faculty of speaking with tongues never previously learned (on which I have fully treated in the note at Acts ii. 4), we have abundant proof, both from Scripture and the testimonies of the earliest Fathers. The same may be said of the next two particulars, the 'taking up of serpents,' and the 'drinking of poison without injury.' The former was in that age regarded as a decisive test of supernatural protection (though we find that this power, like all others, was sometimes pretended to by impostors); and the latter faculty would (as Doddridge truly observes) be espec. necessary in an age when the art of poisoning was brought to such cursed refinement. As to the fifth particular, Healing the sick supernaturally, the Scriptures and early Ecclesiastical writers are full of examples. Upon the whole, there is abundant evidence for the fulfilment of all the promises which the above expressions, in their plain and full sense, imply; and for the accomplishment of their chief purposes,—namely, of miraculous attestation to the Divine mission of those to whom they were made, and of supernatural protection to them under all the evils, which they should have to encounter in the exercise of their ministry. It must, however, be borne in mind, that since our Lord is here speaking of the miraculous powers imparted to those who should believe, which were necessary to confirm and extend the faith until its universal establishment, the believing here spoken of must denote an exercise of what is called the faith of miracles, as is evident both from the subject to which it refers, and from the fact, that, even in the apostolic times, the endowments here promised were not extended to all who simply believed the Gospel. See 1 Cor. xii. 28. And that they were not all miraculously endowed is not ascribed to their want of faith, but to the sovereign appointment of God, who 'worketh after his good pleasure, all in all.'

OF this Evangelist (as of the preceding) little is known with certainty, except from the New Test.: for as to the traditions of the early Fathers, they are scanty and unimportant; and those of the later ones merit little attention. It is the opinion of some (including the early Fathers and the older Commentators in general, and Dr. Lardner) that Luke was a Jew; but this is forbidden by Col. iv. 11—14, where he is distinguished from those of the circumcision, and therefore could not be, at least, a Jew born. Others (including many recent Expositors) suppose him to have been descended from Gentile parents; but in his youth to have embraced Judaism, from which he had been converted to Christianity. Yet as there is great reason to think that Luke was a very young man when converted to Christianity, it is little likely that he should, before that time, have passed from Gentilism to Judaism. The truth here probably lies in medio; and we may suppose him to have been (like Timothy) partly of Gentile and partly of Jewish extraction, his father a Gentile, his mother a Jewess. And this will account for the two principal characteristics of his writings,—accurate knowledge of the Jewish religion, and no inconsiderable power of Greek composition. That he should be so far as on the mother's side a Jew, is not at all inconsistent with his bearing a Greek name, which he would, of course, derive from his father. There is, I apprehend, nothing in the New Test. which militates against this hypothesis,—by which all seeming discrepancies are reconciled,—but much to confirm it; for surely he was more likely to be reckoned among Jews (see Acts xxi. 27, compared with xxi. 15, 17), if he were Jew-born by the mother's side, and brought up a Jew, than if he had been merely a proselyte from Gentilism, as Dr. Davidson supposes him to have been. That the Evangelist was 'the Luke the beloved Physician' of St. Paul, may be regarded as next to absolutely certain. As respects his country, Euseb. and Jerome testify that he was a Syrian born at Antioch: but of his place of residence before his conversion, and his attaching himself to St. Paul, we know nothing certain. Greaw. thinks he was an inhabitant of Philippi; others, of Troas. The first mention of Luke in the New Test. is at Acts xvi. 10, 11, where he is said to have been with Paul at Troas; but whether he became first acquainted with the Apostle there, and was then converted by him, or whether he had been before converted, and become attached to the Apostle Paul, we cannot ascertain (being wholly uninformed as to the place or circumstances of his conversion); but the latter is by far the more probable supposition. Luke had, we may presume, been converted some time before; and been resident at some part of the North coast of the Ægean sea, probably Philippi; from which, it seems, he went to Troas to meet Paul there, on his second Apostolic Progress, in order to obtain further information as to the Gospel of Jesus Christ. After that period Luke was in close attendance on St. Paul, during the remainder of his second missionary progress. Also on his third, Luke was with him at Philippi, Troas, Miletus, Tyre, Caesarea, and Jerusalem. That he accompanied Paul to Rome is quite certain; and probably he was with him, more or less, during the two years of his imprisonment; nay, probably very nearly till his martyrdom. The circumstances of the latter part of Luke's life, and the manner of his death, are involved in the deepest obscurity,—espec. since the accounts given by Ecclesiastical writers are neither consistent with themselves, nor in themselves probable. Even the time of his death is not ascertained.

Of the genuineness and authenticity of this Gospel there has never been any real doubt; since it is quoted or alluded to by various writers, in an unbroken chain, from the Apostolical Fathers down to the time of Chrysostom. See Davidson. As to the authenticity of the first two chapters, which has been recently called in question by those who impugn the miraculous conception of Christ, suffice it to say, that those chapters are found in all the MSS. of the Gospel of which we have any knowledge, and in all the Versions. And to this complete external evidence may be added internal evidence of the strongest kind; for while there is no Critical reason imaginable against the chapters, there is the strongest reason to suppose them genuine,—since the first is connected with the second, and the second with the third, in exactly the same manner as the first and second chapters of Matthew are connected with the third.

As respects the Time and Place of its writing, the latter is altogether uncertain, no less than nine places being mentioned by writers; and as to the former, the matter is one of doubtful dispute. Davidson thinks it most probable that Luke's Gospel was written at Rome, during Paul's imprisonment, since Italy seems to have been the country to which Theophilus and the first readers belonged; that the Evangelist had more leisure there than elsewhere, and that this Book preceded the composition of the Acts, at the same place, at the beginning of A. D. 63, according to the Chronology of Anger and Wieseler; and that hence the present Gospel may be assigned as near as possible to 61, at which time Peter had not arrived at Rome. However, Canon Tate has in his Continuous Progress of St. Paul, given good reasons for fixing on A. D. 59. Mr. Gresw., after a most elaborate investigation of the matter, comes to the conclusion that this Gospel was not only written after that of Mark, but that it was intended to be supplemental to those of Matth. and Mark; and Canon Tate (ubi supra) declares himself entirely satisfied with the demonstration so fully given by Mr. Gresw. to that effect.

As respects the question for whom this Gospel was written, it was, of course, written as to its immediate purpose, for the instruction of Theophilus, who was in all probability (for the reasons assigned by Dr. Davidson) a Gentile believer living out of Palestine. But that does not exclude a far wider purpose, even in the Evangelist's intention, and certainly in the purpose of the Holy Spirit, for the instruction both of contemporary Christians and those of all future ages. Internal evidence attests that it was written for the use of Gentile communities, as might be expected from one personally known and attached to the Apostle of the Gentiles; and this is confirmed by the unanimous voice of antiquity. In short, we may suppose (for I would not pronounce positively) that, as Mark's Gospel was intended for the use of the Gentile Christians and Hellenists of the West, so this was meant for the instruction of those of the East, namely, Greece, Asia Minor, and the islands.

As respects the relation of Luke's Gospel to St. Paul, the reader is referred to Dr. Davidson's ample discussion of this quæstio verata. He has adduced various citations from the early Fathers, as Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, Jerome, and some others, in which Luke's Gospel is, he thinks, virtually resolved into the authority of the Apostle Paul. I could myself adduce several further proofs in the Introductions to this Gospel, found in many of the Lambeth, and not a few of the Mus. copies. The substance of most of them I have found derived from Cosmas Indicopleustes, an Alexandrian monk of the 6th century, the author of a Topographia Christiana, and also, it would seem, of another work, consisting of Introductions to the Gospels. But, from the searching examination of Dr. Davidson into the grounds of this view, there is great reason to regard the tradition as, if not baseless,—as Dr. Davidson maintains,—yet resting on very uncertain data. From the close connexion subsisting between the Evangelist and the Apostle, it was natural for the ancients to have supposed that Luke wrote his Gospel under the superintending influence of St. Paul. The transition, as observes Davidson, between a disciple of the Apostle to the act of writing the Gospel under Apostolic inspection was natural. Yet I grant that the Tradition rests on no foundation sufficiently solid to admit of its adoption. We are, however, I apprehend, warranted in supposing, that the Gospel was written in some measure under the auspices of St. Paul, with whom he had probably, during the time of his drawing it up, become intimately connected. And how far there may, or may not, have been some degree of assistance given by the Apostle to his follower and favourite disciple, we cannot say. Even Mr. Alf. grants that it is an interesting inquiry how far Luke's continued intercourse with the great Apostle to the Gentiles may have influenced his diction, or even his selection of facts [rather matter]. It is, he adds, a remarkable coincidence that the account of the institution of the Lord's Supper should be nearly verbatim the same in Luke xxii. 19, and in 1 Cor. xi. 23, and that Paul claims to have received this last from the Lord. And we know that a revelation was made to him, to which he refers in Gal. i. 12. Eph. iii. 3. 1 Cor. xi. 23, embracing, at least, the leading facts of the Evangelic history. And the circumstance, Mr. Alf. thinks, may have acted on the mind of Luke, and even shaped, or filled out, some of his narratives in aid of direct sources of testimony. Mr. Alf. admits that we may trace a similar cast of mind and feeling in some instances which he proceeds to specify. But all this is, I would say, taking too low a view of the matter, and not allowing enough to the effect of that inspiration, which must of itself have been sufficient to enlighten the mind of the Evangelist on the great doctrine of man's free justification by grace through faith (attested in the use of the term δικαιωμῖνος in the strictly evangelical sense, Luke xviii. 14), even without the direct teaching of St. Paul, both by his preaching and his private instruction. Besides, the claim of this Gospel to Canoncity, if it do not rest mainly on the intimate intercourse of the Evangelist with the Apostle, will at least be materially strengthened by the fact of that intercourse. And the very early Tradition before adverted to cannot, even if rejected in its strict sense, fail to produce a considerable impression of the just claim of this Gospel to be "faithful and worthy of all acceptance."

To advert to the characteristics of Luke's Gospel—we cannot fail to recognize a remarkable circumstantiality, exactness of narration, and no little touch of the graphic; though not comparable with the minuteness of detail and picturesqueness of Mark. There is also a brevity of expres-

περὶ ὧν κατηχήθης λόγων τὴν ἀσφάλειαν.

sion far greater than that of Matth., though less than that of Mark, and not so comprehensive by the multum in parvo. And though it has been said that Luke is more intent on the narrating of facts, than on the recording of the Sermons and Parables of our Lord, yet when he does adduce the lessons of moral instruction conveyed by our Lord, he is surpassed by no other Evangelist in touching force, simple and genuine pathos, and deep feeling. To turn to a matter of far less consequence, in treating on which our German brethren appear (as in all matters of externals) to considerable advantage—the nature of the diction has been ably handled by Gerdorf and Cröner,—the result of whose researches has confirmed the view of the best Expositors, that, though the phraseology is substantially the same as that of the other Evangelists, yet it is far purer in its Greek, espec., I add, as to the exact use of the tense of verbs, and their construction. The composition has far less of Hebraistic character than that of the others. In short, the style is generally far purer and more fluent than that of the others. There is more of the finish of regular composition, and no little approach to the regularity of historical writing, and occasionally that which distinguishes the Classical historiographers, I mean the writer's combining his own judgment with the events which he narrates. See iii. 20. vi. 11, 16. ix. 53. In fact, we may almost say, that in carrying out a sort of latent and quiet emulation, not imitation, of Classical tournerie and finish, he studiously avoids those awkward constructions and harsh modes of expression so common in Mark, and even Matth. In short, the Gospel bears the impress of an inquiring mind; of a studious searching after the truth, and its execution attests a writer of good education and respectable station in life, and one who had acquired, in some way, no inconsiderable power of expressing his thoughts. Above all, we cannot fail to trace a most conscientious love of truth, a mind under the influence of the Holy Spirit, communicating to him such a due measure of Divine inspiration as might be sufficient to enable him to carry out what he had by Divine Providence been destined to take in hand, that all future believers ἐπιγνώσιν περὶ ὧν κατηχήθῃσι λόγων τὴν ἀσφάλειαν.

The historical character of the first chap. of this Gospel has been ably vindicated against some recent mythical interpreters, by Professor Mill, in a Tract, Camb. 1841. 8vo.

I. 1—4. From this Proem, forming a very valuable, though brief Introduction, we learn (as Dr. Davidson remarks), that many previous attempts had been made to give a fixed character to the Evangelical tradition, and also the nature of those attempts. 2. The qualifications possessed by Luke for writing a Gospel. 3. The mode in which he proposed to write it. 4. Why he wrote it,—namely, because his predecessors had failed in their endeavours. 5. The advantages which Luke himself possessed by availing himself of eye and ear witness. "Since (observes Bp. Lonsdale) the Evangelist here assigns as a reason for his drawing up the present Gospel, that many others had undertaken to write Gospel narratives, and since he speaks of his own complete understanding of all things from the very first; we may conclude both that he regards those histories as erroneous or defective, and also that he wrote under a conviction of his own superior qualifications for the work."

The persons meant by these many has been much discussed; but it is agreed that the writers of the Gospels of Matthew and Mark could not be intended to be included in those writings; Matthew being one τῶν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς αὐτοῦ τῶν,—and Mark having perhaps not yet written his Gospel. It is certain that we are not to understand the Apocryphal Gospels, since very few, if any, of those can be proved to have been so early in being. The narrations in question were probably the compositions of pious and well-meaning persons: but, as we may infer from the context, without the necessary information or qualifications for writing a Gospel history. Hence their accounts, though not intentionally false, were necessarily erroneous and defective. And some of these probably formed the foundation of the Apocryphal Gospels. That they were in some degree defective, or erroneous, seems implied in the very circumstance, of the Evangelist's undertaking to supply Theophilus with more certain information; for though in ἐπιχρίσιν there is no direct reference to either success or failure, yet, as in Acts ix. 29. xix. 13, there is a plain allusion to failure of purpose, so here there is a faint vestige of it. That the Church never acknowledged the authenticity of any histories of our Lord except the four Canonical Gospels, is quite certain. Ἀνατάσσασθαι is not to be understood of re-arranging what is already written. For the sense of repetition in the word, though frequent, is not perpetual. It seems here to denote, not indeed repetition, but succession, as of one thing after another, which will here imply setting in order. Thus ἀνατάσσασθαι will signify to compose, equivalent to συντάσσασθαι, as in Dio Cass. 1326, 94.

1. πεπληροφορημένον] Πληροφορία signifies prop. to carry a full measure, to be full; also active, to make full; and figur. to make fully certain, give full assurance; either as spoken 1st, of persons, or 2dly (as here and in 2 Tim. iv. 17), of things; which are thus said to be fully confirmed and established, and are therefore received as absolute truths, with full assurance of faith. Accordingly, the expression is nearly equivalent to πιστευμένον, as at Josephus, Ant. xvii. 6, 3. By πραγμ. are meant, not things, but matters, facts.

2. καθὼς παρέδοσαν ἡμῖν] If these words be referred, as is done by most Interpreters, to the narratives before mentioned, there would seem to be no reason why the writer should have undertaken a work which would appear to be superfluous; the information in those being supplied by persons so well qualified to communicate it. But though the reference be such, according to the construction, it is certainly not according to the meaning intended, which would have required not ἡμῖν, but αὐτοῖς. The difficulty would be effectually removed, by referring καθὼς, &c. (as Koecher, Rosenm., and Kuin. direct) to τῶν πεπληροφορημένων ἐν ἡμῖν (understanding these words to assign the ground of that firm conviction), and by assigning to καθὼς the sense, not unfrequent in the New Test., 'quatenus, inasmuch as.' But as this reference involves some harshness, it is better to refer καθὼς to ἀνατάξασθαι: rendering it 'quatenus admodum, according as.'—Παρίδοσαν, 'have delivered;' the term being used not only of the declaring of a thing in writing, but, as here, orally. By ἡμῖν we may understand, as just before, 'us Christians,' meaning all Christians.

—ἀπ' ἀρχῆς] This expression admits of several senses, each assigned by one or other of the Expositors: but the context must fix the meaning here to one only,—namely, the origin of the Christian Dispensation, at the commencement of the official course of its author at his baptism by John, as is quite clear from Mark i. 1 (where see note), and Acts i. 21, ἐν ᾧ (scil. χρόνῳ) ἐσηλθε καὶ ἐξηλθεν ἐφ' ἡμᾶς Κύριος. Ἰησοῦς ἀρχαίμενος πρὸ τοῦ βαπτίσματος Ἰωάννου, &c. By τοῦ λόγου must be meant τ. λ. τοῦ Θεοῦ, the Gospel, as applied to whatever is revealed by God to men for their instruction, and here espec. denoting the Word preached. On ὑπερ, and δίκαιον, see my Lex.

3. ἰδοὺς κάμοι] The Evangelist here does not, as Alf. says, class himself with the above πολλοί, though neither does he claim to be of a distinct class from them. Of παρηκολ. ἀκριβῶς the sense is 'having accurately traced and investigated every thing from the earliest source,'—the very beginning of a thing,—perhaps with allusion to the top-springs or source of a river. In this very sense the word is used by Demosth. p. 1463, ὅσα τυγχάνω, δι' ἐμπειρίαν καὶ τὸ παρηκολουθηκέναι [ἐξ ἀρχῆς] τοῖς πράγμασιν, ἰδὼν: also p. 285, ἀνδρα—παρακολουθηκότες τοῖς πράγμασιν ἐξ ἀρχῆς.

—καθ' ἑξῆς] for the Class. ἐφεξῆς, denoting not order of time, but of events, matters of fact, the πραγμάτων at v. 1, perhaps with some reference to the classification of those which admit of it, and are best considered in that way, or, at least, the orderly (not necessarily consecutive) arrangement of such matters.

—Θεόφιλε] This is not, as some say, a feigned name, to denote 'a true Christian,' but one intended to denote a real person, for whose instruction the present Gospel was more immediately written, being probably a convert of Luke's. Of this individual, to whom the Gospel was as it were inscribed, it is easier to say what he was not, than what he was. That he was not a Jew is pretty clear from ii. 22, 24. iv. 6. Acts xxiii. 5. That he was not a native or inhabitant of Palestine, Dr. Davidson thinks may be inferred from i. 26. ii. 4. iv. 31. viii. 26. xxiii. 51. xiv. 13. Acts i. 12—18; also that to whatever country he belonged (probably, I think, Macedonia) he was a Gentile, as is, he thinks, shown by the explanatory circumstances appended by Luke to several things in his Gospel, which circumstances might to a Gentile need elucidation. Yet these explanations might be intended quite as much or more for the class of which Theophilus was an individual. Their spiritual exigencies would probably be far greater than his, who, from his being, as appears from Luke's address, κράτιστε, a person of some rank or station in life, was, we may presume, of good education, and doubtless competent information. We cannot suppose that the term κράτ. was used merely, like the Lat. vir praestantissime, as a conventional compliment; it was doubtless as a title of due respect called for by circumstances.

4. ἵνα ἰπικνῶς] 'that thou mightest fully know,' i. e. obtain full information, become fully acquainted with. In this inchoative sense the word often occurs in N. T. In κατηχ, there is a reference to that oral instruction, which preceded and followed up admission into the Church by baptism. By λόγων seem meant the accounts or statements made of the matters on which the Christian religion, both in its doctrines and precepts, was founded. Τὴν ἀσφάλειαν and the preceding terms ἀνωθεν, ἀκριβῶς, and καθ' ἑξῆς, seem to glance at the opposite qualities in the narrations just adverted to. So in a very important passage of Euseb. Eccl. Hist. iii. 24, it is said of Luke's language in his Preface, ὁ δὲ Δουκᾶς ἀρχόμενος καὶ αὐτὸς τοῦ κατ' αὐτὸν συγγράμματος τὴν αἰτίαν προϋήκει, δι' ἣν πεποιτται τὴν σύνταξιν, δηλῶν ὡς ἀρα πολλῶν καὶ ἄλλων προτετίστορον ἐπιτηδεύκων διήγησιν ποιήσασθαι, ὡς αὐτὸς πεπληροφόρητο λόγων, ἀναγκαίως, ἀπαλλάττων (I conjecture ἀπαλλάξων) ἡμᾶς περὶ τοὺς ἄλλους ἀμφορίστον ὑπολήψεις, τὸν ἀσφαλὲς λόγον, ὡς αὐτὸς ἰκανῶς τὴν ἀλήθειαν καταλήψει, ἣν ἐκ τῆς ἡμα Παύλῳ συνουσίας τε καὶ διατριβῆς, καὶ τῆς τῶν λοιπῶν ἀποστολῶν, ὠφελήμενος, διὰ τοῦ ἰδίου παρόντων ἀναγγελοῦ. The foregoing conjecture is indispensable to the sense, and seems to have had place in the copy used by Rufinus in the fifth century, when forming his Latin Version. And the ττ and ξ are sometimes confounded by the scribes.

5. ἐφημερίας] Properly a daily service, like that of the Jewish priests in the Temple; and since that was performed by the priests in turn, for a week alternately, it came to denote (as here), by metonymy, the class (for there were twenty-four classes) that took that weekly service in rotation. The offering of incense was, no doubt, the daily offering, which would fall to Zacharias' lot as an ordinary priest in his course.

For ἡ γυνὴ αὐτοῦ, Iachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from B, C, D, and four cursives (to which I can add nothing worth mentioning): and Alf. styles the text. rec. 'a correction for perspicuity.' But that it should have been introduced into all the copies but seven, is highly improbable. Yet the Grecism is so rough that the change is possible.

6. δίκαιοι ἐν. τ. Θεοῦ] Meaning persons of truth, uprightness, and integrity; ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ being an Hebraic adjunct, importing reality; because whatever is what it is, in the sight of an omniscient God, must be really so; see Gen. vii. 1. The words following are exegetical and illustrative; and προεισόμενοι is, as often in Scripture, used of habitual action. Δικαιώμασι and ἐντολαῖς, denoting the ordinances and commandments, are nearly synonymous; but the former may refer to the moral, the latter to the ceremonial law. Ἀμεμπτοι (irreproachable) expresses their good repute with μεν, as δικ. their piety towards God. So Artemidor. ii. 12, ἐκείνη διατίλειται ἀμεμπτος. Comp. Ovid, Met. i. 328, who says of Deucalion and Pyrrha, ἄνποκος ἀμβος, cultores numinis ambos.

7. προβεβηκότες ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις αὐτῶν. This is said to be a Hebraism; but it is only such by the use of ἡμεραις and ἡλικία, and that of ἐν; the Class. writers using the phrase προβαίνειν τῇ ἡλικίᾳ, or κατὰ τὴν ἡλικίαν.

9. ἔλαχε τοῦ θυμιάσαι. Supply κλήρον or μῆρος, which is expressed in Acts i. 17; though perhaps the noun may be the λᾶος included in the verb. Among the various offices thus distributed by lot, the most honourable was this,—of burning incense. So much so, indeed, that no priest was allowed to perform it more than once. By τὸν ναόν is meant the Sanctuary, in which was the altar of incense (see Hab. ix. 1—6) as distinguished from the Temple at large, in which the people were praying. A somewhat similar occurrence is related in Jos. Antt. xiii. 10, 3, of a High Priest having a Vision at the same time as the one here, namely, that of offering incense, where, in like manner as here, the people are described as being outside (viz. of the Temple at large) while the incense was being burnt in the Sanctuary.

10. For τοῦ λαοῦ, I have now, with almost all recent Editors, received ἦν τοῦ λαοῦ, on considerable external authority, confirmed by most of the best Lamb. and Mus. copies, as also by internal evidence.

12. ἐταράχθη] Not without reason; for though angelic appearances in the Temple had been once not unusual, even as late as the time of Hyrcanus, who (as we learn from Joseph. Antt. xiii. 18) witnessed such, while he was offering incense,—yet they were now very uncommon; and therefore the appearance, of itself sufficiently terrific, would be the more appalling.

13. εἰσηκούσθη—ἡ δέησις σου] Some think that the prayer was a prayer for offspring, addressed either then or formerly. Many arguments have been urged for, but more against, this supposition. Besides that the apparent impossibility of the thing may be supposed to have produced acquiescence in the will of God, the pious priest would be little likely to mingle private concerns with public devotions; and hence it is more probable that he was praying,—together with the welfare of the nation,—for the advent of Him whose coming many signs announced to be near at hand, even the Consolation of Israel (ii. 25).

—γεννήσει υἱόν σοι] On the circumstances connected with the births of John the Baptist and of Christ, see Lightfoot, Whitby, Macknight, and Dr. Bell, on the mission of John the Baptist; who ably evinces the genuineness of this part of the sacred history, and shows that 'the whole train of events here said to have taken place are of a nature so entirely beyond the power of man to produce, that if they really happened as they are said to have happened, the authority of any fact founded on them becomes unquestionable.'

14. γινίσει] This, for text. rec. γεννήσει, I have now received, with all recent Editors, on strong external authority (to which I can add that of several Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence. See note on Matt. i. 18.

15—17. On this portion compare Matt. iii. 3 and John xxix. 30—34, and see Dr. Smith's Scrip. Test. L. iii. ch. 2, 'on the evidence relative to the person of Christ, as derived from the office and testimony of John the Baptist; where he shows that a forerunner was peculiar to the dignity of the Messiah, and weighs the terms in which John's office is described,—his testimony, and resemblance to Elijah.

15. μέγας ἐνώπιον τοῦ Κυρίου i. e. μέγας παρὰ Θεοῦ, 'in the sight of the Lord,' i. e. as most understand, Jehovah; though others interpret it, the Lord Jesus. But the former is greatly preferable. That the expression only intimates, as Mr. Alf. thinks, the spiritual nature of his office and influence, is more than I can admit, because it is a lowering of the augustness of the expression.

—οἶνον καὶ σικερα οὐ μὴ πῖν] A Nazaritic injunction. So in Numb. vi. 3, it is said of him who has vowed a Nazaritic vow, ἀπὸ οἶνον καὶ σικερα ἀγιοσθήσεται. Σικερα is derived from the Heb. שכר, to inebriate, and denotes generally any intoxicating drink; but was chiefly applied to what we understand by made wines, viz. any vinous liquor not made from grapes, but from dates, figs, or palms.

In καὶ Πνεύματος ἁγίου πλησθήσεται there is a tacit opposition between drinking wine, or strong drink, and being filled with the Spirit. See Eph. v. 18.

The words ἐκ κοιλίας μητρὸς αὐτοῦ, from a Hebrew phrase to denote 'from the earliest period.' It is one frequent in the Old Test. (see my Lex.), and found elsewhere in the New Test., Matt. xix. 12. Acts iii. 2. xiv. 8. Gal. i. 15. Thus the notion of Meyer and Olshaus., who suppose it meant that the Holy Spirit should act on the child even before his birth, besides being, as Mr. Alf. admits, "not necessary," is not allowed by the passages of the Old and New Test., where this Hebraistic phrase occurs, for which the Class. writers use ἐκ παιδός, or βρίθους. In short, the words καὶ οἶνον καὶ σικερα οὐ μὴ—αὐτοῦ are meant to be confirmatory of what had been before said; q. d. 'As a token of his entire devotedness to God, he will not only be a perpetual Nazarite, but will be filled with the Holy Ghost from his earliest years.'

17. αὐτοῦ] A difference of opinion exists as to the person to whom the pronoun is to be referred. Some, as Heumann and Kuinoel, regard it as put emphatically for Christ; comparing v. 17, and 1 John ii. 6, 12. But in those passages there is no emphasis; the pronoun having reference to an antecedent noun, though somewhat remote. And though examples may be found of αὐτός in an emphatic sense, yet that is only under circumstances different from the present—chiefly when several words intervene between the subject and the verb. Again, to suppose αὐτός so employed here, where a manifest antecedent immediately precedes, would be harsh in the extreme. And to regard αὐτός as used in so different a way in two places separated only by a couple of words, were to suppose a perfect enigma. According to the rules of just interpretation, αὐτοῦ must be referred to the person who was just before spoken of, Κύριον τὸν Θεόν. I cannot, however, agree with the generality of Commentators in understanding by Κύριον τὸν Θεόν the Lord Jehovah; since that would involve a no small harshness; though, if it were admitted, we might say, with Calvin, that 'since there is no express mention of Christ, the Angel makes John the forerunner of the Eternal God; or we may hence infer the eternal Divinity of Christ.' This, however, would be incurring a harshness almost as great as that which we have been opposing. It is better, therefore, with several ancient Expositors, and, of the moderns, Maldonati, Castalio, Bengel, and others, to understand by Κύριον τὸν Θεόν, the Lord Jesus Christ. And so the Persic Translator must have taken it; since he renders 'their Lord and God;' by which the expression will answer to that addressed to Christ by Thomas (John xx. 28), 'my Lord and my God.' And agreeably to what is here said, that the Baptist 'will turn many of the Israelites to their Lord God' (ἐπιστρέψει), we find in 2 Cor. iii. 6 (with reference to Christ), 'when any one shall turn to the Lord,' ἐπιστρέψῃ πρὸς Κύριον, where some very ancient authorities, for Κύριον, have Θεόν. And the very word is used in Zech. xiv. 5, and elsewhere, with reference to the Messiah.

The allusion in προελεύσεται ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ is clear from Matt. iii. 3, where see note.

—πνεύματι here means 'disposition,' as δυνάμει 'zeal and energy,' or 'mighty endowments.' On Elias, as a type of the Baptist, see note on Matt. xi. 14. Compare also Ecclus. xlviii. 1, ἀνστήσει Ἑλίας προφήτης ὡς πῦρ, καὶ ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ ὡς λαμπρὰς ἑκαίετο. In ἐπιστρέφει καρδίας πατέρων, &c., there is an allusion to Mal. iv. 6, where it is said that Elias will go before the Messiah ἐπιστρέφει καρδίας πατέρων πρὸς υἱόν, καὶ καταστήσει φύλας Ἰακώβ. On the exact import, indeed, of the words Commentators are not agreed. They have been supposed to denote a reconciliation of discordant sects and political feuds, by a common repentance and reformation: but they may rather be explained to mean that John, by preaching repentance and reformation, would bring both fathers and children to the same frame of mind, would turn persons of all ages from the disobedience of the wicked to the wisdom of the just; and would thus make ready a people prepared for the coming of the Lord Jesus. In ἐπιστρέφ. τὴν καρδίαν τινὸς we have not a mere Hebrew phrase, since in Plato, Opp. vi. 257, 3, we find ἀναστρέφειν τὴν καρδίαν τινός, 'to bring any one to a better mind by moral reformation.' Thus the two first clauses state the particular purposes of the Baptist's mission; namely, to introduce concord, philanthropy, and reformation of mind and practice. The third states the general purpose, or perhaps the result of the two former.

18. κατὰ τί] Supply σημῖον, which is expressed in a similar passage of Gen. xv. 8. Grot. here remarks on the difference in the cases of Abraham and of Zacharias, as to the same action. The former did not ask for a sign, from distrust in the promise of God, but for confirmation of his faith; whereas the latter had no true faith at all, and did not, as the former, turn from natural causes to the great First Cause. Hence, though a sign was given to him, it was a judicial infliction likewise, for not believing; though wisely ordained to be such as should fix the attention of the Jews on the promised child.

19. Γαβριήλ] Heb. גבריאל, 'Man of God.' See Dan. viii. 16, and ix. 21, comp. with Job xii. 15, where we have the name of another Archangel, Michael, ἄρχαγγελος, equiv. to 'Who is as God,' Gr. ἰσάθεος. Prof. Mill (ubi supra v. 1) has shown that we are not to suppose that the names of the angels were borrowed from any heathen system (prevalent in Babylonia), inasmuch as the persons and order of angels were known long before, and their names had come from an after revelation to Daniel. The designation ὁ παρστ. ἄ. τ. θ., meaning in attendance at the throne (an expression occurring both in the Sept. and in Lucian, D. D. xxiv. 1, δαὶ παριστάμενοι τῷ Δεῖ), is equiv. to ἀρχάγγελος, a Chief Angel. Of these it is said in Job xii. there were seven.

20. ἔσθ' σιωπῶν καὶ μὴ δυν. λαλῆσαι] This is not a mere tautology (to avoid which several Commentators, ancient and modern, explain σιωπῶν, deaf, quite against the propriety of language), but the latter phrase is meant to explain and strengthen the force of the former, as in Acts xiii. 11, ἔσθ' τυφλός, μὴ βλέπων τὸν ἥλιον,—and its purpose is to communicate emphasis thereto, 'Thou shalt be silent, yet not able to speak.' Comp. also Acts xviii. 9, ἄλλει, καὶ μὴ σιωπήσῃ. Though in the present instance the καὶ meaning imo, makes it somewhat distinct from the other passages. It is idle to adduce such Class. phrases as Homer's, ἀδάκρυτος καὶ ἀπήμων, since that is a simple Hendiadys.

21. ἰθαύμαζον ἐν τῷ χρονίζειν, &c.] The people might well wonder; for it appears to have been customary for the priest not to tarry, on account of the people waiting in the outer court; who would fear lest some harm had befallen him,—from a negligence in the duty, or otherwise,—which might be ominous of evil to the people at large. When Zacharias at length appeared, and was evidently deprived of the faculty of utterance, the people would be likely to conjecture that something extraordinary had happened to him, and naturally asked whether he had seen a vision.

22. λαλῆσαι αὐτοῖς] 'address them,' neither to give them the accustomed benediction, nor to inform them of the cause of the delay. Ἐν διανεύων α., scil. τοῦτο,—he noddled assent to the inquiry, whether he had seen a vision. Διανεύειν signifies, 'to express one's meaning by nods or becks.' So Thucyd. i. 34. 1, νύματι χρῆσαι μῖνον, where see my note. Κωφός here, as appears from v. 62, signifies both deaf and deaf.

23. λειτουργίας] On this see my Lex.

24. περιέκρυβεν ἑαυτήν.] Not, 'she concealed her situation,' as some Expositors explain; but, 'she kept herself retired.' This she would be induced to do during her whole pregnancy, not only through motives of delicacy (considering her advanced years), but from an anxiety to preserve herself from such accidents, as might either endanger the safety, or impart any defilement to the embryo (see Judg. xiii. 14); and lastly, she would feel herself bound, considering the signal favour she had received from above (by which was removed from her the reproach that barrenness involved), to employ the period of her pregnancy in the exercises of more than ordinary devotion. It is frivolous to debate which five months she secluded herself; for the last five are not permitted by the context, which manifestly points to the first five. Yet the words ἐν τῷ μηνὶ τῷ ἔκτῳ ἀπεστάλη will not (as has been thought) oblige us to suppose that she kept retired only the first five. There was more reason, on every account, for the next four; and therefore we are warranted in extending that privacy (with Lightfoot) to the whole period of gestation. The period five months is merely mentioned, as being that which intervened between the time of her conception and that of the angel's appearance to Mary and the visit to Elisabeth. I agree with Mr. Alford that the ὅτι does not signify for, but is the usual particle serving to introduce a speech. But this will not prove, as he imagines, that her studious privacy had not for its purpose to devote herself to the exercises of devotion in prayer and praise. That is, I think, strongly intimated in the air of the words οὕτως μοι πεποίηκεν, &c., which, as appears from the οὕτως, are ejaculatory; q. d. 'Thus wonderfully (mercifully) hath the Lord dealt with me!' Accordingly, we have here a brief expression of her devotional feelings, fitly called forth by this miraculous dispensation of Divine Providence, whereby, instead of the reproach of barrenness, was given for her portion honour, nay, great glory, by her being ordained to give birth to One who should be μέγας ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, destined to prove a great instrument in promoting the purposes of God for the benefit of man.

^{26—29}. On this portion, containing a revelation of the miraculous conception, see the Dissertation of Canon Townsend, Chron. Arr. p. 32, seqq.

²⁷. μεμνηστευμένην] 'betrothed, contracted;' without which no woman was ever married among the Jews, and probably the Gentiles also, from the earliest ages. See Hom. II. 5, 245.

²⁸. ὁ ἄγγελος] Cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, L, two cursives, and the Copt. Version, but retained by Lachm.;—very properly, since it is more likely that the two words should have been removed in four copies than inserted in all the rest, and in all the Versions except one, espec. considering they are not, as Alf. says, a gloss. In fact, the reading of B was no other than an emendation of some Critic, who thought that the two words should not come in again so soon, and accordingly removed them. Certainly a pure Greek Class. writer would not have expressed them.

The words at the end of the verse, εὐλογημένη σὺ ἐν γυναιξίν, are cancelled by Tisch., but retained by Lachm.;—very properly, since the authority for their omission is only the same as in the foregoing alteration; though here internal evidence is against them, considering that they may have been brought in from v. 42; though Lachm. does not even bracket them.

—X., κεχαριτωμένην] 'Hail, thou favoured one of God!'

³², ³³. I quite agree with Dr. Henderson on Is. ix. 5, that 'though the words of these verses are not expressly or verbally quoted from the passage of Isaiah, yet that the angel Gabriel thus applies them in the words of these verses. First (continues Dr. H.), this child was to be 'the Son of the Highest,' in reference to that part of the prophecy, 'To us a Son is given.' Secondly, he was to be 'great,' which the assemblage of exalted and distinguished names in the prediction sufficiently indicates. Thirdly, he was to have given to him 'the throne of his father David,' which corresponds to 'his government upon the throne of David' in the prophecy; and his 'reigning over the house of Jacob,' to his being

Καὶ ἀπήλθεν ἀπ' αὐτῆς ὁ ἄγγελος.

³⁹ Ἀναστὰσα δὲ Μαριάμ ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ταύταις ἐπορεύθη

'over the kingdom of David' in the following clause. Fourthly, the words 'of his kingdom there shall be no end,' are almost a literal quotation of the words, 'of the increase of his government there shall be no end.' That neither Hezekiah, nor any other temporal king of the Jews after this time, can possibly be intended, appears from the fact, that none of them ever did or could exert a beneficial influence over Galilee, since it lay entirely beyond their jurisdiction; and also from the peculiar terms of the description, which admit of no appropriate interpretation except they be applied to a Divine Person." This view Dr. Henderson confirms on the admission even of the same Neologians, Rosenm. and Schroeder, and of the earlier Rabbins.

As respects the appellations here applied to the Messiah, or that of Τίος Θεοῦ, I have already treated. I would only now add that the word μέγας is to be taken not as a simple epithet, but in a most emphatic sense, as meant to correspond to the Hebrew 'Mighty God'; and accordingly, it would be proper to write it Μίγας. Dr. Henderson observes that the celebrated Rabbins, Ben Sirā, includes "Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty God, Prince of Peace, in his enumeration of the eight names of the Messiah." See more in Bp. Bull's Works, p. 37. Jud. Eccl. p. 242, D.

³⁵ πνεῦμα ἁγίον] 'the Holy Spirit,'—namely, the creative Spirit of God. Bp. Pearson, cited by Alford, well observes, that no more is to be ascribed to the Spirit than what is necessary to cause the Virgin to perform the actions of a mother. As Christ was made of the substance of the Virgin, so he was not made of the substance of the Holy Ghost, whose essence cannot be made. And because the Holy Ghost did not beget him by any communication of his essence, therefore he is not the Father of him, though he were conceived by him. On account of such Divine conception, it is declared that that holy child which should be born of Mary should, even in his human nature, be called, and really be, the Son of God. As respects the term ἐπισκιάσει, whatever be the nature of the figure (not, however, one taken from a bird, as Grot. supposes, nor from a cloud, as Alford, because it is inconsistent with the NATURE of the thing signified), it is used to designate the Divine Power, as resting upon and exerting its influence on the Blessed Virgin at the conception of the Son of God. Thus it has nearly the same force as ἐπισκηνώσει, used, as it frequently is, in 2 Cor. xii. 9, where it is applied to the powerful Divine influence resting and abiding on Paul for his support.

— τὸ γεννώμενον ἁγίον] Render: 'that holy thing' (γένος).

³⁶. For συγγενῆς, I have now, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., received συγγενίς, from most of the ancient uncials and a few cursives (to which I can add several Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence, as existing in the great rarity of the term συγγενίς, which was therefore likely to be taken for or pass into the usual form -ης. It was also likely to be used by Luke, since, although it never occurs in the ancient and pure Greek writers, yet it is found in Synes. Epist. 155. Plut. Mor. p. 267. D. Charit. v. 3. Porphy., and other still later writers referred to by Dind. on Steph. Thes. Paris, Ed. in v. The similar, and yet rarer form, εὐγενίς, occurs in Joseph. Ant. vii. 3, and Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ix. 8. I have just afterwards adopted ἡγήσεται, instead of Vulg. γίγνη, from strong external authority (confirmed by most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and by decided internal evidence.

For τῷ Θεῷ, Tisch., and Alf. read τοῦ Θεοῦ, from B, D, L; while Lachm. retains τῷ Θεῷ, very properly; the other being evidently either an error of scribes, or a false correction of Critics.

³⁹ ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ταύταις] The expression is by some Commentators explained as standing for εὐθις, immediately. But they have not proved this signification, of which, I apprehend, the phrase is incapable. It evidently signifies, in the lax form of similar Hebrew phrases, 'about that time;' which may denote a period of two or even three weeks.

— πόλιν 'Ιούδα] What city is here meant has been not a little disputed. Some think Jerusalem; others, Hebron. But it cannot have been the former, since that was not in the Highland district; whereas Hebron, was not only a Sacerdotal city, but was situated in the Highlands. But why, then, did not the Evangelist at once say Hebron? Is it probable that he would mention the metropolis of the tribe in so very indefinite a manner? Not to say that, as Reland thinks (but qu. P.), from the air of the context, we should expect the name of some certain city. Hence he suspects that there is here an error in the reading, that the true reading is 'Ιούτα, or 'Ιούττα, itself also a sacerdotal city, and in the Highlands, a few miles east of Hebron, mentioned in Josh. xv. 55. xxi. 16. Heb. יטת. This conjecture is embraced by Vales, Michaelis, Rosenm., and Kuin. The scribes, they say, might easily confound the comparatively little known 'Ιούτα with the well-known 'Ιούδα; or 'Ιούτα may have been changed in pronunciation into 'Ιούδα at the time of St. Luke. As confirmatory of the above, I would add, that one Edition of the Sept., in the passage of Joshua above adverted to has 'Ιδδδ, plainly by an error of the scribes for 'Ιουδδδ—a dialectical variety of 'Ιούττα. However, I cannot find any evidence in the Lamb. and Mus. copies to countenance the change proposed, and consequently I still retain 'Ιούδα, which is thus used at Matt. ii. 6. and Josh. xxi. 11.

41. ἐσκίρτησε ἐν τῇ κοιλίᾳ α.] Σκίρτάν properly signifies 'to bound for joy,' as young animals do; but it is sometimes, like the Latin salire, applied to the leaping of the fœtus in utero. So Gen. xxv. 22. ἐσκίρτων τὰ παῖδια ἐν αὐτῇ, and Nonn. Dionys. viii. 224. A circumstance not uncommon in the advanced stages of pregnancy, and which is usually occasioned by sudden agitation, and sometimes by sympathy.

42—45. The knowledge that Mary was to be the mother of the Messiah is, with reason, supposed to have been conveyed to Elisabeth by immediate revelation. And her declaration of this knowledge, introduced as it was by the very words of the Angel's annunciation (v. 28), together with her delicate allusion to the unbelief of Zach., who, in a similar case, had doubted the Vol. I.

words of the Angel (see v. 20), would be a mutual confirmation of the faith of them both.

42. εὐλογ. ἐν γυναιξί] i. e. 'blessed among women;' implying blessed above them; not a mere Hebrew form of superlative, since the same mode of expression occurs in the Class. writers, both Greek and Latin, as in the Horatian lines, "Micat inter omnes Julium Sidus."

43. πόθεν μοι τοῦτο] Supply τὸ πρᾶγμα γίγνεται. A form expressive of wonder at any unexpected honour done, and not unfrequent in ancient writers. I agree with Mr. Alf., that the word Κυρίου here, as applied to the unborn babe, can no otherwise be explained, than as uttered in the spirit of prophecy, and expressing the Divine nature of our Lord; but I cannot allow his adoption of κραυγῇ, instead of φωνῇ, at the preceding verse, from merely B. L., one cursive, and Origen. He pronounces φωνῇ 'a correction to the more usual term.' Yet on Mark i. 26 he pronounces κράξαν for φωνήσαν as a correction to the more usual term; and so Iachm. alters κραυγῇ to φωνῇ in Rev. xiv. 18. I cannot but suspect that the word φωνῇ was altered to κραυγῇ by some Critic who thought that he was improving the Greek, and had in mind such passages as Rev. xiv. 18. Besides, Luke never, I believe, uses κραυγῇ, except in sensu deteriori; but he does use φωνῇ with its cognate verb, infra xxiii. 46. and Acts xvi. 28. and φωνῇ μεγάλῃ, infra iv. 33. viii. 28. Acts vii. 60. viii. 7. et al. sæpe. Why, then, should it not be thought likely that he would adopt the same expression here? Our Critics, however, thought that there would be more elegance in substituting for the cognate noun another equiv. in sense, but varying in sound, as in Matt. xv. 1. Mark vii. 10. and often in Sept. And so in John xi. 4. we have φωνῇ μεγ. ἐκράυαζε, and Acts vii. 57. κράζοντες φωνῇ μεγ., and Luke iv. 33.

45. ἡ πιστεύουσα ὅτι, &c.] There is here some difference of opinion as to the right punctuation. Most suppose it to be ἡ πιστεύουσα ὅτι, &c.; while not a few make it ἡ πιστεύουσα ὅτι. The former carries with it a more weighty sense than the other; but is not so agreeable to the usus loquendi, by which the thing believed is introduced by an ὅτι. Not that examples are wanting in Scripture of the absolute use of πιστεύω, but that ὅτι coming after πιστεύω would naturally be referred to it in construction.

ἀπὸ θρόνων, καὶ ὕψωσε ταπεινοὺς· 53 * πεινῶντας ἐνέπλησεν

However, on more mature consideration of the matter, I give the preference to the former mode, espec. since, as Lightf. thinks, there may have been present to the mind of Elisabeth the unbelief of her husband, as compared with Mary's faith.

46. In this noble Canticle the blessed Virgin devoutly praises God, 1. for his mercy to her, vv. 46—49; 2. for his mercies to all men (vv. 50—53); 3. for his espec. goodness to be shown to his faithful people in all future ages (vv. 54, 55). It is observable that most of the expressions in this sublime effusion are derived from the Old Test., espec. from the Song of Hannah, 1 Sam. ii. 1—10, in which there was so much that was remarkably suited to Mary's own case, and which concludes with a prophecy of the kingdom and power of Christ.

It is remarkable, too, for the similarity of its language to that used in other parts of the Old Test. The whole has been admirably illustrated by Bp. Jebb, Sac. Lit. pp. 392—402, whose mode, however, of handling it too often keeps out of sight (though, we may presume, not because out of mind) that higher view which ought to be taken of this portion, whereby there is ascribed to the mother of our Lord the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, which doubtless filled Elisabeth, v. 41, and Zacharias, v. 67.

—μεγαλύνει ἡ ψυχὴ μου] This use of ψυχὴ is not a mere Hebraism, but is very emphatic, and implies the greatest earnestness and intensity of feeling, as, indeed, appears by its union with πνεῦμα, so that the two words denote, by Hendiads, as at 1 Thess. v. 23, 'the whole inner man.' See my note there. Μεγαλύνειν, in this precatory sense, signifies to exalt. Ἐγαλλ. is a stronger term than μεγαλ., and denotes 'exultation and ecstatic joy.' Comp. Ps. xiii. 6, with 1 Pet. i. 8.

47. τῷ σωτηρῇ μου] Not 'my preserver,' but, 'my Saviour,' as in 1 Tim. i. 1. ii. 3. Tit. i. 3. iii. 4.

48. ὅτι ἐπέβλεψεν ἐπὶ τ. τ. δ. α.] So also Levit. xxvi. 9. This use was probably founded on that of the Heb. נָּטָה; though something like it is found in the Classical use of ἐπόπτεσθαι and ἐφορᾶν, and the Latin conspicere.

—μακαριοῦσί· 'shall esteem me happy,' namely, in giving birth to the Saviour of the world. In this absolute use the word occurs in James v. 11.

49. μεγαλεῖα] Expositors supply ἔργα. But it is better to say that, in such a case as this, the adjective is used substantively. Nor is μεγ. to be rendered (as it is done by some) wonders; but ἐποίησέ μοι μεγ. may be translated 'hath conferred upon me favours unspeakable;' for μεγαλεῖος signifies more than μέγας. The expression is found also in Ps. lxx. 19 (Sept.), & ἐποίησάς μοι μεγαλεῖα. See Deut. x. 21. The blessed Virgin had doubtless in mind the miraculous conception of the Messiah; and she adds what follows, to the end of the next verse, in expression of her sure heart-confidence in the goodness and mercy of God.

The expression ὁ Δυνατὸς, formed on the Heb. גִּבּוֹר, designates κατ' ἐξοχὴν (as in Ps. xxiv. 8. Sept.), 'the Almighty.'

50. By ἔλεος is meant, as often in the Sept., the lovingkindness of the Lord. Instead of εἰς γενεὰς γενεῶν several MSS. have εἰς γενεὰν καὶ γενεάν, which is edited by Matthæi; while Tisch. and Alf. read εἰς γενεὰς καὶ γενεάς. But these and two other various readings are no more than so many various modes of explaining or simplifying an expression somewhat unusual, yet one founded on the Hebrew idiom. The true reading here may however be thought an open question.

51. Here we have, first, an accumulation of phrases expressive of God's power; and the general declaration ἐποίησε κράτος ἐν βραχίονι αὐτοῦ is then illustrated by examples. Βραχ. denotes, by an usual Hebrew figure, 'the mighty power of God,' as shown in the most signal manner. By βραχίονι the Almighty is here represented as powerfully exerting his sovereign power.

—διεσκόρπισεν] 'he utterly discomfits.' A metaphor derived from putting to flight a defeated enemy. So Ælian V. H. xiii. 46, τοὺς μὲν διεσκόρπισε, τοὺς δὲ ἀνέκτισσε. The word not unfrequently occurs in the Sept., but very rarely in the Class. writers.

—διανοία καρδίας αὐτῶν] Διανοία is governed of ἐν understood, and the expression signifies 'their inmost thoughts and devices.' The general sense is, that 'He scatters their imaginations, frustrates their schemes, and brings their counsels to nought.'

52. καθεῖλε δυνάστας] Καθεῖρειν signifies properly to pull down, as applied to things, though often as applied to persons. Comp. Ecclus. x. 14. See my note on Thucyd. vi. 83. Δυνάστας signifies not 'kings' only, but all who are invested with political power. Something parallel as to the sentiment is found in Hesiod., Opp. i. 5, ρεῖα δ' ἀρτίηλον μινύθει, καὶ ἀδὸνλον αἰεῖται—Ζεὺς ὑπὲρβριμύτης.

53. This sentiment is closely connected with that of the preceding verse. By the expression ἀγαθῶν is meant food, agreeably to the figure in πεινῶντας καὶ κενούς. Comp. Pa. ciii. 5, 'who satisfieth thy mouth with good things;' Sept., τὸν ἐμπιπλῶντα ἐν ἀγαθοῖς. But, by the use of the term πλουτοῦντας, it should seem that πειν.

 and κενούς are to be taken of abundance, or want,
 of the subsidia vias; in short, of wealth or poverty.
 So 1 Cor. iv. 8, ἥδη κακορεσμένοι ἐστέ, ἥδη ἐπλουτήσατε. The expression κενούς is accommodated to the figure in πεινῶντας, so Job xxii. 9 (a passage here probably had in mind), χήρας δὲ ἐξαπέστειλες κινάς. Yet it may not the less mean 'destitute [of riches].' And in this absolute use the word occurs in Hdot. vii.
 131, ἀπικίατο—κινοί. Comp. Aristoph. Plut.
 593, εἴτε τὸ πλουτεῖν, εἴτε τὸ πεινῆν βέλτιον.

⁵⁴. Ἀντελάβετο] Ἀνταλαμβάνεσθαι signifies properly to lay hold of any person by the hand, in order to support him when likely to fall; but it is here (and often in the Classical writers) used metaphorically, in the sense of protect, support. By Ἰσραὴλ παιδὸς αὐτοῦ (an expression occurring in Is. xli. 8) is denoted the same as ὁ οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ, i. e. the Jewish nation, in Pa. xcvi. 3, on which the words of this verse are founded.

—μνησθῆναι ἐλέους] The Almighty is said to be mindful of his people, when he exerts his power for their support, and confers on them the benefits he promised. The expression has here peculiar emphasis, the full sense being, 'to give a fresh proof of mercy and favour to Israel, in addition to the ancient mercies shown to that people.'

The Aorists, vv. 51—54, incl., express not only the habit of the past, but also of the present, and, by implication, of the future, as to what the Lord hath done for her, inasmuch as what the Lord hath done and still doth, he may be expected to do in future, being "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." However, in translating, one cannot do better than to use the Present of custom.

⁵⁸. ἐμεγάλυνε τὸ ἔλεος αὐτοῦ μετ' αὐτῆς] A Hebraism, to signify 'showing signal kindness' to any one, found in Gen. xix. 19.

⁵⁹. ἐκάλουν] 'they were calling, were going to call, intended to call.' Comp. διακώλυν in Matt. iii. 14, where see note.

⁶¹. For ἐν τῇ συγγενείᾳ σ., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from A, B, C, L, Δ, and 10 cursives, ἐκ τῆς ἑ-ίας. Alf. pronounces the text.
 rec. "a correction to sense." But surely one reading is as much sense as the other. It is highly improbable that all the copies except 10 (or rather 9, for I find ἐκ τ. σ-ίας in MS. Trin.
 Coll. B, x. 16), and all the Versions except the Coptic should have been so industriously corrected for no purpose. Far more probable is it that ἐκ τ. σ. was a correction of the Greek by the Alex. Critics. That it is far more Class.
 Greek Mr. Alf. must know.

⁶². ἐνένευον] 'intimated by nods and becks.'
 See note supra v. 22; from both which passages the inference is so plain that Zach. was deaf as well as dumb, that one cannot help wondering at the perverse stolidity of the free-thinking De Wette and Meyer in seeking to do away with this plain fact, rendered still more plain by the words ἰθαύμασαν πάντες, at v. 68, where see note. At τὸ τί supp. κατὰ, where τὸ belongs to the whole of the subsequent clause, the sense being 'as to what name he might wish to call him.'
 This idiom of τὸ before τί is so rare, that I only know of one other example, Jos. B. J. vii. 5, 2, ἐπ' ἀδόλῳ δὲ τὸ τί φρονεῖ.

For αὐτόν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read αὐτό, from B, D, F, G, and 6 cursives; to which I can add nothing: and I cannot receive the reading, since αὐτό was more likely to be a correction of the Critics in those 10 MSS., than that all the rest of the copies should have been altered. A Class. writer would certainly have written αὐτό, as called for by the παιδίον at
 v. 59.

⁶³. πινακ.] Denoting the small square tablet, either whitened or smeared with wax, employed by the ancients, and yet in use in the East. The diminutive form is only used by the later Class.
 writers; the earlier ones use πινακίον. Ἐγραψε λέγων is a Hebraism often occurring in the Sept., and occasionally in Jos., as Antt. xi. 3, 4, and xiii. 4, 1.

70. τῶν ἁγίων—προφ.] The second τῶν is omitted in B, L, Δ, 3 cursives of the same Family, also in Orig., and Euseb., and is cancelled by Tisch., and Alf., but retained by Lachm., very properly; for as to the reason for rejecting it propounded by Gersd. and Vater, because 'the Article is no where else so used, preceded by an adjective,' yet on that very account they ought to have been less ready to cancel the Article, than to inquire whether the preceding word is really an adjective. Now Bp. Jebb and Rosenm. think it is not an adjective, but a substantive, as very often elsewhere. So Deut. xxxiii. 2, 3. 1 Sam. ii. 9. Chron. vi. 41. Job xv. 15. Ps. xxx. 4. xxxiii. 9. That the Patriarchs, from Adam downwards, were God's saints, though not all of them his prophets, is certain: and why they might well be so called, appears from Levit. xx. 7. So xix. 2. xxi. 8. This view I should have adopted, but for the very similar passage of Luke himself, Acts iii. 21, ἄχρι χρόνων ποκαταστάσεως πάντων, ὧν ἐλάλησαν ὁ Θεὸς διὰ στόματος [πάντων] ἁγίων αὐτοῦ προφητῶν ἀπ' αἰῶνος, where Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. insert τῶν before ἁγίων; which, however, Bp. Middleton thinks unnecessary. Yet here it is found in all the MSS.; and if the Article be used with the adjective, it cannot be dispensed with in the substantive. And that the writer meant it so to be taken in the passage of Acts is clear; because ἁγίων αὐτοῦ προφ. can only mean, 'of his holy prophets:' and τῶν ἁγ. πρ. could mean no more. This indeed is confirmed by 2 Pet. iii. 2, μνησθῆναι τῶν πρ. ῥημάτων ὑπὸ τῶν ἁγίων προφητῶν. Rev. xxii. 6, ὁ Θεὸς τῶν πνευμάτων τῶν ἁγίων προφητῶν, and Jos. Antt. xii. 9. 6, τεῖχος κατισκευασμένων ὑπὸ τῶν ἁγίων προφητῶν.

— ἀπ' αἰῶνος] This phrase, which often occurs in the Hellenistic writers, and sometimes in the Classical (so Longin. § 34, τοὺς ἀπ' αἰῶνος ῥήτορας)—though the latter prefer the expression ἀπ' ἀρχῆς—signifies 'from the most ancient times.'

— ἐξ] for ἀπὸ, as in a similar passage of Joseph., Antt. ix. 8, 5, ὁ Θεὸς δίδωσιν αὐτῷ τὴν ἐκ τοῦ πολέμου καὶ τῶν κινδύνων ἀδείαν.
72. ποιῆσαι ἔλεος μετὰ] An Hebraism also occurring in Acts xiv. 27. xv. 4. Gen. xxiv. 12, 14. Ps. cxix. 65. Job xii. 6. Judith viii. 26.

73—75. ὅρκον ὃν ὥμοσε] The difficulty which here exists in the construction cannot, I think, well be got rid of by supposing an ellipsis of κατὰ before ὅρκον. It should rather seem, as

Elmer and Valckn. maintain, that ὅρκον is put for ὅρκου on account of the subsequent relative ὃν, as in Luke xx. 17. Compare Mark xii. 10. Acts x. 36. Matt. xxi. 42. On this so called attraction, see Matthiae, Gr. Gr. § 474. Buttman, Gr. Gr. § 151, and Herm. on Soph. Elect. 643 and 681.

This and the next verse contain the substance of the oath unto Abraham. The Prophets of the Old Test., in describing the times of the Messiah, and the spiritual worship which was to succeed to the ceremonial observances of the law, use the very same language as that of this Divine Hymn; though neither the Jews generally, nor even the prophets themselves, understood those prophecies as we, informed by history, and enlightened by the Gospel, are enabled to do. 'Αφόβως is to be taken, not with ῥυσθέντας, but with λατρεῦειν; which is required by the construction, and yields a sense most in unison with the nature of the Gospel,—as alluding to the absence of the 'spirit of bondage,' mentioned Rom. viii. 15; the sense being, 'without fear of our spiritual enemies, Sin, the Law, and Death, over which we obtain the victory by Christ,' see 1 Cor. xv. 57, and Note. 'Οσιότης denotes the observance of all duties to God; δικαιοσύνη, the performance of all duties to men. Comp. Eph. iv. 24, and Plut. de Discr. Adul. § 43, ὅραν ὅπως ὁσιότητι καὶ δικαιοσύνῃ κοσμήσαι Σικελίαν, which, compared with the expression of the Evangelist, tends to refute the notion of the Rationalists, that the whole subject of this Song is the temporal Theocratic greatness of the Messiah. Similarly in 1 Thess. ii. 10, we have ὁσίως καὶ δικαίως, and Tit. i. 8, δικαίον, ὁσίον.

74. The words τῆς ζωῆς, not found in many of the best MSS. (including several Lamb. and Mus. copies) and some Versions and some Fathers, are with reason cancelled by all the Editors from Griesb. downwards.

76. In this and the following verses we have a remarkable prophecy respecting the dignity, office, and success of John, also describing the nature, privileges, and effects of the Gospel, and foretelling its salvation both among Jews and Gentiles.

For καὶ σὺ, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit καὶ σὺ δέ, from B, C, D, L, and 8 cursives; while Lachm. rejects the δέ, very properly, since besides overwhelming superiority of external authority, internal evidence is in favour of the text. rec. The other reading arose from error of the scribes, who commingled two readings καὶ σὺ and σὺ δέ.

II. 1¹ Ἐγένετο δὲ, ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκείναις ἐξῆλθε δόγμα παρὰ Καίσαρος Αἰγυψίου, ἀπογραφῆσθαι πᾶσαν τὴν οἰκουμένην

77, 78. In these verses it is intimated that salvation, which was, under the law, by legal righteousness alone, is, under the Gospel, obtainable alone by remission of sins, to be obtained through the free grace and mercy of God, and the satisfaction of Christ, our righteousness.

78. διὰ σπλάγχχνα ἐλέους] With this expression compare σπλ. οἰκτιρῶν at Col. iii. 12. Each is a stronger expression than either of the two nouns would be, taken singly. 'Ἐλέους is a stronger term than οἰκτ.; the latter signifying only the pain we feel at the misery of others; the former, the desire of relieving that misery, with an adjunct notion of benevolence.

— ἀνατολὴ ἐξ ὕψους] Many eminent Expositors take ἀνατολὴ to signify a budding branch, and figuratively, a son, like the Heb. פֶּטֶח. But the metaphor is so harsh, and leads to such a confusion (taken in conjunction with the words following), that I see no reason to abandon the common interpretation 'the dawn from on high,' with allusion to those passages of the Old Test. which describe the Messiah under the metaphor of the light, and the sun, see Mal. iv. 2. Against this interpretation, indeed, it is urged by Wetst. and others, that thus ἐξ ὕψους will not be a proper expression, because the sun when he ascends is always in the horizon, and not over head. The objection, however (most hypercritical in itself), might be sufficiently overruled by understanding the expression to denote, what it very well may, that moderate elevation which the sun soon attains after its rise. But ἐξ ὕψους may rather, I think, be taken (as it is done by Kuin. and Tittm.) for ἀνωθεν, i. e. from heaven, to denote the rising of the Sun of Righteousness. Mal. iv. 2. And so ἐξ ὕψους is used infra xxiv. 49. The whole passage represents the Messiah as coming, like the rising sun, to dispel the darkness which covered the world, 'bringing life and immortality to light' through the Gospel. I would here compare a noble passage of Philo Jud. 714, E, in which we have the same beautiful allusion: καθάπερ γὰρ ἀνατελλαντος ἡλίου, τὸ μὲν σκότος ἀφανίζεται, φωτὸς δὲ πληροῦται τὰ πάντα· τὸν αὐτὸν τρόπον ὅταν θεοποιῇτος ἡλῖος ἀνάσχη, καὶ ἐπιλάμψῃ ψυχῇν, ὁ μὲν τῶν κακιῶν καὶ παθῶν (I conjecture κακῶν παθῶν. See note on Col. iii. 5) ῥόφους ἀνασκιδνάται, τῆς δὲ αὐγοειδιστάτης ἀρετῆς τὸ καθαρώτατον καὶ ἀξίωραστον εἶδος ἐπιφαίνεται. Where, in the words ὅταν θεοποιῇτος—ψυχῇν, Philo had in mind Mal. iv. 2, δωτελεῖ υμῖν ἡλῖος δικαιοσύνης and θεοποιῇτος is put emphatic (like οἰκλιν ἀχειροποιήτου at 2 Cor.

v. 1, where St. Paul might have written θεοποίητον), and is in sense equivalent to θεοπνυστος. The metaphor is similar to that at 2 Cor. iv. 6, ὁ Θεὸς ὁ ἀπὸν ἐκ σκότους φῶς λαμψάει, δὲ ἐλαμψεν ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ἡμῶν. Thus, too, the citizens of the New Jerusalem as at Rev. xxii. 5, said to have no need of the 'light of the sun,' for the Lord God φωτίζει ἐκ' αὐτοῦ.

79. ὁδὸν εἰρήνης is taken from Isa. xlix. 8, but spiritualized, i. e. that peace with God which bringeth with it salvation.

80. τὸ δὲ παιδίον ἤρξε, &c.] Comp. the similar conclusion infra ii. 40.

— ἐκραταιοῦτο πνεύματι] 'and grew strong in mind and spirit' (similarly as it is said, Dan. v. 10, καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα αὐτοῦ ἐκραταιώθη), acquiring, we may suppose, in solitude such an energy as would be necessary for the work which he had to perform. The period of his retirement to the desert is with most probability supposed to have been at the age of puberty, when he would have strength of body and mind to bear that solitude, which for him was so necessary. By that seclusion he would not be warped by the pernicious prejudices of the Jewish teachers, and would moreover approach near unto God, and seek that guidance of the Holy Spirit, which was indispensable to enable him to be the herald of the Gospel.

— ἀναδείξεως] The word means properly appointment to, and also, by implication, entrance on any ministry; as x. 1, and Acts i. 24. It may be rendered, 'manifestation unto Israel [as a prophet],' when he came forward publicly in that capacity, by, as it were, a solemn inauguration into office, as recorded in Matt. iii. init.

II. 1—20. Birth of Christ, its announcement and celebration by the hosts of heaven.

1. ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκ.] With allusion not to the last verse, but to ver. 36, seqq. of the preceding chapter. Ἐξῆλθε δόγμα, 'an edict, or decree, was issued, or promulgated'; neuter for passive. This sense of ἐξίρχεσθαι occurs in the Sept. at Dan. ii. 13. ix. 25. Esth. i. 19, where it answers to the Heb. מָצָא.

— ἀπογραφῆσθαι] As respects the question whether this word should be taken as pass. or as active, I know of no instance in which ἀπογραφῆσθαι has certainly a passive sense. The case is different in those passages where there is a decidedly passive form, as in that of Xenoph., adduced in my Lex. N. T., and in Arrian, E. A. vii. 4, 12, ἀπογραφῆναι ἐκίλισιν πάντων τὰ

νόματα. It is true that Perizonius on Ælian, V. H. iv. 25, confidently asserts the passive sense to exist in this passage of St. Luke, referring for proof to the words of Dionys. Hal. Ant. iv. 10, p. 660, ταῖς ἐξῆς ἡμέραις ἀπογράφεσθαι κελεύσας τοὺς ὑποκρίως, ὅσοι τὴν πίστιν ἀδυνατοὶ ἦσαν φυλάττειν τισὶν ὀφείλουσι, καὶ πόσον ἕκαστος. But all that can be said is, that there the pass. may, not that it must, be assigned. Though, indeed, the above passage is one labouring under corruption,—a corruption rather increased than removed by the attempts of Reiske to emend it,—which I may find some fitter occasion to remove. I shall be enabled to prove that the verb is in the middle voice, and that the sense is, as here, to register oneself.

It is plain that by τὴν οἰκ., scil. γῆν, cannot be meant the whole world. Most Commentators take it to mean the Roman world, i. e. empire; an expression (like orbis terrarum in Latin) then in general use, see Acts xxiv. 5. Rev. iii. 10. xvi. 14. Since, however, no historian has noticed such a general census of the whole empire; and since it is little probable that, had there been one, it would have been mentioned in connexion with the Proprietor of Syria, we may suppose (with Keuchen, Bynæus, Wolf, Lardner, Pearce, Fischer, Rosenmuller, Kuinoel, and others) that Judæa only is meant, as in Acts xi. 28, and Luke iv. 5.

2. αὕτη ἡ ἀπογραφὴ—Κυρηνίου] Here a considerable difficulty presents itself,—namely, how to reconcile these words of the Evangelist with those of Josephus, who states the ἀπογραφὴ, or census, here spoken of, to have taken place ten or twelve years later than the birth of Jesus Christ. To remove this discrepancy various solutions have been proposed; only one of which seems entitled to attention,—namely, that of Wetstein, Campbell, and Bp. Middleton, who understand the meaning to be, that ‘though the Census was actually set on foot about the period of our Saviour’s birth, it was presently laid aside, or at least no consequences followed, till the Imperial Decree, ten or eleven (rather eight or nine) years afterwards, in the Presidency of Cyrenius.’ “It is true (says Bp. Middleton) that Josephus has not related that any order for enrolment was issued at that time; yet he adverts to circumstances which make it not improbable that some measure of this kind was thus early adopted.” In the latter part of Herod’s reign (which terminated only two years after the birth of Christ) we learn from Josephus, Hist. xvi. 9, 3, that Augustus became offended with Herod; and, in an angry letter, threatened henceforth to treat him as a slave [not slave; the original term being ὑπηκόος, subject, Edit.], by which threat it might fairly be understood, that he meant to reduce Judæa to the state of a Roman province. And it is not improbable, that though the threat was not executed in the lifetime of Herod, yet that steps might have been taken to make him believe that the emperor was in earnest. In the reign of Archælus the enrolment actually took effect, and Judæa was made subject to Augustus. Thus the meaning of αὕτη ἡ ἀπογραφὴ—Κυρηνίου will be, that the enrolment (here alluded to) first took effect (or did not take effect till) the presidency of Cyrenius. Of this and similar senses of γίνομαι many examples are adduced in Schleusner’s Lex. On the force of the Article here, and the support it gives to this mode of taking the words, see Bp. Middleton, who compares Rev. xx. 5, αὕτη ἡ διάστασις ἡ πρώτη, and iv. 1. 7. xxi. 19.

The above solution is much confirmed by two able Articles in the Journal of Sacred Lit., New Series, No. 1, p. 1—37, and No. 2, p. 457, seqq., by another correspondent, whose view very nearly coincides with the former. The following is a brief Analysis of the latter article. The writer first remarks on the inaccuracy of the version ‘to be taxed,’ which I have all along shown to be quite indefensible. There is, he truly remarks, no mention made by the Evangelist of taxing. All that his words imply is, that a decree was issued by Augustus for the enrolment, or for a census of Judæa. The object for which this was made is not stated; and perhaps no one would have thought of a taxing had it not been for the narrative of Josephus, which leads us to conclude that Judæa was taxed while Cyrenius was President of Syria. The census ordered by Augustus, and referred to by Luke, may have been made merely for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the population. It is scarcely necessary to remark, that the second verse is a parenthesis. Were it wanting, no deficiency would be felt in the sacred text. It may, then, have been thrown in with the design of explaining what went before; and the object of it probably was to obviate the very objection which it is now brought forward to support. As a decree was issued, but no enrolment took place, thus the truth of Luke’s statement might have been denied; and to guard against this, the Evangelist tells us that the decree was not fully executed till several years afterwards.

Again, what seems to have misled Expositors, is their supposing that there were two censuses made under Augustus—one just before the birth of Christ, and another under the presidency of Cyrenius—and that the Evangelist confounds the two together. But there is no mistake of the kind in his narrative. His purpose is to distinguish between the decree and the execution of it. The one was issued at the time specified by the sacred historian; but the other did not take place till many years afterwards. Something—though what that was is not stated—interfered to interrupt, or suspend, the design; and no opportunity of carrying it out with complete effect had, it seems, occurred, till the time that Cyrenius was appointed governor of Syria. The contrast between the decree and the fulfilment of it appears to be the key that unlocks the whole mystery. And if the passage be read under this remark, it will be seen that every thing is quite plain,—thus: ‘And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that the world (the whole of Judæa) should be enrolled (the enrolment itself was first completed [rather, carried into effect by execution] when Cyrenius was governor of Syria), and all went to his own city to be enrolled each.' The above view places the distinction as the sacred writer intended it, between the decree and the execution of it, which took place at different times; and it removes in an easy and natural manner what has been represented as a contradiction between the statement of Scripture and the truth of History."

It is strange that the able writer above quoted should not have seen that πάσαν τὴν οἰκουμένην signifies, not 'the whole of Judea,' but 'the whole of the Roman world,' i. e. the Roman Empire, by an use occurring in Acts xvii. 6, and xxiv. 5; also Jos. Antt. xii. 31. B. J. v. 5, 14. Herodian, v. 2, 5. The decree had reference to the whole of the empire; but its carrying into effect may have taken place at different times in different provinces. Of course Luke must here have had respect in what follows to the province of Palestine, which is included under τὴν οἰκουμένην. The question, however, is, whether it was a census of population only; or also of age, occupation, rank, or property. It should seem that the first census was one of population only, though intended to lead to another embracing those other particulars, and which took place under the government of Cyrenius. Mr. Alford, I find, coincides in this view; as does Mr. Greswell, who adduces a passage from Suidas, which clearly makes mention of this personal enrolment, in order to ascertain what was the population of the various provinces, or subject states, of the empire. "We know," remarks Mr. Alford, "from Tacit., Sueton., and Dio Cass., that Augustus had drawn up a Rationarium or Breviarium totius imperii (which took many years to accomplish), and of which this enrolment of the inhabitants of the provinces would form a part. Of the data for this Compulatio the enrolment in Luke might be one."

4. ἐξ οἴκου καὶ πατριάς Δ.] Grotius, Kypke, and others, have rightly observed that the πατριά was a part of the οἶκος; the latter comprehending the collateral branches, and even servants (οἰκογενεῖς), the former being confined to the direct line of descent; very similar to the distinction, among the Romans, of gentes and familias. After the many separations which had taken place of the Jews, any such census as the above would have been impossible, unless each went to the place which had formerly been the lot of his clan or family. The only reason which the Commentators can imagine for Mary's attendance is, that she was an heiress; for otherwise women were not registered. But it does not follow, from the words of the Evangelist, that Mary went to be registered; for σὺν may very well mean, 'accompanied by.' 5. μεμνηστευμένη] 'who had been betrothed (and was then married).' That such must be the full sense, appears from Matt. i. 25, whence it is clear that Mary had been taken to the house of Joseph before the time here spoken of.

6. ἐπλήσθησαν αἱ ἡμέραι] Simil. Gen. xiv. 24 (Sept.), καὶ ἐπλήσθησαν αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ τακεῖν αὐτήν. 'H. is here put for time; which use is frequent in Scripture, and is called a Hebraism; but it occurs in Thucyd. vi. 65, αἱ ἡμέραι ἐν αἷς ζυγίσαντο ἔξιν ἰγγυε ἦσαν.

7. ἐσπαργάνωσεν] See my Lex. These σπάργανα were not only in use then (to prevent distortion of the limbs), but were retained in use until very late in modern times.

— ἀνέκλινεν α. ἐν τῇ φάτνῃ] Ἀνακλίνω is often used absolutely; the place of laying being left to be supplied from the context, or the subject. Here it is a vox signata de hac re, and ἀνέκλινεν may be rendered 'cradled.' It is not so easy to fix the sense of φάτνη. This is commonly taken to denote 'a manger.' But, although such would seem no unfit receptacle for a new born child, yet, as mangers are not now in use in the East, but hair cloth bags instead, this interpretation has been considered unfounded. Yet it has never been established that mangers were not used by the ancients; nay, there has been tolerable proof adduced, from Homer and Herodotus, that they were; namely, of the form of our cribs, see Is. i. 3, and Job xxxix. 9. The common interpretation, however, has been thought to be untenable on another and more serious ground. For 'if the φάτνη (observes Wets.) was a part of the stable, and the stable a part of the inn, it follows that he who had a place in the stable, had one in the inn.' Yet the Evangelist says, 'there was no room for them in the inn.' 'It is (says Bp. Middleton) plain from the whole context, that φάτνη was not merely the place in which the babe was laid, but the place also in which he was born and swaddled.' The words ἐν τῇ φάτνῃ surely belong as much to ἔτεκεν as to ἀνέκλινεν, for else where should the delivery take place? Not in the κατάλυμα, for there there was no room, not merely for the child, but for 'them.' Hence Wets., Rosenm., Middl., Kuin., and many others, by φάτνη understand some place of lodging, though less convenient than the κατάλυμα. Many think it was an enclosed space, either in front of, or behind the house, and palled in, like our farm-yards. Since, however, such would seem but indifferent shelter for one in Mary's situation, others adopt the signification stable; which is thought to be confirmed by the authority of many of the early Fathers, who call the place of Christ's nativity a cave. Of these latter interpretations neither seems well-founded. If the term φάτνη denotes a building, it would seem to be neither a mere enclosed farm-yard, nor a regular building like our stable; but rather like the hovels or sheds among our farmers' home-stalls. After all, however, I apprehend that the φάτνη does not designate the building,—whatever that was, whether stable, or hovel, or cave, in which Joseph and Mary were housed, but the place in which the new-born babe was laid. A view confirmed by antiquity; for the Fathers who call the place of Christ's nativity a cave, yet plainly distinguish the cave from the φάτνη. So Origen, contra Celsum, p. 40, ἀκούουσιν τῇ ἐν εὐαγγελίῳ ἱστορίᾳ δεικνύται τὸ ἐν Βηθλεὲμ σπηλαίον, ἐνθα ἐγεννήθη, καὶ ἡ ἐν τῷ σπηλαίῳ φάτνη, ἐνθα ἐσπαργανώθη. Thus it should seem that the true sense of the term is that assigned by the ancient Interpreters generally, and the earlier modern ones,—manger or crib; a signification which occurs in Scripture, at least in the Sept., and that three times. As, however, a manger implies a stable, we may infer (what the air of the context plainly suggests) that Mary's delivery took place in some place out of the house itself, of whatever kind that might be. And after her delivery, what was so natural as that the manger of the stable or home-stall (whichever it was) would be employed as a cradle for the new-born babe, the fittest place, from its elevated position, for preserving it from danger? And it makes no difference if the place were, as the ancients universally make it, a cave; a tradition which cannot be rejected without setting too lightly by the testimony of early antiquity, in a matter where antiquity scarcely could be misinformed. That caves were sometimes (especially, we may suppose, in rocky situations, like that of Bethlehem) used as stables, is certain. Thus Eurip. Bacch. 482, Matth.: καθύρξατ' αὐτὸν ἱππικαῖς φίλας φάτναισι, ὥς ἂν σκότιον εἰσορᾷ κνίφας. Nay, that they were used not for stables only, but also for houses, might be proved by a multitude of examples. It may suffice to refer to the case of Petra, recently as it were disinterred by the persevering researches of modern travellers.

The τῇ, not found in MSS. A, B, D, L, has been cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But the external authority is quite insufficient for cancelling a word; espec. in this case, where internal evidence is in its favour. It was, I suspect, cancelled by the ancient Revisers, because they did not, any more than the modern biblical Critics, perceive the force of the article, which, I agree with Mr. Green, Gram. N. T. p. 143, is here used with φάτνη, by its association with καταλύματι; which ought indeed, in strictness, to have preceded, but which here follows almost immediately; an inversion of order, as in Heb. iii. 3.

8. ἀγραιοῦντες.] Ἀγραιοῦν properly signifies 'to make one's abode in the fields sub dō,' whether by night or day, but usually the former. It is not certain, however, that these shepherds abode in the open air. They might be in huts or tents; for Kypke cites from Diod. Sic. ἀγραιῶνα, to denote a military encampment. And Busbequius, Epist. i. 58, speaks of 'wandering flocks' tended day and night by the shepherds, who carry their wives and children with them in waggons, and for themselves, he adds, ἐξίγνα tabernacula tendunt.' Yet these shepherds were probably not Nomades, but Bethlehemites, whose watch over their flocks by night may be best expressed by the modern term house. Τῇ νυκτὶ is for νυκτερινὰς; and φυλάσσειν, φυλ. τ. ν. may be rendered, 'keeping the night watches'; the plural having reference to the various turns, or reliefs.

9. ἐπιστῇ αὐτοῖς.] Ἐφίσταται denotes to come upon the night suddenly, and, as appears from the examples in Wetstein, is especially used of supernatural appearances. Δόξα Κυρίου is best explained, with Euthym., Whitby, Schoëttg., and Wahl, here (and at Acta vii. 55. Exod. xxiv. 16. xl. 34. 1 Kings viii. 11. 2 Chron. vii. 1. Heb. mtt. τζβ) of that Θεῖον φῶς, or 'extreme splendour' in which the Deity is represented as appearing to men, and sometimes called the Shechinah; an appearance frequently attended, as in this case, by a company of angels.

11. σωτήρ] Wetstein has here and on i. 79, incontestably proved (after Bp. Pearson, On the Creed), by a vast assemblage of citations from Classical writers of every age, that the terms σωτήρ, Κύριος, Θεός, and ἐπιφανής, so often applied in Scripture to Jesus Christ, prove him to have been of an origin far more august than the human; the terms being only applicable to a Deus Præsens, The Son of God, and God. I quite agree with Mr. Alf., that Κύριος here (in the peculiar collocation Χρ. Κύρ.) corresponds to the Hebr. יהוה.

12. τὸ σημεῖον] Render: 'the sign,' namely, by which they would know where to find the new-born Christ. Βρέφος ἱστ., καίμ., &c. Render, not 'the babe,' but 'a babe swaddled,' &c. So, in a similar passage of Matt. xxi. 2, we have εὐρήσετε θύον διδιδόμενον.

—τῇ φάτνῃ] The τῇ is not found in very many of the best MSS.; and has been, with reason, cancelled by all Editors from Wetstein to Tisch. and Alf.

14. δόξα ἐν ὑψίστοις. — εὐδοκία!] From the full discussion which I was obliged to enter into of the needlessly vexed question of the construction of this passage, and also of the true interpretation of this not Doxology, but brief ejaculatory burst of praise (which consists, as I have fully evinced, of three, not two clauses, in which the third is an exegetical amplification of the second; and thus no copula is necessary), it is clear that the full sense expressed and implied is 'Be there, and by the birth of the Saviour there is, glory to God in the highest heavens, as there is (proclaimed) peace on earth (the reconciliation of man to God, Rom. v. 1. Eph. ii. 14—17. Col. i. 20), namely, the good pleasure of God (in Christ) unto men, in the acceptance of man by God.' There is a sort of parallelism, by which ἐν ὑψίστοις and Θεῷ are opposed to ἐπὶ γῆς and ἐν ἀνθρώποις respectively.

— εἰρήνη here is used as supra i. 79, and espec. infra xix. 38, where we have a similar form; εἰρήνη ἐν οὐρανῷ, καὶ δόξα ἐν ὑψίστοις! And in this sense the word occurs perpetually in the Epistles of St. Paul. Indeed, our Lord had been predicted of by Isaiah ix. 6, under the name of 'the Prince of peace.'

15. καὶ οἱ ἄνθρωποι, οἱ ποιμένες, &c.] On the use of καὶ here see note on v. 21. The next words of ἄνθρ. are not pleonastic; for the use of the Art. before each forbids us to suppose here the common idiom ἄνθρωπος πάντες; but the latter term is in apposition with, and exegetical of, the former; q. d. 'the men, i. e. the shepherds (spoken of at v. 8) said to each other.' So Thucyd. viii. 77, οἱ δὲ πεμφθέντες ἐν Σάμον, οἱ δὲ καὶ πρὸς βενταί, &c.

— τὸ ῥῆμα—τὸ γέγον.] 'The thing spoken of, which has taken place.'

those things stored up in her memory; as in many passages of the Class. writers; for συμβάλλειν means to enter into the meaning of a thing by 'comparing' [putting together, as we say] circumstances; and is used particularly of oracles, dreams, or any such things, whose meaning is not obvious, but is attained by reflection and a comparison of circumstances. 'Ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ belongs both to συνετήρει and συμβάλλουσα. So Dan. vii. 28, καὶ τὸ ῥῆμα ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ μου συνετήρησα.

20. ὑπέστρεψαν] This (for the common reading ἵπστ.) is found in almost all the MSS. and early Editions, is confirmed by numerous passages from this Gospel and the Acts, and is, with reason, adopted by every Critical Editor from Wetstein downwards.

21. αὐτόν] This (for the text. rec. τὸ παιδίον) is found in almost all the best MSS., Versions, and early Editions; and is rightly edited by Matthæi, Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. The common one is evidently a correction.

— καὶ ἰκλήθη] The καὶ here is somewhat perplexing; and hence was thrown out by the ancient Critics. Modern Editors and Expositors have, more properly, endeavoured, but unsuccessfully, to account for it. It should seem that this expression is to be referred to that idiom (commonly esteemed Hellenistic, but in reality Classical, Greek) by which καὶ is used in the apodosis to a preceding clause, containing a notation of time, either express or implied, as Thucyd. i. 50, ᾗ ᾗ δὲ ἦν οὐκ, καὶ οἱ Κορ., &c. Also Xenoph. An. vi. 4, 26, σχεδὸν δ' ὅτε ταῦτα ἦν καὶ ἥλιος ἴδυστο. Consequently, in those cases it may be rendered, 'and then,' or 'then also,' and sometimes simply then.

22. παραστήσαι] The term is used, like the Latin admonere and sistere, κατ' ἐξοχήν, both of victims brought to the altar, and of offerings consecrated to God. There is here much variety of reading. Some copies have αὐτοῦ; others αὐτῆς; but most αὐτῶν. For the first two readings there is little or no authority. Αὐτῆς is justly suspected to be a false correction, and to have proceeded from the superstition of those who were scandalized at the idea of impurity being ascribed to Jesus. Whereas they ought to have considered that the impurity was only external and ceremonial, not moral; it being merely an obligation and restraint laid on women newly brought to bed, until after the performance of certain rites.

²⁵. δίκαιος καὶ εὐλαβής]. The former term denotes 'one who faithfully discharges his duties to men'; the latter, 'one who scrupulously performs his duties to God.' And thus it is a somewhat stronger term than εὐσεβής.

— παράκλησιν τ. Ἰ.] i. e. by metonymy of abstract for concrete, Παράκλητον, the Consoler, a name, by the Jews of that age, and long afterwards, used to designate the expected Messiah, with reference to the language of the Prophets; which would then be brought peculiarly to mind by the oppression under which they were groaning from the Gentiles. As to the reason why the Article is not here used, that probably is, because Παράκλησις τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ was so commonly used of the Messiah, that it became in the end a kind of proper name; inasmuch that (as we learn from Lightfoot) men used to swear by the Messiah under that title; e. g. 'Ita videam consolationem Isr., xi,' &c. From this passage, and that infra v. 38, it seems that there was then a general expectation among the Jews of the immediate coming of the Messiah, and that the more pious among them looked to that event with stronger faith and more devout religion than the multitude. See on Matt. ii. 1, and xi. 3.

τ. Π., as in Matt. ii. 12. Acts x. 22, and elsewhere. But this is one of Luke's peculiar idioms. In what manner this Divine oracle in the present case conveyed, whether by oral communication, dream, or otherwise, we are not told; but it was probably by dream. Whether Simeon was, as Mr. Alf. thinks, the subject of an especial indwelling and leading of the Holy Spirit, according to which God's saints have often been directed and informed in an extraordinary manner, we cannot know; and to pronounce positively where nothing is revealed is being 'wise above what is written.'

²⁹. ἀπολύεις] Ἀπολύειν signifies properly 'to let go from any place (or fig. from any state, which implies coercion) to any other place,' as home, &c.; and it is used either with εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν, or absolutely; and sometimes, as here, it is employed figuratively, and by euphemism, of death, with the addition of τοῦ σώματος, or of τοῦ ζῆν, as is usual in the Classical writers, though in the Scriptural ones without it, as here and in Num. xx. 29, and Gen. xv. 2. The term was by the Classical writers used partly of deliverance from confinement, and restoration to liberty; partly of deliverance from labours and anxieties of various kinds, not only by the being eased of laborious duties, but by removal from them by death; inasmuch as, amidst various metaphors, the body is supposed to enchain the soul, and detain it from its native home. Accordingly the sense of the passage is, 'Now, Lord, thou dost [by this sight] dismiss me to the grave, as thou promisedst, in peace and tranquillity, because mine eyes have seen thy salvation,' i. e. the author of it. The aged saint, by a beautiful figure, takes this sight of his Redeemer as a dismissal from the burden of life, a sort of Go in peace! So Bereshith R. 63. 16, 'Melius, ait, fuisse illi ut dimitteretur in pace.' We may suppose that life having been considered by him as involving a service to be rendered, and a duty to be performed, he regarded dismissal from life as the being loosed from that burthen, the being freed from its onuses. The same metaphorical use, and in the same term, occurs in Soph. Antig. 314. ποίῳ δὲ καταλύσαι, ἐν φοναίῃ, τρώῃ, where

Linwood wrongly supplies τὸν βίον, the verb ἀπολ. being a middl. reflex., and the sense there intended, 'in what manner did she free herself (supply τοῦ βίου) by suicide?' where Musgrave aptly adduces Plutarch, frag. Wytenb. p. 155, ἀπολίσσεται γὰρ τὸν ἀποθνήσκοντα, καὶ τὸν θάνατον ἀπόλυσιν καλοῦσι,—and he might have added a passage still more to the purpose from v. 1254 of the same drama, ἔθανε, ἀπελύθη, 'hast got free,' vitā soluta es. 'Οτι, after ἐν εἰρήνῃ, is to be closely connected therewith, and rendered, not 'for,' but 'because.' Now this construction is common when a verb or adjective precedes; why, then, should it not be allowed after an adjectival phrase? The other signification requires much unauthorized subaudition to make out any construction, as will appear from consulting the Paraphrasts. Δεσποτῆς is in Scripture often used, as here, of the supreme Lord, i. e. God; though in the Classical writers the highest sense it bears is as used of Sovereigns.

30. εἶδον οἱ ὀφθ.] In εἶδον οἱ ὀφθ. μου there is an emphasis and energy, as in Gen. xiv. 12. Job xix. 27. xlii. 5. 1 John i. 1. Τὸ σωτήριον, Neut. adjective for substantive, as in Luke ii. 30. Eph. iii. 6. Ps. xciii. 2. It is here put for σωτήρα. Κατὰ πρόσωπον is nearly equivalent to ἐνώπιον. This is not a mere Hebraism, since several examples have been adduced from the Classical writers. There is, however, this difference between the Classical and the Scriptural usage,—that in the former the phrase is usually significant, in the latter, generally pleonastic. Here, however, it has much force; the full sense being, 'On whom all nations may fix their eyes,' as the object of their faith and hope.

32. ὅπως—ἰθὺν] This is in apposition with τὸ σωτήριόν σου at ver. 30. Grotius observes, that the passage has reference to Is. xlii. 6, and Ps. xcvi. 2, from which it should seem that there is here a transposition, for ὅπως ἰθὺν, εἰς ἀποκάλυψιν. But εἰς ἀποκ. does not, I conceive, mean (as Grotius and others suppose) 'for a revelation of the righteousness of God'; but is better explained by Euthymius εἰς ἀνδ-βλεψιν τῶν ἰθὺν, scil. πετυφλωμένων τῇ πλάνῃ, namely, for their deliverance from that spiritual darkness which had so long enveloped them. The result is expressed in the next words, q. d. 'So as to produce glory to thy people Israel, among whom the Saviour was born.'

34. οὗτος κείται, &c.] The imagery is supposed to be taken from Is. viii. 14. xxviii. 16, which passages are applied to the Messiah in Rom. ix. 33. See Grotius, Wolf, Le Clerc, and Wets., who remark, that under the figure of a stone lying in a path, on which heedless persons may trip, Christ is designated as a rock of stumbling to those who reject him, but a rock of support to those who avail themselves of his aid. Κεῖσθαι is not to be regarded as implying fatality; but must be taken in a popular acceptance for to be ordained or appointed for any thing, as in Phil. i. 17, and 1 Thes. iii. 3. Πτώσιν and ἀνάστασιν are to be taken, respectively, of sin and misery,—and of reformation and happiness; i. e. as to the event, namely, that he should be the occasion of sin to many, who would reject him, and be the occasion of many being raised from the bondage of sin to repentance, faith, and salvation through him.

—εἰς σημεῖον] scil. εἶναι. There are few passages on the sense of which Interpreters are less agreed than the present, and that from the extensiveness of signification in the word σημεῖον. The chief point, however, to be considered is, not what it might mean anywhere, but what it may by the context be determined to mean here, especially as forming part of a phrase. This principle will reduce the multitude of interpretations to only two that have any semblance of truth. Σημεῖον may, with the Pesch. Syr., Beza., Brug., Maldon., Macknight, and Doddridge, be supposed to stand for σκοπόν, and mean, like the Latin signum, 'a mark or butt to be shot at'; and thus, by a figure derived from archery, intimate the deliberate malice of Christ's persecutors. So Lament. Jer. iii. 12, 'He hath bent his bow, and set me as a mark for the arrow,' ἰσθίλωσις με ὡς σκοπόν εἰς βίλος, not unfrequent in the Old Test. The metaphor, too, is highly applicable to Christ's passion, which seems alluded to at v. 35.

To this interpretation, however, it has been objected, that the metaphor fails at ἀντιλεγόμενον, and that no example of such a sense of σημεῖον has been adduced. These arguments are, however, not of sufficient weight to overturn an interpretation which has so much to recommend it. Yet, as there seems little doubt that the pious speaker had in his mind the words of Is. viii. 14—18, so σημεῖον may justly be supposed to bear the same sense here which it does there; and thus we may, with Grotius and most other eminent Expositors, take the meaning to be, that 'Christ should be a signal example of virtue calumniated.' Ἀντλ. is to be understood of actions, as well as words, like ἀντιλογία at Heb. xii. 3, which passage is highly illustrative of the present.

35. καὶ—δι'] 'quia—imo.' Σοῦ αὐτῆς. Not merely for σταντῆς, but put separate for emphasis' sake. See Matth. Gr. Gr. § 148. In τὴν ψυχ. δ. ῥομφαία we have figurative language, similar to what is found in the Poetic parts of the Old Test., and indeed in the Classical Greek Poets, by which the mind is said to be wounded, as the body is transfixed with arrows, swords, &c.

36 Καὶ ἦν Ἄννα προφῆτις, θυγάτηρ Φανουὴλ, ἐκ φυλῆς Ἀσὴρ· αὕτη προβεβηκυῖα ἐν ἡμέραις πολλαῖς, ζήσασα ἔτη μετὰ ἀνδρὸς ἑπτὰ ἀπὸ τῆς παρθενίας αὐτῆς. 37 Καὶ αὕτη χήρα ὡς ἐτῶν ὀγδοηκονταεσσάρων, ἣ οὐκ ἀφίστατο ἀπὸ τοῦ ἱεροῦ, νηστεῖαις καὶ δεήσεσι λατρεύουσα νύκτα καὶ ἡμέραν 38 καὶ αὕτη αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ ἐπιστάσα ἀνωμολογεῖτο τῷ Κυρίῳ, καὶ ἐλάλει περὶ αὐτοῦ πᾶσι τοῖς προσδεχομένοις λύτρωσιν ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ. 39 Καὶ ὡς ἐτέλεσαν ἅπαντα τὰ κατὰ τὸν νόμον Κυρίου, ὑπέστρεψαν εἰς τὴν Γαλιλαίαν εἰς τὴν πόλιν αὐτῶν Ναζαρέτ. 40 Τὸ δὲ παιδίον ἤϊξανε, καὶ ἐκραταιοῦτο πνεύματι, πληρούμενον σοφίας· καὶ χάρις Θεοῦ ἦν ἐπ' αὐτό.

See Prov. xii. 18, and several citations which I have adduced in Recens. Synop. We can be at no loss to imagine the many ways in which this prophecy was fulfilled in the mother of Jesus, she being a witness to the many insults and sufferings endured by Jesus, and especially, at the foot of the Cross, of his cruel and ignominious death. See John xix. 25.

— ὅπως ἂν ἀποκαλυφθῶσιν ἐκ π. κ. δ.] i. e. 'in order that thereby the real character of every one [as to truth and virtue] may be displayed.' I agree with Bishop Lonsdale that these words should be read in connexion with ver. 34 (the intermediate words καὶ σοῦ—ῥομφαία being parenthetical), and that the sense is, that 'while all the Jews profess to be anxiously desiring the appearance of the Messiah, the very thoughts (or dispositions) of their hearts may be revealed (or made manifest), and thus it may appear which of them desire him with worldly, and which with spiritual views.' Διαλογ. denotes properly 'regitation,' but also 'intent,' or 'purpose,' which being indicative of 'disposition of mind,' it came to have that sense, as here, and infr. vi. 8.

36. προφῆτις] Of the various senses which have been assigned to this term, the best founded may probably be that of the ancient Expositors, and, of the modern ones, Grotius and Schleusner, 'one endued with the χάρισμα or spiritual grace of uttering Divine revelations;' or, in a general way, 'one to whom God reveals himself by his Spirit.'

37. αὕτη is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. on the authority of 4 uncials, 5 cursive MSS., and 2 late Versions. But the authority is insufficient, especially considering that internal evidence is in favour of the word, which was more likely to be removed (for the sake of getting rid of a seeming tautology) than to be inserted in all the copies but nine, and all the Versions but two.

— χήρα ὡς ἐτ. δγ.] The very long widowhood of Anna is particularly adverted to, since virtuous widowhood was held in great honour among the Jews, and even Gentiles. And monogamy was held in high esteem among the nations of antiquity. See Joseph. Antt. xviii. 6. 6. Val. Max. ii. 1. 3.

— οὐκ ἀφίστατο—νύκτα καὶ ἡμ.] A strong expression, importing that she assiduously attended at all the stated periods of public worship, both day and night (for there were occasionally night-services of sacred vocal music); and also that she spent most of her time in the Temple, engaged in prayer, with fasting and holy meditation.

— νηστεῖαις καὶ δεήσεσι λατρ.] Λατρεύειν is here employed, like inservire in Latin for vacare, in the very unusual sense, to be devoted to any thing. The nearest approach to which is that use by which λατρεύω sometimes signifies serve, with a Dative of person, as at Acts xxvii. 23.

38. ἐπιστάσα] 'coming up,' as at x. 40. The αὕτη here is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from A, B, D, L, X, Δ, some 5 cursives, and the Copt. Version; internal evidence is rather against the removal. In words so nearly the same one was almost sure to thrust out the other. So several Lamb. and Mus. copies have not the αὕτη, yet a few ancient Mus. copies and also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, have not the αὕτη. The τῷ Θεῷ for τῷ Κυρίῳ, edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from B, D, L, X, is evidently a critical alteration to prevent mistake. Αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ, i. e. at the time that Symeon uttered the above words. Ἀνωμολογεῖτο τῷ Κ. This is by some rendered, 'returned thanks.' That sense, however, is confined to the Classical writers; and even in them has χάρις added, and is accompanied by no Dative. It is better to adopt the sense which the word bears in some kindred passages of the LXX. (as Ps. lxxix. 13), and render, 'returned praises to the Lord.' The two significations, however, merge into each other. Αὐτρωσιν here seems to include the two notions of deliverance and of redemption. Most of the Jews thought only of the temporal, while the wiser few took it in the spiritual sense.

and Wakef. take these words (by an idiom connected with the oblique cases of Θεός, to denote greatness, or excellence, and, by a common signification of χάρις, grace) to denote that Jesus was of extraordinary comeliness. But there is no example of such a sense of χάρις in the New Test., nor any nearer approach to it than gracefulness of speech; which cannot here apply. Besides, χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ is of such frequent occurrence in the New Test. (espec. in St. Luke's writings), that the Evangelist would never have ventured on introducing such an idiom of Θεός as that just adverted to in this case, since misapprehension would be sure to arise. In fact, χάρις Θεοῦ, except in a few passages where it has reference to the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, always denotes in the New Test. the favour of God to men. And that it is so taken here, is placed beyond doubt by a kindred passage, infra ver. 52.

⁴¹ τῇ ἑορτῇ] The ancient Versions all render as if they had in their copies ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ. But, as none of our MSS. present this reading, we may suppose that the translators thought there was an ellipse of ἐν, and accordingly supplied it. And certain it is that the ἐν is invariably found with ἑορτῇ in the Sept., and almost always in the Class. writers. Indeed, the only examples I have ever noted of ἐν not found in this case is in Pind. Olymp. v. 11, βωμοῖς δὲ διδύμοις ἐγίγαρον ἑορταῖς θῶν μεγίσταις, and Athen. p. 137, Ε. ἄρτον δὲ ταῖς ἑορταῖς προσπατιδίβαι. No reason, however, is there to suppose, in such a case, an ellipse of ἐν, since we may regard the Dative as one of time; though that is very rarely found, except with words denoting time, as ἡμέρα, ἔτος, ἐνιαυτός, &c. Yet of this three examples have been adduced; to which add Hom. Il. xv. 324, θῆρε δύν κλονίσαι, μολαῖνς νυκτὸς ἀμολαγῶν Ἑλθόντ' Ἰξάτινς, &c. Jos. Antt. xvi. 2, 4, καὶ ταῖς ἑορταῖς ἄγοντας ἡμᾶς εἰς δικαστήρια, and Thucyd. iii. 54, μάχῃ τῇ γιν., et al. sup.

⁴² ἀναβάντων αὐτῶν] The αὐτῶν includes Jesus; which, indeed, is implied in the preceding words ὅτε ἐγένετο &c.; for the age of twelve years (which was considered the age of puberty, and was that when the children were put to learn some trade) was, as appears from the Rabbinical writers, that at which the above obligation was thought binding; when, too, they were solemnly introduced into the synagogue, and initiated in its doctrines and ceremonies.

— ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ] By this is meant an apartment in the Temple, where the doctors sat, for the purpose of public instruction. We need not press on the sense of ἐν μέσῳ, which may simply mean 'among them;' the sense being, as Bornemann explains, 'sedebat inter doctores,'—namely, so as to be seen and heard by all. Nor are we from ἐπερωτῶντα αὐτοὺς to suppose any thing like disputation, but modest interrogation and discussion. Indeed, it is plain from the Rabbinical citations in Lightfoot, that the Jewish doctors used such a plan of instruction as dealt much in interrogation on the part of the taught. Something very similar occurs in the account given by Josephus of his boyhood, Life, § 2: Ἐγὼ δὲ συμπαίδευμένος, εἰς μεγάλην παιδείαν προέκοπτον ἐπίδοσιν, μνήμη τε καὶ συνέσει δοκῶν διαφέρειν. Ἐτι δ' ἀρα παῖς ἂν, περὶ τισανρισκαδικάτων ἵπτοι, διὰ τὸ φιλογράμματος ὑπὸ πάντων ἱπποσύνην, συνόντων αἰὶ τὴν ἀρχιερίων καὶ τῶν τῆς πόλεως πρώτων, ὅτι τοῦ παρ' ἐμοῦ περὶ τῶν νομίμων ακριβέστερόν τι γινώσκει.

49. ἐν τοῖς τοῦ Πατρὸς μου] Commentators are perplexed with this elliptical expression, in which some supply πράγμασι; others, οἰκίμασι. The former is well supported by Classical examples; and if Luke were a Classical author, it would deserve the preference; but in an Hellenistic writer the proof is invalid. It is therefore better, with the ancient and a great majority of the modern Commentators, to supply οἰκίμασι, of which ellipse Wets. has adduced examples in superabundance, both from the Classical and Scriptural writers. So Gen. xli. 51. Eccles. xlii. 10. Comp. John ii. 16. Since, however, the question in respect to suitableness is nearly equal, and the former sense is the weightier, and in some measure includes the latter, but not vice versa,—we are warranted in preferring it. I am not quite sure whether it may not be better, with Bornem., to dispense with any ellips., by simply supposing τὰ τοῦ Πατρὸς to stand for τὰ πατρώα, denoting 'any thing concerning his Father,'—his worship, the place of that worship, and the employment of promoting a knowledge of his word, carried on there. Indeed, Dean Prideaux, Connexion, l. ix. vol. iv. p. 395, Ed. Oxon., regards, with some reason, our Lord's presence in the Temple on this occasion as his first appearance in his prophetic office and in the business of his Father, on which he was sent, in sitting among the doctors in the Temple, and there declaring the truth of God unto them. "This (continues the Dean) was his first sign of coming to his Temple foretold by the Prophet Malachi (iii. 1), whereby, according to the Prophet Haggai, 'the glory of this latter house was made to be much greater than that of the former.' He had been personally there before (at his baptism), but now first ministerially [officially], as the Messenger of the Covenant, whereby the messages of life and salvation were revealed unto men. And, on this his coming, began to be fulfilled that signal prophecy of Jacob, 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a Lawgiver from beneath his feet, until Shiloh (meaning the Messiah) come.'"

50. οὐ συνῆκαν αὐτ.] 'They did not fully comprehend his meaning;' probably from the ambiguity of the mode of expression, and that he chiefly intended 'the business for the accomplishment of which his heavenly Father had sent him into the world.' See John iv. 34. vi. 38. v. 17. ix. 4. xvii. 4. They knew in some sense who he was, but were not prepared to hear so direct an appeal to his heavenly Father. There is a close connexion in thought between this and the next verse, which is intended to intimate that, notwithstanding what he had on that occasion said to them of his heavenly Father, he continued to live in the practice of all proper obedience to them as his earthly parents. In this use of the participle ὑποτασσ. and ἦν, is implied a notion of continuance and habit of action, q. d. 'notwithstanding the astounding occurrences just recorded, Jesus continued to be, as before, habitually obedient to them.'

51. διετῆρει πάντα τὰ ῥήματα, &c.] 'Ῥήματα may here include both 'sayings and doings,'—i. e. the words spoken, and all the circumstances connected with the affair just before spoken of. Διετῆρ. means laid up and kept these occurrences as matters of deep reflection. The phrase διετῆρ. ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ is very unusual, and was probably derived by the Evangelist from Dan. vii. 28, τὸ ῥῆμα ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ μου διετῆρσα. Passages have, indeed, been by Expositors adduced from Philo and the Class. writers, but none to the purpose. More aptly might they have compared Hom. Od. xxi. 355, παιδὸς γὰρ μῦθον πεπνυμένος ἐνθετο θυμῳ.

52. προέκοπτε] i. e. 'continued increasing' in wisdom, as well as 'advancing' ('making progress,' see my Lex. in v.) in age and stature; said with reference to what went before, v. 40, τὸ δὲ παιδίον ᾗζανε καὶ ἰκραταιοῦντο πνεύματι, πληρούμενοι σοφίας· καὶ χάρις Θεοῦ ἦν ἐπ' αὐτόν, meaning to intimate, that as before his parents went with him to Jerusalem he had been advancing in bodily growth and strengthening in mental vigor, with an abundant measure of wisdom and Divine grace, so after he returned with them to Nazareth he kept making the same advance as before.

It has indeed been thought a no inconsiderable difficulty to imagine how a Divine Being could be said to increase in wisdom. But it has been well observed by Mr. Le Bas, that "the astonishing intercourse of the Deity with man, exhibited in the person of our Redeemer, was an actual coalition of the two natures; a coalition so intimate and so complete as to produce a perfect unity of counsel and singleness of agency." "By keeping," continues he, "this in view, we bring the light closer to the mysterious truth here announced. Like other men, the Son of Mary had a reasonable soul, whose faculties were capable of gradual expansion. The Divine essence, however intimately united to the human, did not supply the place of the intellectual functions; but, as the mental powers of the man advanced in capacity and truth, the perfections of the Godhead poured in its illuminations." So that during the eighteen subsequent years of our Saviour's life we may consider him as gradually but surely advancing onward to that fulness of wisdom and virtue, which was recognized at his baptism by the Divine approval expressed by ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα.

III. 1. On the chronological questions connected with this passage, the reader is referred to Dr. Hales, Mr. Benson, and Canon Townsend.

2. ἐπ' ἀρχ. 'A. καὶ K.] There has been much perplexity occasioned by the use, in the Gospels and also in Josephus, of phraseology expressing or implying plurality, where the Law recognized but one. In strict propriety there could be but one high-priest at a time, who held the office for life. But, after the subjection of Judea to the Roman yoke, great changes were made; and the occupants of an office, in which had been vested almost regal authority, were changed at the will of the conquerors. Hence some have supposed that the office had become annual, and that Annas and Caiaphas, occupying it by turns, each, or both, might be said to be the high-priest. This, however, is a wholly gratuitous supposition, and overturned by what is said in Joseph. Antt. xviii. 2, 2. Others think that Caiaphas was the high-priest, and Annas his sagan, or deputy,—a title given to him by Joseph. Antt. xviii. 6, 24. And great was the dignity of the sagan, who was allowed, upon occasion, to perform the highest sacred functions of the high-priest. Others, again, imagine that the title is given to Annas, as being the chief of Aaron's family then alive, and being regarded as the rightful high-priest by the Jews, though Caiaphas held the office by appointment of the Roman governor. These last two methods likewise proceed on supposition; and although there is nothing which contradicts either, there is no reason for giving a preference to one or the other. It would seem, therefore, though Lachm. describes Annas and Caiaphas as being both high-priests at the same time, that one of them was, in a more peculiar manner, considered as high-priest of the year; that Annas, as ex-high-priest, was reckoned as still having the office, as he certainly exercised the power, John xviii. 13; espec. as he might be actually in the office of sagan, and thus be enabled the better to retain his pristine authority. I have now, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alé, received ἀρχιερέως, from almost all the uncials, and not a few cursive MSS., including all the ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies, confirmed by internal evidence, though I cannot but suspect that the reading was brought in in order to get rid of the awkwardness of supposing two high-priests.

4, 5, 6. The quotation exactly corresponds with the Sept., at least in the Alex. MS., though in the Vatican πάντα is inserted before τὰ σκολιὰ, and for αἱ τραχεῖαι εἰς ὁδοὺς λείας the Alex. has ἡ τραχεῖα εἰς ὁδοὺς λείας, the Vatican ἡ τραχεῖα εἰς πᾶσα λεία; but the reading αἱ τραχεῖαι is confirmed by the Hebrew and Chalm. Par., and the Vulg. and Arab. Versions. For ὁδοὺς λείας the Hebr., Chalm., Syr., and Arab. would require ὁδὸν λείαν; and so Aqu., Symm., and Theod., εἰς πᾶσαν. The other is a free and less correct version. The words τὸ σωτήριον τ. Θεοῦ are derived from the Sept., though the Hebrew and the other Versions have them not, leaving 'the glory of the Lord' to be repeated from the preceding clause. But the Translator substituted here τὸ σωτήριον τ. Θεοῦ for αὐτὸ because (as Dr. Henderson saw) he understood the foregoing phrases of the promised Saviour, as in Luke ii. 30.

5. The Evangelist cites this passage of the Prophet more fully (continuing it further) than Matthew and Mark, because he was writing especially for Gentile converts; and the latter part of the citation was necessary to assure them that the 'salvation of God' and the participation in the privileges of the Gospel extended to them as well as the Jews.

6. ὄψεται τὸ σωτήριον τοῦ Θεοῦ] Comp. τὸ σωτήριόν σου supra, with Ps. xcvi. 2, Sept., and Is. lx. 6, and Lam. iii. 26. The Baptist had here in mind the words of Exod. xiv. 13, ὁράτε τὴν σωτηρίαν παρὰ τοῦ Κυρίου (Alex. Θεοῦ), and 2 Chron. xx. 17, ἰδετε τὴν σωτηρίαν Κυρίου, and Is. lii. 10, ὄψονται τὴν σωτηρίαν παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, where, as in Exod.

7 Ἐλεγεν οὖν τοῖς ἐκπορευομένοις ὄχλοις βαπτισθῆναι ὑπ' αὐτοῦ Γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν! τίς ὑπέδειξεν ὑμῖν φυγεῖν ἀπὸ τῆς μελλούσης ὀργῆς; 8 Ποιήσατε οὖν καρποὺς ἁγίους τῆς μετανοίας· καὶ μὴ ἄρξησθε λέγειν ἐν ἑαυτοῖς· Πατέρα ἔχομεν τὸν Ἀβραάμ· λέγω γὰρ ὑμῖν, ὅτι δύναται ὁ Θεὸς ἐκ τῶν λίθων τούτων ἐγεῖραι τέκνα τῷ Ἀβραάμ. 9 Ἡδὴ δὲ καὶ ἡ ἀξίνη πρὸς τὴν ῥίζαν τῶν δένδρων κείται· πᾶν οὖν δένδρον μὴ ποιῶν καρπὸν καλὸν ἐκκόπτεται καὶ εἰς πῦρ βάλλεται. 10 Καὶ ἐπηρώτων αὐτὸν οἱ ὄχλοι, λέγοντες· Τί οὖν ποιήσομεν; 11 Ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ λέγει αὐτοῖς· Ὁ ἔχων δύο χιτῶνας μεταδότες τῷ μὴ ἔχοντι· καὶ ὁ ἔχων βρώματα ὁμοίως ποιεῖτω. 12 Ἦλθον δὲ καὶ τελῶναι βαπτισθῆναι, καὶ εἶπον πρὸς αὐτόν· Διδάσκαλε, τί ποιήσομεν; 13 Ὁ δὲ εἶπε πρὸς αὐτούς· Μὴδὲν πλέον παρὰ τὸ διατεταγμένον ὑμῖν πράσσετε. 14 Ἐπηρώτων δὲ αὐτὸν καὶ στρατεύομενοι, λέγοντες· Καὶ ἡμεῖς τί ποιήσομεν; Καὶ εἶπε πρὸς αὐτούς· Μὴδένα διασεύσητε, μὴδὲ συκοφαντήσητε· καὶ ἀρκείσθε τοῖς ὀφωνίοις ὑμῶν.

xiv. 13, the Genit. of relation is freely, but very faithfully expressed by the addition of παρὰ. This view is confirmed by a passage of Coloss. ii. 19, where τὴν αὐξήσιν τοῦ Θεοῦ is, as I have there shown, for παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ.

10. ποιήσομεν] Many MSS., including almost all the ancient ones, have ποιήσωμεν, which is edited by Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., who adopt the same reading from the same MSS. at vv. 12 and 14, while Scholz inconsistently retains ποιήσομεν in those passages. For my own part, I suspect that in all three the reading arose from gloss, or rather alteration, for the sake of introducing purer Greek; though this is not, as we shall see, decidedly unclassical. This use of the fut. ind. for the subjunct. (an idiom probably derived from the Hebrew) occurs also in Matt. xxviii. 21. xix. 1, and elsewhere in the Gospels, as also in the Epistles. So Rom. vi. 1, ἐπιμενοῦμεν τῇ ἀμαρτίᾳ. The same variety of reading occurs at John vi. 5, where the above three Editors read ἀγοράσωμεν, which seems supported by external authority, though internal evidence is in favour of -σομεν, and the sense intended may be, 'what! are we to buy?' as here the sense is, 'what are we to do?' That this use of the fut. indic. was thought to differ little from the subjunct. is plain from Eurip. Ion 758, where they are thus combined in the same clause: εἰπωμεν ἢ σιγῶμεν, ἢ τί δράσωμεν; though in the line but one before, we have τί δρώμεν; In either case the sense is the same, namely, 'what are we to do?' It is essential to this idiom that the sentence should be interrogative; and therefore in Cratet. Frag. θηρ. i. 10, μ. 80 [Meineke] (supplying the only example known to me in the Class. writers): Ὀύκοῦν μεταστρέψας σιαντὸν δλαὶ πάσαις δλείφω, for οὐκοῦν, the learned Editor should have written οὐκ οὖν and δλείφω; 'why, then, won't you, can't you?' &c. The use of οὖν is the same in both passages.

13. μηδὲν πλέον—πράσσετε] 'exact.' This VOL. I.

use of πράσσειν, as said of levying taxes (like perficere in Latin,) is frequent in the Class. writers. The original sense seems to have been 'to manage.' The difference between the active and middle forms is this: the active signifies to collect for another's use, the middle to collect for one's own. Διατάσσειν is a vox signalis, used of legal enactments, especially such as relate to laying on taxes. The παρὰ after a comparative, or a word which implies comparison (espec. μείζων or κρίττων), is used for ἢ, both in the Scriptural and Class. writers. So Appian, vol. ii. 78, πλείονες παρὰ τοὺς ἀρχαίους. The literal sense is 'alongside of;' and juxta-position almost implies comparison. The Baptist does not, we see, condemn the exercise of their profession, but only the abuse of the power it gave them.

14. στρατεύομενοι] Michaelis thinks that this denotes 'men under arms, or going to battle;' for he imagines that Herod's war with Aretas had already commenced; and that there is here reference to the troops engaged in that service. A chronological reason, however, lies against this supposition, so strong, that it is better to take στρ. to denote men engaged in military service; as in Jos. Antt. xix. 9, 1, ὅσοι στρατευόμενοι ποτε ἔτληον. The Article would indeed seem wanting; but it may be understood, and indeed is found in several MSS., or suppl. τινὲς.

— μηδένα διασεύσητε] This is by many Commentators taken to mean, 'do not harass any one;' a signification found in the Class. writers. But some more special sense seems to be intended. It is therefore best explained as equivalent to, and indeed formed on, the Latin phrase concussere, 'to extort money by dint of threats of violence.' Συκοφ. signifies 'to extort money by false accusation, or the threatening of it.' [Comp. Exod. xxiii. 1.]

— ἀρκείσθε τοῖς ὀφωνίοις] In the early ages a soldier's pay consisted chiefly in a supply of food, and was called ὀφώνιον, from ὄψον, and meant something to buy ὄψον withal. Now ὄψον, according to Boeck, i. 137, originally signified every thing used as food, with the exception of what was prepared from corn; nearly what we mean by meal. In process of time an equivalent in money was substituted for the supply of meat; and then ὀψώνιον, which had originally signified support, came to denote pay: though still some allowances of food were left the soldier, which probably opened a way to the extortion alluded to. Much light is thrown on this matter by a passage of Joseph. de Vit. § 47, συνισβύλιον (namely, his soldiers) πρὸς μηδὲνα μῖτε πολεμῶν, μῖτε ἀρπαγῇ λαμβάνειν τὰς χώρας (farms), ἀλλὰ σκηνοῦν κατὰ τὸ πείλον ἀρκουμένων τοῖς ταυτῶν ἐφοδίοις.

15. διαλογιζομένων—μήποτε αὐτὸς εἴη ὁ Χριστός.] Dr. Hammond and Mr. Wesley render, 'whether he were not the Christ,' which is supported by the Pesch. Syr. Version, 'thinking that perhaps he were the Christ,' as also by one MS., which has ἵστω ὁ Χριστός. But the context plainly calls for the dubitative sense of μή; and consequently the exact version will be, 'whether he were or were not the Christ,' though there is reason to suppose, that they felt strongly inclined to think he was. This view is borne out by the air of the preceding context; and such seems to have been the opinion of Chrys., Theoph., and Euthym. Nay, they go almost as far as the Pesch. Syr.; for they regard it as a supposition or opinion. But μήποτε, when followed by the opt., must necessarily imply some doubt (which probably differed in different persons; as was the case on other occasions. See Matt. xxviii. 17); and this idea of doubt may be recognized in John vii. 26, μήποτε ἔγνωσαν—ὅτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ Χριστός, 'have they, or have they not, ascertained that,' &c. Accordingly, the term mused (i. e. pondered), whether he were not the Christ, however it may (as in the use of μήποτε δὲ at 2 Tim. ii. 25) be scarcely warranted by nice grammatical propriety, is very possibly the sense intended by the Evangelist. This will serve to determine the sense, however debated, of προσδοκῶντος τοῦ λαοῦ, of which the sense, 'the people being in expectation,' viz. as Meyer explains, that John would declare himself the Christ, is inconsistent with the μήποτε. The Evangelist seems to mean that they were in anxious expectation (so Acts xxviii. 6), surprised, i. e. inclined to think he was; but their belief was damped with doubts; and consequently they waited the event which should decide the matter.

21. ἐν τῷ βαπτισθῆναι, &c.] A difference is to be noted between ἐν τῷ βαπτισθῆναι τὸν λαόν and ἐν τῷ βαπτίζεσθαι τὸν λαόν, of which the latter means, 'while the people were being baptized,' and the former, 'after they were baptized.' Accordingly, in order to render the peculiar meaning of the Greek more distinct, the whole may be rendered thus: 'And it came to pass, after all the people had been baptized, that when Jesus also had been baptized, and was praying, the heaven was opened,' &c.

The words καὶ προσευχ., here added by Luke, and which are not found in the other Evangelists, merit attention. Our Lord, who was content to be obedient unto the Law for man, underwent the rites and performed the ceremonies of the Mosaic Law; and on the same principle underwent this baptism, because he wished to set an example to others of 'fulfilling all righteousness.'

23. ἦν—ὥσπερ ἐτῶν τριάκ. ἀρχ.] I am still of opinion, that of these puzzling words the most probable sense is, 'Jesus was about 30 years old when he began his ministry;' i. e. had nearly completed his 30th year. So Luke, Acts i. 21, 29, speaks of Jesus as beginning (ἀρχάμενος) his ministry from the baptism of John.

The expression ὡς ἐνομίζετο evidently alludes to his Divine origin, as only the reputed son of Joseph, though really conceived by the Holy Ghost. See Archbishop Magee, On the Atonement, vol. ii. p. 422.

IV. 1. Πν. ἁγ. πλ.] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit Πλ. ἁγ. πν., from B, D, E, K, L, X, and about 18 cursives (to which I could add not a few Lamb. and Maa. copies, also Trin. Coll. B. x. 16 and 17), and internal evidence would seem to be in its favour; also Acts vi. 3 and 8; vii. 55; xi. 24; but that sort of evidence is uncertain; and this seems no case for change; espec. since Matthei has gone far to show that this change of position was brought in from the Evangelist.

— ἐν] for ὑπό; denoting the instrumental cause. So Æschyl. A. 1260, οὕτως ἀπαλλάσσουσιν ἐν θεῶν κρίσει.

2. ἡμέρας τεσσαράκοντα] These words would seem to connect with πειραζόμενος following, as some Editors take them. But St. Matthew describes the temptation as taking place at the close of that period. Most recent Commentators attempt to remove the discrepancy by supposing the meaning to be, not that Jesus was tempted forty days in succession, but that, at various times during those days, he was exposed to temptations, besides those which the Evangelist now proceeds to enumerate. This method, however, cannot well be admitted. At least it is better, with some ancient and modern Commentators, to connect the words with the preceding; comp. Exod. xxxiv. 28. 1 Kings xix. 8. Πειραζόμενος, however, is not, I conceive, put for πειρασθῆναι, but is a nominativus pendens, for Geuit. absolute. This mode of taking the passage is confirmed by Mark i. 13, who here follows Luke: καὶ ἦν ἐν τῇ ἔρημῳ ἡμέρας τεσσαράκοντα, πειραζόμενος ὑπὸ τοῦ Σατανᾶ. Moreover, at πειραζόμενος is implied τότε from the context. That, however, will not, as in the case of διὰ ἡμ. τισσ. involve any contradiction; since what takes place at the close of any period of time is understood to have taken place within that time. At any rate the discrepancy is of no moment, the accounts of the Temptation being substantially the same in all three Gospels.

6. καὶ τὴν δόξαν αὐτῶν] scil. βασιλείων, i. e. 'and the glory which will result from the government of them.'

7. πᾶσα] This (for the common reading πάντα) found in almost all the best MSS., including many Lamb. and Mus. copies, several Versions, Fathers, and early Edd., has been received by almost all the Editors, and with reason; as being the more difficult reading. Yet πάντα may be defended, as being more natural, and agreeable to the popular style; though propriety requires πᾶσα as referred to ἐξουσίαν.

8. From Deut. vi. 13. 1 Sam. vii. 3. Γάρ, and ὁ in the next verse, not found in the best MSS., are cancelled by almost all the recent Editors.

On more maturely considering the grounds of the text. rec. of this verse, I am induced to finally edit thus: Ἰησοῦς [Ἵπαγε ὀπίσω μου] γέγραπται [γάρ]. The γάρ is absent from every uncial and a great number of the cursive MSS., including many Lamb. and Mus. copies, confirmed by all the most ancient Versions, and several Fathers. And although the words Ἵπαγε ὀπίσω μου, Σατ. are absent from a comparatively few, to which however I can add a few Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, yet their testimony is confirmed by every ancient Version of weight, espec. the Pesh. Syr., and also by Origen and Vigil. Taps. Moreover, internal evidence is against the words, considering that they were more likely to be brought from Matth. than put out. Besides, the fact, that the γάρ is almost certainly inisitious, goes far to prove also these words to be not genuine. I doubt not that they had no place in the text of nearly all the archetypes of those MSS. which are without the γάρ, but were introduced by the scribes, or the Revisers, from the margin, or the interlineary space where the proposed additions were not unfrequently noted down. It is, therefore, not without reason that Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. reject them. Weta., Matth., and Scholz retain the words, without brackets, but only, it would seem, because they receive them in Matt. iv. 10. Weta., indeed, flatly pronounces the omission of the words to have been an emendation of Origen's, just as at Matt. iv. 10, he ascribes their omission to Origen, though in no case could Origen's authority have had such extensive influence as his conjecture implies. And here, at least, the omission could not have arisen from his emendation, since he himself (as Dr. Mill long ago remarked) expressly says that "the words had no place in the earliest and most ancient MSS." And as Origen did not cancel the words on his own authority here, so it is not likely that he should have done so at the passage of Matt. iv. 10. Grotius, who rejects the words, ably points out what caused the liberty here taken of foisting in the words, namely, the same as what induced other Critics to transpose certain of the verses in Luke's narration, that they might restore that order of the several temptations which is found in the parallel portion of St. Matthew [where, it is observable, this temptation is placed last]; though, as Grot. adds, "nulla fuit causa cur Lucas, in rebus ejusmodi, ordinem tam anxie sequeretur."

9. ὁ Τίς] The ὁ is, on competent authority, cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.

11. The ὅτι, not found in very many MSS., early Edd., and Versions, is cancelled by Matthæi. It may have come from the margin, and originated from those Critics who read γέγραπται γάρ ὅτι—ἐντελεῖται; thus regarding the words as not strictly speaking a quotation, but only a report of the sense. And thus the ὅτι would require to be repeated. But it should rather seem that there is an actual quotation, and therefore the ὅτι is pleonastic, or recitativum.

14. ἐν τῇ δυνάμει τοῦ Πν.] 'under the powerful influence of the Spirit.' Καθ' ὅλην, throughout, over all. This sense occurs also in Acts ix. 31, and is sometimes found in the later Class. writers, but is rare elsewhere.

16. ἀνίστη ἀναγνῶναι] Lightfoot and Vitranga have shown, that it was the received custom for the Scriptures to be read both by the minister and the people standing. The Pentateuch was so distributed into portions for Sabbath reading, that the whole might be gone through in the year; also that to them should be adjoined some such portion from the Prophets as either had an affinity to the lesson from the Pentateuch, or was selected by the reader for edification.

17. βιβλίον] The βιβλία of the Hebrews, and, indeed, of the ancients in general, were rolls fastened to two laths with handles; by holding which in his hand, the reader could roll, or unroll the writing at his pleasure.

—εὔρε] By this must not be understood, according to the explanation of some Expositors, the 'finding after search;' but, as Chrys., Orig., Theophyl., Euthym., Maldon., and others, the seemingly fortuitous, though in reality providential, finding, as something brought about by the providence of God; which indeed is (as Origen remarks) implied in the subsequent words, πνεῦμα Κυρίου ἐπὶ ἐμέ—ἔχρισέ με εὐαγγ., &c.

18—20.] This portion (introduced, as it seems, out of the regular order) was selected by our Lord in order to draw the attention of the people, and to show its fulfilment in himself; as also with allusion to the reason why he was called ΧΡΗΣΤΟΣ, and his religion termed the Gospel. Its application to the Messiah is acknowledged by the best Jewish Expositors. Its primary import, indeed, was probably the restoration of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity; but it seems to have had also a secondary reference to the MESSIAH, by that double sense of prophecy, which has two applications, of which the secondary is (as here) not unfrequently the more important.

18. πνεῦμα Κυρίου ἐπ' ἐμέ] Intimating his Divine appointment to say and do as he does.

—ἔχρισέ με] The term signifies, not so much to appoint as inaugurate into an office; which, in the case of eminent persons (as kings, prophets, priests, &c.) was always conferred by unction. Christ's unction was the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him at his baptism; whereby, as Peter says, Acts x. 38, God anointed him with the Holy Spirit and with power. See also iv. 27. Hence, indeed, the appellation ἁγῶς, or Χριστός, i. e. the Anointed.

—εὐαγγελίσασθαι] This, for the text rec. εὐαγγελίσασθαι, I have, with all the Editors from Matthæi downwards, adopted from many ancient MSS. and most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies.

—ἵασασθαι τοὺς—καρδίαν] The words are omitted in B, D, L, and 3 cursives of the same Family, some Latin copies, with the Copt. and Æthiop. Versions, and have been cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but on insufficient authority, though internal evidence is against them, since they may have been inserted from the Sept. See note on the parallel passage of Matth. However the words would seem to be required by the parallelism; in which πτωχοῖς and συντετρ. τὴν καρδίαν correspond to each other, the latter signifying the afflicted or contrite, the former the distressed or poor in spirit; according as the literal or the spiritual sense be adopted. Συντ. is occasionally found even in the Classical writers, in a metaphorical sense, of mental sorrow. Thus Plutarch vi. 171, 8, μὴ συντρίβισθαι δὲ, μηδὲ δάθυμι τὸν ἰαλγῆμον. Polyb. v. 58, 13. It is a stronger term than λυπεῖσθαι.

The correspondent terms which follow, αἰχμαλώτοις, τυφλοῖς, and τεθραυσμένοις, have likewise a double sense. Ἀφαισις, in the sense of deliverance from captivity, is found also in the Classical writers. With respect to τυφλοῖς, the sense of the Hebrew, 'those who are bound,' is greatly preferable, though the other may be justified, by taking the term to denote those who are as it were blind with long confinement in dark dungeons. In the spiritual sense, αἶχμη will denote those who are bound with the chain of sin; and τυφλοῖς, those who are blinded by sin and Satan; namely, 'the blind people that have eyes' (Isa. xliii. 8), or those that 'seeing, see not.'

19. κηρύξαι—δικτόν] This sums up the whole of the above, in words which contain an allusion to the year of Jubilee; when, by sound of trumpet, was proclaimed deliverance, and restoration of every kind. Thus it is meant, that the Gospel is to the Law what the Jubilee year was as compared to all others. In the application, ἐνιαυτός will denote time generally, as in the Hebrew. Δικτόν is for ἀριστόν, as 2 Cor. vi. 2, καὶρός δικτός. The word is not found in the Classical writers.

²⁰ τῷ ὑπηρέτῃ] i. e. the Chazan or officer who had charge of the sacred books.—Ἐκάθισεν. As those did who proceeded to address some instruction to the people, after having read the portion of Scripture. See Vitringa de Syn. Jud. p. 899.

— πάντων οἱ ὀφθαλμοὶ ἦσαν ἀτενίζοντες αὐτῷ] i. e. 'they were looking fixedly upon him, their attention was fixed upon him'; probably out of curiosity to know how he would expound (as was usual) the sublime portion of the Prophet he had just read.

²¹ ἤρξατο λέγειν πρὸς αὐτοὺς] These words are generally supposed to be a kind of formula serving to introduce some discourse; and, as used here in conjunction with the first clause of the next verse, they confirm the opinion of those Expositors who regard the words σήμερον—ὑμῶν as the substance of the discourse of our Lord delivered as on another occasion, Matt. xi. 4 and 5. Accordingly, the fulfilment in their ears here spoken of was not simply that they had heard the Gospel from his mouth, but that what the Prophet had, under the Holy Spirit, there written as a "sure word of prophecy," or had predictively pronounced, was now fulfilled in his case, i. e. held good of the character which he now sustained as the Anointed of God to preach and teach, to deliver from spiritual thralldom, and free from spiritual blindness, &c. And if all these leading points were (as we may be sure they were) adequately brought out, and thus the purpose of the Gospel set forth and the character of its author, the expository discourse in question may have been of no inconsiderable length; and, from the nature of the points treated on by Him who spake as never man spake, must have been fraught with heavenly edification, ministering, in the doctrines brought forward, grace to the hearers. Besides the passage of Matt. xi. 4, 5, there is another remarkable instance in Acts xxviii. 23—28, where, although St. Paul is said to have addressed the Jews in a discourse which lasted from morning till evening, St. Luke has only recorded the conclusion said by way of application.

with the added words πόθεν οὖν τοῦτω ταῦτα πάντα; The persons who said this need not be understood, by a strict interpretation of the πάντες, to have been all; for this is not conveyed by the fuller account contained in the parallel portion of Matthew. At any rate, their admiration and their wonder was how this σοφία and these δυνάμεις (miracles) could comport with the humble origin and lowly station of Him who thus spake. But this wonder soon, it seems, passed into incredulity, as we may infer from the words of St. Matthew, καὶ ἰσκανδαλίζοντο ἐν αὐτῷ; hence they were ready to utter the words of the subjoined proverb against him (which is the true sense of ἐρεῖτέ μοι in the next verse). They had already said it in their hearts, and probably much more than that; hence the severity with which our Lord dealt with them, and which their base and atrocious conduct afterwards fully justified. The solemnity, too, with which the subsequent address to them is introduced (commencing with the form of expression employed by our Lord on other occasions, ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν), adds not a little to its force. Our Lord calls their attention to two remarkable instances in which acknowledged Prophets had wrought, or not wrought, miracles according to the good pleasure of him who worked in and by them; and, in adverting to two instances in which the persons on whom they had displayed their miraculous power were persons out of the pale of the people of God, he intimated that Gentiles might be fitter objects of God's mercy and favour than Jews. He thus awakened a feeling of anger and rage that issued in personal violence, well-nigh amounting to a horrible enormity.

²³ εἶπε π. α. Π. ἐρεῖτέ μ. τ. π. τ.] This was said to them by our Lord, as being well aware that, though they acknowledged the excellence of his doctrines, they would require of him a proof of his Divine mission by the working of miracles. As to the subsequent proverb (common both to Hebr. and Class. writers) its application here is evident from the words following, which are as much as to say, 'without this proof of thy power we shall have no more reason to believe in it than men would in the claim of a physician to have trust in his skill, who could not cure himself of any disease he professed to cure in others.'

ἐστιν ἐν τῇ πατρίδι αὐτοῦ. ²⁵ Ἐπ' ἀληθείας δὲ λέγω ὑμῖν ^{n 1 Kings 17. 7. & 18. 1. James 6. 17.} πολλὰ χῆραι ἦσαν ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις Ἑλίου ἐν τῷ Ἰσραὴλ, ὅτε ἐκλείσθη ὁ οὐρανὸς ἐπὶ ἔτη τρία καὶ μῆνας ἕξ, ὡς ἐγένετο λιμὸς μέγας ἐπὶ πᾶσαν τὴν γῆν. ²⁶ καὶ πρὸς οὐδεμίαν αὐτῶν ἐπέμψθη Ἑλίας, εἰ μὴ εἰς * Σάρεφθα τῆς Σιδωνος πρὸς γυναῖκα χήραν. ²⁷ Καὶ πολλοὶ λεπροὶ ἦσαν ἐπὶ Ἑλισσαίου τοῦ προφήτου ἐν ^{2 Kings 5. 12.} τῷ Ἰσραὴλ· καὶ οὐδεὶς αὐτῶν ἐκαθαρίσθη, εἰ μὴ Νεεμὰν ὁ Σύρος. ²⁸ Καὶ ἐπλήσθησαν πάντες θυμοῦ ἐν τῇ συναγωγῇ, ἀκούοντες ταῦτα. ²⁹ Καὶ ἀναστάντες ἐξέβαλον αὐτὸν ἔξω τῆς πόλεως· καὶ ἡγαγον αὐτὸν ἕως [τῆς] ὄφρου τοῦ ὄρους, ἐφ' οὗ ἡ πόλις αὐτῶν ὀκοδόμητο, εἰς τὸ κατακρημνίσαι αὐτόν.

is added. So Mark vii. 26. Luke xxiii. 17. John vi. 17. xi. 2. xix. 23, and not unfrequent in the Class. writers. Mr. Alf., indeed, pronounces this use of it after εἴπε as a formula usual with Luke, and intimating the passing to a different source of information, or at least to a break in the record, if from the same source. This involves a principle which I cannot bring myself to admit, and, as to the formula, though it may apply to the passages referred to in the margin, yet not to this. What difference of sense can be imagined here, is far more than I can perceive. Where the sense is simply that 'Jesus said moreover.' The Nazarenes being likely to apply the above proverb to our Lord, to show how fit it was that he should do miracles among them, he intimates by another proverb, that he is fully aware that any miracles he might work would renew the disbelief they had in his Divine origin, from their knowledge of his lowly origin.

25. "Verily I tell you that, &c." Here our Lord obviously proceeds to justify his refusal to work miracles among the Nazarenes, on the ground that God permits or refuses the use of miraculous powers by his prophets, according to his good pleasure, and not according to men's judgment and expectations; as in the instances adverted to 1 Kings xvii. 9, and 2 Kings v. 1, 14. Or rather (as has been observed) our Lord calls their attention to two cases where acknowledged prophets had so little honour in their own nation, that they bestowed their favours on foreigners; q. d. 'Such is the want of faith in my own country, that I shall do no mighty works here, but shall give the evidence of my divine mission to others.'

26. The reading Ἀραφθα, or -τα, adduced from MS. L and 10 cursives, I also find in several of the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies; but the Hebr. original, and the general present spelling of the name, forbid the removal of the Σ, which, however, was probably dropped in ordinary and careless pronunciation of the word. I have chosen now to bring in the φθ for πτ, with Tisch., Lachm., and Alf., from considerable authority, confirmed by several of the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies. Not so with the Σιδωνίας for Σιδωνος—often edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from A, B, C, D, L, V, X, and 18 cursives, almost all of the same Family as D, with the Ital., Vulg., and Ori-

gen; to which I can only add a few Lamb. and Mus. copies. But were there many more, they would nought avail, considering that internal evidence is quite in favour of Σιδωνος, the other being plainly a gloss, such as we might put in Versions which are, in a case like this, of no weight.

28—30. The same kind of rage filled the Jews on another occasion recorded at Acts xxii. 21, 22, where similar unacceptable truth (namely, that Gentiles might be fitter objects of God's mercy than Jews) came to their ears. See Deut. xxxii. 31, where the Jews' jealousy of God's favour to the Gentiles is foretold. Our Lord's treatment on this occasion was only a foreshadowing, by anticipation, of what he would afterwards experience from the whole Jewish nation, verifying what is said in John i. 11, εἰς τὰ ἴδια ἦλθεν, καὶ οἱ ἴδιοι αὐτὸν οὐ παρέλαβον.

On ὄφρου, 'brow, or rather ridge of a hill,' see my Lex. Dr. Robins., indeed, alleges that the present Nazareth is not built on the brow of that hill, but a distance of two miles from the hill, now called 'the Mount of Precipitation.' But I agree with Alf., that neither does the narrative preclude a considerable space having been traversed, during which they had our Lord in custody, and were hurrying with him to the edge of the ravine; nor is it necessary to suppose the city built on the ὄφρυν, but only on the mountain [rather mountain-range], of which the ὄφρυς forms a part. However, we cannot tell, without a plan of the site, whether it was so or not; and the present situation of Nazareth is no proof of its site in the age of Christ. It was probably situated far nearer to the ravine than two miles. Besides, the distance itself would depend on what part of the ravine it was measured from. The τῆς before ὄφρου, cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on strong authority, I find absent from almost all the ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies. The hurling down a precipice was a mode of capital punishment, which among the Jews, as well as the Greeks and Romans, was adjudged by the law in case of sacrilege. So Philo, ap. Euseb. Hist. viii. 392, νόμου κειμένου τὸν ἱερόσυλον κατακρημνίζεσθαι. But it scarcely applies to the present case, since that was probably a mere tumultuous proceeding of the populace, as in the case of the stoning of Stephen, and both much akin to what is called in Jewish affairs 'the rebel's beating.'

41. σὺ εἶ, &c.] Comp. Mark iii. 11. Why the demons here confessed the power of their Conqueror, and proclaimed him to be the promised Messiah, was in order to impede his ministry. On which account our Lord checks them, and commands them to be silent.

For κρᾶζοντα, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit κραυγάζοντα, and Alf. pronounces the text. rec. to be a correction to a more usual word. The authority for κραυγ., is considerable; and I can add a few Lamb. and Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. Yet this is no case for change, espec. since κραυγ. was quite as likely to be a correction of Critics to a stronger term than of κρᾶζ. to a more usual.

The words ὁ Χριστὸς, not found in several ancient MSS., are cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but wrongly; for the omission may well have arisen from the homoteleuton in the two ὁ's.

42. I can confirm the reading ἐπεζ., for ἐζητ., adopted by almost all the Editors from Griesb. downwards, from many Lamb. and Mus. copies; also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17.

— ἐπε αὐτοῦ.] Since ἐπε is invariably used with a Genit. of place or time only, never of person, I cannot but regard αὐτοῦ, with Wakefield, as put for αὐτόθεν, as often in Scripture.

43. ταῖς ἐτέραις πόλιν.] 'to the inhabitants of the other cities,'—namely, where the Gospel has not yet been preached.

— ἀπέσταλμαι, 'I sent.' See note on Mark i. 38.

V. What is related in the 11 first verses of this Chap. agrees with what we find at Matt. v. 18, 22 (where see note), and Mark i. 16, 20, where see notes.

1. καί.] On this use of καί see note supra ii. 21.

2. ἐστῶτα] i. e. as opposed to 'being in motion.' For the Greeks used στήναι, and the Latins stare, to express the situation of ships, whether at anchor or fastened on shore. So Hom. Il. θ.

43. νῆες δὲ ἄγχι θαλάσσης ἐστᾶσ'. Virg. Æn. vi. 904, 'stant littore puppes.'

The term ἐστῶτα may mean either 'fixed at anchor' or 'fixed aground,' i. e. drawn upon shore. The former sense is assigned by the Pers. Version and by some modern Commentators, the latter by Campb., who offers several reasons in support of this view, of which the most weighty is, that the barks are said to be not ἐν τῇ λίμνῃ, but παρὰ τὴν λίμνην. And, I would add, παρὰ τὴν λίμν., having occurred just before, cannot here be supposed to have any different sense. Moreover, the words of the next verse, ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς ἐπανάγ., show that they were really ashore, or at least aground. Vainly do the Commentators, who understand it of being at anchor, allege the above two passages of Homer and Virgil, because in the Homeric one the vessels spoken of are expressly said to be on shore near the margin of the sea, or aground on shore.

— ἀπέπλυναν.] Not, 'were washing,' but 'had washed, or cleansed;' see note on vii. 21. The ἀπ' in ἀπέπλ. signifies off, with respect to the dirt or filth. However, the sense depends on the exact reading, which varies; the MSS. fluctuating between ἀπέπλυναν, ἀπέπλυνον, and ἐπλυνον. The great bulk of the MSS. have ἀπέπλυναν, a comparatively few have ἐπλυνον, and only 5 have ἐπλυναν, which Alf. edits, but which is, on all accounts, the least to be approved. I cannot consent to sink the preposition in composition, because in that consists the rarity and roughness of the reading; and consequently I reject the ἐπλυνον of Lachm. and Tisch. Under these circumstances I have retained ἀπέπλυναν, but because I disapprove of the Pluperf. sense, I should, were there sufficient authority for ἀπέπλυνον (which, however, I find in a few ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies), not hesitate to edit it. The Pesch. Syr., Ital., Vulg., and Pers. Versions may have had it in their copies, though they could not express the force of the ἀπὸ, for want of a term like our verb to

3. ἐπαναγαγεῖν] sub. ναῦν. Comp. Hdot. vii. 100, τὰς δὲ νῆας οἱ ναύαρχοι ἀναγαγόντες ὅσον τε (I conjecture γε) τίσσερα πλῆθρα ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰγιαλοῦ. The ἐπὶ is equiv. to our ward in composition. On this term, and on κατὰ-γῆν, to bring to land, see Wessel. on Hdot. iii. 39, and my note on Thucyd. vol. i. p. 52 (Engl. Transl.).

4. ἐπανάγαγε—καὶ χαλάσατε] This change from the singular to the plural, Bornem. accounts for thus: 'In altum enim navigat, qui eò gubernaculum dirigit; h. l. Simon, sed ad retia projicienda pluribus hominibus opus erat, qui in navi versabantur.' Χαλᾶν is a vox sol. de hac re, though ἀφίεναι, καθίεναι, and ῥίπτειν are used by the Class. writers.

5. ἐπιστάτα] Ἐπιστάτης properly denotes one who is set over any persons or business, as here that of instruction; and is thus equiv. to master or teacher, used by the other Evangelist. The latter sense is rather rare in the Class. writers; when it does occur, it denotes a professor of any art, as opposed to a novice.

6. συνέκλεισαν] This and συλλαβάνειν infra are terms appropriate to hunting and fishing; of which examples are cited by Wetstein.

—πλῆθος ἰχθύων] This, for the common reading ἰχθύων πλῆθος, is found in very many of the best MSS., and has been adopted by all the Critical Editors from Matth. downwards.

—διεῖρήγυντο] 'was breaking, had begun to break,' i. e. had well-nigh broke.

8. Ἐξέλθε ἀπ' ἐμοῦ] This abrupt mode of address is quite suitable to the quick discernment and lively feeling of Peter's character, considered as an exclamation indicative of profound humility and deep reverence; as of one unworthy to appear in the presence of a personage whom he considered as superhuman. See some admirable remarks on the exact spiritual state of Peter on the present occasion by Prof. Trench, at p. 122 of his excellent work on the Miracles.

10. ἀνθρώπους ἔσθι ζωγρῶν] A most apt and forcible metaphor. Though, indeed, terms of hunting and fishing, especially ἀλίσκισθαι, αἰρεῖσθαι, θηρᾶσθαι, are by the Greek and Hebrew writers often used of those who attach men to themselves; as I have in Recena. Synop. proved by numerous original examples from Xenoph., Diog. Laert., Plutarch, Ælian, and others. Ζωγρεῖν signifies, 1. to take any one alive; 2. to capture; 3. to catch, as said of animals. Thus the full sense here is, 'As thou hast hitherto caught fish, thou shalt now catch and win over [to the truth] men;' a promise remarkably fulfilled to Peter, when there were added three thousand to the Church by his preaching on the day of Pentecost, Acts ii. 41.

¹⁷ καὶ δύναμις—αὐτοῦ] Render: 'and the power of the Lord was [exerted] to heal them.' By Κυρίου some understand God. But that would require μετ' αὐτοῦ (i. e. Christ) to be supplied; an ellipse which can by no means be admitted. By αὐτοῦ must (as the recent Commentators have seen) be meant, not the Pharisees, but the sick.

liasts, as infra xix. 4. Since, however, the ellipse of διὰ would be very harsh, I am inclined to suspect that ποίας is not the true reading, but ποία, sub. ὁδῷ, which, though not noted from any of the MSS., seems to have been read by the Italic and Vulgate Translators, who render 'quâ parte.' The ε might easily have arisen from the ε following. My conjecture is confirmed by the opinion of Bornem., who cites Schæfer on Apoll. Rhod. i. 934, in proof that ποία (sub. μερίδι vel ὁδῷ) may mean 'quânam parte?' And there is little doubt but that, in the common dialect ποία was also used without interrogation for 'quâ parte.'

²⁶ ἔκστασις ἔλαβεν αὐτ.] So Hom. II. λ., 402, φόβος ἔλλαβε πάντας. Dr. Mangey conjectures that one of the two words φόβου

and ἱστᾶσις is a gloss on the other. But the ideas are (as Grotius observes) very different. They were struck with amazement at the thing done, and full of awe at the Divine power exerted to accomplish it. Comp. Menander in Stobæi Serm. cxi. p. 556, 25, πάντα διὰ τὰ μὴ προσδοκώμεν ἱστᾶσιν φέριε. Παράδοξον denotes what is παρὰ δόξαν, beyond one's expectation, and, from the adjunct, wonderful.

27—39. Calling of Levi,—a question respecting fasting, Matt. ix. 9—17. Mark ii. 13—22.

27. ἐξῆλθε] i. e. παρὰ θάλασσαν, as it is expressed in the passage of Mark, where it is said that the people went to him and he taught them.

28. ἠκολούθησεν] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἠκολούθει, from B, D, L, X, and one cursive; to which I can add nothing; and the almost entire want of support from the cursive MSS. (for the Leicester MS. sprang from the same original) is unfavourable. The reading may have come from the passage of Luke; but there is a great want of evidence that it did so. It is more probable that ἠκολούθει was a critical correction, in order the better to adapt the word to the preceding ἀκολουθεῖ, than that ἠκολούθησεν should have been brought in for no particular reason in all the copies but five.

29. The ὁ before Λευ. has been, on strong authority (confirmed by not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies), cancelled by all the Editors from Matth. downwards. The phrase ποιεῖν δοχὴν occurs in Gen. xxi. 8. See more in my Lex. in v. δοχή.

— καὶ ἦν ὄχλος] Bp. Middleton's caustic reflection on the Ed. Complut. for having ὁ before ὄχλος, 'a gross deviation from the usus linguae,' was unfounded, for the Complut. has not the ὁ. The learned Prelate was here deceived by Wetstein, whose report of the readings of the Complut. is never to be implicitly relied on. Jackson of Leicester's statement always may, since he made a regular collation of that noble, but ill-appreciated Edition, for critical purposes.

30. οἱ Γραμματεῖς—οἱ Φαρις.] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read οἱ Φαρ. καὶ οἱ Γραμμ., from B, C, L, and 3 cursives of the same Family, with the Ital., Vulg., and Copt. Versions. Internal evidence is in favour of the reading, but the evidence of one family is insufficient to form a text, though internal evidence is rather in favour of the reading. By αὐτῶν understand the Capernaumites. The word is, indeed, omitted in several very ancient MSS., but was only expunged for the sake of removing a harshness. I have now, with Griesb., Matth., Lachm., and Tisch., admitted τῶν before τελ., on very strong authority, confirmed by Mark ii. 16, and several of the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies, as also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17. The text. rec. may seem confirmed by Matt. ix. 11, and other passages; but the authority of ancient MSS. is, in such a case as this, not to be set aside.

31. οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχουσιν, &c.] See note on Matt. ix. 12. To the parallel sentiments adduced by Expositors I add a most apposite one from Dio Chryz. Orat. viii. p. 131. Morell.: Ἐώρα γὰρ (i. e. Diogenes) ὅτι πλείστοι ἀνθρωποὶ ἱκεῖ (i. e. Corinth) συλίσαι διὰ τοὺς λιμίνας καὶ τὰς ἑταίρας διὲν οὖν φρόνιμον ἀνδρα, ὥσπερ τὸν ἀγαθὸν ἱατρόν, ὅπου πολλοὶ νοσοῦσιν, ἱκεῖσι λίαν βοηθήσουτα· εὐταυτ, ὅπου πλείστοι εἰσιν ἀφρονίστεροι, ἱκεῖ μάλιστα ἀποδομῇν, ἱελεγγχοντα καὶ καλῶστα τὴν ἀνοίαν αὐτῶν.

33. οἱ δέ] Meaning, as Valckn. shows, not the Scribes and Pharisees mentioned at ver. 30, but, as appears from Matt. ix. 14, the disciples of John, or both these and the Pharisees, Mark ii. 18. Accordingly, οἱ δέ is for τις δέ, as in Matt. xxviii. 17.

— διατί] This word is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, L, 2 cursives of the same Family, and the Copt. Vers., but retained by Lachm.;—very properly, since external evidence is utterly insufficient, and internal, rightly weighed, unfavourable. It is more likely that the word was lost by the carelessness of scribes, or the mala industria of Critics in four copies, than that the expression should have been introduced into all the rest, including the Lamb. and Mus. copies, besides all the Versions. Moreover, it is to be considered that the words of our Lord are plainly an answer to a question; and it is evident from the foregoing context here and in the parallel passages of Matthew and Mark, that the persons who came to Jesus (the disciples of John and of the Pharisees) came for the very purpose of asking a question. Accordingly, the removal of the διατί not only destroys all the spirit of the address, which has the air of remonstrance, but by the removing of the words in question the passage is fairly dispirited.

ποιούνται, ὁμοίως καὶ οἱ τῶν Φαρισαίων οἱ δὲ σοὶ ἐσθίουσι καὶ πίνουσιν ; 34 Ὁ δὲ εἶπε πρὸς αὐτοὺς· Μὴ δύνασθε τοὺς υἱοὺς τοῦ νυμφῶνος, ἐν ᾧ ὁ νυμφίος μετ' αὐτῶν ἐστι, ποιῆσαι νηστεύειν ; 35 Ἐλεύσονται δὲ ἡμέραι [καὶ] ὅταν ἀπαρθῇ ἀπ' αὐτῶν ὁ νυμφίος· τότε νηστεύσουσιν ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις. 36 Ἐλεγε δὲ καὶ παραβολὴν πρὸς αὐτοὺς· Ὅτι οὐδεὶς ἐπίβλημα ἱματίου καινοῦ ἐπιβάλλει ἐπὶ ἱμάτιον παλαιόν· εἰ δὲ μήγε, καὶ τὸ καινὸν σχίζει, καὶ τῷ παλαιῷ οὐ συμφωνεῖ [ἐπίβλημα] τὸ ἀπὸ τοῦ καινοῦ. 37 Καὶ οὐδεὶς βάλλει οἶνον νέον εἰς ἀσκούς παλαιούς· εἰ δὲ μήγε, ῥήξει ὁ νέος οἶνος τοὺς ἀσκούς, καὶ αὐτὸς ἐκχυθήσεται, καὶ οἱ ἀσκοὶ ἀπολούνται· 38 ἀλλὰ οἶνον νέον εἰς

35. καὶ ὅταν ἀπ'.] The καὶ is omitted in MSS. C, F, L, M, 13 cursives [add several Lamb. and Mus. copies], and the greater part of the Versions; and in others it is inserted before τότε, exactly as in the parallel passages of Matthew and Mark. It is difficult to account for a καὶ here. To call it a Hebrew pleonasm is but to shuffle over the difficulty. To construe it with τότε (as do Homberg and Abresch) is doing utter violence to the construction. It should seem that the καὶ was first omitted by accident, then written in the margin as to be inserted, and finally brought in at a wrong place. On again maturely considering this awkward, however minute point, I am of opinion that although the cancelling of the καὶ will get rid of the difficulty, yet internal evidence is adverse, the removal being a mere device for the nonce. As to the removal of the καὶ, and the placing it before τότε, with M, Δ, and 8 ancient cursives, and the Ital. and Æthiop. Versions, there is insufficient authority; and a shade is cast over even that, by the probability that the change was made from the parallel passages of Matthew and Mark. If the reading be retained, as for the present it must, we are to suppose in καὶ ὅταν a harsh Hebraism, 'Yes, [days] when'; of which use Hartung on the Particles would furnish examples, though the idiom is here unsuitable.

— τότε—ἐν ἐκ. τ. ἡμέραις] A similar mode of expression occurs in Demosth. de Cor. p. 288, τότε τοίνυν κατ' ἐκείνων τὸν καιρὸν, where there is no pleonasm, but rather an intensity of sense.

36. Before ἱματ. Tisch. and Alf. insert ἀπὸ, from B, D, L, X, 9 cursives, and some Versions. Lachm. introduces it, but within brackets. He would have done better in rejecting it entirely, as far more likely to have been introduced, than, for no apparent cause, removed. The σχίσας inserted by Tisch. and Alf. (not Lachm.), from B, D, L, and 6 cursives (to which I can make no addition), plainly originated in critical tampering. I regard the σχίσας and συμφωνήσας of Tisch. and Alf. (not Lachm.) in the same light.

As respects the second ἐπίβλημα, it is not easy to decide. It is absent from many MSS. (including all the best Lamb. and Mus. copies), and is cancelled by Matth., Griesb., Tisch., and Alf., but retained by Scholz and Lachm., perhaps rightly, though the reading is an open question. The harshness of the construction is no sufficient ground of objection, and it might be that very harshness which caused the insertion. Nevertheless, as not a few copies have τὸ ἐπίβλ., the word may have been accidentally lost by means of the repeated τό. But I pronounce nothing. Internal evidence is quite in favour of the present tense throughout the verse, for which the future was substituted by the Revisers, since it seemed called for by the εἰ δὲ μή. But it does not agree with the familiar mode of expression here used, the sense being, 'otherwise he both rends (cuts up) the new cloak, and the patch put upon the old cloak from the new one does not agree with the old,' the scope of the context being, that all things should be suited to circumstances,—and that as use forms the taste, so men's long accustomed modes are not speedily to be changed, nor can they be suddenly initiated into unwonted austerities. The thing is differently expressed in the passages of Matthew and Mark, the mischief there represented being not quite of the same kind, though what is said is equally apt, and alike fitted to set forth the injury to both systems from attempting to engraft the new upon the whole. By the term ἱμάτιον is here meant to be denoted, not any garment, but that important one, and which, as most in sight, makes any such rent especially conspicuous, the Bornous, or web of cloth used as a wrapper to throw around the inner garment, like the plaid worn in Scotland. At v. 37 the use of βάλλαι (for ἐπιβ., which indeed is found in one of the most ancient MSS.) is, I believe, unprecedented; and the word seems employed merely by way of adaptation to the ἐπιβάλλαι of the foregoing comparison, though ἐμβάλλαι would here have been by far the more suitable term. Such is the use in Hdot. ii. 6, of ἐγχέω; and in Plutarch, t. vi. 20), of ἐνέσσεσθαι for ἐνέβαλε.

For ὁ νέος οἶνος, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ὁ οἶνος ὁ νέος, from nearly all the uncial and 13 cursive MSS.; to which I can only add Lamb. 1188 and Scriv. y, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. It is probably, though not certainly, the genuine reading.

VI. 1. ἐν σαββάτῳ δευτ.] It is impossible for me to notice, much less review, the very numerous interpretations which have been propounded of this obscure, though, at the time when the Evangelist wrote, well understood expression; nor is it necessary, since the only one that has any semblance of truth,—resting, it is true, like the other, very much on conjecture,—is that of Theophyl. and Euthym. among the ancients, and Scaliger, Lightf., Cassub., Whitby, Schleusner, Kuinoel, &c. of the moderns,—namely, that the sense is the first Sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread,—namely, that on which the wave sheaf was commanded to be offered up, and from which, and not the first day of the Passover, the fifty days were reckoned to the Pentecost. Hence it is no wonder that all the Sabbaths from the Passover to the Pentecost should have taken their appellation ἀπὸ τῆς δευτέρας τοῦ πάσχατος. It is no wonder that the extreme obscurity of the expression should have induced the ancient Critical Revisers to cancel it, espec. as they did not find it in the parallel passages. So B, L, and 7 cursives of the same Family; to which I can only add Scriv. x, y, and Lamb. 1177, 1188, 1189, 1193. Meyer pronounces it spurious; and Tisch. cancelled it in both his Editions, though he has restored it in his Harmony. Alf. retains it, but in brackets. If there be any thing certain in criticism, it is that the word is genuine. To adduce ancient Versions (as does Alf.) in such a case as this, at least against its authenticity, were idle. The presence of the word in the Vulg. and some copies of the Italic, attests its high antiquity. Matthæi does not think, with Mill, that the Translators omitted the word because they did not understand it, but because “pendebant ἐ Λεctionariis,” and this is confirmed by its absence from the above Lamb. copies, all of them but one (1177) Lectionaries of the highest cast, and one (1193) as ancient as the latter part of the eighth century.

He shows how it came to pass that the word was not in the Lectionaries.

—ψάχοντες] This word is of rare occurrence. Yet it is added from Nicand. Ther. 590 and 629, and καταψ. from Hdot. iv. 75.

2. The words ποιεῖν ἐν are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, L, 2 cursives, the Vulg. and Ital. Versa. They may have been brought in from Matth., but very unlikely in all the copies but four. It is more probable that they were removed by certain Critics, who thought the composition improved in compactness and neatness by the removal.

5. Κύριός ἐστι· τοῦ σαββάτου] See on Matt. xii. 8. For this verse the framer of the text of the MS. D inserts, in the place of what he thought needless, as having place in the parallel passages of Matt. and Mark, the following substitute: Τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρᾳ, θαυμάμιεν τινα ἐργαζόμενον τῷ σαββάτῳ, εἶπεν αὐτῷ· ἄνθρωπε, εἰ μὴ οἶδας τί ποιεῖς, μακάριος εἰ· εἰ δὲ μὴ οἶδας, ἐπικατάρατος καὶ παραβάτης εἰ τοῦ νόμου, of which Mr. Alf. thinks the form and substance speak for its originality: and he is disposed to believe its authenticity!! Trahit sua quæque volucrias. For my own part, I regard it as (like multitudes of others, ejusdem farinae, in this most corrupt copy D) not only an interpolation, but the handy-work of some male feriatus homo, who had a mind to try his hand at fabrication. Were it not for the indifferent character of the book as dealing so much in licentious innovation and fabrication, I should say that it might have originated in an early tradition incorrectly reported. But ἐπικατ. is so opposite to the character of our blessed Lord, and the whole so evidently formed on Rom. xiv. 22. ii. 25, 27. James ii. 11, that one cannot mistake its origin.

7. παρετήρουν αὐτόν] The best, and indeed the greater part of the MSS. (to which I can add not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin.

καὶ οἱ Φαρισαῖοι, εἰ ἐν τῷ σαββάτῳ θεραπεύσει· ἵνα εὕρωσι κατηγορίαν αὐτοῦ. ⁸ Αὐτὸς δὲ ἵδρι τοὺς διαλογισμοὺς αὐτῶν, καὶ εἶπε τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ τῷ ξηρὰν ἔχοντι τὴν χεῖρα· Ἐγείραι καὶ στήθι εἰς τὸ μέσον. Ὁ δὲ ἀναστὰς ἔστη. ⁹ Εἶπεν οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς πρὸς αὐτοὺς· Ἐπερωτήσω ὑμᾶς τι· ἔξεστι τοῖς σάββασιν ἀγαθοποιῆσαι, ἢ κακοποιῆσαι; ψυχὴν σῶσαι, ἢ ἀπολέσαι; ¹⁰ Καὶ περιβλεψάμενος πάντας αὐτοὺς, εἶπεν * αὐτῷ· Ἐκτείνων τὴν χεῖρά σου· ὁ δὲ ἐποίησεν [οὕτω]. καὶ ἀποκατεστάθη ἡ χεὶρ αὐτοῦ [ἰσχύς] ὡς ἡ ἄλλη. ¹¹ Αὐτοὶ δὲ ἐπλήσθησαν ἀνοίας· καὶ διελάλουν πρὸς ἀλλήλους, τί ἂν ποιήσαιαν τῷ Ἰησοῦ.

¹² c' Εγένετο δὲ ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ταύταις, ἐξῆλθεν εἰς τὸ ὄρος ^c Mark 2. 13. προσεύξασθαι καὶ ἦν διανυκτερεύων ἐν τῇ προσευχῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ. ^{acc.}

Coll. B, x. 16) have παρετηροῦντο, which has been edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. And Lachm. (though not Tisch.) introduces it at Mark iii. 2. I doubt not that it is the true reading in both cases: for this deponent use of παρετηρῆσθαι, though unknown in the Class. Greek writers, occurs infra xiv. 1, ἴσαν παρετηροῦμεν αὐτὸν, in all the MSS., as also in Gal. iv. 10, ἡμέρας παρετηρίσθη; Sept. in Ps. xxxvi. 12, παρετηρήσεται ὁ ἀμαρτωλὸς τὸν δίκαιον, and, accordingly, in Acts ix. 24, παρετήρουν τε τὰς πύλας, where Lachm. and Tisch. very properly restore παρετηροῦντο. In saying that this deponent use is unknown in the Class. writers, I am aware that it seems to exist in Dio Cass. l. 10, p. 702, 98, ὅσα προστάττουσιν—ἀκριβῶς παρατηρεῖσθαι. But, considering that that writer's use of words and phrases is, in general, purely Classical, and that he elsewhere several times uses the active form, I doubt not but that a slight corruption has taken place, and that he wrote παρετηρίτε. The αὐτὸν is cancelled by almost all the Editors, on very strong authority (which I can confirm from most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies); I have now double-bracketed the word. It probably came from Mark.

9. ἐπερωτήσω ὑμᾶς τι· ἔξεστι] These words admit of two constructions, according as they are punctuated: 1. declaratively, 'I will ask you what is allowable on the Sabbath, to do good, or to do evil?' 2. interrogatively, 'I will ask you somewhat, Is it lawful, &c.' But the latter, which I have adopted, is preferable, both on account of its greater simplicity, and as being confirmed by a similar passage, infra xx. 3, and Matt. xxi. 24; and the ὑμᾶς being, as we learn from the parallel passages, emphatic, tends to confirm this view. The reading ὑμᾶς εἰ ἔξεστιν, adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, D, is very specious, but came evidently from the Alexandrian polishing school, as perhaps did the ἀποκτινῆναι for ἀπολέσαι just after.

10. The αὐτῷ here, for ἀνθρ., is, with all the Editions, adopted on the strongest authority.

— ἐποίησεν οὕτω] The οὕτω is omitted in very many MSS., and is cancelled by Matthæi, Grieb., and others; but injudiciously: for a great part of those MSS. have ἐξέτεινεν for ἐποίησεν, and with that the οὕτω is inconsistent.

To ἐποίησεν the οὕτω is almost indispensable, and it is confirmed by a similar use in ix. 15. xii. 43. Acts xii. 8. Luke ii. 48. iii. 11. vi. 31. x. 37. Ὑγίης is omitted in very many MSS., and is cancelled by most Editors. See, however, the note on Matt. xii. 13, and Mark iii. 5, and compare Acts xiv. 10. Nevertheless internal evidence is rather against the word.

11. ποιήσαιαν] Lachm. edits ποιήσαιαν, with B, L, et al. But that is too Attic a form to suit the New Test.; though it may have arisen from a mere error of the scribes for ποιήσαιαν. However, the text rec., which is retained by Tisch. and Alf., is not to be altered, as perhaps preserving a form of the provincial Greek of Syria. Render: 'what they might do unto Jesus,' i. e. how far they might cause his destruction, as the parallel passages suggest, and which is confirmed by Acts ix. 13, ὅσα ἐποίησεν τοῖς ἀγίοις. John xv. 21. Hebrews xiii. 6.

12. ἦν διανυκτερεύων ἐν τῇ προσευχῇ τ. Θεοῦ] On the interpretation of τῇ προσευχῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ there has been some difference of opinion. The ancients, and most moderns, take it to mean, 'prayer to God;' while some of the early modern Commentators, and others of the more recent ones, as Wetst., Dodd., and Campb., maintain that it signifies 'in the proseucha, or oratory, of God.' And that there were Jewish places of worship called προσευχαί, is undoubted. But whether that sense is here to be assigned is another question. Those Commentators adduce, indeed, several reasons why the common interpretation cannot be admitted. They urge that προσευχῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ, in the sense prayer to God, is abhorrent from the simplicity of Scriptural expression, and subversive of analogy; and that διανυκτερεύειν properly respects some place where the night is spent. But διανυκτερεύειν is not only used of places where, but of things (i. e. business) in which the night is occupied, as in the examples cited in my Recens. Syn. And as to simplicity of expression, it is no more violated here than in numerous other cases; where the use of the Genit. falls under that Rule of Winer, § 30, 1, in treating on Genit. of relation, and espec. the objective genit. for Accus. with πρὸς, as here and Matt. xiii. 18. iv. 9. Jos. Antt. ix. 9, ἐπὶ δέσειν καὶ ἱκετεῖαν τοῦ Θεοῦ. Soph. CEd. Tyr. 239, ἐν θεῶν εὐχαῖσι. Lys. Or. 31, ἱκετεῖας θεῶν. As to the other objections proposed, they proceed, as I have shown in my Recens. Syn., on a confusion of ancient with modern modes of expression. That which respects the use of the Article here has been fully answered by Bp. Middl.; who, besides making well-founded objections to the sense oratory, shows that the term is not uncommon as used with προσευχὴ taken in the sense of prayer. See Matt. xxi. 22. Acts i. 14. 1 Cor. vii. 5, and comp. Matt. xiv. 23. Finally, he observes that to pass the night in prayer, without going to an oratory, was (as Schoettg. shows) a usual act of Jewish devotion. And when we consider that the common interpretation (confirmed by the Psch. Syr. Vers.) is the more obvious and simple, and that our Lord's very object in going was to pray, and that on this, an occasion of great moment, when he was just entering on the work of ordaining the Twelve Apostles, he would be likely to pray powerfully and perseveringly, that interpretation is decidedly to be preferred.

15. I have pointed as I have in this and the next verse, with Schulz and Scholz, because the Apostles are here evidently meant to be distributed into pairs. That they were so sent forth to evangelize, is certain from Mark vi. 7.

16. Ἰσκαριώτην] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read Ἰσχαριώθ, from B, D, L, and 33, with the Ital., Syr. (qu?), and Marcion ap. Epiphani. I cannot find any vestige of the reading in the Lamb. and Mus. copies, except that in the Lamb. copy of the Vulg. I find scariath one of the many other readings of the Ital. Vers. preserved in that very ancient copy of the Vulg. But this is no case for change of text.

17. τόπου πεδινού] To reconcile this with the description in Matthew (for the discourse here recorded is substantially the same), we may suppose that it was a sort of tube-land, viz. a sort of comparatively flat ledge, or ridge, projecting from the side of the mountain.

18. ὀχλούμενοι ἀπὸ πν. ἀκ.] Ὀχλεῖσθαι signifies 'to be troubled or vexed, whether by irksome business, or by such sickness as hinders any one from pursuing his occupation;' of which senses many examples, both with νόσος expressed and understood, are adduced by Wetst. and others. In the New Test. and LXX, however, the latter use is never found, but only that of being vexed or troubled, as said of demoniacal possession. So Acts v. 16, ὀχλουμῖνον ὑπὸ πνευμάτων ἀκαθάρτων. Tob. vi. 7, ἰδὼν τινα ὀχλῇ διαιμόνιον ἢ πνεῦμα πονηρὸν, &c., and Act. Thom. § 12, ὑπὸ δαιμόνων ὀχλ. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἰνοχλ., from A, B, L, and 2 cursives. Alf. pronounces the text rec. as an 'alteration to a more simple word.' But that this should take place in all the copies except four, is no less than incredible. The state of the external evidence forbids the change, and that of internal is in favour of ὀχλ., since ἰνοχλ. was evidently a critical correction, though a false one, since it could only signify 'to be teased or annoyed, hindered from pursuing one's employment,' whereas, as applied to possession by evil spirits, ὀχλεῖσθαι signified turbare, commovere, 'to be vexed' (as in the passages cited by Wetst.) a sense altogether suitable. This is not the only passage in which ἰνοχλ. has been obtruded by shallow Critics. Thus in Hdian. vi. 3, 9, τὸ δὲ τοῦ ὀχλουῦντος ἀποσιτίσθαι, two MSS. have ἰνοχλ., rejected by Irmsich as a gloss; though it is rather, as Dind. or Steph. Thea. in v. points out, a critical alteration to a more usual term.

For ὦδ, I have now admitted the reading ἄωδ, with almost all the Editors from Matth. downwards, on strong external authority (to which I can add not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies) confirmed by internal evidence. And this use of ἄωδ for ὦδ after a verb passive is very rare; accordingly the reading is not to be rejected.

19. δύν. παρ' αὐτ. ἐξήρχ.] This will not, any more than Matt. v. 30. prove the notion that the power by which the sick were healed was exerted by a sort of efflux, or effluvia, from our Lord's body. See note on Mark v. 30. The best Commentators, ancient and modern, are agreed that ἐξήρχεσθαι ἐπὶ ἑνι ἄνδρ, like the Heb. מֵן in Ruth i. 13, simply means as exorcedus.

20—49. Sermon on the Mount; at least the matter bears a very strong resemblance to many portions of the Discourse so termed, in chaps. v. vi. and vii. of Matth., and of which our Lord, we may suppose, repeated, with some variations, such parts as suited the occasion. It is well observed by Bp. Lonsdale, that 'the beatitudes contained in vv. 20—22, differ from those recorded in Matt. v. 3—10, in being applied directly to the actual condition of our Lord's hearers; while those in Matt. are delivered as general truths, without any application to the persons present.'

22. In the terms ἀφορ. and ἰκθ. there may be no more than an allusion to the first and the second degrees of excommunication among the Jews, on which see Vitringa de Syn. Jud. p. 722. At any rate, the terms must not be applied to such excommunication only, but designate various kinds of expulsion from society; in which view ἀφορ. may respect their treatment at the hands of the Jews; ἰκθάλ., from the heathens. How covered with obloquy and contempt were the primitive Christians by the Heathens, we have abundant evidence, both in Scripture and in the writings of the first Christian Apologists. And the expression 'spurn at their [very] name' (a free, but faithful, version of ἰκθ. τὸ ὄν. ὑμ.), is a very strong one, unjustifiably weakened by taking name for the person bearing the name.

23. χάρητε]. This (for χαίρετε) is found in almost all the best MSS. (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and is adopted by all the Editors from Wets. downwards. On this use of the Subjunct. in an Imper. sense see Buttm., and comp. Aristoph. Plut. 761, σκιρτᾶτε καὶ χορεύετε.

—κατὰ ταῦτα] for οὕτω in Matt. v. 12, which excludes the reading κατὰ ταῦτά adopted by some Editors, and τὰ αὐτά by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on insufficient authority.

25. οὐαὶ ὑμῖν] Campbell, in a long and able note, proves, as Euthymius had long before done, that οὐαὶ here is not imprecativ, but declarative: 'Woe is unto you! alas for you!'

26. οὐαὶ, ὅταν καλ. εἴπω.] These words are addressed to the disciples generally; but, from the reference made at the second clause to the false prophets of former times, it should seem that the warning was espec. meant for such of the disciples as formed part thereof, the Secrets, who would be likely to become prophets or teachers of the Gospel, for whom the warning implied of the danger of withholding or perverting the truth committed to their charge, in order to obtain the favour of all men, would be highly suitable. In this view Grot. has appositely cited a narration respecting Phocion, recorded by Plut. t. ii. 187, F, where we are told, that when, in his orations, he had particularly pleased the multitude, he used to ask his friends whether any thing wrong had escaped him in his address. 'Υμῖν' is omitted in almost all the best MSS. (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and several Versions and Fathers; and is cancelled by almost all Editors. As respects the πάντες just after, external authority is nearly as great for its absence as its presence, and internal evidence is almost equally balanced. Accordingly, Grot. and Matth. reject, while Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. adopt, the word. My impression is, that the word is not genuine; but I have only bracketed it. Certainly it was more likely to be inserted than expunged; and assuredly it was not in the copy used by the Peach. Syr. Translators. It is also not found in the Vulg. and the other Versions, except the Ital. Tisch., indeed, says it has place in the Cod. Amiat. of the Vulg.; and I find it also in the Lamb. copy. But the latter of those MSS. has often the Ital. readings; and so, I doubt not, has the former. That the word should have been removed, as Mr. Alf. supposes, 'because seeming inconsistent with the other member of the comparison' of πατέρες, is utterly incredible.

28. The καὶ before προσεύχ. is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on strong authority (to which I add most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence, as existing in the probability of its having been inserted by Critics, who did not perceive the force of the ἀνταπόδομα.

30. The expressions in this and the foregoing verse are not to be too rigorously interpreted; being merely intended, in the one case, to inculcate a spirit of forbearance and meekness under injuries or deprivations, and in the other of being disposed to give to those really in need; and, generally, of not being severe in exacting our dues. The difference between ἀπαίτειν and ἀπαίτειν is that the former denotes to ask as a favour; the latter, to demand as a right.

32. χάρις] put for εὐεργεσία and its consequence μισθός. So Dionys. Hal. A. vi. 86, τίς ἐστιν ἡ σὴ χάρις ἡμῖν καὶ ὀφείλεια;

35. καὶ δανείζετε μηδὲν ἀπελπ. Some take μηδὲν ἀπελπ. to mean, 'nothing despairing.' But though ἀπελπίζειν often signifies to 'despair,' yet that it cannot have that sense here, is plain from the words of the preceding verse, παρ' ὧν ἀπελπίζετε ἀπολαβεῖν. Others take ἀπελπ. in an active sense, of causing despair. But such a sense of the word is unauthorized, and here unsuitable. The true interpretation seems to be the one generally assigned by ancient and modern Commentators, 'hoping for nothing again:' a sense which, however deficient in Class. authority, is very agreeable to analogy; for as ἀπολαβεῖν is used for λαβεῖν ἀπὸ τινος, so ἀπελπίζειν may be for ἐλπίζειν ἀπὸ τινος. So in Athen. p. 649, ἀποσθῆναι for ἐσθῆναι ἀπὸ τινος. The sense, therefore, is, 'Lend to those from whom there is little hope of receiving back your money.' From numerous passages of the Class. writers which I have adduced in Recens. Synop., it appears that the heathens sometimes used to lend money to respectable persons brought to unmerited dis-

treas; and, on certain occasions, made collections in aid of their distress, which the Greeks called ἐρανομοίαι. If any one, for instance, had lost a considerable part of his property by shipwreck, fire, or any other such calamity, it was not unusual for his friends to supply him with money, not to be paid back by any certain day, but when convenient. This, however, they scarcely ever did, except to those who, they had some hope, might, by a more prosperous turn of fortune, some time or other, not only repay the money, but return the favour, which they termed εὐεργεσιῶν. Whereas our Lord enjoins his hearers to do this good (in the words of Thucyd. ii. 40) 'not with the narrow calculations of self-interest, but in the confidence of liberality;' a confidence reposed in Him who is the poor man's surety.

— υἱοὶ τοῦ Ὑψ.] i. e. either 'beloved of God' (as in Eccles. iv. 10, γίνου ὀφθαλμὸς ἐν πατρί — καὶ ἴσθαι οὐκ ὕψιστον), or, 'like unto God, as being animated with a spirit of benevolence similar to that of the Deity.' The Article, not found in many MSS. and the Ed. Princ., is cancelled by Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz, agreeably to the usage of Luke. See ch. i. 32, 35, 76.

— ὅτι αὐτὸς — πονηροῖς] This is not, as Kuinoel asserts, 'the same sentiment, in other words, as that at Matt. v. 45.' For there the injunction is only to show kindness even to our enemies; here we are also enjoined to show benevolence to our fellow-creatures. And when we are commanded to imitate God, who is beneficent even to the ungrateful,—this is said to anticipate an objection,—that the persons whom we may benefit are almost sure to prove ungrateful. To which the answer is, '[But yet benefit them:] for God, &c.' In the next verse, οἰκτ. should be rendered, not merciful, but compassionate; pitying and relieving, according to your power, the distresses of others.

^{37.} καταδικάζετε] Καταδ., κρίν., and ἀπολ. are properly forensic terms; the former signifying 'to condemn,' the other 'to acquit.' They are, however, meant to be accommodated to private use. The three clauses advert, the 1st to sitting in judgment on the faults of others; the 2nd to passing condemnation on them. The 3rd enjoins a contrary spirit,—that of judging for the best, acquitting our neighbour of such charges as are manifestly not well founded.

^{38.} ἰδοτε, &c.] With candour in judging is united liberality in giving, as being a kindred virtue. Inasmuch that, at the end of the verse, the words τῷ γὰρ αὐτῷ—ὑμῖν are employed to enjoin the exercise of the virtue mentioned in the preceding verse, by a metaphor derived from the imagery in this; wherein the καλὸν (handsome and full) is further illustrated by the terms πεπιεσμένον, σεσαλευμένον, and ὑπερεκχυνόμενον, which have reference to the three principal of the many modes of giving abundant measure among the Jews; such as the supernatans, the cumulata, pressa, agitata, operta. The cumulata and operta were larger than the abassa, the ordinary and just measure, by heaping up the vessel, and cutting off the cumulus with a lath; but the pressa, agitata, and supernatans, corresponding to the three here mentioned, were the amplest. Ὑπερικχ. (also found in Joel ii. 24, ὑπερεκχυνήσονται οἱ ἡλιοὶν, and ὑπερικχ. in Prov. v. 16 [for the Hebr. שׁוּר, dispersed] and Joseph. Bell. i. 21, 4) is not to be taken, with almost all commentators, of a measure of liquids (for that is inconsistent with its being 'poured into the lap,' as just after), but (with Euthymius and Beza) of a measure of solids, by a catachresis common to all languages. Thus there is a climax; for the ὑπερικχ. supposes that the measure has been already pressed down and shaken together.

—δώσουσιν εἰς τ. κ. ὑ.] Not 'shall men give,' but, as Gataker explains (de Styl. N. T. pp. 70, 71) 'dabitur vobis,' scil. a Deo. So infra xii. 20, ἀπαιτοῦσι he renders 'a te repetetur.' There is here an allusion to the Oriental custom of receiving a measure of corn or other dry articles in the bosom or lap of their flowing veats, the former of which they made use of like our pockets (see 2 Kings iv. 39. Prov. xvi. 33), as did also the Greeks and Romans. See Hdol. vi. 125. Hor. Sat. ii. 3, 71. The expression is proverbial, and of course expressive of what generally takes place.

^{39.} μήτι δύναται—πισοῦνται:] Our Lord had before said that they were to evince themselves to be his true disciples by loving their enemies and forgiving one another. He now intimates, that if they do not practise, as well as preach, these doctrines, they will be like blind guides; who perish themselves, and are the cause of destruction to those they lead. Ἐμπισοῦνται is here found, for π.σ., in B, D, L, P, and 8 cursives of the same Family, is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., and is preferred by Bornemann (who compares ἐμπισοῦται εἰς βόθυνον at Jer. xxxi. 44). Certainly this is required by strict propriety of language. Yet may not the simple have been used for the compound in the plain phraseology of common life, so suitable to a proverb? As to Bornemann's appeal to xiv. 5, where we have εἰς φρίαρ ἐμπισοῦται, many MSS., including the Alexandrian, have π.σ.οῦται, which is edited, perhaps rightly, by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.

^{40.} οὐκ ἔστι—διδάσκαλος αὐτοῦ] No little difference of opinion exists as to the true scope and exact sense of these words, and espec. of the latter clause. In order to determine the interpretation, it is proper first to settle the connexion. Now the question is, whether the words are to be considered as connected with the preceding ones (v. 39), or to be regarded as forming an independent sentiment. The former is the view adopted by most Expositors, ancient and modern, who suppose an admonition to Christian hearers, to 'take care on what teachers they attend.' But this, so far from being, as Thomas Scott thinks, the 'more obvious interpretation,' is one involving no little harshness. And as to its being, what he avers it to be, more agreeable to the context—that argument it were vain to urge, unless we could prove that a connexion was intended by the Evangelist to subsist between vv. 39 and 40. Nothing improbable is there in the supposition, that no connexion was intended, and that v. 40 was introduced as an independent gnome, or religious maxim. And, considering that it is found in that portion of the Gospel (c. iv.—ix. 50) which comprehends the principal discourses and sayings of our Lord (espec. from the Sermon on the Mount), this may very well be supposed meant for one of those. And this is rendered almost certain by the fact, that the portion in question is substantially found in Matt. x. 24, 25, οὐκ ἔστι—αὐτοῦ, where we have the advantage of a context to determine the scope and true sense of the words. Between the two passages there exists the greatest similarity, almost amounting to identity; for St. Luke here (as not unfrequently elsewhere) chose to omit the words οὐδὲ δούλος ὑπὲρ τοῦ Κυρίου αὐτοῦ and καὶ ὁ δούλος ὧς ὁ Κύριος αὐτοῦ, which, since δούλος here perhaps, and certainly at John xiii. 16 (where this clause is retained, and that of μαθητῆς—διδάσκαλος is omitted), bears the sense disciple, 'ex usu loquendi Judæorum, quorum discipuli magistros suos dominos, se ipsos autem servos, appellare solebant,' as says Schleus. Lex. It may indeed seem that a diversity exists in ἀρετῶν αὐτῶν: but there we have no other than a plainer expression, serving to draw forth what is implied in ἔσται, 'he will be,' meaning, that he will be ready to be.

Grot., Castellio, Calvin, Hammond, Whitby, Bp. Pearce, and Abp. Newcome, so explain, which last-mentioned is the only English Translator who has separated this verse in printing from the former. That it ought to be so separated, was distinctly, I find, seen by Calvin, who, after placing this verse in his Harmony, after Matt. x. 24, 25, fully and ably justifies his so doing. As respects the construction, and the exact force of the term κατηρτισμένοι, the words are undoubtedly to be construed thus: 'πᾶς δὲ [μαθητῆς] κατηρτισμένος ἔσται ὡς ὁ διδάσκαλος αὐτοῦ. Κατηρτισμένος, which means fully instructed, perfectly acquainted with his duty, and by impl. πρὸς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθὸν ἐξηρτισμένος (2 Tim. iii. 17). Thus the full sense is, with due qualification for a dictum generale, 'The disciple is not usually above his teacher; but every one who is, or would be, a thoroughly instructed scholar, must be (i. e. must aim at being) perfect as his teacher.' Thus, 'as the disciple generally follows his master's example,—so if ye be blind and ignorant, so probably will your disciples be also; if you neglect your duty to God, neither will your hearers observe theirs.'

41. τί δὲ βλέπεις, &c.] The connexion here is well traced by Bp. Lonsdale thus: 'As those who profess to instruct others must not themselves be ignorant; so must those who rebuke others for their faults beware lest they themselves be subject to the same or greater faults.'

43. οὐ γὰρ ἐστὶ, &c.] Render: 'for that is not a good tree which bringeth forth bad fruit.' The connexion has been laid down by Abp. Newcome, but more skillfully traced by Bp. Lonsdale as follows: ['Beware of such hypocrisy as that of which I have just spoken,] for it is not such fruit as a really good tree would bring forth.'

44. With the sentiment here comp. Ecclus. xxvii. 6, and Eurip. Hec. 599, seqq. See also note on Matt. vii. 16. At v. 45 and 46, there is also a close connexion of sense and argument, wherein, as Mr. Alford well observes, 'our Lord descends into the closest personal searching into the life and the heart, and gives his judicial decision of the end of the hypocrite, whether teacher or private Christian.' See more in notes on the parallel passage of Matt.

48. ἔσκαψε καὶ ἐβάθυνε.] By Hendiadys, for βαθύως ἔσκαψε; a kind of expression found both in the Classical and the Hellenistical writers. So Judg. xiii. 10, ἐτάχυνε καὶ ἔδραμε, for ταχύως ἔδραμε. The moral (as Grotius observes) is, that the study of piety and virtue should not be superficial, but a principle well grounded and deeply rooted in the heart, so as to resist the assaults of passion, temptation, &c.

—πλημμύρας.] The word signifies properly a swell, flood, or inundation of any kind, whether of the sea, or of a river (and espec. that of the tide). The latter is here had in view. Comp. v. 49. The house is probably supposed to be situated in the way of such a river as the Nile, without any agger for security, like that so graphically described in Joseph. Antt. ii. 10, 62.

49. For ἴπισα, Tisch. and Alf. read συνέπισα, from D, L, and 13 cursives of the same Family, together with some MSS. of the Italic; while Lachm. retains ἴπει;—very properly, since the authority for the other is insufficient, and internal evidence rather adverse than not, considering that though it is possible that ἴπει may have come from Matth., yet it is improbable that it should have come into all the copies except a very few (for I can only adduce Scriv. y). It would rather seem that συνέπει was a correction of style by the Critics, and that it is a more Class. expression needed not Alford's formal proof.

VII. 1—7. Healing of the centurion's servant, Matt. viii. 5—13.

4. ἀξίός ἐστιν ϕ παρέξει] Unless the phrase be a Latinism, ἀξίος must be taken in the absolute sense, of which I have adduced numerous examples in Recena. Synop. Παρέξει is an Attic form for παρίξῃ, on which see Matth. Gr. § 197 and 496. I am, however, not disinclined to adopt παρίξῃ, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from almost all the uncials and a few cursives, to which I can add several ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies, with Trin. Coll. B, x. 16.

5. τὴν συναγωγὴν—ἡμῖν] Render: 'And he it is who hath built for us the synagogue.' This was not unusual in an individual. The person was, no doubt, a proselyte.

— τὴν συναγωγὴν— ϕ κοδ. ἡμῖν] Campb., Bp. Middl., and others, rightly render 'the synagogue;' the Art. serving to intimate that there was only one synagogue in the place, whereas, according to the rendering of the E. V., 'a synagogue,' there might be several. Yet in John vi. 59, and xxviii. 20, ἐν συναγωγῇ is rendered, 'in the synagogue,' though in some MSS. there the Article is expressed, though it is by all the best Expositors left unexpressed. Had the present Evangelist intended to express the sense 'a synagogue,' why should he not have written συναγ. without the Article? It is true that the word, as used without the Article (espec. in the strict sense a synagogue—a building so called), is of rare occurrence. Yet I have noted an example of it so used in Jos. Bell. ii. 14, 4, συναγωγὴν ἔχοντες παρὰ χωρίον οὐ, &c.

6. μὴ σκύλλου] See my Lex.

9. ἠθαύμασεν αὐτόν] Not, 'held him in admiration,' as several render: but simply, 'marvelled at him,' viz. the strong faith which he evinced.

12. It is well remarked by Abp. Newcome, that 'the four circumstances here mentioned with so much simplicity and conciseness tend to raise compassion more strongly than the most laboured amplification of art.'

— ἔξεκομίζετο] 'was being carried out.' Ἐκκομίζειν is a funeral term corresponding to the Latin efferre; for the custom of interring the dead outside of cities or towns, in gardens or in private and unfrequented places, was common to all the nations of antiquity; to the Jews, because dead bodies were regarded as unclean; and to the Gentiles, in order to prevent infection.

For υἱὸς μονογ. B, D, L, and two cursives have μονογ. υἱός, which reading has been received into the text by Tisch. and Alf., but not by Lachm.; rightly, for though the position μονογ. υἱός is one more agreeable to Classical usage (as appears from Eschyl. Agam. 87, μονογενὴς τέκνον πατρί), yet it is not, on that account, to be preferred. We may suppose the term μονογ. to have been placed after υἱός, as in Luke viii. 42, and often in Sept., in order to its being brought into closer connexion with τῇ μητρὶ, which is not quite equivalent to τῆς μητρός, though Expositors take it as dat. for genit. I would render, 'behold, there was being carried out dead [a person who was] an only son to his mother.' With this pathetic circumstance in the narration, I would compare the touching words of Eurip. Alc. 305, μόνος γὰρ αὐτοῖς ἦσθα, and 925, κόρος ἀξιοβήρηνος ἔχει· ἐν δόμοισι μονόπαις, and espec. of Gen. xxii. 2, Sept.

— καὶ αὐτὴ χήρα] Supply ἦν, agreeably to the tense of the preceding verb, especially as it would be in some measure anticipated from the following ἦν; for a repetition of ἦν within so short a space would have been offensive. The ἦν just after is, indeed, omitted in many MSS., early Editions, and Versions; and is cancelled by almost all the Editors. Yet it cannot well be dispensed with. I suspect that its omission partly arose from a mistake, which originated in a confounding of this ἦν with the one just before. The καὶ is very significant; the full sense being, that 'besides her other sufferings [losing her son] she was also a widow.'

14. ἤγατο τῆς σοροῦ] Meaning thereby to stop the bearers. Σορὸς generally denotes a coffin, of marble or other materials. But, as such were not in use among the Jews, the word must here denote the bier, or funeral couch, on which the dead of the higher classes among the ancient nations were carried forth. See my note on Thuc. ii. 34.

15. ἀνέκθισεν] Meaning, not merely revived, but sat up; by which he would be seen, since the bier was nearly flat.

16. ἐγγίγεται] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἤγγισεν, from 5 uncial and a few cursive MSS. But the authority for the change is insufficient, and the reading seems a mere grammatical correction of tense.

18—35. Message of inquiry from John the Baptist. Our Lord's answer.

19. δύο τινάς] The τις indefinite is simply used with a numeral at Acts xxiii. 23, and xix. 14. And the Philologists think that the addition of the τις renders the number indefinite; which is often the case in the Classical writers; and the τις may be then expressed by our some; but whether it has that force in the New Test., may be doubted. It is unsuitable to the sacred writers, and can hardly have place in numbers so small as two. Besides, Matthew mentions positively two. It rather seems to have the sense, q. d. 'certain persons, two in number.'

21. ἰθεράπευσαι] We may (with the Pesh. Syriac) take the Aorist as put for the Pluperfect, by a use frequent in narration. So supra v. 2, ἀπέκλυναν, 'had cleansed,' and infra xix. 1, διήρχετο (where see note). Mark iii. 10, πολλοὺς ἰθεράπευσεν. John xviii. 24, ἀπίστευαν αὐτὸν ὁ Ἄννας. This idiom is indeed almost confined to narration, and chiefly has place in parenthetical sentences.

— νόσων, καὶ μαστ. καὶ πν. κ.] Here we see deponical possession studiously distinguished from disorders, and that by a Physician. The disorders are also distinguished into the ordinary and milder ones (νόσοι), and the more grievous and painful (μαστίγαι) (as Mark iii. 10, and v. 29, and Ps. xxxii. 10); so called, because such were regarded as peculiar souffrages from God. So μαστίγαι is used in Hom. II. μ. 37. Æschyl. Prom. 703. Theb. 604. Ag. 625. Ἐθεράπευσαι is used proprid of the νόσοι καὶ μαστίγαι, and improprie of the dispositions. However, in that case there was almost always a disorder cured at the same time that a demon was ejected. Ἐχαρίσατο τὸ βλέπειν, 'he bestowed sight,' meaning, the faculty of sight; for such is the force of the Article. However, the τὸ is absent from nearly all the uncials and about 20 cursives, to which I can add several Lamb. and Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B, x. 17. The reading here is doubtful, since the second τὸ might have been absorbed in the first, or the τὸ might have been repeated from the τὸ preceding; but the former supposition is the more probable, and the ancient Translators all seem to have had the τὸ in their copies. At any rate, this is a case in which external authority of MSS. has peculiar weight, and that is quite in favour of the τὸ, which, indeed, imparts a stronger sense, intimating that some of the persons were born blind; and it is confirmed by 2 Macc. iii. 33, σοὶ καχάρισται τὸ ἴδεν ὁ Κύριος.

25. τρυφή is by most recent Commentators supposed to denote sumptuous dress; to which it is sometimes applied in the Classical writers, as in Eurip. Phœn. 1505, στολίδα κροκόισσαν ἐκείσα τρυφᾷ. Thus it would stand for τρυφῆς. That, however, would be too poetic for plain prose; and there is no reason to abandon the general sense luxury, put for a luxurious life. Thus in a kindred passage of Artemid. iii. 60, τοῖς ἐν τρυφῇ διάγουσι. Comp. also 2 Pet. ii. 13. The ὑπάρχει must be accommodated in sense to each of the nouns with which it is connected.

27. ἐγὼ ἀποστέλλω] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel ἐγὼ, from MSS. B, D, L, and 4 cursives only, the Vulg. Version, and some MSS. of the Italic; but without reason, as will appear from note on Mark i. 2.

28. προφήτης] This, not found in 5 uncial and 13 cursive MSS., has been cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but it is defended by the Syr. and Vulg. Versions, and two of the ancient MSS., A, D. Nevertheless, it may have come from the margin, and been left to be supplied from v. 26, though that is not in the manner of the Evangelist.

28. ὁ δὲ μικρότερος, &c.] Meaning that "the humblest Christian, as belonging to a dispensation so superior to that of which John was the last prophet, enjoyed, as such, a superiority over him."

29. ἰδικαίωσαν τὸν Θεόν] Of this disputed term the versions 'honoured,' 'obeyed,' and

τὸ βάπτισμα Ἰωάννου ³⁰ οἱ δὲ Φαρισαῖοι καὶ οἱ νομικοὶ τὴν βουλὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡθέτησαν εἰς ἑαυτοὺς, μὴ βαπτισθέντες ὑπ' αὐτοῦ. ³¹ [εἶπε δὲ ὁ Κύριος·] * Τίνι οὖν ὁμοιώσω τοὺς ἀνθρώπους τῆς γενεᾶς ταύτης; καὶ τίνι εἰσὶν ὅμοιοι; ³² * Ὅμοιοί εἰσι παιδίοις τοῖς ἐν ἀγορᾷ καθημένοις, καὶ προσφωνοῦσιν ἀλλήλοις καὶ λέγουσιν· Ἡυλλήσαμεν ὑμῖν, καὶ οὐκ ὠρχήσασθε· ἐθρηνησαμεν ὑμῖν, καὶ οὐκ ἐκλαύσατε. ³³ Ἐλήλυθε γὰρ Ἰωάννης ὁ βαπτιστὴς μήτε ἄρτον ἐσθίων μήτε οἶνον πίνων καὶ λέγετε· Δαιμόνιον ἔχει. ³⁴ Ἐλήλυθεν ὁ Τῖος τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐσθίων καὶ others, are but paraphrases. It is best to suppose a significatio pragmatice, and to adopt the sense espoused by many of the best Commentators: acknowledged and commended the justice of God (i. e. of his purpose in calling them to repentance by John), and were accordingly baptized. This interpretation is required by the antithetical formula in the next verse, τὴν βουλὴν (counsel) τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡθέτησαν, &c. A disputed point, however, still remains,—namely, whether this and the verse following are to be considered as the words of our Lord (which is the common opinion), or whether (as Bornemann, Alf., and others maintain) the words of the Evangelist, containing a remark, that in consequence of what our Lord then said concerning John, the people immediately resorted to his baptism. But (as is justly urged by Campb.) such cannot be the sense here; because John was then in prison, where he remained till his death. An objection this, so serious, that Bornemann, who strenuously maintains the words to be the Evangelist's, is compelled, in stating their sense, to pass over all mention of the people being baptized by John. And then, as if distrusting his own view, he 'sees no reason why the Aorists ἰδικαίωσαν and ἡθέτησαν should not be taken as Pluperfects.' But it may be shown that there is a reason,—namely, that the use of the Aor. I for the Pluperf. is an idiom only to be admitted under certain circumstances, on which see Winer Gr. Gr., and note supra v. 21. Here, however, no such circumstances exist. In short, had the writer meant to express a Pluperfect sense, why should he not have used the Pluperfect tense? As to what is urged by Bornemann, that 'the words, regarded as those of Christ, are languid and frigid,' that is a mere question of taste. But if we allow these to be frigid, it would not be difficult to prove the words which similarly follow in Matt. xi. 12, 13, to be so also. And yet even Bornemann must acknowledge those to be Christ's. Finally, the words under consideration can be no other than Christ's, because they are evidently of the very same nature with the above, and related to the same conversation of our Lord. For as πᾶς ὁ λαὸς here means the people at large, the populace (called at John vii. 49, ὁ ὄχλος ὁ μὴ γινώσκων τὸν νόμον), as opposed to the Rulers and the Pharisees,—so also the best Commentators interpret the expression βιασθαι at Matt. xi. 12, of the meaner crowd. Moreover, though the οὖν at v. 31 may be resumptive, and meant to take up the discourse left at v. 29, yet, according to the invariable usage of the best writers, that supposes the words to come from the same speaker or writer.

But, to advert to what may be considered as principally leading to the opinion of these verses being from the Evangelist,—namely, the words which introduce the verse following, εἶπε δὲ ὁ Κύριος, these are now universally admitted to be not genuine. And vain is it that Bornemann seeks to build even upon this sandy foundation an argument for the preceding being those of the Evangelist. Nothing, surely, is more improbable than that the words should have originated in any such desire to prevent mistake in the words following: for no one could fail to see that they were Christ's. In short, it is plain that the words originated from the Lectiomaries, since the verse commences an ἀνέγνωσις, or Reading, and which required to be introduced by some such words. Thus Scholz attests that they are found, not only in the Lectionaries, but in the margin of those MSS. textus perpetui, which always mark the commencement of the Readings in the margin. It may, moreover, be urged, that the οὖν at v. 3, which is found in all the MSS., evidently has reference to what was said at vv. 29, 30.

Lastly, there is another reason why the verses under consideration cannot but be from our Lord,—namely, that they are evidently adverted to by him at v. 35, καὶ ἰδικαίωθῃ ἡ σοφία ἀπὸ τῶν τέκνων αὐτῆς πάντων. And thus we are there supplied with an authentic interpretation of one of the most variously expounded passages in all the New Test. By σοφία there is meant 'the wise counsel' of God for bringing men to the Gospel, by what was a preparation thereto,—namely, thoroughly repenting of their former sins, and being baptized by John. And by 'the children of wisdom' are meant those who recognized that wisdom, and approved it by acting conformably thereto and becoming assimilated thereto, and who were therefore children of God.

The passage may be rendered thus: 'And now the great body of the people who have heard him,—and even the publicans,—have acknowledged and fulfilled the just purpose of God (see Acts xx. 27), by being baptized by John; but the Pharisees and Lawyers have set at naught, by rejecting, the purpose of God respecting themselves, having not been baptized by John.'

³³ δαιμόνιον ἔχει] for δαιμονίζεται, as often in the New Test. Though Valcknaer maintains that the former phrase was only a common expression of reviling, for to be mad; q. d. μωλ-

πίνων καὶ λέγετε· Ἰδοὺ ἄνθρωπος φάγος καὶ οἰνοπότης, * φίλος χολᾶ; which the earlier Greeks expressed by δαίμωνι καὶ κακοδαίμονι.

³⁴. φίλος τελωνῶν] Such is the reading of the great body of the MSS., Versions, and early Editions; which is received by all the Critical Editors. The other reading arose probably from the passage of Matt. xi. 19.

^{36—50}. It is now generally admitted that, for many reasons, the narrative contained in these verses does not relate to the same anointing of Jesus as that recorded at Matt. xxvi. 6. Mark
xiv. 3. John xii. 3; and that there is no sufficient ground to suppose the woman here mentioned to have been the Mary Magdalene spoken of soon after, viii. 2. The term applied to her in the next words, ἥτις ἦν ἁμαρτωλὸς, cannot but mean (as is plain from Hesych., who, in v. ἀλοιταί, conjoins ἁμαρτωλοὶ with πόρναι) a courtesan; though, as is plain from the context, one now (though of late) reformed. The ἦν (which must not be taken as a pluperfect) confines the sense to what was then the case, inasmuch as her penitence and reformation—brought about by our Lord's teaching—had been so recent, that she still, it seems, lay under the same stigma as before. That she was, as Mr.
Alf. says, even up to this time a prostitute, is incredible, even on his own showing, where he says, that the woman's behaviour certainly implies that she had heard our Lord, and been awakened by his teaching.

³⁷. ἐν τῇ πόλει.] Render: not, 'in the city;' but, 'of the city;' this being a common Greek idiom for ἐκ τῆς πόλεως, which occurs at viii. 27. By πόλ. is to be understood the town where Simon's house was situated.

— καὶ ἐπιγνῶ.] I have now, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., admitted the καὶ, as supported by strong external authority (to which I could add not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin.
Coll. B, x. 16), confirmed by internal evidence, considering that the καὶ was more likely to be removed than added. The καὶ is often thus introduced, as if necessary to a Participle, though propriety requires its absence. Nevertheless, it is quite as likely that Luke used the καὶ, and that the Critical Corrector removed it as an unclassical construction.

For ἀνάκειται just after, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read κατακ., from A, B, D, L, X, and one cursive, a very suspicious circumstance, which induces me to suppose that κατακ. was a correction of Critica, who had in mind Mark ii.
15. That all the copies but 6 should have been altered, almost uselessly, is incredible.

At v. 38 I cannot receive, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., the alteration of position, from four MSS. only. Even were there more, one reading is as likely to be "a re-arrangement" as the other; and here external authority so paramount ought to prevail.

³⁸. στᾶσα ὀπίσω] Jesus, it seems, was re-
elbow, his head and countenance turned towards the table, and his naked feet (the sandals being taken off before the meal) turned the contrary way towards that at which the servants who bore the dishes came to wait on the guests.

— κατεφίλει] This action implied the deepest reverence and most profound humility, as the bathing his feet with his tears did humble supplication. The anointing of the feet was also a mark of profound respect, retained even in modern times. Both these actions are alluded to by Aristoph. Vesp. 608, καὶ πρώτη μὲν ἡ θυγάτηρ με Ἀπονίῃ, καὶ τῷ πόδ' ἄλειψῃ, καὶ προσκύσασα φιλήσῃ. The wiping his feet with her hair was also a mark of deep reverence.
When Mr. Alf. remarks that τοῖν δάκρ. cannot mean 'her tears' [though the words are so rendered in the Pesch. Syr.], one is inclined to wonder at what school he learnt his Greek. The use of the Article for the Pron. poss. is one of the most frequent of idioms,—well known to scholars even before the labours of Bp. Middl.
and Mr. Green had further developed its use.
And Mr. Alf. is here (as occasionally elsewhere) splitting a hair, by a distinction between the tears which she shed, and her tears. The former is the literal sense; the other comes in by implication.

³⁹. οὗτος, εἰ ἦν προφήτης, &c.] Render: 'If this man were a prophet, he would know.' By προφήτης is here meant a Divine legate, 'one sent from God,' and consequently endued with supernatural knowledge.

⁴⁰ Καὶ ἀποκριθεὶς ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπε πρὸς αὐτόν Σίμων, ἔχω σοί τι εἰπεῖν. κ 1^a. 52. 5.

40. ἀποκριθεὶς] This might be rendered, as it is by most recent Translators, addressing; but, considering that there seems here a reference to in answer λέγων, it is best to render by answering; what our Lord here replies in words being, we may suppose, said in answer to what Simon had said to himself in thought; thus supplying one among other remarkable instances of our Lord's knowledge of the thoughts of men. See Matt. ix. 4. Hence, while Simon imagined he had found a decisive proof that Jesus was not a prophet, our Lord, by replying to his inmost thoughts, showed him that he was far more than a prophet, nay, was no other than the Prophet who should come into the world. See John vi. 14. Thus we are enabled to see the full force of the personal appeal to the inner thought and conscience of Simon in ἔχω σοί τι εἰπεῖν, by which is denoted 'something of great importance,' our Lord meaning thus to fix his whole attention on what he was going to say.

41. χρεοφειλ.] I have now, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., received this reading, instead of text. rec., from all the uncials and a few cursive MSS. (to which I add 'most of the ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies,' as also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), confirmed by internal evidence, considering that this later Greek form was more likely to be used by Luke than the earlier and Attic χρεωφ., which might be introduced by the Ecclesiastical Revisers.

42. The δὲ after ἐχόντων has been cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from 4 uncials and 5 cursive MSS. An authority, however, too slender, espec. considering that this is a case in which the particle (supported by the Syr. and Vulg. Versions and the MS. A) can hardly be dispensed with, and ἀσυνδέτων would be out of place. Lachm. retains the word, but within brackets. It was, I doubt not, omitted by accident in those 8 copies. The particle is often lost by the carelessness of scribes. See Matt. xii. 46. xiii. 1. xxvii. 35. xxviii. 41. Mark v. 13. Luke xvii. 3, 17. ix. 32. xxi. 23. xxii. 47. John vii. 9, 41. ix. 37. xvi. 20. xix. 34. xxi. 12, and occasionally in the Acts, Epistles, and Revel. In a multitude of other passages the δὲ (which the Critics seem to have disapproved of) is altered to some other particle, such as καὶ, οὖν, &c. I mean not to deny, that particles of connexion were often obtruded into the text, in the middle ages. But this is one of those cases in which we can hardly suppose that the writer (unless St. John) would fail to use the particle.

44. Our Lord now contrasts the incivility of Simon, who had neglected the usual offices of attention, with the respectful assiduity of the woman. And here we have allusions to the several customs in use among the Jews to guests who were made very welcome. 1. Their sandals were unloosed, and their feet washed and carefully wiped, and, if the person were of high rank, anointed. 2. A kiss was the usual salutation on entrance, or as soon as the person was comfortably seated. 3. The head was sometimes anointed with aromatic oils or unguents.

45. For εἰσῆλθον. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read εἰσῆλθεν, from L and 8 cursives of the same Family, confirmed by the Syr., Ital., Vulg., and Copt. Versions, and Victor—very slender authority: though I can confirm it by about nine ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies. I suspect, indeed, that the number of copies having εἰσῆλθον is far greater than is supposed, since so minute a variation might escape the eyes even of a careful collator. Internal evidence is therefore rather in favour of the reading; and, if admitted, it would enable us (Mr. Alf. thinks) to account for the admission of such a woman into the guest-chamber of such a Pharisee. She seems, says Mr. Alf., to have entered simultaneously with our Lord and his disciples. But this is only exchanging one difficulty for another, since it is not easy to imagine how the disciples would allow such a person to join their train;—unless, indeed, they had observed her (prob. unknown to them by character) lately in close attendance on their Lord's preaching. And this seems the true key to unlock the difficulty.

47. οὐ χάριν—ἀγαπήσει πολὺ] It may seem not very easy to fit what is here said into the lesson conveyed by our Lord in the parable. The difficulty mainly turns on the sense to be assigned to the ἐν. By the ancient and the early modern Interpreters it is explained to mean for, or because. But not a few of the more recent χάριν, λέγω σοι, ἀφένονται αἱ ἁμαρτίαι αὐτῆς αἱ πολλαί, ὅτι ἠγάπησε πολὺ. ⁴⁸ ὃ δὲ ὀλίγον ἀφίεται, ὀλίγον ἀγαπᾷ. ⁴⁸ ¹ Εἶπε ¹ Matt. 9. 2. δὲ αὐτῇ· Ἀφένονται σου αἱ ἁμαρτίαι. ⁴⁹ ^m Καὶ ἤρξαντο οἱ συν- ^m Matt. 9. 2. ⁿ Mark 2. 7. ανακείμενοι λέγειν ἐν ἑαυτοῖς· Τίς οὗτός ἐστιν ὃς καὶ ἁμαρτίας ἀφίησιν; ⁵⁰ ⁿ Εἶπε δὲ πρὸς τὴν γυναῖκα· Ἡ πίστις σου σέσωκέ σε πορεύου εἰς εἰρήνην. ⁿ Matt. 9. 22. ^{Mark 5. 34.} ^{10. 52.} ^{infra 5. 45.} ^{18. 42.}

Expositors regard this sense as repugnant to the scope of the parable; which, say they, represents the gratuitous forgiveness of sins as the cause of the love, not the love the cause of the forgiveness, (an effect, they remark, at v. 50 ascribed to faith,) and they render the ὅτι therefore. But this signification is deficient in authority. And as to what has been alleged, that it represents love as the meritorious cause of the remission of sins, that is by no means the case. Although faith is afterwards said to have saved her, yet as it was faith working by love, the latter might be said, in a popular sense, to be the cause of her salvation. The meaning of ὅτι ἠγάπησε πολὺ (where ὅτι is for ὅτι, i. e. καθὼς, en quod: see note on Mark ix. 11) may be expressed by 'inasmuch as she hath given full evidence of her love and attachment.' Now that of itself implied faith in the Messiahship of Jesus, and may be presumed to have sprung from the root of true repentance. Thus the full sense of the passage may be thus expressed: 'wherefore such being the case, I say unto thee, her many sins are forgiven; for (i. e. inasmuch as) she hath loved, doth love, much: intimating why and on what account her sins were thus forgiven, namely, because of her faith, working by the love of a true penitent heart, and under the full purpose of amendment for the future. See v. 50, ἡ πίστις σου σέσωκέ σε, words which probably our Lord subjoined in order, we may suppose, to preclude any such mistaken notion, as that her love and affectionate assiduities were in any degree the meritorious cause of her salvation. Thus he makes it distinctly understood, that it was her faith, thus working by repentant love, that had drawn forth the declaration of her Saviour, that 'her sins were forgiven to her.'

The next words, ὃ δὲ ὀλίγον—ἀγαπᾷ, seem meant to convey, under a gnome generalis, a special animadversion on the individual addressed; and would have been more plainly expressed, had there been written (what Bornem. conjectures to be the true reading, ὃς δὲ ὀλίγον ἀγαπᾷ ὀλίγον ἀφίεται αὐτῇ. The sense intended is evidently this: 'But so it is,—he to whom little is forgiven (i. e. he who has little to be forgiven) has little of love'—the very case of Simon, whose deficiency in love, practically evinced, is glanced at in these words of our Lord.

48. ἀφένονται σου αἱ ἁμαρτίαι] 'thy sins are [hereby] forgiven thee.' Many regard this as a repetition of the consolatory assurance, which Christ had given to the woman. But the truth is, that we have here a formal pronouncement of that forgiveness, which the foregoing words only implied.

49. ὃς καὶ ἁμαρτίας ἀφίησιν:] Render: 'who even forgiveth sins.' The καὶ is used as in similar passages at vii. 25, and Matt. viii. 27. Mark iv. 41; and here, as there, τίς means quis, qualis, or quantus.

50. πορεύου εἰς εἰρήνην] This is not, as many regard it, a mere form of affectionate valediction, as in James iii. 16. So to view it is to confound εἰς εἰρήνην with εἰς εἰρήνην. The full sense is (by the use of an expression found also in a quite similar passage, viii. 48, where, as here, a sort of twofold meaning is meant to be conveyed), not only go in peace (i. e. released from that which had destroyed it) but, for peace, looking forward to peace and joy in believing, that peace with God which passeth all understanding.

VIII. 1. κατὰ πόλιν καὶ κ. The κατὰ here has the distributive force, which has place not only in numerals, but also in other nouns, and the full sense is, 'city by city, and village by village.'

2. Μαγδαληνῇ] i. e. an inhabitant of Magdala, on the Lake of Genesareth.—ἐξῆλ., 'had been expelled.' Neut. for Pass.—ἐπτά, possibly for πολλά, defin. for indef., as in Matt. xii. 26 and 45, but not certainly.

3. ἐπιτρόπου] It is not agreed what is the exact office designated by ἐπιτροπος; which, as it denotes generally one who has an office committed to his charge, is of very extensive signification, and may denote Guardian, or Lieutenant of a province, or Treasurer, or house or land Steward, agent and manager. So Xen. Œcon. xii. 2, ἔχει ἐπιτρόπους ἐν τοῖς ἀγροῖς. It is, indeed, impossible to determine the exact nature of the office held by Chusa under king Herod, inasmuch as, from an inscription in Boeckh (Inscr. Gr. T. II. No. 2790), it appears that there were several persons under a sovereign who had the appellation, as in Jos. Antt. xviii. 666, mention is made of one Thaumastus, as king Agrippa's ἐπιτροποι τῆς οὐσίας. Chusa was

For ἀπὸ before τῶν ὑπ., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἐκ, from A, B, D, K, L, and 10 cursives of the same Family (to which I could add a few Mus. copies, and also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16) —very insufficient authority, though internal evidence is rather in favour of ἐκ. But this is, as Griesb. and Scholz saw, no case for change. As respects the αὐτοῖς just before, which, for αὐτῷ, is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from many MSS. uncial and cursive [to which I could add some Lamb. and Mus. copies], it cannot be admitted, since, although external authority is quite in favour of it, internal evidence is decidedly against it, from its yielding a sense exceedingly harsh and jejune,—considering that the disciples have not been previously mentioned.

To suppose αὐτῷ, with Meyer and Alf., "a correction, more natural after healing had been mentioned," is wholly gratuitous and sophistical; and to suppose the correction to have been introduced into the great body of the copies, is quite improbable. It should rather seem that the αὐτοῖς arose by error of scribes from the s following adhering to the ω, and, as often, confounded with C.

4—15. Parable of the Sower, Matt. xiii. 1—8. Mark iv. 1—21, where see notes.

4. καὶ τῶν ἐπιπορ. πρὸς αὐτόν] These words are peculiar to Luke, and their purpose is to show how it came to pass, that there should have been so great a concourse of persons to our Lord at the time when he delivered the subsequent parable, namely, that fresh crowds were continually resorting to him; a peculiar sense of ἐπιπορ., but found in Polyb. iv. 9, 2, ἐπιπορ. πρὸς τὸ πλῆθος. The full meaning literally expressed is, 'Now when a great multitude is being assembled even of those who are resorting to him [as they came] city by city (i.e. a crowd out of each), [namely, those cities which he had gone to in lately traversing Galilee]. It was, as Mr. Alf. says, 'the desire of those who had been [lately] impressed by his discourses [or influenced by], his miracles, which brought them together to him now.' There is something graphic in the narrative present of the two verbs συν. and ἐπιπορ., which is not found in the passage of Matth., where a Pass tense is adopted in συνήχθησαν. As respects the reading, I am now of opinion that συνάγεται there is probably the true reading.

7. καὶ συμφυεῖσαι αἱ ἄκ., &c.] Συμφυεῖσαι is a Passive form of later Greek, instead of the Act. Aor. 2; yet it occurs in Philo. What is meant by the choking here spoken of will appear from Xenoph. Econ. § 12, Τί γάρ, ἴφη, ἦν ὅλη πνίγη, συνεξορμαῖσα τῷ σίτῳ καὶ διαρπάζουσα τοὺς σίτον τὴν τροφὴν,—and Ælian V. H. iii. 1, κίττος—συμφυκνύει τοῖς δένδροις.

9. τίς εἶη ἡ παραβολή α.] 'what may be the meaning of this parable.' So Cebes Tab. δεῖν ἡμεῖν—τί ποτε ἔστιν ὁ μῦθος.

12. οἱ δὲ παρὰ τὴν ὁδὸν—ἀκούοντες] The full sense, as appears from the parallel portions of Matth. and Mark is, 'Those by the way-side are those that hear [only] but do not attend, or lay to heart, what they hear.' In other words, 'The seed sown by the way-side denotes the word as preached to way-side hearers,' i.e. those who receive the word into hearts that cannot attend to, or comprehend it, λόγον ἀπὸ τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν, ἵνα μὴ πιστεύσαντες σωθῶσιν.

13 Οἱ δὲ ἐπὶ τῆς πέτρας, οἱ, ὅταν ἀκούσωσι, μετὰ χαρᾶς δέχονται τὸν λόγον· καὶ οὗτοι ῥίζαν οὐκ ἔχουσιν, οἱ πρὸς καιρὸν πιστεύουσιν καὶ ἐν καιρῷ πειρασμοῦ ἀφίστανται. 14 Τὸ δὲ εἰς τὰς ἀκάνθας πεσὼν, οὗτοί εἰσιν οἱ ἀκούσαντες, καὶ ὑπὸ μεριμνῶν καὶ πλοῦτου καὶ ἡδονῶν τοῦ βίου, πορευόμενοι, συμπνύγονται καὶ οὐ τελεσφοροῦσι. 15 Τὸ δὲ ἐν τῇ καλῇ γῇ, οὗτοί εἰσιν οἷτινες ἐν καρδίᾳ καλῇ καὶ ἀγαθῇ, ἀκούσαντες, τὸν λόγον κατέχουσιν, καὶ καρποφοροῦσιν ἐν ὑπομονῇ. 16 Οὐδεὶς δὲ λυχνὸν ἄψας, καλύπτει αὐτὸν σκεύει, ἢ ὑποκάτω κλίνης τίθῃσιν ἄλλ' ἐπὶ λυχνίας ἐπιτίθῃσιν, ἵνα οἱ εἰσπορευόμενοι βλέπωσι τὸ φῶς. 17 Οὐ γὰρ ἔστι κρυπτόν, ὃ οὐ φανερόν γενήσεται· οὐδὲ ἀπό-

13. καὶ οὗτοι ῥίζαν οὐκ ἔχ., &c.] Here kai stands for δι, which is found in the parallel Gospels. Render: 'But those (meaning such persons) have no root'; where is added in the parallel Gospels, ἐν ἑαυτοῖς; meaning that they have no principle of growth. The next words, οἱ πρὸς καιρὸν, &c., ῥῆμα or ἔρπε qui, intimate the reason why such is the case,—namely, that their faith is but temporary and transient. The full sense intended is, 'inasmuch as they believe but for a season,' or, as the other Gospels express it, 'are but temporary believers.'

— πειρασμοῦ] i. e. trial ἐκ θλίψεως ἢ διωγμοῦ, as the parallel passages of Matth. and Mark suggest. 'Ἀφίστανται,' 'start off,' fall away from the faith. So 1 Tim. iv. 1, ἀποστήσονται τῆς πίστεως.

14. In the interpretation of this verse Expositors have been much perplexed, chiefly by the confusion which exists of the thing itself with that to which it is compared; for πορευόμενοι has reference to the persons designated; but συμπνύγονται to the seed with which they are compared. But the sense is best cleared up by taking the expressions as they stand. Οἱ ἀκούσαντες is not for οἱ ἀκούοντες, found in the other Gospels, but may be rendered, 'who after hearing [the word],' and the kai just after is like the Hebr. for τότε, then. The next words, καὶ ὑπὸ μεριμνῶν—βίου serve to show how it comes to pass, that the seed thus sown, and seemingly taking root, comes to no perfection, produces no fruit. The words, ὑπὸ μεριμνῶν—βίου are to be connected with συμπνύγονται, and not, as Bornem. and others suppose, with πορευόμενοι. Ὑπὸ signifies 'under the pressure of,' with allusion to the choking of the seed under heavy clods. By πλοῦτον (an expression rendered obscure by extreme brevity) understand the possession of riches, as causing him who possesses them to set his heart upon them and trust in them, to be proud of them, and to forget that 'he is, as regards the soul, poor and naked,' Rev. iii. 17. By μεριμνῶν are meant the 'anxious cares of life.' With the sentiment here implied, comp. Philem. Frag. Incert. vii. 1—4, 'Ἀεὶ τὸ πλουτεῖν συμφορὰς πολλὰς ἔχει, Πράγματ' τε πολλὰ κίνηχλάσεις μυρία, Πράξει τε πολλὰς συλλογὰς τε τοῦ βίου. Ὅθεν πένεσθαι μᾶλλον ἡδύναι ἔχει, Ἐχειν τε μέτρια, κάμειμον ζῆν βίου, ἵνα ward off poverty, and to obtain and keep wealth' (see Theocr. Idyll. xxi. 1—5, and Eurip. Med. 599), where for the manifestly corrupt reading συλλογὰς—left untouched by Bentley and Meinecke—I conject. συγχύσεις, which derives no little confirmation from Eurip. Andromache, 292, πικρὰν σύγχυσιν βίου Φρ. πόλει, and Diod. Sic. l. i. 75, Ἐσόμενῃν ἰσῶν τοῦ βίου σύγχυσιν. As respects πορευόμενοι and συμπνύγονται, I would not, with some, regard the former term as redundant, or as meant to denote gradually (a sense wholly unsupported by proof); and least of all would I render, with Alf., 'as they go forth, go their way'; for though the sense occurs elsewhere, yet it is in a different context. The word is best considered as a participle of circumstance (like the Latin gerund), denoting mode or manner, and meaning, 'as they go on in the course of life,' equiv. to ἀναστρεφόμενοι. As respects συμπνύγ., it is not what Kuin. regards it, a deponent form (for no example of this is to be found), but a passive. What is here meant, then, is, that, as it is with seed which thus sown becomes, from one stage of growth to another, more and more choked and smothered, so it is with the persons in question, who are represented as gradually choked; for by the term συμπνύγ. it is meant that the word within them is quite choked, and becomes unproductive of any perfect fruit, as expressed in οὐ τελεσφοροῦσι. The word is used properly of trees or plants bringing fruit to maturity, and that almost always with an Accus., though sometimes with-out; as Philo, p. 26, αἰξουσι καὶ τελεσφοροῦσι, and Plut. de Educ. § 4. Comp. Geopon. l. x. 87 (of a fruit tree), καὶ τελεσφορεῖ, καὶ οὐκ ἀπορίπτει τὸν καρπὸν.

15. ἐν καρδίᾳ καλῇ καὶ ἀγαθῇ] This is to be regarded, not, as it is by Beza and Grot., as a dictum ex adyitis Philosophia, but as a popular form of expression, not to be interpreted theologically, but ethically, denoting purity of purpose and goodness of intention, by which persons are prepared to keep fast hold of what they have heard and learnt, and to carry it out ἐν ὑπομονῇ, scil. τοῦ ἔργου, or what is denoted by ἔργου ἀγαθοῦ in Rom. ii. 7, καὶ ὑπομονῇ ἔργου ἀγαθοῦ, meaning, 'by patient continuance in well-doing' under all circumstances, whether prosperous or adverse. Ἐν ὑπομονῇ may be

¹⁸ δ δοκεῖ ἔχειν] The δοκεῖ is not redundant, in the present, and perhaps in very few of the many passages adduced in proof thereof. Luke has here expressed something more than Matthew and Mark,—namely, that what such a person yet retains is likely to be so soon lost, that he can hardly be said to have it, though he may seem to himself or others to have it.

²⁰. λεγόντων] Examples of this ellipt. genit. occur in the purest Class. writers from Homer downwards.

²¹. οὗτοί εἰσιν, οἱ, &c.] I have pointed thus, because the Article of with the Particip. has here an explanatory force, and οὗτοι and οἱ ποιῶντες require to be kept distinct; the sense being, 'My mother and my brethren are those' (our Lord here, as appears from Matt. xii. 49, pointing to his disciples).—namely, those who hear and do the word of God. Comp. Matt. xii. 48; Mark iii. 32—35. So speaking, then, our Lord declares that the hearers and doers of the word of God are his mother and his brethren—in other words, that they occupy as near and dear a relation to him.

²²—²⁵. Our Lord while crossing the lake stills a storm. Comp. Matt. viii. 18—34. Mark iv. 35.

²³. ἀφύπνωσε] 'obdormivit.' A very rare sense of the word, which in the Class. writers signifies 'to raise oneself from sleep,' to awake. This, however (probably a provincial or popular use of the word), is found in the Sept., Judg. v. 27, and Ignat. Martyr. § 7.

—κατέβη] Stormy gusts are, in the Classical writers, often said καταίειν (so Thucyd. ii. 25, ἀνέμου κατιόντος. Pausan. xi. 34, 3, κατιόντος ἐπὶ τοῦ πνιγματος καταβαίνειν), very rarely καταβαίνειν. The term κατέβη is graphic, and alludes to the fact, that the λαίλαψ, or hurricane, when arising, whether at sea or on a lake, seems to come right down from the sky (comp. Hom. II. xiv. 19, πρὶν τινα κεκριμένον καταβήμεναι ἐκ Διὸς οὐρον); or, when occurring near shore off a rocky coast (which was the case in the present instance), down from the mountain tops through the gorges. In συνεπληροῦντο we have a familiar catachresis, by which what properly respects the ship only (so in Matt. we have ἵστί τὸ πλοῖον καλύπτεσθαι, and in Mark, γυμίζεσθαι—ὑπὸ τῶν κυμάτων) is applied to the sailors. The same catachresis, however, is found in the Class. writers, though only in the case of the term used by Mark, γυμίζεσθαι, evidently suggested by this, of which I know no other example; yet of ships as filled out by a crew it occurs in Xen. Hell. iv. 8, 7, also in Plato, p. 75 and 92, 'to be filled to the full' (cram-full). So the Gloss. Gr. explains συνεπληροῦν by farciō.

²⁴. ἀπολλύμεθα] 'we are perishing;' lit., 'are being lost;' the term applicable to the ship (as used in Xen. Hist. i. 1, 26; 6, 24 and 26, νῆων τρεῖς ἀπόλλυνται) being applied to the crew, as in Xen. Hist. i. 7, 7.

26—29. Comp. Matt. viii. 28—34. Mark v. 1—20, and see notes there.

26. Γαδαρηνῶν] On the reading here see note on Matt. viii. 28, in Excurs. i. at the end of the volume. As respects the reading ἀντιπέρα here, adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from almost all the uncials and not a few cursive MSS.,—to which I can add several Lamb. and Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16,—it has internal evidence in its favour, and may be the genuine reading; but the actual existence of the form is uncertain; and it makes no part of the plan and purpose of this edition to introduce obsolete and anomalous forms, which would be unsuitable to my readers generally, and are merely objects of antiquarian interest to any.

29. For παρήγγειλε, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read παρήγγελλον, from nearly all the uncials and several cursive MSS. (to which I add several Lamb. and Mus. copies, also Tr. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17.) And indeed internal evidence is in its favour, from the extreme rarity of the Imperf. form; which, however, is found in Hdot. viii. 70. ix. 53 (a writer who never employs the Aorist), also Xen. Cyr. ii. 42, ταχὺ παρήγγελλον, and Thucyd. v. 10, 3, in the texts of Bekk., Poppo, and Goell. (formed on the most ancient MSS.), παρήγγελλε, where, however, I have, with Arnold, retained παρήγγειλε, though the other is probably the true reading. However, I cannot find that the Imperf. was ever used in the Hellenistic Greek. It never occurs in the Sept., nor in any of the later Greek writers. And in the only other passage where Mark uses this verb we have παρήγγειλε in all the copies.

—συνηρπάκει] corripuerat, lit., 'had held in his grasp,' a very graphic term, and one highly suitable to possession. So Philo, p. 219, ὑπὸ θείας κατοχῆς συναρπασθεὶς οἰστρῶ. This appears from the proper signification of the term, which is, 'to clench and hold fast any thing by drawing the fingers together.' In ἰδεσμεῖτο—φυλασσόμενος, the part φυλασσ. is meant to intimate, that, even though bound (or attempted to be bound, as the Imperf. may intimate) with manacles and fetters, he required to be kept under guard, lest he should break his chains; the unnatural increase of physical strength in such possessions being doubtless akin to that subsisting in cases of raving madness.

31. τὴν ἄβυσσον] scil. χώραν, that part of Hades in which the souls of the wicked were supposed to be confined. See 2 Pet. i. 14. Rev. xx. 1. So also Eurip. Phœn. 1632, Τάρταρον ἄβυσσον χάσματα, and Act. Thom. § 32, ἡ ἄβυσσος τοῦ Τάρταρου. And so in 2 Pet. ii. 4, we have τάρταρώσας. See Professor Stuart's Essays on the words relating to Future Punishment, especially on ἡνέω, ἔδνη, and Τάρταρος. 'Sheol (says he) was considered as a vast domain or region (of which the grave was only a part, or a kind of entrance-way), extending deep down in the earth, even to its lowest abysses. It may also be remarked, that, as in the Old Test., Sheol is a place to which the righteous go, as well as the wicked; and as our Saviour, subsequently to his death, is represented as being in Hades, Pa. xvi. 10. Acts ii. 27, 31; so it was not improbable that the general conception of Hades, as meaning the region of the dead, comprised both an Elysium and a Tartarus (to speak in Classical language), or a state of happiness and a state of misery.' See more in the ample Dissertation of Mr. Greswell 'on the existence and locality of Hades,' forming the 10th Chapter of the Appendix to his work on the Parables. Whether this ἄβυσσος is to be considered as a part of Hades, or not, the context, which represents the fear of torment, demands that we should here suppose the place meant to be the abode of damned spirits, whatever may be that locality.

32. παρεκάλουν] Tisch. and Alf. read παρεκάλεσαν, from B, C, L, and 3 cursives; while Lachm. retains the text. rec., very properly, since it was as likely that παρεκάλεσαν should have been introduced from the passage of Mark as παρεκάλουν from that of Matthew. As to Alf. adopting παρεκάλεσαν "because less usual," one might very well deny such to be the case; but that is no matter, for in instances of this kind, weight of external authority must decide. Can any person, but one blinded by system, think it aught but incredible that so slight an alteration should have been made, without any reason, in all the copies but six; for I cannot find a vestige of it in the Lamb. and Mus. copies?

33. I have now received, with Matth., Griesb., Scholz., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., the reading εἰσήλθον, instead of εἰσῆλθον, from nearly all the uncial and very many cursive MSS., including not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies.

34. For γεγεννημένον, I have received γεγονός, with Griesb., Scholz., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from many uncial and not a few cursive MSS. (including some Lamb. and Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), confirmed by internal evidence. The word ἀπελθόντες, cancelled by all recent Editors, and fully-bracketed by myself, I find absent from all the best Lamb. and Mus. copies, also Tr. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17.

37. The τὸ before πλοῖον is cancelled by

Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, C, L, X, and 13 cursives, but wrongly, as will appear from various notes on Matthew and Mark. It is more likely that the τὸ should have been here, as on many other occasions, in all the four Gospels, removed by Critics who were ignorant of the force of the Article, and the fact as to the boat provided, than that it should have been introduced here into all the copies but seventeen. It is true that supra v. 22 we have ἐνίσθη εἰς πλοῖον, yet there many ancient MSS. read τὸ πλ., and even if the τὸ be not genuine, it will not affect the genuineness of the τὸ ἔρρι, because there the narration is quite fragmentary; and since it commences a narration, the Article would be out of place.

39. καθ' ὅλην τὴν πόλιν] Not meaning the whole city [of Gadara], but the side at large; for, from what goes before, it appears that the people, up and down, had been told what had taken place; and at v. 37 it is said ἠρώτησαν αὐτόν ἅπαν τὸ πλῆθος τῆς περιχώρου τῶν Γαδ. ἀπελθεῖν.

40—56. Raising of Jairus' daughter, and healing of a woman with an issue of blood, Matt. ix. 1—26. Mark v. 21—23.

40. ἀπεδέξατο αὐτόν] A stronger term than προσέδ.: the sense being, 'welcomed his coming, which they had awaited with longing expectation.'

42. ἀπέθνησκει] 'was dying,' at the last gasp, so as to be in a manner dead; so Plato, ἀποθνήσκειν τε καὶ ταῦτά. In the parallel passage of Matthew we have ἰταλῶνται, a term, however, proceeding from the anxious parent, and presenting a very natural hyperbole. This renders it unnecessary for us to suppose, with Alf., that Matthew was not aware of the subsequent message.

⁴² ἐν τῷ ὑπάγειν αὐτόν· 'as he was just going off,' viz. to the house of Jairus. Of this peculiar construction and use of ὑπάγειν, another example occurs at xvii. 14, ἐν τῷ ὑπάγειν αὐτούς, 'as they were going,' viz. to the priests, to show themselves as cured. It is true, that for ὑπάγειν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read πορεύ-εσθαι, from C, D, P, one or two cursives, and the Ital. Vers.; and Mr. Alford pronounces ὑπάγειν as 'an alteration to a more specific term;' as if it were likely that, in all the copies but four or five, an alteration, where one should least have expected it, would be made. Whereas nothing is more probable than that the change should have taken place, in those few MSS., from a marginal gloss, by which a somewhat rare idiom was explained. As respects the words καὶ ἰγίνιτο, preferred by the same Editors on the same slender grounds, they were evidently interpolated by Critics who thought they should improve the construction, and had in view supra
v. 40 and infra xvii. 11, and other passages.

⁴³ οὕσα ἐν ῥύσει· With this use of εἶναι with ἐν, denoting to labour under a disorder (occurring elsewhere in Scripture), we may compare ἐν ῥύσει ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ in Mark v. 2.
In either case the ἐν is for σύν. For εἰς ἰατροῖς is found ἰατροῖς—in almost all the best MSS., and is with reason adopted by every Editor from Weta downwards. On the force of the Dative, see Matth. Gr. Gr. § 387.

— ἰατροῖς προσαναλῶσασα—τὸν βίον· 'had expended on physicians,' &c., namely, in seeing them. The construction here of the dat. for the accus. with εἰς is quite according to Classical usage; and on that very account the reading ἰατροῖς, which I have, with Lachm. and Tisch., adopted, from most of the ancient MSS., in the place of εἰς ἰατροῖς, may possibly have sprung from critical emendation. On the other hand, the construction of the accus. with εἰς was probably that used in the common Greek phraseology. The πρὸς in composition ought not to be regarded, as it has been by many Commentators, as pleonastic; nor can it have the sense assigned,

'besides all her suffering, all that she suffered,' which were a sense not a little jejune; but rather it seems meant, that she had spent not only all her own means, but also whatever she could borrow from relations or friends; who, according to the custom of the ancients, were bound, in such a case, to render assistance by common contributions. This view of the sense derives confirmation from a passage of Plato,
p. 311, where persons are mentioned as not only expending their own means, but τὰ τῶν φίλων προσαναλίσκοντες. So, too, in Demosth. p. 1025, 20, we have ὥστε πρὸς τοῖς αὐτοῦ καὶ τὰ
τῶν ἄλλων προσαναλίσκειν.

⁴⁵ καὶ εἶπεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς· τίς, &c.] Jesus asked, not that he was ignorant who had touched him, and knew not the circumstances of the case, but that he might not be himself the divulger of the miracle; and that the woman, hearing the question (which was meant to elicit what followed), and drawing near, might testify the benefit she had received, and that, in consequence of her declaration, she might presently hear from his lips that 'her faith had saved her;' and that, by this means, others might be excited to come and be healed of their disorders.

⁴⁶ ἔγνω δύναμιν ἐξελθοῦσαν ἀπ' ἐμοῦ.] See

51. The eis, which I have placed within brackets, is cancelled by almost all Editors, on strong authority, confirmed by all the best Lamb. and Mus. copies.

52. ἐκόπτοντο] 'were bewailing her' (lit. 'beating themselves' for her). See my Lex. in v.

— οὐκ ἀπὶθανεν] Lachm. and Tisch. read, from MSS. B, C, D, L, X, and several others, οὐ γὰρ ἀπὶθ., an evident alteration (made for the sake of introducing a neater composition) on the part of those who perceived not the force of the Asyndeton.

54. ἐκβαλὼν ἔξω πάντας, καὶ] These words are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from MSS. B, D, L, X, and 4 others. They may have been introduced from the parallel passages of Matth. and Luke: but I suspect that they were removed by the Alexandrian Critics, and for no better reason than that to which I have attributed the var. lect. v. 52. In ἡ παῖς we have Nomin. for Vocat., which occurs also at vi. 25. x. 21. xii. 32. xviii. 11, and Mark v. 41, and sometimes in the Class. writers, espec. the Attic ones. For ἐγείρου, Lachm. and Tisch. read ἐγείρει, on good authority. But I prefer ἐγείρει, for a reason which will appear from my note on Matt. ix. 5.

55. διέταξεν αὐτῇ δοθῆναι φαγεῖν] It has been well remarked, that this direction shows that the maiden was not only restored to life, but to a lively sense of its wants and weaknesses; and would, in her present frail state, require nourishing food, so that the life actually restored should be kept up.

IX. 1. μαθητὰς αὐτοῦ] These words, not found in very many of the best MSS. (including many of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), several Versions, and some Fathers, are cancelled by almost every Editor from West. downwards. Some MSS. too, and those Versions which have not μαθ. αὐτοῦ, have ἀποστόλους αὐτοῦ.

Nothing, therefore, can be plainer than that both are from the margin, and introduced from Matt. x. 1.

2. ἀπέστειλεν, &c.] In the foregoing verse it is said, that he gave them power to cast out demons and to heal disorders: in this, that he gave them a commission to go forth and exercise that power, in conjunction with the preaching of the Gospel-Dispensation.

3. ῥάβδους] Many MSS. have ῥάβδον, which is preferred by almost all the recent Editors, whether rightly or not, is doubtful. See note on Matt. x. 10.— Ἀνὰ, a-piece. So Matt. xx. 9, ἔλαβον ἀνὰ δηνάριον, and John ii. 6, ἀνὰ μετρητὰς δύο ἢ τρεῖς. On this distinction sense, see Bornemann, and Matthie, Gr. Gr. § 579, 3; who, however, seem wrong in supposing that in this idiom the numeral and noun belong to the preposition ἀνὰ. They are rather to be referred to the verb; and the preposition is to be taken as put absolutely (thus becoming, as it were, an adverb) by an ellipsis of ἕκαστον, which is sometimes expressed, though generally left to be understood.

— ἔχειν] This is usually explained as Infinitive for Imperat. ἔχετε; a not unfrequent idiom, to lessen the harshness of which, Philologists generally suppose an ellipsis of an Imperative of εἶχε, or of ἔει. But it is better, with Hermann on Vig. p. 591, to suppose the idiom to be a relique of ancient simplicity of language, when a wish was expressed simply by a verb in the Infinitive. See Matthie, Gr. § 546. Kuhn, Gr. by Jelf, § 671. Of this there is a confirmation in the use of the Hebrew verb. The principle, however, cannot apply to the phraseology of later Greek writers, especially prose writers. It will usually be found that the Infinitive has a reference to some verb which has preceded, and to which the writer inadvertently accommodates the construction. Thus the idiom falls under the head of Απαιταποδοτον; ex. gr. here ἔχειν is used as if αἴρειν (with reference to εἶπε, bade) had preceded, and not αἴρετε.

7. After γινόμενα the words ὑπ' αὐτοῦ are omitted in B, C, D, L, 2 cursives of the same Family, with the Ital., Copt., Sahid., and Armen. Versions, and are cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., but only bracketed by Lachm. There is scarcely any authority for canceling them. Alf. pronounces the words "a supplement for particularity;" but strange it were that such a supplement should have crept into all the MSS. but four, and all the most important and trustworthy Versions. It is far more probable that they were omitted by accident in two ancient archetypes whence those copies were derived. Instances of such omission are common in even the best MSS.

— διηπόρει] 'he was in doubt what to think,' viz. as to what Jesus really was. For ἐγγίγερται, Lachm. and Tisch. read ἡγέρθη, from B, C, L, and 7 cursives of the same Family; while Alf. retains the text. rec.; very properly. But ἡγέρθη was not derived, as he imagines, from Matth., but was a Critical correction as to tense, exactly as supra vii. 16, where Alf. adopts the ἡγέρθη, from nearly the same MSS. as here.

8. For εἰς, Lachm. and Alf. read τις, from B, C, L, X, and a few of their usual associates. Alf. pronounces the εἰς 'adopted from Matth.,' whereas τις is manifestly a correction of Hebraistic into Class. Greek by the Critics; exactly as the εἰπε δὲ for καὶ εἶπε edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on nearly the same authority. And Alf. derives the text. rec. 'from Matth.,' as if so slight an alteration would be introduced into all the copies except some dozen.

9. καὶ ἰξ. ἰδεῖν αὐτόν] 'and he was desirous of seeing him.' See note on Matt. xiv. 13.

10. ὅσα ἐποίησαν] 'what they had done,' i. e. their proceedings generally, implying what is expressed in the parallel passage of Mark, namely, what they had taught.—ὑπεχώρησε. The reason why our Lord, with his disciples, thus suddenly retired, appears from what we read in the parallel passages of Mark and Luke. It was not, as Mr. Alf. says, 'to rest awhile from labours so severe as to afford no time for necessary refreshment;' but, as we may infer from Matt. xiv. 13, to withdraw from the fury of Herod, who had recently put to death John the Baptist. The Bethsaida here mentioned was doubtless the Bethsaida on the east side of the lake, and at the top of it, where the Jordan enters it, called Julias, and consequently quite out of the territory of Herod. The τόπος ἔρημος here spoken of was, it would seem, in the district of the town of Bethsaida, and probably somewhere on a mountainous chain, which extends along the whole of the Gaulonitis. Though Bethsaida is here called πόλις, yet that is only said by anticipation, as being such at the period when Luke wrote this Gospel. At the time when our Lord went to the desert place in its district, Bethsaida was, as we learn from Jos. Antt. xviii. 2, 1, no more than a κώμη; though, on being colonized and renamed by Philip the Tetrarch (Herod's successor), it was made a πόλις, and called Julias, after Augustus' daughter Julia. However, there is some difficulty created by a various reading. For εἰς τόπον ἔρ. πόλ. καλ. B^h, Tisch. and Alf. edit εἰς καλ. B^h, from B, D, L, X, and 1 cursive; while Lachm. retains the text. rec.;—very properly, for the other reading cannot be right, since it is inconsistent with all the other three Evangelists, from whose accounts it plainly appears that our Lord and his disciples retired, not to the city or town of Bethsaida, but to a desert place in its district; which the words, as they stand in all the MSS. except a very few, distinctly state. John (vi. 3) fixes the site by calling it τὸ ὄρος. See note on Mark vi. 34.

11. For δεξάμενος, Lachm. and Tisch. read ἀποδ., from B, D, L, X, and 15 cursives of the same Family (to which I can only add Lamb. 1177); while Alf., with unwonted prudence, retains the text. rec.; very properly, since ἀποδ. arose from a critical alteration, suggested by supra viii. 40, though the context is here different, the sense being, 'having admitted them to his presence,' given them a willing reception.

12. ἡμέρα ἤρξατο κλίνειν] Κλίνειν and its compounds are often used with ἥλιος, to denote the declination of the sun to the horizon. Sometimes, as here, ἡμέρα is used instead of ἥλιος. In these cases some suppose an ellipsis of εἰς ἱσπέραν, which is expressed in Judg. xix. 11, and Arrian Exp. Al. iii. 4, ἐγκλινάντος δὲ τοῦ ἡλίου εἰς ἱσπέραν. But ellipse there is none.

— ἵνα—καταλύσωσι] We have here a metaphor taken from travellers unloosing their horses (either by unbridling or unharnessing them) for a halt (as Hom. Od. iv. 28, εἴτ' εἰ σφῶν καταλύσμεν ὁκίας ἵπκον), or by unloading them for the night and taking up their quarters, as at an inn, &c. Such, too, is the sense here intended. The multitude were to seek lodgings and provision at the neighbouring κώμας and ἀγροί, by which latter terms are to be understood 'farm-houses.' No provisions were to be had ἐν ἐρήμῳ τόπῳ, because there were no habitations.

For ἀπελθ., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit πορευθίντες, from 5 uncial and 6 cursive MSS. The text rec. may have come from the parallel passages of Matth. and Mark. Or, the other reading may have been a mere alteration of verbal Critics, who were thinking of such passages as infra v. 13. vii. 22. ix. 52. xiii. 32. xv. 15. xvii. 14. But in those there is not, as in the present, an addition of words between the particip. and the verb. Besides, the context here requires the somewhat stronger sense 'to go off, depart.' And the reading is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Arab., and Æthiop. Versions. Besides, the slenderness of external authority forbids the change adopted by the above Editors; who would probably have decided otherwise, had they remembered their own contrary decision at Acts xxiii. 32, where, for πορεύεσθαι they adopt ἀπέρχεσθαι, from some 11 MSS., without being aware of the present passage (though coming from the same writer), and of Luke's frequent use of πορ. in its participial form, which confirms the reading πορ.

there. But there is no reason why the Evangelist should not have used ἀπελθόντες, espec. considering that the term is more suitable here.

13. For ὑμεῖς φαγεῖν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read φαγ. ὑμ. from only one MS. (B), taking for granted, as usual, that the text rec. was introduced from Matth. and Mark, in the face of the high improbability that all the copies except one should have been so industriously altered in so minute and unimportant a particular; whereas nothing was more likely than that in one copy the position should have been changed either accidentally by the scribe (such things being of perpetual occurrence), or by a Critic, who thought good composition required that the phrase δότε φαγεῖν should not be broken up by the interposed ὑμεῖς, espec. as thus a stronger emphasis would be imparted.

— εἰ μήτι—ἀγοράς.] 'unless, indeed, we should buy,' &c. On this use of the subjunct. after εἰ μὴ (occurring also at 1 Cor. xiv. 5, and Rev. xi. 5) see Winer, Gr. Gr. § 42. I agree with Mr. Green (Gr. N. T. p. 56), that the circumstance of the subjunct. being found in the sentence with εἰ may be considered as a colloquial anomaly.

14. κατακλίνατε αὐτοὺς κλισίας] So Joseph. Antt. vi. 4, 1, κατακλίνει αὐτὸν ἐπὶ τὴν ἰστίαν. Athen. xi. init., κατακλίνας (scil. αὐτόν) ἐν τῇ πύλῃ, θαλλίαν τε καταλάσας, ἀντὶ τραπεζῆς, παρέθηκε τῶν τυνθέντων. In κλισίας there is an Accus. of manner.

16. εὐλόγησεν αὐτοὺς] Lit., 'asked the Divine blessing upon them.' Agreeably to the Jewish custom, by which it was usual for the head of the family, at every meal, to pronounce a blessing on the food, previously to partaking of it, commencing with the words, 'Blessed art thou, O God, who bringest bread out of the earth,' &c. Thus the term εὐλογεῖν came to be transferred to the food itself, and, with the Accus. of the thing, was equiv. to εὐχαρίσταιν, as here and in Matt. xxvi. 26, et al.

18. ἐν τῷ εἶναι, &c.] To take ἐν in the sense

συνῆσαν αὐτῷ οἱ μαθηταί, καὶ ἐπρώτησεν αὐτοὺς, λέγων· Τίνα με λέγουσιν οἱ ὄχλοι εἶναι; ¹⁹ Οἱ δὲ ἀποκριθέντες εἶπον· Ἰωάννην τὸν βαπτιστὴν ἄλλοι δὲ, Ἡλίαν ἄλλοι δὲ, ὅτι προφήτης τις τῶν ἀρχαίων ἀνέστη. ²⁰ Εἶπε δὲ αὐτοῖς· Ὑμεῖς δὲ τίνα με λέγετε εἶναι; ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ [ὁ] Πέτρος εἶπε· Τὸν Χριστὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ. ²¹ Ὁ δὲ ἐπιτιμήσας αὐτοῖς, παρήγγειλε μηδενὶ εἰπεῖν τοῦτο. ²² εἰπὼν, ὅτι δεῖ τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου πολλὰ παθεῖν, καὶ ἀποδοκιμασθῆναι ἀπὸ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων καὶ ἀρχιερέων καὶ γραμματέων, καὶ ἀποκτανθῆναι, καὶ τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ † ἐγερθῆναι.

afterwards, as is done by Maldonat and others, is inadmissible by the proprietas linguae, and is forbidden by the words of the parallel passage of Matthew. Of καταμόνας the sense is not to be pressed on, the meaning being only so far 'apart' as was necessary for the purpose (sufficiently so for the privacy of prayer in a low voice), since from the added words συνῆσαν αὐτῷ subjoined for the sake of qualifying καταμόνας, it appears that the disciples aderant, 'were at hand' in devout attendance on their Lord. In συνῆσαν there is a pregnancy of sense, the full import being, 'were with him in attendance upon him,'—a peculiar use of the term, yet not unfrequent in the writings of Plato, e. gr. p. 151, D. It is observable, that though there are three or four varr. lectt. here existing, yet they only show the perplexity of the ancients as to the sense of the word.

21. For εἰπεῖν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read λέγειν, on considerable, but not competent, authority; though internal evidence is favourable. See note on Matt. viii. 30. The same decision may be passed on the ἀναστῆναι, for ἐγερθῆναι, adopted at the next verse by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.

23. καθ' ἡμέραν] Editors and Critics differ in opinion on the genuineness of this expression, which is rejected by Wets., Matth., and Scholz, but retained by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. External evidence is pretty equally balanced; the Alexandrian recension and almost all the Versions having it; and the Constantinopolitan, with the other Versions and several Fathers, being without it. Griesb. thinks it was removed by the librarii, as not being in the other Gospels. But he adduces no example of a similar curtailment from the same cause. Matthæi, on the contrary, thinks it was introduced from the Fathers and Interpreters; who had perhaps in view 1 Cor. xv. 51. And of this he adduces some strong proofs. I am inclined to agree with him; and would add that the same asceticism which induced several of the Fathers to throw out the εἰκὴ at Matt. v. 22, may have induced them to introduce καθ' ἡμέραν here. But I rather think that they only brought it forward to complete the sense, not the text; and that having been taken from them by the Scholists, it was occasionally marked in the margin of copies, and then was introduced into the text of the transcripts. However, the authenticity of the words may justly be regarded as an open question.

24. ὃς γὰρ ἂν θέλῃ—αὐτήν] Render: 'For whosoever would save his life, will lose it; and whosoever shall lose (or sacrifice) his life—will save it.' There is here (as in the other parallel passages, and the similar ones of Matt. x. 39, and John xii. 25) an indirect Paronomasia between the two senses of ψυχὴ, life and soul—equiv. to salvation; the meaning being, in other words, 'Whosoever would save his life, it must be to the sacrifice of his soul,' i. e. his salvation. It is strange, that in this and the parallel passage of Matthew, Abp. Newc., Wakef., and Campb. should render ψυχὴν in the latter verse by life. The words may, indeed, have the appearance of conveying a notion of the physical sense life; but that is only because our Lord's words were formed on an adagial gnome, setting forth the folly of a man's sacrificing life for any consideration in life whatsoever.

25. The term ζημιωθείς was probably introduced as serving further to unfold the idea in question, and by way of intimating that the loss is occasioned by the default of the person himself, which is such as to incur the forfeiture of his soul. Finally, it may be observed that ἑαυτόν is used in preference to ἑαυτοῦ ψυχὴν, by way of setting the case in the strongest point of view, by designating the loss as no less than that of the whole man, soul as well as body; which is confirmed by what we find in Matt. x. 28.

27. ἐσθάντων] This, for ἐσθιόντων, is found in very many MSS. (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and is adopted by all the Editors from Matth. downwards. The αὐτοῦ, for ἑαυτοῦ, adopted by Tisch. and Alf. (not Lachm.), from B, L, and one cursive, may seem confirmed by internal evidence, as if ἑαυτοῦ was introduced, as Alf. thinks, from Matthew and Mark. But it is very improbable that it should be introduced into all the copies but two, and the ancient Versions from the Pesch. Syr. downwards. Whereas αὐτοῦ is very likely to have arisen, in those copies, only from an error of a scribe who probably was thinking of something else. Or it may have been an alteration of Critics who,—as the various readings attest, and as my extensive collations confirm,—had a great objection to this particle, which they very often removed, or supplied its place by another; as probably in the present instance, though to the sacrifice of the deep impersonality here involved in the words.

28. ἐγένετο—ἡμέραι ὀκτῶ] Here there is nothing against grammatical propriety; ἐγένετο not being the true verb to ἡμέραι, but, together with ἡμέραι, constituting (by an ellipsis of τοῦτο) a formula frequent in Luke, which merely serves to introduce some new narration. Thus ἐγένετο δὲ, &c. will be connected with καὶ παραλαβὼν; and consequently ὥσει ἡμέραι ὀκτῶ will be a parenthetical epanorthosis upon the preceding μετὰ τοὺς λόγους τούτους, and it is equiv. to μεθ' ἡμ. ἔξ in Matthew and Mark. It is obvious that the one reckoning is inclusive, the other exclusive. The τὸν before Πέτρον is, on strong authority, cancelled by all the recent Editors.

31. τὴν ἔξοδον] This word often signifies a military expedition, both in the Scriptural and Classical writers. Hence some have imagined that it here figur. represents the contest our Lord was afterwards to maintain against the rebellious Jews, on his advent at the destruction of Jerusalem. But this is neither warranted by the words, nor permitted by the context. The best Commentators since the time of Grotius have been agreed that ἔξοδον (by an ellipsis of τοῦ ἔξου, expressed in Joseph. Antt. iv. 8, 2) is here used to denote death; by a euphemism common both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, and indeed found in every language, and which is justly considered among the allusions that have preserved that most ancient of traditions, the immortality of the soul. The misinterpretation above adverted to probably arose from the verb with which ἔξοδον is construed, πληροῦν; which would be very applicable to ἀγῶνα; whereas, in its usual sense, it seems not to suit ἔξοδον. Yet it does; since, by a sort of sempre præsens, there is an allusion to the previous accomplishment of the work our Lord came to perform (see John xvii. 4); just as in the Latin phrase obire mortem, which is used with allusion to obire penam; as also defungi viâ, with allusion to the previous discharge of the business of life, and what constitutes the true purpose of life.

32. βεβαρημένοι ὕπνῳ] This may mean, 'heavy for sleep'; in other words, 'their eyelids were weighed down unto sleep.' So Anacreon, Od. 52, καρθίνον βεβαρήμην εἰς ὕπνον.

33. μίαν Μωϋσεῖ] This, instead of Μωϋσεὶ μίαν, is found in almost all the best MSS. (including not a few Mus. copies) and Versions, and has been adopted by all the Editors from Matth. downwards.

34. ἐν τῷ ἐκείνους εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὴν νεφ.] 'when they entered into the cloud,' meaning, by a common permutation of terms, 'when the cloud enveloped them.' They were 'afraid,' because the cloud was a symbol of the Divine presence. See note on Matt. xvii. 6.

^{36.} ἐν τῷ γενέσθαι τὴν φωνήν] The full sense is, 'when the voice had been [uttered].'

— εὐρέθη ὁ Ἰησοῦς μόνος] Perhaps εὐρ. is here to be taken as at Acts viii. 40, Φίλ. εὐρέθη εἰς Ἄλφτον, and so may be rendered, 'made his appearance, or was seen to be alone.' Thus answering to the account of Matthew and Mark, οὐδένα ἰδόν αἰ μὴ τὸν Ἰησοῦν μόνον.

^{38.} For ἀνεβόησε, Lachm. and Tisch. read ἰβόησε, from B, C, D, L, and 6 cursives of the same Family; while Alf. with unwounded discretion, retains ἀνεβ.; very properly, though not for the reason he gives,—namely, that ἰβόησε is the more usual term, ἀνεβ. being almost as usual as ἰβ., and in this sense of shouting out is required by propriety. But it is not unfrequent for a preposition in composition to be lost; and sometimes I have in the Class. writers found it removed by a Critic who thought that the ava overloaded the sense; e. gr. in Xen. Cyr. vii. 1, 29, Ed. Schn., λεχυρῶς ἀναβόησας, where later Editors would read βοήσας, from one MS., or also remove λεχυρῶς; the latter of which modes is adopted by Poppo, who, however, wrongly brackets the ava, not seeing that the only reason for ava being expunged was that λεχυρῶς had got out of place. Ἀναβ. is often used by Xen. and by most Class. writers, and occurs in the Sept. and Jos. Surely one at least of our Editorial Triumvirs might have remembered the similar instance at Matt. xxvii. 46, where the same Family of MSS. has ἰβόησαν, where they rejected the reading: then why not here?

For the text. rec. ἐπιβλίψον, ἐπιβλέψαι is found in almost all the best MSS. (including many Lamb. and Mus. copies), and has been adopted by all the more recent Editors.

^{39.} ἐν συντρίβον αὐτόν, 'having bruised,' we have a strong metaphor taken from any animal being utterly destroyed, by all his bones being crushed together and broken. See Dan. vi. 24. Jerem. i. 17. So Shakespeare, Cymbel., has, 'Willis himself crush him together.'

^{41.} τὸν—ὧδε] This (instead of ὧδε τὸν υἱόν σου) is found in almost all the best MSS., and is received by all the recent Editors.

^{43.} ἐπὶ τῇ μεγ. τοῦ Θεοῦ] 'at the mightiness of God' [as manifested in Christ]. Μεγαλειότης is a word which, in Scripture, is almost appropriated to designating Divine power. So it is used in 2 Pet. i. 16, of Christ, thus evidently showing Peter's belief in the Divinity of our Lord. See Phot. Epist. 125.

— οἷς ἐποίησεν ὁ Ἰ.] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἐποίησεν, from six uncial and seven other MSS., but injudiciously, considering that internal evidence is quite adverse to the reading. Ἐποίησεν has every appearance of being a correction of tense, proceeding from the Alexandrian Critics; though it seems called for by propriety of language, since the sense here meant to be expressed is not fecerat, but faciebat, 'was doing.' Yet, as the Eng. did presents a good familiar representation of the sense, so might ἐποίησεν be considered such.

^{44.} θέσθε εἰς τὰ ὅτα] In θέσθε εἰς τὰ ὅτα here, and the briefer form, ἑνωτίσασθε, Acts ii. 14, we have two expressions of common life, equiv. to the more exact phrase, θέσθε εἰς τὰς καρδίας, in Luke xxi. 14, and elsewhere, which has its parallel in the Latin reponere in corda, mentem, animum, and signifies, 'to lay to heart,' to attend diligently to what is said, or, as here, about to be said. Here the phrase has the fullest force of which it is susceptible; for the words just after subjoined—to which attention is here called—were of deep and solemn import; and the disciples would have just reason to remem-

— τοὺς λόγους] 'these words,' meaning the ῥήμα, or declaration immediately following, respecting the delivering of the Son of man into the hands of men for suffering and death, of which they had been apprised a little before (supra v. 22). In both cases our Lord was pleased to intimate his approaching sufferings and death, on occasions when the general acknowledgment of power and glory might lead them to expect that he would become worldly great.

45. In ἵνα μὴ αἰσθ. the ἵνα is equivalent to ὥστε, adeo ut, 'inasmuch that they did not understand the declaration,' i. e. did not receive it in full belief, hindered by their preconceived opinion, that the Messiah would live for ever, and be distinguished by worldly greatness. This notion led to the distinction, made by the Rabbins, between Messiah Ben Joseph, who was to die, and Messiah Ben David, who was to triumph and live for ever.

46—50. Comp. Matt. xviii. 1—5. Mark ix. 33—40.

46. τῶς, &c.] This use of τὸ, in reference not to a noun, but to a sentence, or part of a sentence, is almost peculiar to Luke, though it occurs also in Matt. xix. 18, and Mark ix. 23. In fact, the neuter Article, as Winer observes, 'stands before all propositions which are cited as proverbs or maxims; or which, on account of their importance, require to be made distinctly prominent.'

48. ὁ γὰρ μικρότ., &c.] See note on Matt. xviii. 4.

49. ἀποκρ.—εἶπεν] The connexion of this answer with our Lord's declaration will appear from what is said on Mark ix. 38, seqq., but it is more distinctly set forth here.

The τὰ before δαιμόνια is omitted in most of the uncial and some cursive MSS. (to which I can add not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies), and is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But may it not have been removed because not in Mark, and from the idiom being somewhat unclassical? But since it recurs at xi. 15. 18—20. xiii. 32, why should not Luke have used it here? It occurs several times in Matthew and Mark.

50. ἡμῶν—ὑμῶν] Lachm. and Tisch. edit ὑμῶν—ὑμῶν, on strong, but not competent, authority.

51—xix. 28. Occurrences which took place in the course of our Lord's last journey out of Galilee to Jerusalem.

— συμπλ. τὰς ἡμέρας τῆς ἀναλ. α.] Συμπληροῦσθαι, when used of time, denotes such a completion of a period between two given periods, as that the latter is fully come. Here it is, as often, taken populariter; an event being thus spoken of as come, when it is very near at hand. Render, 'at the time when the days were being fulfilled,' i. e. 'when the time was almost come; in other words, when nothing but the journey to Jerusalem intervened between the present time and our Lord's ascension to, or assumption into (ἀνάληψις), heaven, whence he came. For such is the import, however disputed, of the term ἀνάλ., which is used in this sense in the Sept., 2 Kings ii. 11 (said of the Translation of Elijah), also in the Test. xii. Patr. In τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ ἐστήρ. we have a Hebraism, denoting fixedness of purpose, determination to do a thing.

ὥστε ἐτοιμάσαι αὐτῷ. ⁵³ Καὶ οὐκ ἐδέξαντο αὐτὸν, ὅτι τὸ ^{o John 4. 4, 9.} πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ ἦν πορευόμενον εἰς Ἱερουσαλήμ, ⁵⁴ Ἰδόντες ^{1 Kings 1. 10, 12.} δὲ οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ Ἰάκωβος καὶ Ἰωάννης εἶπον Κύριε, θέλεις εἰπωμεν πῦρ καταβῆναι ἀπὸ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, καὶ ἀναλῶσαι αὐτοὺς, ὡς καὶ Ἡλίας ἐποίησε; ⁵⁵ στραφεῖς δὲ ἐπετίμησεν αὐτοῖς, καὶ εἶπεν Οὐκ οἴδατε οἶον πνεύματος ἔστε ὑμεῖς; ⁵⁶ [ὃ γὰρ ^{John 2. 17.} Τῶς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου οὐκ ἦλθε ψυχὰς ἀνθρώπων ἀπολέσαι, ἀλλὰ ^{John 2. 17.} σῶσαι.] καὶ ἐπορεύθησαν εἰς ἑτέραν κώμην.

52. At ἐτοιμ. αὐτῷ there is an ellip. of τόπον, or ξενίαν, which words are elsewhere expressed. I am quite at a loss to imagine how Mr. Alf. can explain the sense to be 'the preparation of announcing the coming of Jesus as the Messiah.' This would make the Evangelist write by enigma. It is only necessary to observe, that the next words οὐκ ἰδέξ. confirm the usual interpretation. The Samaritans' refusal to receive Jesus to what must have been the usual accommodation of lodgings, &c. supplied to Jews who crossed their country to go to Jerusalem, could not have arisen from our Lord's going up to worship at Jerusalem, but could only have been produced from their having heard of the strong censure, which, in his conversation with the woman of Samaria (recorded in John iv. 20—22), he had passed on their Temple and worship, as compared with the Temple and worship of Jerusalem.

53. ὅτι τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ ἦν πορευόμενον, &c.] This phrase, too, is Hebraic (so in 2 Sam. xvii. 11, וַיֵּרָא וַיִּנָּח וַיֵּרָא, which is rendered by the LXX, καὶ τὸ πρόσωπον σου πορευόμενον ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν), and the sense is, 'because they observed that he was travelling to Jerusalem,' the direct road from Galilee thither lying necessarily across Samaria (see John iv. 4), and when the great Feast approached, there were many Jews travelling across Samaria to Jerusalem.

54. ἀναλῶσαι.] The term signifies lit. 'to consume,' destroy in any way, whether by famine, or what is here meant (as appears from the several particulars, fire, &c.), by any violent death; a sense which it also bears in 2 Thess. ii. 8, and Class., as Eurip. Iph. T. 338. JEL. V. H. iv. 28. As used of fire, the word is frequent in Sept.

55. οὐκ οἴδατε—ἵστε.] There are two modes of understanding the address of our Lord which followed up his rebuke, either as an interrogation, 'know ye not with what spirit ye should be actuated [as being my disciples]?' or understanding πν. of the Holy Spirit, 'know ye not what manner of Spirit ye belong to?' But, according to either mode, some violence is done to ἵστε by extorting from it a sense of duty; and certain it is that not one of the ancient Translators or Expositors so took the words. Moreover, there is found no example, at least in the Gospels, of (οὐκ) οἴδατε used interrogatively. Hence it is better to understand the words, with the ancient and most modern Expositors, declaratively, a mode of interpretation which has more of simplicity and earnestness, in the inculcation of a weighty truth setting forth their want of self-knowledge. Agreeably to this, the sense may be thus expressed: 'Ye know not by what disposition (the opposite to that of the Redeemer, who came not to destroy men's bodies, but to save their souls), and how much at variance with the spirit of the Gospel of peace and love, ye are actuated.' However, the sentiment is closely connected with the disputed question as to the authenticity of the words, and also of the clause subjoined, ὁ γὰρ Τῶς—σῶσαι. Both clauses are cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., and the latter by Griesb. and Scholz. There is strong authority in uncials for the rejection of each, but very slender authority of cursives; and though I could add some dozen of Lamb. and Mus. copies, it would nought avail against, what is very unfavourable, the want of more cursives. And the vast superiority of external authority, confirmed by all the important Versions, is only to be balanced by strong internal evidence against the words, which does not exist. My opinion many years ago, that the omission of the two clauses was occasioned by the καὶ—καὶ, espec. the καὶ εἶπε—καὶ ἔπορ. is, I find, confirmed by the suffrage of Meyer. No tolerable case can be made out against the authority of the former clause; and the latter is closely connected by the γὰρ, and the authority from MSS. is nearly the same for the omission—in the Lamb. and Mus. copies entirely so. Moreover, internal evidence, properly weighed, is not against the latter clause. As to the passages from which the words are supposed to be taken, Matt. xviii. 11. Luke xix. 10, they are, as Alf. observes, not the same words, nor is the sentiment the same. I cannot consent to expunge a passage so strongly supported by external and internal evidence, since, while it is easy to account for the removal, it is difficult for the insertion, of the passage, which has been, with unwonted judgment and prudence, retained by Alf., to whose opinion, however, I cannot assent, that 'the passage was tampered with as being in the way of the system of ecclesiastical censures.' More probably it was omitted through the former clause being not well understood.

place of abode, as a habitation or a home;' and, in point of fact, we no where in the Gospels find it mentioned, or even alluded to, that our Lord had any house of his own.

61. ἀποτάξασθαι] 'to bid farewell to.' How the word comes to bear this sense (found only in the later Greek writers), see my Lex. N. Test. 'Τοῖς εἰς τὸν οἶκ., for τοῖς οἰκείοις, 'those of my family.'

62. οὐδεὶς ἐπιβαλὼν, &c.] A proverbial maxim, couched under an agricultural allusion, derived from the circumstance that the ploughman has to keep his eyes forward, and intent on the lines of the furrows, if he would make them straight (which was denoted by ὀρθοτομῆσαι); whereas to look back from inattention would render his labour fruitless: a forcible image to inculcate the necessity of fixed attention to the important work in question, when once engaged in. Comp. Hesiod. Opp. ii. 60, ἰθὺν ἀβλακ' ἐλαύνει, Μῆκτι παπταίνων μεθ' ὀμῆλας, δλλ' ἐπὶ ἔργῳ θυμὸν ἔχων.

— εὐθετός ἐστιν εἰς τὴν βασιλ. τ. Θ.] i. e. 'fitted or adapted to the work he has to do,' whether as a private Christian, or a preacher of the Gospel. The term εὐθ. signifies lit. 'well-set,' and metaph. 'adapted to the accomplishment of any work.'

For εἰς τὴν βασιλ., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read τῇ βασιλείᾳ, from B, L, and 2 cursives, regarding the text. rec. as an exegetical gloss on τῇ βασ., as if the dat. would need any gloss, or such would have been introduced into all the copies but four. It is far more probable that τῇ βασ. arose from a correction of Critics, who thought a dat. would be a better construction than an accus. with εἰς: and, indeed, it is found in Nicolaus ap. Stob. and Heb. vi. 7. But the accus. with εἰς or πρὸς is found in good Greek writers from Hippoc. downwards. Of the dat. I know no other exx. than the above two.

Moreover, considering that Luke uses the construction εὐθετός· εἰς elsewhere, it is likely that he would use it here.

X. 1. ἑβδομ.] MSS. B, D, M, and 2 cursives, to which I can only add Scriv. γ. It is, however, adopted, in brackets, by Lachm., but how wrongly will appear from the able note of Matthæi. Alf. regards the reading as 'a traditional correction, to agree with the members of the Sanhedrim.' He would have been nearer the truth had he omitted the word traditional, and given the credit of this ingenious device to his worthy friends the Critical correctors, or the Ital. Vers., whence it came into the MS. D and other MSS. altered from the Latin copies, and possibly MS. B, though, if it really be in that copy—which I doubt—the δύο in MS. B may have originated in the K, which letter is very often confounded with B by the scribes. It is possible that the number seventy may have been adopted with reference to the Seventy Elders of Israel, Exod. xxiv., but more probably because a round number.

2. ἐκβάλῃ] This, for text. rec. ἐκβάλλῃ, is found in very many MSS. (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), and is received by almost all Editors from Matth. downwards, except, indeed, Mr. Alf., who retains the text. rec., from B, C, F. But the F is uncertain, and the B only e silentio. As to Mr. Alford's ground of preference, that the Present has the force of an enduring act, the Aorist would indicate a transitory one. But though the former remark may be true, it is here unsuitable; and the use of the Aorist does not necessarily suppose the action to be transitory.

4. μηδὲνα κατὰ τὴν ὁδὸν ἀσπ.] Not meaning that they should violate the common forms of courtesy (as appears from Matt. x. 12. Luke x. 5), but that they should suffer nothing of vain form, or merely complimentary address, still less mere trifling conversation, to divert them from their sacred office.

6. I have bracketed the μὲν and ὁ, which almost all Editors cancel, on strong external authority confirmed by internal evidence.

7. ἄξιος γὰρ—ἔστι [The full sense is, 'And this ye may freely do,] for the labourer is worthy [of his hire, for the labour he does;] q. d. 'ye will earn your temporal support by your labour for the spiritual good of your hosts.

8. ἡγγικεν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς ἡ βασιλ.] Here we have an example of the use of perf. for pres., of which Valckn. adduces examples; and others may be seen in the Grammars of Buttm. and Matth., and Winer, Gr. N. T. § 343. The perf. is used, and not the aorist, by way of expressing completed action at the time present to the speaker; so that perfects of this kind are very properly termed by Kühn. and Jelf present perfects. Here the action of approaching is represented as completed, which amounts to the same as saying that it has arrived or become present. Upon the whole, of the various English Versions here, no one is so correct as our common authorized one, of which the rendering is, 'is come nigh unto you.' Yet this is not altogether correct. The most exact rendering would be, adest, 'is at hand,' i. e. 'is present to you,' equiv. to παρίσται. At v. 11, ἡγγικεν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς must be rendered in the very same manner, though some Translators make a difference. But the use of the perf. for the pluperf. is confined to the language of narration, and does not extend to that of direct address. Moreover, there is great reason to think that the intention of our Lord was that the Apostles should simply repeat the same message in the very same words (whether those addressed would hear or forbear), as a testimony unto them, brought within their reach to choose or to refuse its offered mercies or blessings. Hence I can by no means approve of the cancelling of ἐφ' ὑμᾶς by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. on the authority, they allege, of MSS. B, D, L, 1, 33, 130, 131 (Ed.), 157, 209, and the Copt., Armen., Pers., Goth., Vulg., and Italic Versions. This, however, forms no exact representation. As to the other MSS. I am not able to test their accuracy. But MS. B (the most ancient of all MSS.) has the words. As to D and L, they have little or no authority by themselves; and the other five MSS. (for No. 130 is only the Latin Version of the MS.) are of too modern a date to carry any weight set against nearly a hundred times as many, including the Alexandrian and all the twenty-seven uncial MSS., except two, of the least trustworthy. As to the Versions, the Copt., Arm., Pers., and Goth., they are of little weight. The Italic Version would have some, but that several ancient MSS. of that Version have the words, and probably they were in the original MS. of that Version. As to the Vulg., it has far less authority, when unsupported by the Italic. And Jerome's judgment, on such a point as the rejection of words, is of no great value. I suspect that the words were originally thrown out by some Critics whose purpose it was to remove a tautology, and who thought that there would be more gravity and dignity in ἡγγικεν ἡ βασιλεία, 'is come,' having in mind a passage of Matt. iii. 2, ἡγγικεν ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν. But the absolute construction there of ἡγγικεν would be here unavailable, since (as also at Matt. xii. 28, ἔφθην ἐφ' ὑμᾶς ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ) the fact is announced, not generally, as respects the world at large (as it is in the Lord's Prayer), but in reference to certain persons then specified.

11. τὸν κον. ἀπομασσόμεθα ὑμῖν] Render, 'we return it back to you,' a form of giving up all intercourse: q. d. 'even the very dust from your city, which cleaveth unto us, we wipe off [and return it back] to you.' 'Εφ' ὑμᾶς is by almost all Commentators supposed to mean, 'against you,' 'to your harm.' But that sense cannot be admitted. All that is meant seems to be this,—that the same solemn message is to be delivered unto them, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear. Render: 'But (or however) know ye this (i. e. receive this our testimony), that the kingdom, &c. Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, from B, D, L, and 5 cursives of the same Family, to which I can only add Scriv. y. It may be, as Mr. Alf. thinks, a repetition from v. 9; but the evidence of all the MSS. but 9, confirmed by the Pesh. Syr. Vera., goes far to prove that it is not.

Between ἡμῖν and ἀπομασσόμεθα 7 uncial MSS. and 20 others have εἰς τοὺς πόδας ὑμῶν, which words have been received by Lachm. and Tisch. But internal evidence is against them, from the circumstance that we can better account for their addition than their omission. They came, I suspect, from a marginal Scholium pertaining to κολληθῆναι, i. e. ad pedes, equiv. to pedibus nostris, though that is implied in the ἡμῖν, otherwise the construction in κολλ.

als derives confirmation from Aretæus, p. 76, Σικὴν κούφην κεκολλήσθαι εἰς τὰ μετὰφρανα. But the words seem supplied by the Scholiasts with a view to a passage of Matt. x. 14. Luke ix. 5. Acts xiii. 51, though at so early a period that the words are recognized in the Pesch. Syr. Vers.; and hence it may be thought an open question as to their genuineness, especially as I find them in not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies.

12. λέγω δέ] The δὲ is absent from many MSS. (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies); and since internal evidence is against it, it is probably not genuine.

13. ἐν σάκκῳ—καθήμεναι] This habit and posture in mourning was in use not only among the Eastern, but the Western nations of antiquity. Comp. Eurip. Iph. A. 1175. Xen. Anab. v. 1. vii. 3, and see D'Orville on Charit., p. 488. The putting on sackcloth was not confined to the East. So Plutarch, iii. 168, says of the superstitious man, ἔξω κάθηται σακκίου ἔχων. See on Matt. xi. 21—23.

16. See Matt. x. 40, and note.

18. ἰδῶν τὸν Σ., &c.] The best Commentators are agreed that this is a bold and figurative mode of expression—anticipating the future triumph, already commencing, of the Gospel over the powers of darkness—presenting, as Bp. Warburton, Sermon xxvii., says, ‘a lively picture of the sudden precipitation of the Prince of the air, where he had so long held his empire; and hung, like a pestilential meteor, over the sons of men.’ The construction, however, here demands our first attention, in order to determine the exact sense, which has been disputed. As respects the former, we have here a condensed brevity of expression for ἰδῶν τὸν Σατ. ἐκ τοῦ οὐρ. πεσόντα, ὡς ἀστρ. ἐκ τοῦ οὐρ. πεσόντα, a forcible image to represent the sudden taking place of an event as suddenly come, as quickly gone; ‘come and gone (as we should say) like a flash of lightning.’ So Lucian, Imag. xi. t. ii. 468, Σὺ μὲν, ὡσπερ τινα ἀστραπὴν παραδραμούσαν, ἀναξ ἰδεῖς αὐτὴν καὶ, &c., or (to use the words of a great poet), ‘or like the borealis race, that flit (παράδρ.) ere you can point the place.’ The implied notion of suddenness is conveyed under the same figure in Isa. xiv. 12, where of the King of Babylon it is said: “How art thou fallen from heaven, resplendent (radiant) son of the morning!” Comp. the φωσφόρος of 2 Pet. i. 19, and the ἰωσφόρος of the Sept. In the impressive term ἰδῶν there is reference to a past, but only recently past, event, namely, our Lord’s sending them forth. And in πεσόντα we have the use of the prophetic past for future (like ἐξέπαις in the above passage of Isa., Sept., ἰδοῦσθαι in John xii. 31, κίρται in John xvi. 11, and often both in Old and New Test.) by which any event is anticipated, as having already come to pass. Thus the full sense is: [‘It is no wonder that ye should have found the very devils subject to you through my name and power], for in sending you I [fore-] saw, that Satan the Prince of the devils would suddenly and manifestly lose his power.’ For a similar comparison to lightning, to express the sudden manifestation of Divine power, comp. infra xvii. 24, and Matt. xxiv. 17.

19. πατεῖν ἐπάνω ὀφ. καὶ σκορπ.] This expression might be taken literally (as in Mark xvi. 17, ὁφεις ἀποῖσαι) did the context permit it. But, from the connexion with the preceding and the following verse, it should rather seem to be another figure expressive of their safety,—namely, from men as deadly in their hostility as serpents and scorpions. The connexion of the two verses is this: ‘I saw [by anticipation] devils depart at your bidding, and by the power I gave you. In virtue of the same power you shall now be preserved both from the assaults of Satan and all his emissaries, and shall prevail over the most bitter hostility.’ By τοῦ ἐχθροῦ is to be understood Satan; that being the literal meaning of the appellation. He being the great Enemy of God and mankind. See Matt. iv. 10, comp. with Eph. vi. 11, 12.

an intensive accumulation of negatives. See Matt. xxiv. 21, and note. So in Lucian Pisc. § 19, οὐδὲν οὐ μὴ γίγνηται δίκον, Δικαιοσύνης συμπαρούσης. The purpose of the present verse is encouragement, and the source of it is the unlimited power of Christ over whatever might hinder their exertions, so that "nothing should in any wise harm them," including both things and persons, namely, Satan, his emissaries, and his abettors.

Of the next verse the purpose is mainly warning, by cautioning them under the elation, which new privileges and high powers would too surely generate, against being so puffed up by the consciousness of those powers as to think less than they ought of what far more nearly concerns them personally—that their names have been written in the book of life. Our Lord means to say, that since the power he has granted to them extends so far and wide, they are not to make any particular part of it their especial matter of rejoicing,—not even the subjection of evil spirits to them,—but the communication of God's infinite mercy to them personally, in placing them on the list of his redeemed. Although, however, it is implied, by the very nature of that metaphor, that the title to eternal salvation is unalienable, yet it did not follow but that this might be cancelled (the name blotted out) by conduct inconsistent with the heavenly πολίτευμα, under which any such claim is held. And to this blotting out of the name and claim not unfrequent allusions are found in the Old Test., and also in Rev. xxii. 19. The best Commentators are agreed that there is here an allusion to the methods of human polity; future life being represented under the image of a temporal πολίτευμα, in which the names of citizens were inscribed in a book, from which were occasionally expunged the names of those persons who were deemed unworthy, and who thereby lost the jus civilitatis. Μᾶλλον, not found in very many MSS. (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies). Versions, and Fathers, is cancelled. I think rightly, by almost all Editors. Ἐγράφη should be rendered, as the Pesch. Syr. Version authorizes, 'have been written,' such being the sense intended, though γίγνεται would have been more correct Greek. The reading of some MSS. ἐγγίγνεται, 'have been enregistered,' seems a mere correction; though, being found in three of the oldest uncials and 2 cursives, it has been received into the text by Lachm. and Tisch. as a matter of course, though internal evidence is decidedly against it, and the passage of Rev. xxi. 27 alleged, is a proof to the contrary. At any rate, it has been shown by the best Expositors, ancient and modern, that we are not authorized to infer, from the names having been thus written, any absolute and irreversible decree by election to eternal salvation, but only a present title to life eternal through the obedience of faith, without which their final salvation cannot be secured.

21. ἡγαλλιάσατο τῷ πν., &c.] Here we have the same rapturous expressions of praise and thanksgiving, as on the return of the twelve Apostles from executing the same commission. See note on Matt. xi. 25—27. xiii. 11; and comp. Is. xxix. 14. Eccles. iii. 19. 1 Cor. i. 19, 26.

— ὅτι ἀπέκρυψας, &c.] The phrase here employed is similar to language often found in Scripture; which ascribes to Divine agency the permitted results of human vice or folly. To a customary phrase, then, proceeding from our Saviour's lips, must be assigned its usual meaning; as indeed appears from the tenor of the preceding exhortation. If the Father had hidden these things from the wise and prudent, it was only in a sense consistent with the display, before their eyes, of miracles plain and numerous,—with the employment of a machinery contrived and admirably fitted for the purpose of effecting their conviction and conversion. (Ogilvie's Bampton Lect.)

By ταῦτα, understand all that is expressed, and in any way implied, in the foregoing engristening of the names of the redeemed ones in the book of life.

22. For the text. rec. παρεδόθη μοι, I have now received, with Grieb., Matth., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., μοι παρεδόθη, from a great number of MSS., including every uncial one, and comprehending the best both of the Eastern and Western recension, and every one of the Lamb. and many Mus. copies, with the Compl. Ed., also all the copies in the passage of Matt. xi. 27. The position μοι παρ. seems to have been adopted by the Evangelist on account of the μοι being emphatic, according to the following (which appears the best) rendering of the words: 'Unto Me have all things been committed by my Father, all power and authority,'—namely, inasmuch as (according to the words of the Apostle, Coloss. i. 19) 'it pleased the Father that in Him all fulness should dwell' (even the infinite treasures of grace and mercy committed to Him to dispense to the heirs of salvation), and from Him alone to be derived, He being the Sovereign Dispenser of all things pertaining to the kingdom of grace and of glory. See note on Matt. xi. 27. The words inserted in small print have been adopted, agreeably to the judgment of all the more recent Editors, on strong external authority, confirmed by many Lamb. and Mus. copies, and the Pesch. Syr. Version.

plete knowledge expressed by ἐκπειράζων in the parallel passage of Matthew.

²³ καὶ, στραφεὶς—εἶπε· &c.] I now point ἀποκαλύψαι, καὶ, στραφεὶς, because the words are (as H. Stephens, in his Edition the O mirificum, well saw) in close connexion with the foregoing ones, and form a suitable conclusion to the thanksgiving therein contained. Thus we may render: 'and turning to his disciples apart [from the rest], he said,' &c.

The καὶ before λέγων is expunged by Alf. and Tisch., solely from 2 MSS., B and L, but retained by Lachm.;—very properly, since it is far less likely to have been introduced as "a supplement" in all the copies but two, than to have been removed in those copies by critical correction; for such a use of the καὶ with a Participle is unclassical, though a pure Greek writer would have avoided the previous Partic.

—τί ποιήσας] lit., 'by having done what,' 'by what good deed done.' See Matt. xix. 16, and note. On the force of κληρον. see my Lex.

²⁶ πῶς ἀναγινώσκει;] "Here we have," Lightfoot observes, "a form of expression frequent in the schools, when any one brought forward a text of Scripture in proof of any thing." It is to be noted, however, that our Lord in so speaking, calls on another to adduce some text of Scripture; whereas in the schools it was usual for him who spoke to allege it himself. In the preceding clause, the words ἐν τῷ νόμῳ are placed before γέγραπται ('has been written') by way of making the greater impression, the force of the argument resting on these words with which comp. Is. viii. 20, "To the law and to the testimony." The full sense intended by this interrogatory is, 'in what manner, to what purport, read-

est thou?' (equiv. to, 'what findest thou there?')—a peculiar mode of eliciting what another has to propound. Our Lord refers him to the Law, that he may show him how imperfectly he had understood, and how inadequately he had observed it, and thus bring him unto Him who was the 'Epi of the Law for righteousness (or, justification).' Rom. x. 4.

For δικαιοῦν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read δικαιῶσαι, from B, C, D, L, X, and 2 cursives. But the authority for this is quite insufficient, and internal evidence is adverse. It is very improbable that the alteration should have taken place in all the MSS. but seven (I cannot add one) for no apparent cause. Δικαιοῦν instead of being, as Alf. says, 'the more obvious tense,' is far less so; for it never occurs in the N. T., nor in the Sept.; nor, I believe, in Josephus; nor, indeed, in the Class. writers, except in the Ionic Greek of Hdot. i. 133. ii. 172. vi. 82 and 86. And as there is a strong affinity between the Ionic and the ordinary Greek dialect, we may regard this form as derived from that source. That the Critics should have altered the form into what is usual both in the Class. writers and the Sept., is highly probable.

—κατέβαινε] 'was travelling,' lit. 'descending,' with reference to the situation of Jericho in respect to Jerusalem.

—λησταῖς περιέπεσε] 'fell among robbers.' The scene, as it were, of this story, is well laid on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho; which ran partly through a kind of wilderness occupied with rocks and defiles (see Josh. xvi. 1); and, at that time,—even to the days of Jerome,—was beset with robbers and murderers; inasmuch that it was called the bloody road. Another reason (besides its situation being favourable to banditti) was that of its being the most frequented road in Judæa, as being the principal one to Perea. And a priest and Levite are aptly represented as travelling that way, since the classes, or stations, of the priests and Levites were many of them fixed at Jericho, which is termed in the Rabbinical writers a priestly city.

—ἐκδύσαντες αὐτὸν] Not, having stripped him of his raiment, but spoiled him of all that he had; as we should say, stript him bare, equivalent to 'robbed him,'—a phrase, I apprehend, of common life, of which I can find no example except in the derivative noun ἐκδύσις, in Manetho iv. 331, ἰδὼν ἐκπύριαι τε καὶ ἐκδύσεις τεύχουσιν. And so Gloss Gr. ἐκδύσις, spoliatio. So, too, the Pesh. Syr. and Vulg. must have taken the word, since they render 'despoiled him.' And that the Latin verbs 'spoliare' and 'despoliare' are so used is well known. In πληγ. ἐπιτ. there is a Latinitas, taken from plagas imponere.

—ἀφέντες ἡμιθανὴ τυγχάνοντα] Here τυγχ., not found in several of the ancient MSS. and some Versions, has been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., but on insufficient grounds. Internal evidence is quite in favour of the word, from the greater probability of its being put out than brought in. We may suppose that certain early Critics deemed it unnecessary, and accordingly cancelled it. The biblical Commentators and Lexicographers regard the τυγχάνοντα here as put for ὄντα. But why, then, it might be asked, did not Luke express the sense by ὄντα? As to the use of τυγχάνω ὦν for εἶμι, I cannot help suspecting that a more enlightened exegesis would go far to sweep away the principle (at least in the pure Greek writers) of τυγχ. being ever quite pleonastic. In almost every passage where the pleonasm is supposed to occur, there is some force or other to be assigned to τυγχ. It almost always implies contingency of some kind or other, though it may be difficult to trace it. Thus, for instance, in Soph. Aj. 88, Μένειμι' ἄν' ἤθελον δ' ἂν ἐκτὸς ὦν τυχεῖν: the full sense is, 'I could have wished, by any chance, to be off.'

³¹ κατὰ συγκυρίαν] The Classical writers not unfrequently use κατὰ συντυχίαν, but very rarely κατὰ συγκυρίαν. Inasmuch that we might suppose it to be entirely Hellenistic, did it not occur in Hippocrates. Hence it appears that the phrase κατὰ συγκυρίαν was early in use, but afterwards supplanted by κατὰ συντυχίαν. Yet it maintained a place in the popular diction, even to the time of Eustathius. The term may be defined 'such a concurrence of circumstances' whereby some event is brought about, whether by Divine Providence, as in Dionys. Hal. l. ix. 38, or in the ordinary course of human affairs, as in Hippocr. p. 49, 28, τὰ ἀπὸ συγκυρίης. Diog. Laert. l. x. 98, and here. Of the disputed term ἀντιπαρήλθε, the true sense is, 'he passed by on the contrary side of the road,' intimating that he studiously avoided going up to him.

τραύματα αὐτοῦ, ἐπιχέων ἔλαιον καὶ οἶνον ἐπιβιβάσας δὲ αὐτὸν ἐπὶ τὸ ἴδιον κτήνος, ἤγαγεν αὐτὸν εἰς πανδοχεῖον, καὶ ἐπεμελήθη αὐτοῦ. ³⁵ Καὶ ἐπὶ τὴν αὐριον ἐξελθὼν, ἐκβαλὼν δύο δηνάρια ἔδωκε τῷ πανδοχεῖ, καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ Ἐπιμελήθητι αὐτοῦ καὶ ὅτι ἂν προσδαπανήσης, ἐγὼ, ἐν τῷ ἐπανέρχεσθαί με, ἀποδώσω σοι. ³⁶ Τίς οὖν τούτων τῶν τριῶν δοκεῖ σοι πλησίον γεγόνενα τοῦ ἐμπεσόντος εἰς τοὺς ληστάς; ³⁷ Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν Ὁ ποιήσας τὸ ἔλεος μετ' αὐτοῦ. — ἐπιχέων ἔλαιον καὶ οἶνον] Not 'pouring in' (as if it had been a bolus, which would have required ἐγχέων, found in Hdot. ii. 6), but 'pouring on,' affundens, as the Latin medical writers express the thing. And so indeed ἐπιχέων is used in Gen. xxviii. 18, and xxxv. 14, ἐπιχέων ἐπ' αὐτὴν ἔλαιον, and Dioscor. 11, 91, ἐπιχέας οἶνον. The use of oil and wine, both separately and as a mixture called οὐνέλαιον is plain from passages cited by Wets. from the ancient Medical writers. The mixture was considered a sovereign remedy for wounds produced by violence; wool, lint, or pounded olive being first laid upon the wound. The oil (which in Palestine is very generous) was probably taken with him, by the Samaritan, for the purpose of anointing; and the antiquity of the custom of carrying oil on a journey is shown by the case of Jacob in the Old Test.

— κτήνος] Corresponding to our general term beast, whether horse, mule, or ass. An ass is probably here intended, as being that most used. Indeed, this general term is sometimes, even in the Classical writers, used for the special one. See Xen. Cyr. viii. 2, 8. Πανδοχεῖον denotes a public hostelry, such as are still known in the East by the name khan. See more in my Lex.

³⁵ ἐκβαλὼν] 'having cast or put down.' The two denaria were equivalent to two days' wages of a labourer (see Matt. xx. 9), and therefore sufficient for temporary relief. Indeed, Mr. Greswell shows that it was a sum adequate to maintain a person frugally six or seven days. On ἐπιμελ. and προσδάτ. see my Lex.

³⁶, ³⁷. Here our Lord gives the true answer to the above question, by enabling the interrogator to answer it himself,—nay, indeed eliciting the answer from him.

³⁷. ὁ ποιήσας τὸ ἔλεος μετ' αὐτοῦ] 'he who exercised kindness towards him.' A Hebraism. See notes on Luke i. 58, 72. The moral lesson inculcated in the parable is, as Mr. Greswell says, that 'every man who is so situated as to require the good offices of his fellow-men, without regard to place, nation, consanguinity, or any of the ties which connect one man, or more, with a part of mankind more closely than the rest, must be regarded and treated as their neighbour.' See more in Theoph. and Euthym.

41. τυρβάξῃ περὶ πολλὰ] Here τυρβ. is not in the pass., but the middle voice in a reciprocal sense, 'thou art bestirring thyself, troubling thyself.' Comp. Aristoph. Pac. 1006, and Athen. 336. See more in my Lex. For τυρβάξ., θορυβάξῃ, the reading of C, D, L, and 2 cursives, has been edited by Lachm. and Tisch., but on insufficient grounds, since the omission in those MSS. of μεριμνᾷς περὶ πολλὰ, evinces a license such as destroys all confidence in the reading θορυβ., which indeed is a mere gloss. The above interpretation of τυρβάξῃ is confirmed by Alexia. ap. Suid. 336, F, where he brings in a voluptuary, who, in the midst of some observations similar to what we find in 1 Cor. xv. 32, "let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," slips in an under-address to Manes the cook, τύρβαζε, Μάνη, meaning 'bestir yourself, Manes, about the dinner.' Yet, as the active voice cannot have a reciprocal sense, I would read τυρβάξαι, as standing for τυρβάξῃ, 'are you bestirring yourself?'

42. ἐνὸς ἐστὶ χρεία] An impersonal form (like opus est in Latin), of rare occurrence in the Class., but found in Ecclus. iii. 22 and 49, and xxix. 7. The ἐνὸς here is to be taken emphatically, the sense being 'of one thing [especially] there is need,' namely, the care of the soul, as contrasted with provision for the body. Comp. Ps. xxvii. 4, 'One thing have I desired of the Lord, that' &c.

— τὴν ἀγαθὴν μερίδα—αὐτῆς] Here τὴν ἀγ. μερ. has much force, denoting that meris, beneficium, which is essentially good and profitable both for time and for eternity, and which cannot be lost or taken away. In the term μερίδα there may be an allusion not only to any one taking his portion of what is set before him to choose from (comp. Lament. iii. 24, "The Lord is my portion, saith my soul"); but there seems a tacit opposition to the evil portion (evil, because fleeting and unsatisfying) of those who, in the words of the Psalmist (xvii. 44), have their portion in this life—a portion consequently as fragile as every thing here must be. The term μερ. is used suitably to the foregoing subject, namely, the plentiful repast set forth by Martha, of which a portion would be sent round to each of the guests,—an allusion to the good portion from God to man of his favour and blessing, and an interest in him through the Gospel. Mary is here said to have chosen this portion, because the sons of men have to choose between the portion of this world, which God permits them to take in the fruits of their industry, and the portion in the next, that of their heavenly inheritance through Christ. Hence it is that this portion is called the good portion, meaning that which is alone good, really and essentially such. The next words suggest another reason why it is ἡ ἀγ., the good portion, namely, because it shall not, cannot be taken away; the one differing from the other as the meat which perisheth in the use from that which endureth unto everlasting life, the feeding on the bread of life, John vi. 27.

XI. 1.—13. Our Lord teaches his disciples to pray. We are not to suppose but that our Lord had given them instructions on prayer, both as to the manner and matter. But it was the custom of the Rabbis to give their disciples some brief form of prayer.

2. seqq. On the interpretation here, see notes on Matt. vi. 9, seqq. I cannot but advert to the marvellous omissions which are found in some few MSS., Versions, and Fathers, and which are almost invariably adopted by the late Editors. The words ἡμῶν ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρ. are not found in about eight MSS., with the Vulg. and Peric Versions. But that authority is too slender to claim any attention. The reason for the omission may readily be conceived; though it were vain to imagine reasons for all the innumerable alterations which were introduced by the Alexandrian biblical Aristarchs.

The words γενηθήτω—γῆς are omitted in nearly the same MSS. and Versions as the preceding ἡμῶν—οὐρανοῖς; and, of course, there is no greater attention due in this than in the former case. But the omission here cannot well be considered as otherwise than unintentional. And not only the very small number of MSS. (about six) warrants us to suppose this; but there is a palaeographical principle which increases the probability thereof; namely, that as this clause begins with four words,—two of them the same, and the other two of the same termination with the former clause, ἁγιασθήτω τὸ ὄνομά σου,—so it is likely that these each formed a line in the very ancient Archetype or Archetypes; and thus (as in a thousand other cases) the scribes' eyes might be deceived, and hence they would inadvertently omit the second of those clauses.

Again, the words ἀλλὰ ῥῶται—τροννοῦ are omitted in about the same number of MSS. and Versions as the before-mentioned clauses; with the addition of three or four others, and Origen; and are cancelled even by Scholz. Here the omission cannot be accounted for on the same principle as at γενηθήτω—γῆς: yet the testimony is too weak, and the quarter whence it comes is so suspicious, as to destroy all confidence. Surely it is far more probable that the words were omitted by the above-mentioned Critics for some speculative doctrinal reasons, than that in all the MSS. except about ten, the clause should have been introduced from St. Matth. This last reason will also apply to the other omissions; especially as the doxology, which is found in almost all the MSS. of Matthew, is here found in not one. Is it likely that those who introduced three interpolations should all of them omit to introduce the fourth?

σου ἐλθέτω ἡ βασιλεία σου γενηθήτω τὸ θέλημά σου ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. ³ Τὸν ἄρτον ἡμῶν τὸν ἐπιούσιον δίδου ἡμῖν τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν ⁴ καὶ ἄφεσις ἡμῖν τὰς ἁμαρτίας ἡμῶν, καὶ γὰρ αὐτοὶ † ἀφίεμεν παντὶ ὀφείλοντι ἡμῖν καὶ μὴ εἰσενέγκης ἡμᾶς εἰς πειρασμόν, [ἀλλὰ ῥύσαι ἡμᾶς ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ.]

3. τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν] The τὸ here presents a certain difficulty which Commentators attempt to evade by treating it as pleonasmic; and for the same reason I suspect it was cancelled by some of the early Critics, while others, for τὸ καθ' ἡμ. read, from the parallel passage of Matthew, σήμερον. Both methods are alike unsatisfactory. Suffice it to observe, that the very passages adduced to establish the pleonasm serve to show that, in effect, there is no pleonasm. In short, this use of τὸ is elliptical, εἰς (in the sense 'quod attinet ad') being here understood. And it is also not unfrequently followed by a subst. preceded by another preposition, ἐν, or, what is here found, κατά. So Plato, 320, τὰ δὲ κατὰ τὴν Ἀλλήν Κρήτην; and 17, C, τὰ κατ' ἐκείνην τὴν τέχνην. There may be also an ellipse of μέρος (which word is expressed in Plato, Epist. vii.), but it is unnecessary. The sense may be thus explained: 'Give us the bread (or food) sufficient for us [as regards] this day's need.' These words, τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν, are any thing but (what they have been thought by some) superfluous, being meant to inculcate the weighty truth, that, as we are dependent day by day on the great Author of our being for life, so are we alike dependent on his Providence day by day for the sustenance necessary to carry us through that life.

4. καὶ γὰρ αὐτοὶ, &c.] These words may seem to confirm the interpretation of those who render the ὡς in Matthew vi. 10, by for, or forasmuch as. But it is not necessary to resort to that sense; and there is no real discrepancy; since in Luke that duty is taken for granted as indispensable, which in Matthew is made the condition, or measure, of the forgiveness that we implore. And there is surely no discrepancy between 'Give us this day,' and 'Give us day by day.'

There is very ancient authority for ἀφίεμεν, but the question is, whether the form can be proved to have ever existed. The Grammarians Buttm. and Winer, allege for it the Sept. in Ecclus. ii. 18, ὅτι ἀφίω αὐτόν, κ.τ.λ., and v. 11, οὐκ ἔστιν ἀφίω αὐτόν ὑπνώσαι, but qu?

5—8. Our Lord now proceeds to show the necessity of diligent perseverance in prayer, for any blessings, temporal or spiritual, if we would hope to attain them. This he illustrates even from what is found to hold good in the case of men; and, of course, the application is to be carried no further than the plain purpose of the illustration.

5. τίς] Many good Commentators here take τίς for εἰ τις, as in 1 Cor. vii. 18, and James v. 13; q. d. 'Should any one of you,' &c. But I rather agree with Fritz on Matth., p. 726, and Bornem. in loc., that the true import of τίς in such cases is quisnam? where the interrogation, according to Fritz, expresses animi commotionem. The truth, however, may be simply stated as follows: that our Lord here supposes a sudden and great emergency to have arisen, and inquires to what expedient we should have recourse. Render: 'Which of you shall have a friend, and he shall repair to him—and he (that friend) should answering say to him; not, as in our authorized Version, 'shall have—shall say;' for the Subjunctive mood in such a case, though it expresses what is future, yet not as the Indic. Fut. what is supposed as something certain, but what may be expected under certain supposed circumstances to take place. So in Hom. ii. χ. 459, we have καὶ ποῦ τίς εἰπὼς.

6. ἐξ ὁδοῦ] Valcknaer and Campbell construe this with παρεγένετο, and render, 'is come out of his road.' This sense, however, is forced, and the construction harsh; and it is better, with others, to connect παρεγένετο with πρὸς με (a very frequent construction, especially in Luke), and suppose ἐξ ὁδοῦ to depend on ὡς understood. Render: 'who is just come to me off a journey.' On κόπους παρ. see note at Matth. xxvi. 10.

7. εἰς τὴν κοίτην] Newe. and Middl. would take κοίτην to mean bed-chamber. A signification, however, for which there is no authority. The interpretation was probably adopted to avoid the difficulty of supposing that all were in the same bed, since κοίτην has the Article. But such does not necessarily follow; for the Article may here have the force of the pronoun possessive, and εἰς τὴν κοίτην may best be rendered ἀναστὰς δοῦναί σοι. ⁸ Λέγω ὑμῖν εἰ καὶ οὐ δώσει αὐτῷ ἀναστὰς διὰ τὸ εἶναι αὐτοῦ φίλον· διὰ γε τὴν ἀναίδειαν αὐτοῦ ἐγερθεὶς δώσει αὐτῷ ὅσων χρήξει. ⁹ Καὶ γὰρ ὑμῖν λέγω· ^c Αἰτεῖτε, ^o ^{Matt. 7. 7.} καὶ δοθήσεται ὑμῖν· ζητεῖτε, καὶ εὐρήσετε· κρούετε, καὶ ἀνοιγήσεται ὑμῖν. ¹⁰ Πᾶς γὰρ ὁ αἰτῶν λαμβάνει· καὶ ὁ ζητῶν εὐρίσκει· καὶ τῷ κρούοντι ἀνοιγήσεται. ¹¹ Τίνα δὲ ὑμῶν τὸν πατέρα αἰτήσῃ ὁ υἱὸς ἄρτον, μὴ λίθον ἐπιδώσει αὐτῷ; * ἢ καὶ ἰχθύν, μὴ ἀντὶ ἰχθύος ὄφιν ἐπιδώσει αὐτῷ; ¹² ἢ καὶ ἐὰν αἰτήσῃ ὠν, μὴ ἐπιδώσει αὐτῷ σκορπίον; ¹³ Εἰ οὖν ὑμεῖς, πονηροὶ ὑπάρχοντες, οἴδατε ἀγαθὰ δόματα διδόναι τοῖς τέκνοις ὑμῶν, πόσῳ μᾶλλον ὁ Πατὴρ ὁ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ δώσει πνεῦμα ἅγιον τοῖς αἰτοῦσιν αὐτόν;

by our a-bed, for at-bed. Μετ' ἐμοῦ does not necessarily imply in the same bed; rather, according to the simplicity of ancient manners, in the same room. An interesting trait of domestic life in ancient times. Here, too (as in various passages of the Old Test.) we recognize something which, in its graphic character, has a parallel in the expression of Æschyl. Theb. 292, τίκτα λεχαῖα, as said of the nestlings of the feathery tribe.

8. εἰ καὶ οὐ δώσει. Render: 'if even (or though) he should not rise and give him.'

— διὰ γε τὴν ἀναίδειαν. The γε here ought not to have been passed over in the Versions; since it means at least, pointing at the lesser reason for the action. Ἀναίδειαν denotes that importunity which has no regard to time, place, or person, and will not be restrained by shame. Comp. Hom. Il. iv. 521.

9—13. See notes on Matt. vii. 7—11.

9. Our Lord here shows us how to apply the subject, first in a way of direct affirmation (αἰτεῖτε, καὶ δοθήσεται ὑμῖν), and then in a way of inference; q. d. εἰ οὖν ὑμεῖς, &c., where the comparison is not à simili, but à majori; q. d. 'If the importunate lesser obtains so much from men, what will not be that which offers up fervent and assiduous prayers obtain from his Father in heaven?'

11. ὑμῶν. Many MSS., Versions, and Fathers prefix ἐξ, which is approved by Matthæi, and adopted by Griesb. and Scholz. But it seems to have come from the margin. See infra xiv. 5.

— ἐπιδώσει α. γ. 'will reach forth to him;' a figurative mode of expression. 'H, instead of εἰ, is found in a great number of the best MSS., in most of the Versions, several Fathers, and the Edit. Princ.; and is adopted by Wetst., Matth., Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. The words are perpetually confounded in the MSS., but ἦ seems to be required by the context.

12. ὠν—σκορπίον. To understand the scope of this saying, see note on Matt. vii. 10. The words used in both passages come to the same thing; since the body of the while scorpion bears some resemblance in size and appearance to an egg.

13. εἰ οὖν ὑμεῖς, &c. An inference à majori, as much as to say: 'If the importunate teaser prevails so much with men, what will not he who prays earnestly and assiduously obtain from God?' Will he not assuredly obtain the best, yea the unspeakable gift of his Holy Spirit, in all its various degrees, both extraordinary, as in the case of the Apostles and others in the early times of Christianity, and also the ordinary aids and influences of the same Spirit, so essential to the guidance and support of believers in their spiritual course.

14—36. Accusation of casting out devils by Beelzebub, and the demand of a sign from heaven, Matt. xii. 25—45. Mark iii. 23—29, where see notes.

14. κωφόν. This is said to be put, by metonymy, for what causes deafness, as Mark ix. 25. But κωφ. may mean dumb, as often elsewhere.

17. The connexion may be thus traced: 'But he, knowing the crafty intent with which they had asked for this sign, and the gross fallacy then passing in their own minds by the base imputation of demoniacal influence, said' &c.

— καὶ οἶκος—πίπτει. The sentence contains a parallelism; and (as Valckn. says) διαμερ. in the former member is to be repeated, with an adaptation of gender, in the latter. This mode of taking the passage is confirmed by the parallels in Matthew and Mark, and is adopted by almost all the ancient and the best modern Commentators, who illustrate the sentiment both from the Classical and Rabbinical writers.

²⁰ εἰ δὲ ἐν δακτύλῳ Θεοῦ—ὑμᾶς] Render: 'But if by the finger of God I cast out the devils, then the kingdom of God is already come unto you.' Other exx. of ἄρα beginning (as here) an apodosis occur (besides the parallel passage of Matth. xii. 28) in 1 Cor. xv. 18. 2 Cor. v. 14. Gal. ii. 21, et al. Ἐν δακτύλῳ Θεοῦ, formed on the Heb. בְּצֶמֶחַ שְׁמִי, in Exod. viii. 15, corresponds to ἐν Πνύμ. Θεοῦ in Matth., and one expression is an explanation of the other; so that the full sense intended by the Evangelists is, 'by the power, or energy, of the Spirit of God.' The force of ἐφθ. I have set forth in the note on Matth., and shown the course of reasoning pursued by our Lord. There is also, by the use of this peculiar phrase, an intimation, that 'as Pharaoh's magicians discovered the Finger of God in the miracles which Moses wrought by the Spirit of God, so might they perceive that the devils were cast out by Him in virtue of that Spirit and power.'

²¹ καθωπλισμένος] 'completely armed.' So Aeschin. p. 75, καθοπλίσας τῇ πανοπλίᾳ. Here, however, the term is to be understood, not of personal armour only, but of every kind of preparation for defence, by fortifying the αὐλή or mansion of a magnate. So Diod. Sic. i. iv. 41, τῇ νομοθεσίᾳ καθοπλισθέντας. Hence in the next verse the term πανοπλ. refers to the latter as well as the former preparation for defence, which was by dismantling the arr. The phrase ἐν εἰρήνῃ εἶναι, as said of things, is to be understood of security from rapine; as used of persons, at Acts ix. 31, it denotes security from violence.

The use of the particle μενούν γε (which signifies, as in Rom. ix. 20. x. 18. Phil. iii. 8, imo vero, yes, indeed, but) is commissive, with the reservation implied in this brevity of expression, involving an ellip. of ἀλλά. Our Lord does not deny the honour just pronounced on his mother, but gives it the right turn, by intimating in what her honour principally consisted, even in faith and obedience. An answer which, as Mr. Alf. justly observes, 'cuts at the root of all Mariolatry.'

31. καὶ ἰδοὺ, πλείον Σολ.] The καὶ here does not, as the Commentators consider it, belong to the verb ἴσται understood, but is probably put for καὶ τοι, and points at the raïocination, q. d. 'And yet there is here what is greater than,' namely, greater, as relates both to the matters of the Gospel of repentance, and to the Lord of the Covenant, its Announcer, who is infinitely greater than the holiest and wisest of the sons of men: his preaching than that of Jonah, his wisdom than that of Solomon. The ἰδοὺ is not pleonastic, but asserative, serving to strengthen the assertion; accordingly it is equivalent to profecto verè, as in Jer. v. 5, καὶ ἰδοὺ ὁμ. συνέτριψαν τὸν ὕγρον.

33—36. See note on Matt. xii. 40. The sayings of our Lord here recorded are found, with slight variation, supra viii. 16. Matt. v. 15. Mark iv. 21, and vi. 22, where, however, they are differently connected and applied. Here they refer to the perverseness of that evil generation in refusing to admit the light from one greater than Solomon. As respects εἰς κρύπτην, it may be taken, as it is by some, for εἰς κρυπτόν; but it is better to regard κρύπτην as a Subst., espec. considering that exx. of this use, however rare, are found, e. gr. Athen. p. 205, where we have "in a secret dark cabin," and Heraclid. de Civit. p. 73. Indeed, in the sense vault the word often occurs in the writers of late Grecism, and so used it gave birth to the Latin crypta and our crypt. That, however, is, I apprehend, not the sense here, but rather such as is found in the passages of Athen. and Heraclid., namely, an unlighted cell or closet, in which articles not often used are stowed out of the way. The reason for this is that found in the parallel passage of Matt. v. 15, ἵνα λάμπῃ πᾶσι τοῖς ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ.

35. σκότος ἐστίν] Render: "is darkness;" the Indic. being here used (and not the Subjunct. ᾖ, as the εἰ would rather require), by way of intimating, that the thing feared already exists, or is on the point of taking place. See note on Matt. vi. 22, 23.

36. Our Lord here pursues the similitude in v. 33, where an open manner of teaching is compared to a lamp placed on a stand.

In order to remove what they call an irregularity and tautology, several Commentators devise various conjectures, all of them unauthorized, and indeed unnecessary. There is, properly speaking, no tautology at all (the clause μὴ ἔχον τι μέρος, lit. 'having not any part dark'), being meant to strengthen the preceding position (as in John viii. 12), nor any greater approach to it than is often elsewhere found in Scripture, and sometimes in the Class. writers. This section, vv. 33—36, forms one of the many independent and separate sayings of our Lord, which St. Luke has put together, in a miscellaneous form, without attention to time or place, from ch. xi. to xviii. 14. And therefore it is uncertain whether there be any connexion between this section and the preceding one, vv. 27—32. What is here said by Christ does, indeed, appear in another connexion at Matt. v. 15. Mark iv. 21. But our Lord might choose to introduce it twice, under different circumstances; meaning to caution his hearers against that prejudice which blinded the eyes of their understanding to the evidence of his Messiahship, and demanded a sign. Accordingly, he exhorts them to profit by the light of right reason and the Law of nature or conscience,—the Sovereign gift of God to man, intended to guide him in conjunction with the aid of religion. It is meant, then, that as he who lights a lamp does it that it may give σου ὄλον φωτεινὸν, μὴ ἔχον τὸ μέρος σκοτεινὸν, ἔσται φωτεινὸν ὄλον, ὡς ὅταν ὁ λύχνος τῇ ἀστραπῇ φωτίξῃ σε.

37 Ἐν δὲ τῷ λαλήσαι, † ἡρώτα αὐτὸν Φαρισαῖός τις ὅπως ἀριστήσῃ παρ' αὐτῷ· εἰσελθὼν δὲ ἀνέπεσεν. 38 Ὁ δὲ Φαρισαῖος ἰδὼν ἐθαύμασεν, ὅτι οὐ πρῶτον ἐβαπτίσθη πρὸ τοῦ ἀρίστου.

39 Εἶπε δὲ ὁ Κύριος πρὸς αὐτόν· «Νῦν ὑμεῖς οἱ Φαρισαῖοι τὸ ἔξωθεν τοῦ ποτηρίου καὶ τοῦ πίνακος καθαρῶτε, τὸ δὲ ἔσωθεν ὑμῶν γέμει ἀρπαγῆς καὶ πονηρίας. 40 Ἀφρονες! οὐχ ὁ ποιήσας τὸ ἔξωθεν καὶ τὸ ἔσωθεν ἐποίησε; 41 Πλὴν τὰ ἐνόντα δότε ἐλεημοσύνην καὶ ἰδοὺ, πάντα καθαρὰ ὑμῖν ἔστιν. 42 Ἀλλ' οὐαὶ ὑμῖν τοῖς Φαρισαίοις, ὅτι ἀποδεκατοῦτε τὸ ἡδύοσμον καὶ τὸ πῆγανον καὶ πᾶν λάχανον, καὶ παρέρχεσθε τὴν κρίσιν καὶ light to all around, so the faculty of reason and the gift of conscience should not be allowed to lie hid and be useless. And that (v. 34) as the natural eye, when the vision is sound, directs a man's steps aright; so the mental eye of reason and conscience is a valuable guide, when not perverted; otherwise it involves an inability to distinguish between good and evil. Therefore they are warned (v. 35) to take heed that this internal and spiritual light be not obscured [for otherwise, as it is said in St. Matthew, 'great indeed will be that darkness']. A solemn admonition founded on no less than all that a man may save or lose to all eternity. At v. 36 is a further illustration of the great importance of preserving and cultivating this light; and that is introduced, in a familiar and popular manner, with the not unusual intermixture of the comparison with the thing compared. The clause ἔσται φωτεινὸν ὄλον is meant to illustrate what was just before said, by a reference to the figure employed at v. 33, of the lamp; and ὄλον for καὶ ὄλον is placed after φωτ., the better to connect with the comparison ὡς ὅταν, &c. The word ἀστραπή almost always elsewhere denotes the lightning; but here, as sometimes in the Sept., it signifies, in its primitive and general sense, a bright flame, or lustre.

37—54. Discourse against the Pharisees.

37. ἐν δὲ τῷ λαλ.] I would render, with the Vulg. and Æthiop. Versions, 'when he had [thus] spoken.' Comp. supra iii. 21. — ὅπως ἀριστ. This is to be understood, not of 'dinner,' but of 'a late breakfast,' what we call lunch (Fr. déjeuner à la fourchette), the Latin prandium. And so the word is often taken both in the Sept. and the Class. writers. The term ἀνίστα has reference to the reclining posture at meals; and ἐβαπτίσθη in the next verse is a use of Pass. for Midd. reciprocal, 'washed himself' (meaning his hands), as at Mark vii. 4, where see note. At this meal, I agree with Mr. Alford, our Lord spoke; the occasion being, the wonder of the Pharisees at his not washing himself before he sat down to meat. The words here are parts of that discourse (the great antipharisaic discourse contained in Matt. xxiii.) with which he afterwards solemnly closed his public ministry; on which the reader is referred to the notes throughout.

For ἡρώτα, Tisch. and Alf. read ἑρωτᾷ, from

A, B, and about 3 cursives; while Lachm. retains ἡρ.; rightly, inasmuch as there is no sufficient authority for the change; though internal evidence is strongly in its favour; and I find it in a few ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies of very early text. It is probably the genuine reading.

39. νῦν ὑμῖν] I am now inclined to regard the νῦν as not a particle of affirmation, but of inference, as in English 'now then,' equiv. to 'such being the case,' 'hypocrisy being your characteristic, accordingly ye clean the outside, but leave the inside foul with extortion and villainy:' such is the sense of ἀπ. and πονηρίας. Though, considering that the Pharisees were prone to other vices besides rapacity, it is probable that to these there is an allusion in the comprehensive term πονηρίας, which may mean 'utter depravity of heart, producing profligacy and immorality of life.' See note on I Cor. v. 8, and comp. Rom. i. 29, πεπληρωμένους πονηρίας, πλεονεξία.

40. οὐχ ὁ ποιήσας—ἐποίησε] I still continue to regard the interpretation of these words proposed by Elsner (notwithstanding the support still given to it by the German Commentators), as untenable. To convert the interrogative into a declarative sentence, is running counter to all the ancient Versions and expositions; and, while detracting much from the meaning, taking away more from the spirituality of the passage. The sentiment here intended to be expressed is, I apprehend, as follows: 'Did not He who made the body—and thus made those outward cleansings necessary—make the soul also? Accordingly, how can ye suppose that He will be satisfied with the outward cleansing, and not desire inward purity of heart? must not the cleansing, to be available, extend to the soul?'

41. I am still of opinion, notwithstanding that many able Expositors considerably differ in their view of the sense, that τὰ ἐνόντα must denote, as the context requires, and the parallel passage of Matthew confirms, 'what is within the cup,' its contents; q. d. 'Be not anxious about the outward part [or its brightness]; but [rather] attend to its contents, and do but give alms therefrom, and then food and every thing else shall be pure to you;' meaning, in other words, that if they had such a love of God and their neighbour as should lead them to exercise almsgiving according to their means, nothing from without would make them unclean.

48. ὅτι αὐτοὶ μὲν—μνημεῖα] This is well rendered by Bornemann, 'because, while your forefathers killed the prophets, you have built their tombs.' The Greek writers, he observes, often put a primary sentiment in the second place, and a secondary one in the first place of the sentence. See note on Matt. xxiii. 29, 30, sq.

49. ἡ σοφία τοῦ Θεοῦ εἶπεν, &c.] Here ἡ σοφία τ. Θε. is equiv. to the ἐγὼ employed in the parallel passage of Matthew. As relates to the explanation of the difficulty here found, I agree with Olshausen, Stier, and others, that the whole saying has a reference to a passage of 2 Chron. xxiv. 18—22, which commences with remarks on the weakness of Judah and Jerusalem after the death of Jehoiada, the priest. Then v. 19, it is said: "He sent prophets to them, to bring them again unto the Lord; and they testified against them: but they would not give ear. And the Spirit of God came upon Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, the priest, which stood above the people, and said unto them, Thus saith God, Why transgress ye the commandments of the Lord, that ye cannot prosper? because ye have forsaken the Lord, he hath also forsaken you," &c. Now the words in our text are not indeed a citation, but an amplification of v. 19, there, giving the true sense of what the wisdom of God intended, by enlarging the mere historical notice of God's purpose into the Divine revelation of the whole purpose of God as the counsel of his will in heaven.

52. ἤρατε τὴν κλεῖδα τῆς γνώσεως] Meaning the key which is the only true knowledge, consisting in a right understanding of the Law and the Prophets, which were meant to show forth and testify of him that was to come: but that key being taken away from the people, and appropriated by the priests, the door was closed, and the kingdom of heaven (as it is said in the parallel passage of Matthew, where see note) shut in men's faces.

53. δεινῶς ἐνέχειν] Supp. αὐτῶν, as will appear from the passages cited at the only other passage where this idiom occurs in the N. T.,—namely, Mark vi. 19. Mr. Alford's interpretation, 'to press vehemently upon,' is one formerly adopted from Budæus by some Expositors; but it has been for some time exploded, both as being unsuitable to the context, and as being justly considered unfounded; since the gloss of Hesych., its only support, is admitted by the Editors of that Lex. to be corrupt, and that for ἐγκτεται should be read ἐγκοτεῖ. The gloss was doubtless derived from some Scholiast; just as here Euthym. has ἐνέχειν ἐγκοτεῖν, from a similar source. The phrase with the ellipse, χόλον occurs also, besides Mark vi. 19, in Gen. xlix. 23, and the complete phrase in Hdot. i. 118. vi. 119. The same error as that of the above Expositors was committed by the Translators of the passage of Genesis. The Vulg. rendered by inviderunt illi; whereas the Sept. Vers. expresses the same sense as the Hebrew original, the Samaritan Version, and the Chaldaea Paraphr., 'they bore a grudge, or bitter hate, against him.' That χόλον is the true ellipsis, appears from the passage of Hidot.; though κότον might have been thought of, which would be confirmed by the Homeric κότον ἔθηκε θυμῷ. But κότος is a stronger term than χόλος, which latter signifies 'bitter anger,' the other rancour, 'inveterate malevolence.'

— ἀποστοματίζειν αὐτόν] In order fully to comprehend this peculiar expression, we must consider its origin, and then its bearing on the context here. It is derived from the phrase ἀπὸ στόματος, 'to speak out of mouth, from memory, and without premeditation; also in an Act. trans. sense, 'to cause any one so to do;' and here, 'to cause any one to answer questions,' whether with forethought or consideration, and, by implication, 'to entangle, or entrap, any one in his words;—'an interpretation placed beyond doubt by the kindred passage of Matt. xxii. 15, where it is said, of these same Pharisees, that they took counsel ὥπως αὐτόν παγιδέωσιν λόγῳ. Comp. Prov. vi. 2, Symm., ἐπαγιδεύθη ἐν ῥήμασι τοῦ στόματός σου,—namely, by artful and puzzling questions.

XII. 1—12. Solemn warning against hypocrisy. This discourse is in close connexion with the one immediately preceding, the substance of which is found in Matthew, and perhaps in other parts of this Gospel. It should seem that, while our Lord was in the Pharisee's house, the multitude had again congregated; and that our Lord came forth to them with his mind fully occupied with the grave and serious subject of his foregoing discourse, and, accordingly, proceeds to caution his disciples (who were not with him at the Pharisee's house) against that especial characteristic of the Pharisees, against which they had need to be particularly on their guard. At ἐν οἷς supply πράγμασι, and render, 'during which things,'—namely, the transactions above recorded. Such being the general scope, I am now of opinion that, notwithstanding the objections which I have shown lie against construing πρῶτον with προσέχετε, it is better to refer it thereto than to λέγειν πρὸς τοὺς μαθητάς. Rare as is the sense imprimis, especially, ante omnia, in its present position, as commencing a clause preceded by a colon, it does so occur at 2 Pet. i. 20. iii. 3, and 1 Tim. ii. 1, παρακαλῶ πρῶτον πάντων ποιεῖσθαι, &c., where several ancient MSS. read παρακάλε. The thing, however, is an open question; for certain it is from v. 24, εἶπε δὲ καὶ τοῖς ὄχλοις, that our Lord did address the disciples first, and then the multitude. It cannot be denied that the disciples were most concerned in this admonition; but the sense imprimis, præcipue, is not the less suitable, and it is more agreeable to the earnestness which, under the circumstances, would be expected, and which does show itself in the address. In the Pesch. Syr., Copt., Arab., and Pers. Versions it is construed with πρὸς.

1. τῇ ζύμῃ τῶν Φαρ.] The metaphor here has reference to the silent, but sure, effect of the vice of hypocrisy, which distinguished Phariseism generally, and which, when once instilled, gradually pervaded the whole disposition and character. On the full force of the term ζύμη in the Scriptural and Classical writers, see Greswell on Par., vol. iii. 89, seqq.

4. ἀποκτ.] Considering the marvellous varieties of reading here existing, there seems no case for change. Were any made, I should prefer ἀποκτείνω, with all the recent Editors; but ἀποκτανόντων is not less entitled to adoption. The Lamb. and Mus. copies have almost all of them one or the other.

11. ὅταν προσφέρ. ὑμ. ἐπὶ τὰς—ἀρχὰς καὶ τὰς ἐξουσίας] We may comp. Eph. iii. 10, ταῖς ἀρχ. καὶ ταῖς ἐξ., though it would seem that by ταῖς ἀρχὰς is here meant the higher powers, who held the jus gladii, and by ταῖς ἐξ., the lower and municipal magistrates, who had only the power of correction by imprisonment and corporal castigation. So the term is used in the Epistle of the Vienne and Lyonesse Church to those of Asia and Phrygia (frag. 3, ep. Routh, Rel. Sacr. i. 297), ἀναχθίνας εἰς τὴν ἀγορὰν ὑπὸ τῶν προσηκόντων τῆς πόλεως ἐξουσιῶν.

13—21. Answer to one (not a disciple, but a bystander) who asked for our Lord's interposition to procure a division of inheritance.

13. εἶπε δέ τις, &c.] This circumstance is introduced somewhat abruptly. We should rather have expected it to have been prefaced by some such words as those of Aristot. Polit. v., δύο ἀδελφῶν περὶ τῆς τῶν πατρῶν νομῆς (for διανομῆς) διανεχθέντων, &c. Such exactness of style, however, is not the character of the sacred writers, nor indeed of the ancient writers in general.

—μερίσασθαι, &c.] Meaning, 'so to divide the inheritance as to admit me to my share:' i. e. 'to share it with me;' as Demosth. p. 913, 1, μερισάμενοι τὸ ἑμὸν χωρίον μετὰ Φ. For, as we learn from Seneca, Decl. x. 3, the law was, for the elder brother to divide the inheritance into two portions, and the younger to take his choice of them. The difference between the two terms δικαστ. and μερ. seems to be, that by δικ. is denoted a publicly appointed judge to decide on the claims of different persons to an inheritance, and to authoritatively assign the due share to all; by μεριστ., a privately appointed judge, like our arbitrator or referee, authorized to mediate between conflicting claimants, and apportion equitably to each his due share; lit. an apportioner. So in Plato de Legg. p. 915, such persons are called first, αἰρετοὶ δικασταί, and then διαιτη-

ταί. And so Appian, t. i. 64, Ῥωμαῖοις δικαστὴν ἢ διαιτητήν.

15. Great is the authority (confirmed by many Lamb. and Mus. copies) existing for the word πάσης before πλεονεξίας, which has been adopted by all the recent Editors. It was probably removed by certain Correctors who considered the word superfluous; which, however, is by no means the case: the sense being, 'from every species of covetousness, even that which might, as in the present instance, be thought venial.' In the next words, ὅτι οὐκ ἐν τῷ περισσύνειν—αὐτοῦ, the construction is so harsh, that it is not easy to draw forth any positively certain sense; the very reading itself, from which any true interpretation can be laid down, being uncertain, from the variety and confusion of readings in the copies. As respects the former αὐτοῦ, there is strong external authority for αὐτῷ, yet not sufficient to warrant its adoption. The very same variation exists in the latter αὐτοῦ, which has been adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, D, F, G, and some dozen cursive MSS.; to which I could add a few Lamb. and Mus. copies: and internal evidence is somewhat in its favour, from its being the more recondite expression; and it is confirmed by supra viii. 3. Acts iv. 32. Gen. xxxi. 18. Nevertheless, the other is the more simple, and agreeable to the character of Scriptural phraseology. Comp. Matt. xix. 21. xxv. 14. xxiv. 47. Luke xii. 33, seq. xiv. 33. xvi. 1. xix. 8. Whatever be the reading (which is an open question), the true sense intended by the Evangelist seems to be this: 'not because a man abounds in wealth, does his life consist in, depend upon, his goods,' meaning that worldly possessions, however considerable, are no guarantee for the continuance of life, 'nor by his attaining abundance can this ever become the case,' a truth which has its exemplification in the subjoined parable. Little doubt is there, that under the term ζωὴ is conveyed (as often) a twofold sense, as directed to the twofold lesson here intended to be inculcated, one as respects this world, the other as respects the next;—according to which the term ζωὴ signifies 'life and welfare' not only for time, but for eternity. That such is the case, plainly appears, v. 21; where the deeper lesson is expressly adverted to. The same twofold sense of ζωή is found in Pa. xvi. 11.

16. The above solemn warning and weighty admonition is now set forth most forcibly, and even graphically, by a Parable, showing the folly of worldlings while they live, and their misery when they die. The character so drawn is not that of a person who had got his wealth by fraud or oppression, or of one who would not use it when got; but simply that of a person who lived for this world only, without any thought or care for another,—without any reference to the being and providence of God, or any care for more than his body; utterly regardless of the welfare of his soul, whether for time, or for eternity. And thus his riches,—which might have been a blessing, had he used them with reference to the Giver,—became a snare and a curse. The main characteristics here presented seem an ungodly thanklessness to the Giver of all good things, a greedy selfishness that would appropriate all to self, and, withal, an utter forgetfulness of the insecure tenure by which he holds whatever he possesses; such as that described in the strikingly similar passage of Eccles. xi. 18, 19, where the true sense meant to be conveyed is, that the chief portion or reward of the penurious care of the avaricious man is to be able to say, εἶπον ἀνάπανσιν, καὶ νῦν φάγωμαι (read φάγομαι, from several copies, pres. for fut.), ‘I am going to eat of my good things’ (answering to which are the words ἀγαθὰ and φάγε in the present passage, v. 19), equiv. to ‘jam fruar paratis.’

18. καθελῶ—ἀποθήκας Considering that no idea of violence by pulling down, as respects the building, is here permitted by the context, but only a removal of part of it, or of the materials, either for enlargement or putting together in an altogether new building, we may best render, with Abp. Newc. and Mr. Grew., ‘I will take (not ‘pull’) down;—a sense, indeed, quite permitted by the term καθελεῖν, as used in many passages of the Class. writers, which I could adduce, and some also of the Sept. Ἀποθήκας is wrongly rendered bars; rather we may render, ‘granaries,’ meaning repositories for grain, after threshing and winnowing, as supra iii. 17. συνάξει τὸν σῖτον εἰς τὴν ἀποθήκην αὐτοῦ (there rendered granars), as also in Matt. iii. 12. And so in Prov. iii. 10, ἵνα τίμωληται τὰ ταμεία σου πλησυνόντες σῖτον, where the Version of Aquila has ἀποθήκαι. Render: ‘store-houses.’ These ἀποθήκαι are probably very much like those Egyptian granaries of which

Sir Gardner Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, vol. ii. 135 and 6, has supplied pictures copied from those deposited in the tombs at Beni Hassan and Thebes; these being cellæ, or rooms with vaulted roofs, for depositing the grain when threshed. However, all the above Greek and Latin terms were used indifferently, both of ‘storehouses’ and ‘granaries,’ and probably, in some instances, of both.

—γειμήματα] This, for the text, rec. γαστ., I have received, with all the recent Editors, on very strong authority (including many Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence.

19. τῇ ψυχῇ μου] Meaning ‘to myself.’ An idiom found elsewhere in the New Test., as Matt. x. 33, and sometimes in the Class. writers, as Liban. Or. 463, θαρόντως ἑμαυτὸν, πρὸς τὴν ἑμαυτοῦ ψυχὴν εἰπών. Ἀθηναῖός ἐμι.

—ἀναπαύου] This may be rendered ‘recreate thyself;’ as Eurip. Alc. 804.—Εὐφραίνου denotes, in a general way, the sensual delight resulting from the animal gratifications just mentioned. So Tob. vii. 9, φάγε, πίε, καὶ ἡδέως γίνου.

20. εἶπον αὐτῷ ὁ Θεός] Namely, as Grot. explains, by a locus decretum. Comp. Prov. i. 26, τοιγαροῦν κἀγὼ τῇ θυμῇ τῃ ἀπειλῇ ἐπιγυλάσωμαι, καταχαροῦμαι, &c. This view has been adopted by most of the best Expositors, and recently by Trench. Maldonat, indeed, is of opinion that our Lord meant thus to represent God as really and actually addressing the rich man in so many words, either by an angel (as Augustine supposes) or a prophet, since otherwise (Maldon. says) ‘perit tota vis et gratia verborum atque sententia.’ But I cannot agree with him that, by taking εἶπον in the sense not of actual, but virtual, address, ‘perit tota vis et gratia,’ &c. As respects the gratia, it is not worth adverting to; and as to the warning force, that is not diminished; since it is plain that a sentence passed in heaven, by way of answer to his purpose on earth, can only be considered as a decree in heaven as to what was immediately to take place on earth. There is not want of force, in what is so figuratively bold. Besides, the same figure (of apostrophe) is to be recognized in the words preceding, to which these seem to correspond, namely, ἰδὼ τῇ ψυχῇ μου, where, as often in the Old Test., and sometimes in the Class. writers, the individual is figuratively and by apostrophe represented as addressing himself. Nor is this any novel view, since there is reason to think it was adopted by the ancient Fathers. See Theophyl. If, however, it be thought that the impressiveness of the Parable is materially impaired (which I doubt) by the worldling's gross selfishness and utter folly not being brought into sufficient contrast with the solemn truth of his imminent dissolution, we may suppose the announcement really made on earth not figuratively (with Alf.) by some unmistakable judgment, but virtually through the medium of Angelic agency, referred to at the next verse.

— ἀπαιτοῦσιν] On further consideration of this disputed expression, I am ready to admit that it is not strictly impersonal, but that there is (by an idiom not unusual both in Heb. and Greek) a noun left to be supplied from the subject-matter, by reference (as Mr. Alf. observes) to those whose province it is to attend to such a matter, even the holy Angels, the ministers of the Divine purposes. See supra vi. 38.

— ἀ δὲ ἡτοίμ.] Render: 'the good things which thou providest as κείμενα σεαντῶ.' Comp. Hor. Epist. i. 18. 109, 'Sit bona—provisia in annum.'

— τί τι ἐστὶ ;] Not as though it were of any consequence to the person himself whose the possessions should be, which he has lost his soul to gain; it being merely an emphatical way of saying that they will not be his. Comp. Seneca (Nat. Quest. i. iii. Pref.) 'Conservasti alius, quæ perieris tibi'; and Menander, δῶλ' ἀν ἀποθήκας, ταῦτα καταλείψεις, τί τι; 'for whom?' 'for whose benefit?' not thine.

21. Now follows the brief, but striking, moral by application.

— οὕτως] 'such is the case with,' 'such the folly of.' A familiar mode of expression, meaning, 'such is his case,' such his situation, so destitute of all provision for the life in question, what is termed, 1 Tim. vi. 19, ἡ ὄντως ζωή.

— μὴ σὺ Θεὸν πλουτῶν] 'who is not rich unto God,' i. e. 'with reference to God,' 'unto his will,' 'for his glory,' and consequently for the benefit of his fellow-man, by works of beneficence, thus laying up treasures in heaven.

22—31. Admonitions to trust in God, in reference to whose Providence we are to be either πλουτῶν or ἡρῶν.—Διὰ τοῦτο, 'such being the case,' i. e. since worldly wealth, and the most ample means for enjoyment, are so little permanently enjoyable.

24. τοὺς κόρακας.] On these the Divine Providence is especially shown; for though the old ones very soon expel their young from the nests, and often abandon both nest and young, yet, by a wise Providence, they instinctively heap up in their nests whatever breeds worms, whereby their abandoned young are preserved.

— ταμεῖον] The word scarcely differs in sense from ἀποθήκη. The distinction, if any, seems to be this,—that ταμεῖον, as it originally denoted the store-room of the ταυλάς or dispenser, so it afterwards came to mean 'a store-room' generally, especially for grain, like our barn; while ἀποθ. denoted merely one of those subterranean repositories for grain, which are common in the East. See supra v. 18, note.

29. μὴ μετεωρίζεσθε] Meaning, 'Be not anxiously fluctuating between hope and fear' (see Thucyd. ii. 8, and my note there), as to the supply of your daily wants. Μετεωρίζεσθαι signifies properly to be lifted on high: being used especially of vessels tossed aloft at sea, and then depressed to its very depths; an apt image of anxiety. So Hor. Epist. i. 18. 109, 110.

30. ταῦτα] Namely, all such things as are included in the idea of what has been just before spoken of,—the means of subsistence.

— τὰ ἔθνη τοῦ κόσμου] A seeming pleonasm; since τὰ ἔθνη alone would have been sufficient, or ὁ κόσμος, which is used in John j Matt. 6. 23. οἶδεν ὅτι χρῆζετε τούτων. ³¹ Ἰ Πλὴν ζητεῖτε τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ τὰ ταῦτα πάντα προστεθήσεται ὑμῖν. ³² Μὴ φοβοῦ, τὸ μικρὸν ποίμνιον ὅτι ἡ εὐδόκησεν ὁ Πατὴρ ὑμῶν δοῦναι ὑμῖν τὴν βασιλείαν. ³³ Πωλήσατε τὰ ὑπάρχοντα ὑμῶν, καὶ δότε ἐλεημοσύνην. ¹ ποιήσατε ἑαυτοῖς βαλάντια μὴ παλαιούμενα, θησαυρὸν ἀνέκλειπτον ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, ὅπου κλέπτῃς οὐκ ἐγγίξει, οὐδὲ σὴς διαφθείρει. ³⁴ ὅπου γὰρ ἐστὶν ὁ θησαυρὸς ὑμῶν, ἐκεῖ καὶ ἡ καρδία ὑμῶν ἔσται. ³⁵ Ἔστωσαν ὑμῶν αἱ ὀσφύες περιεζωσμέναι, καὶ οἱ λύχνοι καίόμενοι. ³⁶ καὶ ὑμεῖς ὅμοιοι ἀνθρώποις προσδεχομένοις τὸν κύριον ἑαυτῶν, πότε ἀναλύσει ἐκ τῶν γάμων ἴνα, ἐλθόντος καὶ κρούσαντος, εὐθέως ἀνοίξωσιν αὐτῷ. ³⁷ Μακάριοι οἱ δούλοι ἐκεῖνοι, οὓς ἐλθὼν ὁ κύριος εὐρήσει γρηγοροῦντας. Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι περιζώσεται καὶ ἀνακλινεῖ αὐτοὺς, καὶ παρελθὼν διακονήσει αὐτοῖς. ³⁸ Καὶ ἐὰν ἔλθῃ ἐν τῇ δευτέρᾳ φυλακῇ, καὶ ἐν τῇ τρίτῃ φυλακῇ ἔλθῃ, καὶ εὖρῃ οὕτω, μακάριοι εἰσιν οἱ δούλοι ἐκεῖνοι. ³⁹ Τοῦτο δὲ γινώσκετε, ὅτι, εἰ ᾗδῃ ὁ οἰκοδεσπότης ποῖα ὥρα ὁ κλέπτῃς ἔρχεται, ἐγρηγόρησεν ἂν, καὶ οὐκ ἂν ἀφήκε διορυγῆναι τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ. ⁴⁰ Καὶ ὑμεῖς οὖν γίνεσθε ἑτοιμοὶ ὅτι ᾗ ὥρα οὐ δοκεῖτε, ὁ Τίως τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἔρχεται.

xvi. 18. In reality, however, there is none, the idiom being, like many to be met with elsewhere (even in Thucyd., Aristot., and other writers, the most sparing in words), wherein what is subjoined serves for explanation; the heathens being here designated as "children of this world," and this world only—without any thought of the next; to which the mention of this world is meant to be tacitly opposed.

32. This verse contains a consolatory assurance (interposed amidst admonition, and pregnant with intense feeling) of the Father's love, as the sure ground for the absence of all fear.

— τὸ μικρὸν ποίμνιον] The Art. is either for the pron. poss., or is intended to supply the place of the Voc., Hellenistic. This double diminutive has great emphasis, as appears from the exx. adduced by Expositors; and the pastoral image such as that found in John x. 1, init., makes it peculiarly interesting.

35—48. Exhortations to watchfulness. Here the figurative comparison is drawn forth in order to intimate the nature of the duty, and the mode of performing it. In the ἑστώσαν περιεζ. and the οἱ λύχνοι καίόμενοι there are two forcible forms of expression, alluding to the long robes among the ancients, which required to be girded up for any active employment; and also to the custom of servants of keeping lamps trimmed and burning, to receive their master on his return home late from an entertainment; by which lively images are inculcated the duties incumbent on Christians, of diligence in 'working out their salvation,' and vigilance, by which they may be always ready and prepared to meet their Lord, as the next verse intimates, on which see note at Matt. xxv. 1—13.

and at Luke xiv. 8, by οἱ γάμοι is denoted any 'great and long-continued banqueting,' such as that of a marriage-feast; of which see examples in my Lex. The idiom is said not to occur in the Class. writers, and to be altogether Hellenistic. But it is rather one of later Greek, derived from the language of common life. Thus, although it is found in a pure Attic writer of the Midd. Comedy, Axionic. Chalcid. fr. ii. 16, ὥστε πάντας ὁμολογεῖν τῶν γάμων κρείττω γεγενῆναι τὴν ἑωλὸν ἡμῶν ('that the next day's meal was better than the banquet itself'), yet I doubt not but that it was formed on some adage in the mouths of the common people.

37. περιζώσεται καὶ ἀνακλινεῖ—αὐτοῖς] Meaning, in other words, 'he will reward their diligence and vigilance with the most tender marks of kindness and condescension, such as men have sometimes bestowed on faithfully attached servants'; thus representing the exceeding blessedness which, of his infinite condescension and free grace, our Lord will bestow on those who, with faith and patience, have waited for his coming. In διακονῆσαι the mark of condescension is raised, it would seem, to the highest pitch. Comp. Rev. iii. 20, seq.; where, however, it is raised one degree higher, as implying participation in the Redeemer's throne.

38. καὶ εὖρῃ οὕτω] The ποιούντες added in the D and other ancient MSS., is evidently from Critics, who did not perceive that οὕτω, in fact, stands for γρηγοροῦντας, and is only used by way of preventing an unpleasant tautology; having, indeed, exactly the force that our so occasionally bears, as in the well-known couplet,—
 'Not to admire, is all the art I know | To make men happy and to keep them so.'

39—46. See Matt. xxiv. 43—51, and notes.

Παντὶ δὲ ᾧ ἐδόθη πολὺ, πολὺν ζητηθήσεται παρ' αὐτοῦ· καὶ ᾧ παρέθεντο πολὺ, περισσώτερον αἰτήσουσιν αὐτόν. 49 Πῦρ ἦλθον βαλεῖν εἰς τὴν γῆν· καὶ τί θέλω, εἰ ἤδη ἀνήφθῃ; 50 Βάπτισμα δὲ ἔχω βαπτισθῆναι·

41, 42. To the question proposed by Peter, our Lord answers not directly, but by implication, presenting another parable, by which, as Bp. Lonsdale observes, 'without saying how far all were concerned in the instructions he had just given, he shows that those persons who, like Peter and his fellow Apostles (who are by the figure compared to those house-stewards who in large families used to allot the various departments of duty to the servants, and dispense their allotted portion of food or wages), should occupy offices of high trust in the government of the Church, would have especial need to be on their guard against that forgetfulness of their duty, to which they might be tempted by the delay of their Master's coming to judgment.'

47. ἐκεῖνος δὲ ὁ δούλος, &c.] This portion ought properly to be separated from the preceding; since the words were probably spoken on another occasion, and only inserted here because bearing on a similar subject. The purpose is to point out the method, or rule, on which the Lord will act in punishing the servant who has disobeyed, or who has neglected to do, his master's will. This punishment, it is shown, will be in proportion to the knowledge possessed of that will. The person in question is, however, not the servus improbus just before spoken of; but one who has, on the whole, an inclination to do his duty, and perform his master's will, but who does not heartily set about doing it. Now the lesson we are taught is, that if he has fully known his master's will, and yet does not apply himself to perform it, he will be beaten with many stripes; but if he knew it not, or imperfectly, with few.

As it were manifestly unjust to inflict stripes at all upon any one for not performing his Lord's will when he had no knowledge of it, some would therefore restrict these words to the knowing his Lord's will by special revelation, and the not knowing it by that means. But it should rather seem that they are to be understood comparatively,—namely, of one who knew it more perfectly, as compared with one who knew it less perfectly; men's comparative opportunities being taken into consideration.

49. πῦρ ἦλθον βαλεῖν, &c.] From inculcating the necessity of Christian watchfulness, our Lord is led to advert to those times of persecution (both active and passive) when it would be especially needed;—the fire of which would be kindled soon after his death and passion. This force of the figure contained in the expression πῦρ would seem called for by v. 51,—namely, the persecution arising from dissensions and divisions; but that is uncertain; and at any rate it is better than understanding it, with Alf., of the fire of the gift of the Holy Spirit for purification. On mature consideration, I apprehend that it designates the fire of trial, the result of persecution, adverted to at 1 Pet. iv. 12, μὴ ξενίζεσθε τῇ ἐν ὑμῖν πυρώσει πρὸς πειρασμόν ὑμῖν γενομένην, where see note.

— τί θέλω, εἰ ἤδη ἀνήφθῃ;] This clause partakes of the obscurity which is generally attendant on language spoken under high-wrought feeling. Grotius, Whitby, and others assign to the εἰ the sense, 'O that,' rendering: 'And what do I wish? that it were already kindled!' But though εἰ be sometimes used for εἴθε, as in Luke xix. 42, and xxii. 42, it is in a very different construction from the present. Others, as Rosenm. and Kuin., take the εἰ for ὥς, and the εἰ for ὅτι, ut, like the Heb. כִּי, rendering, 'And how much would I wish that it were already accomplished!' Yet this view of the sense is open to objections insurmountable. The former explanation is greatly preferable, and may safely be adopted. The next best (which some may prefer) is that propounded by Beza and others, 'What will (would I) if it were kindled!' So Euthym. (after Chrysa.) explains: τί πλείον θέλω, ἢν ἀνιφθῇ; So too, but with improvement, Bp. Lonsdale: 'And if it were already kindled, what do I desire? What, but that it should burn on!'

^{50.} βάπτισμα δὲ ἔχω βαπτ.] The δὲ is continuative, signifying moreover; q. d. 'I, too, have to undergo a baptism of suffering,' i. e. as it is elsewhere said, 'to suffer many things,' 'to suffer very greatly,' in reference to his Passion and death. In baptism the whole body was immersed under water; and, in reference to this, our Lord calls his sufferings a baptism, because he was about to be wholly immersed in sorrows, to become 'a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.' See note on Matt. xx. 22, and comp. Mark x. 38.

— πῶς συνέχομαι] 'how am I distressed by anxiety!'—a sense which the word bears elsewhere in the New Test. On the nature of the metaphor, see my Lex. New Test. In short, the two verses form one sentence, of which the general meaning is, that 'since a trial of faith by persecution could not but attend the first preaching of his Gospel, he could wish the flame were already kindled; and that, as his death would usher in that trial, it were already accomplished.' Since the suffering must take place, he could wish it would take place soon; and that the event should be speedily brought about; espec. since from it such blessings will supervene to the world, he feels an anxious desire for its accomplishment.

^{54—59.} Reproofs for blindness to signs of the times, and a warning to improve opportunities, and to seek reconciliation with God.

^{54.} ὅταν ἴδητε τὴν νεφ. ἀνατ.] Render: 'when ye see the cloud rising'; not, 'a cloud,' as it is rendered in all our English Versions, which is passing over the Article τῆς; though that has been cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., from 4 uncial and 7 cursive MSS. (to which I can add nothing); but wrongly; for internal evidence, as well as external authority, is in favour of the word, which was cancelled by the Critics doubtless for the same cause as that for which it was passed over by the Translators,—namely, from ignorance of the force here of the Article, which is that of notoriety, q. d. 'the well-known cloud,' that cloud of a peculiar configuration, like a man's hand, which in Syria and Palestine is the sure prognostic, and immediate forerunner, of a heavy fall of rain. See 1 Kings xviii. 41. That the Pesch. Syr. Translator read τῆς, is certain from his Version, though the recent English Translators of the Pesch. Syr., Eltheridge and Murdock, have destroyed the proof, by rendering 'a cloud,' though the force of the Article is expressed as strongly as possible by the use of the noun emphatic 'Onena' coupled with the Participle 'Benoni' preceded by the Relative Prefix; answering to Chald. ἡ or ἡ, quæ.'

^{55.} καίσων ἔσται] 'it will be fine weather,' answering to the εὐδία of Matt. This is always the case when the s.e. wind prevails. And so καὶ. Ὡρ. in Athen. 73, στίφανος εὐώδης, καὶ καύσωνος ὥρα ψυκτικώτατος, means, 'when the καύσων blows.'

^{56.} τὸ πρόσωπον τῆς γῆς καὶ τ. οὐρανοῦ] In the parallel passage of Matt. τῆς γῆς is not found, and it may seem not very important in sense, especially considering that nothing is subjoined of signs in the earth: yet that may, as Grot. observes, be supplied from Matt. xxiv. 32. Moreover, as Luc. Brug. observes, 'mutata facie cœli, mutatur quoque terræ.' Thus, for instance, certain appearances in the earth,—as the appearance of the hills,—portend storms of wind and rain, and even earthquakes, as Humboldt has shown.

Commentators almost universally refer them to what precedes; most recent ones, to what follows. Both may be said to be, in a certain sense, right. The grammatical connexion is, by means of the ὥς γάρ, with the following; but there is a connexion of thought with the preceding; these words, in fact, forming the vinculum between two sentiments; q. d. 'Yea, and why do ye not of yourselves judge, by the light of your own minds, what is fit and proper to be done at this crisis; and as ye can discern the signs of the weather, and take your measures accordingly, how is it (τὶ ἔστι) that ye do not discern and recognize the signs of the Messiah's coming, and adopt a suitable conduct? Even without the express declarations of the Prophets, ye might, from what "ye hear and see" (comp. Matt. xi. 3-5), recognize the signs of the times and the person of the Messiah [in me].' Ver. 58 is not, as many think, a detached moral maxim taken from Matt. v. 25; but v. 58 is connected with, and explanatory of, v. 57; and, as the connexive formula ὥς γάρ suggests, a great moral truth is applied, for warning, to the present purpose, and that truth, formed on a parabolaical comparison, whereby the Jews are warned to make their peace with God, by repentance and faith in the Messiah, before the time of vengeance, now impending, should arrive, and they be involved in irretrievable ruin. See Matt. xxi. 44. The application, however, is at ch. xiii. 16, left to be made by the hearers themselves; probably in either case to avoid needlessly exasperating the multitude. At the same time our Lord took occasion, from the bystanders telling him of the atrocity which had been recently committed,—and, no doubt, insinuating that the sufferers were eminently sinners,—to supply the moral application here omitted.

58. ὁδοῦ ἐργασίαν] Said to be a Latinism for da operam. Yet the phrase is found in a pure Greek writer, Hermog. de Invent. iii. 5, 7, where it is used of elaborate composition. Ἀπαλλάττεισθαι ἀπὸ τινος signifies properly either 'to be rid of any thing, or to be dismissed, or let go by any person.' It is also used, as here, in a forensic sense, either of a criminal, who is set at liberty when his prosecutor does not follow up his accusation; or of a debtor, who receives an acquittance from his creditor, by paying the money due, or making a composition. Κατασύρειν signifies properly 'to haul or drag down,' but sometimes 'to draw away,' as used of hurrying persons to judgment or execution.

—πράκτορι] Πράττειν and εἰσπράττειν signify 'to exact the payment of a debt or mulct, or of its equivalent in corporal punishment, or of imprisonment till it should be paid.' Accordingly, πρᾶκτωρ denotes the executioner (as in Æschyl. Eum. 315, πρᾶκτορες αἵματος, and so πρᾶκτορες φόνου, Soph. El. 953), and, in a general sense, 'the executioner of a magistrate's sentence.'

XIII. 1. παρήσαν δέ] Render, 'Then there came up:' as Matt. xxvi. 50. In the earlier and purer Classical writers, it is followed by als and a proper name. In the later it is, as here, used absolutely. So Diod. Sic. xvii. 8, παρήσαν τινες ἀπαγγέλλοντες, &c. 'Ἐν αὐτῷ τῷ καιρῷ should be rendered, 'in that very or selfsame season,' namely, when the events recorded in the preceding Chapter took place, and before our Lord had retired from addressing the immense multitude collected. See xii. 1.

—περὶ τῶν Γαλ., ὧν &c.] To what circumstance in the history of that period this matter is to be referred, Commentators are not agreed. Those usually adduced (as the sedition of the Samaritans on Mount Gerizim, or the rebellion set on foot by the followers of Judas of Galilee) are liable to insuperable objections. The transaction is one of those (like the murder of the babes at Bethlehem) passed over by Josephus. Though nothing is more probable, than that something of this sort should have happened; for the Galileans were the most seditious people in Judæa, and Pilate not the most merciful of governors. Josephus has not, indeed, mentioned any Galileans slain in the Temple by Pilate; but we learn from various parts of his history (see Antt. xv. 4, 7. xvii. 9, 3. vi. 17, 19), that tumults often arose at the festivals, and sometimes battles took place even in the Temple, and scenes like the present occurred. So Joseph. Antt. xvii. 9, 5, μάλιστα δὲ τὴν σφαγὴν τῶν περὶ τὸ ἱερὸν ἰδαίνου—ὡς ἰορτῆς τε ἀνιστησκίας, καὶ ἱερῶν ἐν τῷ πρόπῳ σφαχθότων with reference to the putting to death of 300 Galileans in the Temple, in the act of sacrificing. It is therefore probable that a similar insurrection of Galileans, also at a festival, happened in the government of Pilate, a little before the time when our Lord spoke, and was repressed in the same violent manner, though unrecorded by Josephus.

—ὧν τὸ αἷμα—θυσίων] In τῶν θυσίων there is an ellipsis of αἵματος, to be supplied from αἷμα; an idiom found both in the Greek and Latin writers. The complete expression occurs in Philo ii. 315 (cited by Wetstein), where, giving a reason why God commanded that a homicide who had fled for refuge to an altar should be delivered up to justice, it is said that otherwise αἵματι ἀνδροφόνων αἷμα θυσίων ἀνακαθίσταται. So also Theophyl. Simoc. p. 127, Οἱ μὲν οὖν ἐκκεντήσαντες τὸν Β. δειλὸν δαμειγμῆς τοῖνον τοῦ δαίμονος καὶ (even) αἵμασιν. Jos. Antt. vi. 14, 6, καὶ οὐ μὲν αὐτῶν, ἐτι τῶν τραπεζῶν παρακειμένων, ἐπικαταλαμβάνόμενοι παρ' αὐταῖς ἀνηροῦντο· καὶ παρῶν αὐτῶν τὰ σιτία καὶ τὴν τροφὴν τὸ αἷμα, where, for the manifestly corrupt παρῶν, I would read περιέσθην, inquisitabat, 'defiled by intermixture.' This is, then, a boldly figurative way of saying, that they were slain while attending the sacrifice. And how atrocious it was thought to slay any one at an altar, is well known. Accordingly the occurrence in question was, it seems, considered the effect of a Divine judgment on the sufferers, as especially sinners. Now our Lord's answer is meant to correct the erroneous notion of supposing that, or such like general calamity, so far different from the common dispensations of Providence, as to be marks of Divine vengeance on the individuals who are the chief sufferers; and moreover to, in some measure, predict a similar fate to those who would not repent.

This passage, indeed, as Bp. Warburton observes (Sermon xviii. on the Fast-day after the Earthquake at Lisbon), has been usually regarded as a reproof of the opinion which ascribes the general calamities effected by natural or civil causes to God's displeasure against sin; but incorrectly; that opinion being founded in the very essence of religion, and being agreeable both to reason and religion; as manifesting God's glory and effectually promoting man's peace and happiness. What it condemns is the superstitious abuse of it, which uncharitably concludes that the sufferers in a general calamity are greater sinners than other men. The conclusion, indeed, on which their presumption as to the case of the sufferers was founded (as Mr. Greswell observes) on the belief, that temporal calamities were dispensations and effects of Divine Providence, and were so many judgments upon sin. With the truth of this our Lord's answer has nothing to do (nor was it necessary; for the Jews, of all people on the earth, having been accustomed to receive not only rewards, but punishments, through the instrumentality of physical causes, as the effectors of moral good, could not doubt it, and had by sad experience, in their own case, verified it); it being simply an argumentum ad hominem, the object of which was to reprove the hearers, and to bring home conviction to their consciences, even on their own assumptions; q. d. 'These Galileans might be sinners deserving of their fate; but yet it was not for the hearers to draw the consequent inference of their especial guilt, or pass any judgment upon them, if, being equally sinners in the sight of God, they, too, were equally obnoxious to his judgments by temporal visitations for sin.' In short, the point at issue concerned the moral lesson to be derived from the late event,—whether such a meaning was to be given it as would make it general, or partial in its signification. Our Lord proves the former. The persons addressing him considered it as a judgment; he bids them regard it as a warning; and from it was enabled to supply the moral application just before only intimated.

3. πάντες—ἀπολείσθῃ] This may be considered as a prediction, which had its literal fulfilment at the destruction of Jerusalem, when the number of Jews slain was so vast, that Josephus says that it wanted but little of extermination. Here, and at v. 5, for μετανοήτε, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read μετανοήσῃτε, from some 5 ancient uncials and about 7 cursives to which I could add a few Lamb. and Mus. copies and Trin. Coll. B, x. 17: but it would nought avail, since overwhelming external authority is confirmed by internal evidence, the reading being evidently a critical correction.

4. ἐν τῷ Σιλ.] The sense is 'at,' i. e. by Siloam. This tower was probably one of the towers of the city walls, and was, we may suppose, the one at the s. e. angle thereof. Thus the fountain is correctly described by our great Epic Poet as being 'fast by the Oracle of God.' —ὀφειλέται, 'sinners.' A Chaldee idiom, by which debts and sins, and debtors and sinners, are interchanged. So in the Book of Enoch (Fabr. p. 80) we have ὀφειλέτης μεγάλῃς ἀμαρτίας.

6. ἔλεγε δὲ τ. τ. παραβολήν] This parable of the Barren Fig-tree was subjoined in order to enlarge on the idea in the main topic of the foregoing discourse, and to enforce the foregoing warning, by announcing the impending destruction that would attend the long-continued abuse of God's mercy. The Jewish nation, spared at the intercession of the vine-dresser, Christ, is primarily intended (and the sentence now suspended, was subsequently carried into execution not long after by the Romans); but it is equally applicable to individuals, teaching the impressive lesson, that unless men heartily repent and bring forth the fruits of faith and obedience, they will, notwithstanding the long-suffering of God, finally perish.

7. τρία ἔτη] Namely, from the earliest time

of bearing. Καταργεῖ, for ἀργὸν ποιεῖ, 'makes it unproductive, exhausts the soil;' as in Ezra iv. 21. Thus ἀργός often occurs in the Classical writers of 'unproductive' land. The καὶ here is so far from being redundant, that it is almost emphatic, importing that the tree not only bore no fruit itself, but even hindered the growth of it in others.

8. ἄφες αὐτὴν] 'let it stand.' As ἀφίεναι is here opposed to ἐκκόπτειν, so is it to φθείρειν by Philo, p. 581. And so we have ἰδὼν opposed to ἐκκόπτειν in Plato, p. 174. Σκάπτειν περὶ does not, I believe, occur in the Class. writers; but περισκάπτειν, with an Accus. of thing, occurs in Æschyl. in his Fragments (where we have περισκ. τοὺς ἀμπελώνας), and in Philo and the Geoponica, v. 35.

—κόπρια] This, instead of the Vulg. κοπρίαν, is found in a great number of MSS., including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and early Edd., and is adopted by all the Editors from Matth. downwards.

9. κὰν μὲν ποιήσῃ καρπὸν] The Ἀποσιώπεις here has great force and beauty, which would be not a little impaired by supplying the words wanting; the suppression of them intimating a presentiment that the thing in question will not take place; as at Exod. xxxii. 32.

10. ἐν τοῖς σάββ.]. The reading of D and the Leic. MS. (teste Jackson.), ἐν τῷ σαββάτῳ, is remarkable. See note on Matt. xii. 1, 5, 12. Some MSS. may be found which have σαββάτοις.

11. πνεῦμα ἔχουσα ἀσθ.] The recent Commentators mostly regard πν. ἀσθ. as a periphrasis for δασθίναι, and denoting simply a disease. But the passages of the Classical writers which they adduce are of a different nature. The words of our Lord at ver. 16, ἣν ἰδόντων ὁ Σατανᾶς show that πνεῦμα is very significant; and, considering the very frequent use of πνεῦμα in the sense δαιμόνιον, it cannot be doubted but that the sense is (as the ancient and most modern Commentators suppose), 'having a demon which inflicts infirmity and disease.' So Acts xvi. 16, πνεῦμα Πύθωνος, where see note. It was, indeed, an opinion of the Jews (and indeed of the Gentiles), that diseases, especially the severely acute and tediously chronic ones, were inflicted by demons. But the peculiarity of the present expression, and the words of our Lord himself, oblige us to suppose a real demoniacal influence; not, however, it should seem, involving actual possession, at least there is nothing in the context that even implies it.

—καὶ ἦν συγκ.] 'she was bowed together,' συγκ. for συγκυκφύια, as in Job ix. 27. 2 Kings iv. 35. This is not simply an active in a passive sense; for the word may be taken in a neuter sense for σύγκυφος εἶναι.

The Commentators remark that this disorder was the one called κύφωσις, which is seated in the whole of the spine, and extends to the loins; so that the patient is necessarily bowed together, almost bent double, from utter weakness of the part, and therefore the disease might very well be called at v. 12 an ἀσθένεια. This, however, will by no means prove that the disorder was not produced and continued by demoniacal influence. Accordingly ἀπολύσαι in the next verse denotes the setting free of the muscles from that power which held them down stiff and immovable. At v. 13 is described the laying on of the Divine Hands, conferring not only a perfect freedom from the stiffening of eighteen years, but also the power to stand erect by being made straight (ἀνωρθώθη).

Of this use of εἰς τὸ παντ. to signify utterly, exx. occur in Jos. Antt. i. 18, 5. xviii. 2, 7. Plato, p. 1013, in all three passages conjoined with ἀφανισθῆναι.

12. γύναι.] An address of kind courtesy, as at Matt. xv. 28, where see note. See also note on John iv. 21.

15. ὑποκριτὰ] Our Lord so styles him, because he well knew that the objection made to the healing of the woman did not arise from any sincere reverence for the Sabbath, but from envy of and enmity to himself. It is worthy of observation that seven ancient uncials, with very many cursives (to which I can add several Lamb. and Mus. copies) have ὑποκριταί, which has been adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., of whom the last-mentioned pronounces ὑποκριτά a correction to αὐτῶ. It may be so, but I doubt it. Why should not ὑποκριταί be pronounced a correction to ὁμῶν? I cannot venture to disturb a reading supported by the great body of the MSS., and confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, on a mere surmise; espec. considering that the other reading is open to a counter-surmise. Not to say that the change may have arisen from the carelessness of scribes, the terminations -α and -αι being very similar and often confounded. And since both the singular and the plural occur in the context, the copyists would have nothing to guide them as to which should be written. However, the chief cause of the plural reading being adopted was, I doubt not, the presence of ὁμῶν;—though it ought not, since this use of the pronoun with ἵκαστος is any thing but strongly significant. Thus the doubt expressed by Matthæi and felt by Griesb., may be removed. As respects the reading δε, for οὖν, received by Lachm. and Tisch., it may justly be supposed to be a mere alteration, devised for the purpose of avoiding the recurrence of οὖν.

—οὐ λύει, &c.] Our Lord refutes their cavil by a reference to their own practice: for that it was considered allowable to attend to the necessary care of animals on the Sabbath, is clear from many passages of the Rabbinical writers, cited by Schoettg. Nay, even Pagan superstition permitted various employments of husbandry even on the solemn festivals: see Virg. Georg. i. 268. sq.

16. ἦν ἔδρασε ὁ Σ.] i. e. 'whom Satan has deprived of the use of her limbs.' The term is very suitable generally (for the ancients used to compare disorders to chains, by which men are held bound); but especially to the disease in question, which, by the contraction of the limbs, seems to hold the person bound, as being in a manner deprived of self-motion.

23. εἰ ὀλίγοι οἱ σωζ.] It has been a matter of dispute both as to what is the exact import of this inquiry, and the spirit which dictated it. Some understand σωζ. of temporal deliverance, namely, being preserved from the approaching destruction of the Jewish state. But that were to suppose a kind of enigma, little suitable to a simple inquiry. More probable is the opinion of many eminent Interpreters, from Hammond to Kuinoel, that σωζ. is to be understood of preservation from the general unbelief in Christ and non-acceptance of his religion; of which sense they adduce examples from the New Test. and Ignatius' Epistles to Polycarp. Those however are only further proofs of that sense of σῶζεσθαι, by which it signifies the being 'put into the way of salvation.' It is far more natural to understand the word (with most Expositors, ancient and modern) of salvation—properly so called: q. d. 'Are there few who will attain salvation?' A sense which seems required by the terms of our Lord's reply. Whether the question were a captious one or not (though the latter is the more probable opinion), certain it is (as appears from Lightf. and Schoettg.) that the point was a disputed one in the Jewish schools; some maintaining universal salvation, others limiting it to a few elect, see 2 Ed. viii. 1, 3. Now, to a question of such minor importance as this (for it rather concerns us, as Grotius observes, to know what sort of persons will be saved, than how few) our Lord (agreeably to his custom of never replying to questions of mere curiosity) was pleased to return no answer; but makes his words an answer to the question which ought rather to have been asked,—namely, 'how salvation is to be attained.' Thus at John xiv. 22, when Judas asks him how, or why, it is that he should reveal himself to them, and not to the world, our Lord returns an answer, not to the question which was asked, but to the one which should have been asked, answering ἴάν τις ἀγαπᾷ με, &c.

On this idiomatical use of et, peculiar to the New Test. and Sept., see my Lex. in v. ii. 2, and the examples there adduced. There is in all such cases a mixture of two modes of expression: the direct and the indirect; the et being used as though there had been the direct; thus: 'He asked, whether (it) those to be saved are few?' for σωζόμενοι (as pres. for future) for σωθησόμενοι. Euthym. remarks that our Lord made no reply to the above question, because it was superfluous and useless, but spoke of the manner by which any one might be saved; that being the rather necessary to be learnt. Thus the general sense expressed and implied is, 'No matter to you how many or how few shall be saved. Rather strive to be of the number of those who enter in at the strait gate, and who go by the narrow way, for that is the only safe road.' See note on Matt. vii. 14. However, an answer in the affirmative is implied in the words subjoined, ὅτι πολλοί—οὐκ ἔλθουσιν.

24. ἀγωνίζασθε εἰσελθεῖν δ., &c.] 'Αγωνίζασθε is a very significant term, founded on an agonistic allusion; the sense being, 'strain every nerve to force your way in.'

For πύλη, B, C, L, and 2 cursives, and Origen, have θύρας, which is edited by Griesb. and Lachm.; but wrongly: for it is far more probable that πύλη was altered by the Alexandrian Critics to the more exact term θύρας, than that πύλη should have been introduced from the parallel passage of Matthew in all the copies but three and all the Versions. Matth. thinks the reading came from Origen; but the circumstance of its being found in the Cod. B seems to exclude that. At any rate, Origen's authority is neutralized by his elsewhere citing the passage with πύλη. The true origin of θύρας I suspect to have been some copy, or copies, of the corrupt Ital. Vers.

25. ἀφ' οὗ] Sub. χρόνον, 'from the time,' 'when once.' It seems most agreeable to the context to connect this verse (as did the Syr. and Pera. Translators, and also Beza and Pisc.) with the preceding rather than the following; according to which we may best suppose the apodosis to be at τότε, ver. 26. Ἐγερθῇ is not (as some imagine) redundant, but is a part of the imagery of the story, and signifies, 'has risen from his seat;' namely, to go and see that the doors are fastened. Ἀποκλ. is used as at Gen. xix. 10. τὴν θύραν τοῦ οἴκου ἀπέκλεισαν, and Thucyd. v. 80, ἀπέκλειρε τὰς πόλεις. [See Ps. xxxii. 6. Is. lv. 6. Matt. xxv. 10.]

26. ἐνώπιόν σου] 'in thy presence and company.' This mode of address is a form of rowing any one's recollection of a person; as denoting familiar intercourse aforesaid.

27. οὐκ οἶδα ὅ. π. ἄ.] This seems to be a popular mode of expressing that we desire to have nothing to do with the person, as Matt. vii. 23. xxv. 12. So Lucian Pisc. 50, i. 617, makes Aristotle, when brought back to life, say of one who pretends to be a true follower of him, and is not such, ἀγνοῶ ὅστις ἐστίν.

— ἐργάται τῆς ἀδικίας] 'The wicked,' says Bp. Sanderson, Serm. ad Aulam, p. 216, 'are so termed in Scripture because they do hoc agere, make it their work, business, or trade.' Schleus. compares Xen. Mem. i. 1, 27, καλῶν καὶ σκυλῶν ἐργάται. To which I would add 2 Macc. iii. 6, οἱ ἐργάται τῆς ἀδικίας. Menand. Hist. i. 145, A, χαλεπῶν ἔργων καὶ ἀνοσιῶν ἐργάται.

32. τῇ δλώπεικί ταύτῃ] Not said by way of reproach (as in Aristoph. Thesm. 1138, μιαρὸς δλώπηξ! οἷον ἐπιτήκει μοι), though Herod, from his consummate dissimulation, well merited the epithet; but to show our Lord's intimate knowledge of Herod's disposition and secret policy, which was to induce Jesus to quit his territories. — ἐκβάλλω δαιμόνια, &c.] The course of reasoning is this: 'I am employed innocently, and even highly meritoriously, nor shall I long weary him with my presence, but soon take my departure; why, then, should he seek my life?' Σήμερον καὶ αὔριον is a sort of proverbial form, for 'any short period of time,' as in Hos. vi. 2, and a kindred passage of Arrian Epict. iv. 10, cited by Wetstein. On the import of τελειοῦμαι the Commentators are not agreed. Some recent ones take it to mean, 'I shall be sacrificed;' but of this sense they adduce no valid proof. It is better, with the ancient and most modern Interpreters, to explain it, 'I shall be brought to the end of my course,' namely, by death. So Phil. iii. 12, οὐχ ὅτι ἤδη τετελείωμαι. Almost all Commentators consider the word as an Attic contract form for τελειώσομαι, and that as put for τελειωθήσομαι. But Bornem., with reason, objects that the penult of this verb is long; and notices similar errors in the forms of other verbs in the Classics. Here certainly the Present seems required by the correspondent verbs foregoing, ἐκβάλλω and ἐπιτελῶ; though the sense, 'I am being brought to my end;' which involves a notion of what is scarcely future, as being so very shortly to take place, is not unsuitable.

³³ πλὴν—πορεύεσθαι] q. d. 'However, I must for this short time go on in my usual course.' There is, in fact, not an ellipsis, but an apostrophe, to be supplied from what went before; q. d. '[I shall, I say, finish this course in spite of Herod, and shall not perish in Galilee,] for it cannot be,' &c.; which words contain one of the most cutting reproaches imaginable. Of course, οὐκ ἐνδέχεται must be understood with the usual limitation in such sort of acutè dicta; i. e. 'it can scarcely be,' for John the Baptist and some few others, had been put to death out of Jerusalem.

—νοσσίαν] for νοσσία in the parallel passage of Matthew; denoting the nest with the young; as in Deut. xxxii. 11. Render, brood.

XIV. 1. φαγεῖν ἄρτον] A phrase formed from the Hebr. עָרַף לֶחֶם (used in Gen. xliii. 25, in this sense. So the Sept. renders by ἀριστῶν); which, though it properly signifies no more than 'to take food,' yet often denotes 'to feast, to make good cheer;' as when the meal is one to which guests are invited; when it may be supposed that the provision is better than that of an ordinary domestic meal. Indeed, it appears from what Lightfoot, Wetstein, and others, have copiously adduced from the Rabbinical writers, that it was usual with the Jews to provide better cheer on the Sabbath than on other days, and that they even used to make feasts on that day. See Neh. viii. 9—12, and Tob. ii. 1.

By τινος τῶν ἀρχ. τῶν Φαρ. is meant (as Grotius, Hammond, Whitby, Pearce, and Campbell, have shown) 'one of the rulers [of a synagogue], who was a Pharisee,' τῶν Φαρ. being for ἐκ τῶν Φαρ., or in opposition. Comp. John iii. 1. For that such rulers were not all Pharisees appears from John vii. 48.

εὐθέως ἀνασπάσει αὐτὸν ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τοῦ σαββάτου; ⁶ Καὶ οὐκ ἴσχυσαν ἀνταποκριθῆναι αὐτῷ πρὸς ταῦτα.

this surely furnishes a fair case for internal evidence to determine [and that is manifestly in favour of δνος]; farther remarking, that it is hardly to be supposed that our Lord would thus have spoken; also that the argument à minori ad majus would be completely invalidated. I quite agree with him; but since he expressed that decided opinion, he has issued another, and, as often in the case of his brother Editor Tisch., his second thoughts are not his wiser ones. He now adopts υἱός, and defends it; but how? By, as usual, taking for granted that the υἱός was altered to δνος, in order to set right the argument! He says that the stress of the argument is on ὑμῶν, and the point of comparison is the ownership, and consequent tender care of the object in question. There may be, he adds, in the words the meaning son, or even or; but he prefers rendering them simply. Now surely a case that requires such sophistry to sustain it cannot be sound or good; and this might have intimated to Mr. Alford the expediency of the homely maxim, to 'let well be,' espec. since these arbitrary and forced emphases are the most marked of perversions. Of the emphasis of the pronoun after τις I cannot find one example. Though it cannot fairly be demanded of us to account for such portenta as the reading υἱός, yet an able Critic in the Edinb. Review supposes, by a very ingenious process, that it came through the intervention of a Latin Version [the very quarter, I would add, whence are derived most of the monstrosities devoured by some Critics]. It may have been so; but I would rather suppose it to have arisen from the very frequent confusion by scribes of the abbreviation for υἱός and δνος respectively. That Jerome had δνος in his copy cannot be doubted. The terms δνος and βοῦς are often associated in the Old Test., and the expression is a usual one to denote any domestic animal; which is all that the argument here requires; and so in Homer's Hymn to Mercury the term προβάτοις is opposed to ἀνθρώποις; and so elsewhere animals as opposed to men.

⁷. παραβολήν] Meaning, 'an important moral precept,' or rather a series of moral comparisons, including also a parable. See note on Matt. xiii. 3.

— ἐπὶ τῶν] Supply here (as at Acts iii. 5) τὸν νοῦν, or τὴν διάνοιαν, which is found expressed in Plato, p. 926; unless, indeed, it be better to suppose no ellipsis at all, as in 1 Tim. iv. 16, ἐπιχε σταντῶ. Thus ἐπὶ τῶν will simply denote obscuring, &c.

⁹. δὸς τόπον] 'give thy place,' or 'seat.' This phrase (formed on the Latin locum dare) and the following προσανάβηθι ἀνώτερον were customary phrases of table etiquette with the ancients.

— ἄρξῃ—τὸν ἴσχ. τόπ. κατ.] and 'thou proceed to take the lowest place, or seat at table.' Comp. Jos. Ant. xii. 4, 9, κλῆθεις δὲ ἐφ' ἑστίασιν ὑποκατακλίνεταί πάντων (read ὑποκάτω κατακλ. π.), καταφρονεῖς ὑπὸ τῶν τοῦς τόπους κατὰ τὴν ἀξίαν διανομῶντων, 'by those who apportioned the seats according to rank.'

¹². μὴ φῶναι τοὺς φίλους, &c.] This sense of φῶναι, to invite, is very rare, and is founded on that more frequent one, by which the word denotes to call or sommoneo any one to us. The best Commentators are of opinion that the negative particle is here to be taken with limitation, and rendered non tam, quam potius. An idiom, indeed, occurring in various passages of the Old and New Test.; but very rarely where, as here, the two particles are employed in two different sentences. Accordingly, it is better to reject the limitation. The intent of what is here said is plainly to inculcate, that charity is a duty far more obligatory than hospitality.

—ἀναστάσει τῶν δικ.] So ἀνάστ. τῆς ζωῆς in John v. 29. The Pharisees believed in a resurrection of the just, but imagined that there would be two resurrections; one to take place at the coming of the Messiah (who would thus establish an earthly kingdom, to which the Pharisee here evidently alludes by 'the kingdom of God'); the other the final resurrection, to be followed by a state of retribution. The Pharisee, however, it seems, understood the expression, τῇ ἀναστάσει τῶν δικαίων in the sense commonly assigned to it by the Jews, who confined the resurrection and its bliss to the Jews,—a view which our Lord sets aside by the subsequent parable.

—ἀγρὸν ἡγόρασα] Since it can hardly be supposed that a man would buy land without having seen it; or that, having once bought it, the going to see it should be a matter of such urgency; most recent Commentators take the sense of ἡγόρασα to be, 'I intend to buy.' But that is surely a most unwarrantable straining of the sense. There is, indeed, no reason to deviate from the accustomed force of the tense, if we render, 'I have just bought;' and take ἀνάγκην ἔχειν, with the limitation peculiar to all such popular modes of expression (so ἀνάγκαιον at v. 23), merely to imply on the part of the speaker, not absolute necessity, but strong inclination,—well expressed by our common version, 'I must needs.' And though the viewing of land once bought might seem of little consequence, yet it should be considered that property of any kind never possesses such attractions, as when first it comes into any one's possession, by purchase or otherwise; when men's curiosity naturally pries into any advantage, real or fancied. The very same reasoning will apply to the next words ζεύγη βοῶν ἡγόρασα πέντε. For the purchase, though, in a certain sense, made, was not really completed till the proving; the oxen being, we may suppose, bought on warrant, and subject to future trial and approbation. That such was not unusual both among Jews and Gentiles, is plain from the passages adduced by Schoettg. and Wetstein from the Rabbinical writers and the writers on Civil Law.

—ἔχει με παρητημένον] An uncommon expression, of which, however, I have noted an example in Plut. Cat. Min. 24, ἔχει με παρητημένον, 'hold me excused.' This passive use of παραιτεῖσθαι (otherwise a deponent, 'to excuse oneself') is very rare. The only example elsewhere that I have noted is in an anonymous writer cited by Suid. in v., παραιτηθεὶς διὰ τῶν φίλων τοῦτον ἀπέλυσε τῆς αἰτίας.

20. γυναῖκα ἔγγραμμα, καὶ &c.] This was the most specious of the excuses; for, by the laws and customs of most nations, any temporary omission in the duties, and still more the acquiescence of life, was thought excusable in newly-married persons. Hence even soldiers, in that case, had usually a furlough of a year. Commentators have here not been well employed in animadverting, as they have done, on the weakness of the excuses offered. So far from that, the first two reasons are very plausible; and the last very strong. And why? They seem to have been purposely made as strong as such reasons ordinarily are, in order to show that no reasons of any kind will be admitted as valid by the heavenly Inviter: who enjoins us first (i. e. above all) to seek his kingdom and righteousness, and allows of no plea for neglecting that duty; requiring us to 'take up and bear our cross, and forsake all that stands in the way of our acceptance of his gracious invitation,—whether the claims of parental, filial, or conjugal duties, or any similar bond of affection (see ver. 26) ; otherwise we cannot be his disciples, and ' shall not taste of his supper.'

The principle, indeed, which ran through these various excuses, was a contempt of the feast, by a decided preference of other avocations. And carnality, in one or other of its Proteus forms, stamped them all with the mark of falsehood.

²³ φραγμούς] This is usually taken to mean places fenced off; a sense, however, little suitable here. From the term being associated with ὁδοὺς, it is plain that some kind of road is meant; and we may best understand it to denote paths by the hedge or fence sides, such foot-ways as were carried along or aside of, and sometimes across, not only vineyards and orchards, but even corn-fields; the cultivation being, there is reason to think, chiefly by what is called open-field. The φραγ, here denotes the same as the διεξόδους of Matt. xxii. 9, where see note.

²⁵. This and the following verses are by the Commentators supposed to record what occurred on some other occasion. There is, however, I apprehend, a connexion between the two; and the address in question was, we may suppose, made soon after the foregoing; probably occurring as Christ was commencing his journey towards Jerusalem, and the multitude crowding around him at his departure. Our Lord then took occasion to give the moral of the parable recently put forth; containing its application to persons of all kinds, and of every age, to whom the offer of salvation should be made.

²⁶. ἔτι δὲ καὶ τ. ἰ. ψυχὴν] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ἔτι τε καὶ, from B, L, Δ;—authority, however, wholly insufficient (for I find the reading in not one of the Lamb. and Mus. copies); and the δὲ is confirmed by Acts ii. 26, sine v. l., ἔτι δὲ καὶ, and Heb. xi. 36, sine v. l., ἔτι δὲ δασμῶν, in which passage ἔτι δὲ means

quiescentiam. The form occurs also in the Class. writers, espec. Plato and Xenoph., of whom the latter very frequently uses ἔτι δὲ καὶ, and ἔτι δὲ, as also does Soph. Œd. T. 1345. It is true that ἔτι τε may seem justified by Acts xxi. 28, ἔτι τε καὶ "Ἕλληνας εἰσάγαγον εἰς τὸ ἱερὸν. But I suspect that there the true reading is δὲ, which Tisch. adduces from some copies. Indeed, Dindorf on Steph. Thea. in v. ἔτι, after remarking that ἔτι τε has in the writings of the ancient and pure Greek writers been often changed, on due evidence, to ἔτι δὲ, goes on so far as to say that though ἔτι τε does occur in the late writers, yet even there it has been often brought in by scribes.

²⁸. By these parabolical comparisons, Christ counsels his hearers (and all of us of future ages) before we enter on the Christian life, seriously to weigh the difficulty of the duties required of us, the sacrifices to be made, and the temptations to be resisted; so that we may not afterwards be moved by them to abandon our Christian course.

— πύργον] Doddridge supposes this to be such a tower as was built in the vineyards of the East for the temporary accommodation of those who guarded the produce. But the costliness implied in calculating its expense indicates a mansion; such, it seems, as was called πύργος, by a similar figure to the Latin turris, as denoting 'a turreted house'; and, by implication, a considerable edifice. We may here understand a country house in a vineyard; in which sense turris occurs in Livy, xxxiii. 48, where Duker gives other examples. And from Arundel's Travels in Asia Minor, vol. ii. 335, we learn that πύργος even yet designates 'a country house.'

— πρῶτον καθίσας ψηφίζει] Wetst. and some other Commentators take καθ. in the sense of considering. This, however, is a sense not fairly to be elicited from the word; though, in the act of sitting down to a table or desk to reckon up any expenses, there is an implicit sinners of the place and neighbourhood, had heard of Jesus' miracles, and the great power of his teaching; and accordingly, partly from curiosity and partly from better motives, had flocked together to hear him. Whereupon Jesus showed attention to the better disposed of them, and with some of them even sat at meat. This provoked the indignation of the Pharisees, who broke out into murmurings. To prevent the bad effect of whose conduct, in discouraging the penitent from resorting to him, our Lord thought proper to vindicate his own conduct, not, indeed, directly, as at Matt. ix. 10, 13 (where he intimates that he held communication with them as a physician with his patients, not as a companion), but indirectly and by inference, to be drawn from the kindness of God in encouraging and readily receiving penitent sinners (see ver. 20, and compare ver. 7), q. d. 'If God received sinners, ought not we?'

³⁴ 35. See note on the parallel sentiment at Matt. v. 13. This, however, may be considered a somewhat stronger sentiment, as designating a thing so utterly useless as not even to be worth carrying out on the dunghill to benefit the land, but merely fit to be thrown out of doors and trodden under foot in the streets. Accordingly the several Classical passages cited by Wetst. on the passage of Matth. are rather to the purpose here, especially the passage of Plut., thus designating the highest degree of contempt. The connexion here is obscure, and disputed. It is, with most probability, laid down as follows: 'Ye see, then, the necessity of counting the cost and hazard of becoming my disciples. For if ye engage inconsiderately, ye may either apostatize altogether, or become, like unsavoury salt, utterly worthless, mere professors, hearers of the word, and not doers.' [Comp. Mark ix. 50.]

XV. In order the better to understand what follows, we may suppose that some little time had elapsed between what is recorded in the last chapter, and that which is narrated in the present; during which the Publicans, and other open

Our Lord, then, proceeds to illustrate the gracious dealings of God with contrite sinners, in three Parables; which, by placing the matter in different points of view, might make it more clearly understood. Of these the two first are nearly allied, and their scope is to represent the preciousness of the souls of his people to Christ, and consequently the deep interest taken in their conversion by God and his holy angels. The third is meant to set forth the nature of true repentance, and show the gracious reception which the truly penitent sinner will experience from his merciful Father.

1. ἦσαν ἐγγίζ. αὐτῷ] 'were drawing nigh to him, were approaching to him in penitence;' implying the hearkening to him with some degree of faith.

2. At διεγόγγ. the Preposition διὰ denotes continuance of action: 'were continually murmuring.' The Present tense in the verbs προσεδίχ. and συνεσ. denotes habit of action; of the two terms the former denotes admittance to our Lord's society, including the privilege of hearing his preaching; the latter implies a closer connexion, καὶ συνεσθίει αὐτοῖς. ³ Εἶπε δὲ πρὸς αὐτοὺς τὴν παραβολὴν ταύτην, λέγων ⁴ ^b Τίς ἄνθρωπος ἐξ ὑμῶν, ἔχων ἑκατὸν πρόβατα, καὶ ἀπολέσας ἓν ἐξ αὐτῶν, οὐ καταλείπει τὰ ἑννεηκονταενέα ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, καὶ πορεύεται ἐπὶ τὸ ἀπολωλὸς, ἕως εὕρῃ αὐτό; ⁵ ^c Καὶ εὕρων, ἐπιτίθῃσιν ἐπὶ τοὺς ὤμους ἑαυτοῦ χαίρων ⁶ ^d καὶ ἔλθων εἰς τὸν οἶκον συγκαλεῖ τοὺς φίλους καὶ τοὺς γείτονας, λέγων αὐτοῖς· Συγχαρήτέ μοι, ὅτι εὗρον τὸ πρόβατόν μου τὸ ἀπολωλός. ⁷ ^e Λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι οὕτω χαρὰ ἔσται ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ ἐπὶ ἑνὶ ἁμαρτωλῷ μετανοοῦντι, ἢ ἐπὶ ἑννεηκονταενέα δικαίοις, οἵτινες οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχουσι μετανοίας. ⁸ ^f Ἡ τίς γυνὴ δραχμὰς ἔχουσα δέκα, ἐὰν ἀπολέσῃ δραχμὴν μίαν, οὐχὶ ἅπτει λύχνον, καὶ σαροὶ τὴν οἰκίαν, καὶ ζητεῖ ἐπιμελῶς, ἕως ὅτου εὕρῃ; ⁹ καὶ εὐρούσα συγκαλεῖται τὰς φίλας καὶ τὰς γείτονας, λέγουσα·

3—7. The person having the hundred sheep is evidently the Good Shepherd of St. John's Gospel—the Son of God. Under that designation he is represented in the Old Test., e. gr., and in reference to his seeking the lost sheep, in Ezek. xxxiv. 6—15. The Seeker, who is also the Owner, is God in Christ. The hundred Sheep are the House of Israel; or rather, as the present application requires, mankind generally. Of course by ἐρημος must be understood a tract of country adapted to pasturage, in opposition to corn-growing. See my Lex. in v.

5. ἐπιτίθῃσιν—ὤμοις] It may have been, as some say, a custom with the Jewish shepherds to carry their sheep on their shoulders. But this passage will not prove it; for a lost sheep far from home must by shepherds of all countries be carried, since a single sheep cannot be driven. However, the circumstance is here brought in to intimate the great kindness of the Shepherd in the course of seeking, finding, and bringing home in the easiest and gentlest way the lost sheep. The circumstance of calling together His friends and neighbours is probably introduced merely ad ornatum, and consequently is not to be referred in the application to the angels and 'spirits of just men made perfect.' Indeed, the ἀνθρωποπάθεια in the following context (with reference to the feelings of men in such a case of the loss of even part of what they hold dear) excludes it. And here such feelings as that in question are ascribed to God, only to give us a more lively sense of his infinitely benevolent dealings with mankind.

7. By μετάνοια is here meant, not that sorrow for sin which is continually required even of the best persons, but that turning from sin and reformation of life, which is indispensably necessary to true conversion. That there should be greater joy in this instance is well accounted for by Dr. Jortin, Sermon iv. 'Regular obedience is more pleasing to the angels; but here greater joy is experienced; something more like human affection and perturbation, though not so much sedate happiness.' See note on John viii. 56, ἡγαλλίασατο. The declaration in question may be supposed to convey (as Mr. Greswell shows) an oblique but pointed censure of the censurers themselves; since δικαίοις cannot mean simply the righteous, nor οἵτινες οὐ χρεῖαν ἔχουσι μετανοίας those who need no repentance; but the expressions are to be taken with a certain turn of meaning, called forth by the occasion, and connected with irony. Thus by δικαίους are to be understood 'those who think themselves such,' are such in their own conceit; in short, the self-righteous. As examples of this mode of expression, it may suffice to refer to Mark ii. 17. Luke v. 32, οὐκ ἦλθον κυλίσαι δικαίους, ἀλλ' ἁμαρτωλοὺς εἰς μετάνοιαν. Luke x. 21, σοφῶν καὶ συνεστῶν.

8—10. The lost piece of money. The design of this parable is the same with that of the preceding; though another class of sinners may be had in view. The circumstance of the lighting and sweeping corresponds with that of going after the lost sheep until found, and then laying it on his shoulders to bring it home, is to be considered in the same light.

8. τίς γυνὴ] With this parable Expositors compare a very similar one in the Rabbinical writings; and Wets. cites from Theophr. Char. 10, τῇ γυναικὶ ἀποβυλῶσθαι τρίχαλκον, οἷος μεταφέρειν τὰ σκεύη, καὶ τὰς κλῖνας, καὶ τὰς κιβωτοὺς, καὶ διφᾶν τὰ καλύμματα.

— ἅπτει λύχνον] This would be necessary; since (as we find from the remains of Herculaneum and Pompeii) the houses of the lower classes, in ancient times, either had no windows, or only what we rather liken to the loop-holes of our barns.

9. For συγκαλεῖται, 6 ancient uncials, and about 16 cursives (to which I could add several Lamb. and Mus. copies) have συγκαλεῖ, which is received by Lachm. and Tisch., but not by Alf., who regards the reading as a conformation to v. 6. It may be so; but some of the MSS. alleged, as the Leicester MS., have συγκαλεῖ in both passages. And indeed it were strange that Luke should first use the Active form, and then immediately after the Midd. I cannot help suspecting that συγκαλεῖται supr. v. 6, is not, as Alf. thinks, a conformation from v. 9, but is the genuine reading. Luke elsewhere always uses the Midd., except, indeed, in Acts v. 21, συνεκάλεσαν τὸ συνέδριον. But even there I suspect that Luke wrote συνεκαλίσαντο, and that the τὸ was absorbed in the τὸ following.

11—32. The Prodigal Son. This most striking and pathetic parable (peculiar to Luke) is justly termed the crown and pearl of all our Lord's parables. It is not, however, to be understood, as it is by many Expositors, as representing by the elder and the younger son, respectively, the Jews and the Gentiles. I agree with Bp. Lonsdale, that when we look at the occasion on which the parable was delivered, and consider the design of the two preceding parables, we cannot but understand this third as meant to represent the great readiness with which God receives a truly penitent sinner, even as the father receives his younger son (vv. 20—27); and, at the same time, to teach those, who, like the elder (vv. 28—30), pride themselves on their own righteousness, that, so far from being offended at the favour shown by God to a repentant sinner, they ought to rejoice heartily at his return from the way of perdition (vv. 31, 32).

12. τὸ ἐπιβάλλον μέρος]. Supply μοι from the preceding, 'the portion which falleth to me;' namely, after fair and equitable partition. The Jewish law did not, any more than the Roman, permit to a father the arbitrary disposal of his whole property. It was entailed on the children, after his death, in equal portions; except that the first-born had a double share. Such distribution, however, was sometimes made by a parent to his children during his lifetime, with a reservation of what was necessary to the support of himself and his wife, if alive.

13. συναγαγὼν ἅπαντα] 'having brought together the whole of the proceeds;' i. e. converted it into money. So Plut. Mor. p. 772, κληρονομία—εἰς ἀργύριον συναγαγών.—Διεσκόρπισε τὴν οὐσίαν, 'dissipated, squandered his substance' (by a metaphor taken from winnowing; see my Lex. New Test. in v.), as Dionys. xi. 24, ἔπαρξιν αὐτοῖς διασκορπιεῖ. The διά denotes 'dispersion.' See my note on Thucyd. iv. 384. Of the expression ζῶν ἀσώτως (which occurs in Josephus) the sense is, 'by living extravagantly, or sottiſhly,' τρόπον ἀσώτου, as one who is utterly irreclaimable.

14. ἰσχυρὸς] Five uncials and a few ancient cursives have ἰσχυρά, which, as being the earlier, and the other the later Greek, is probably genuine.

15. ἐκολλήθη] i. e. 'engaged himself to.' The verb has properly a passive sense, but is always used in a middle or reciprocal one.—Βόσκειν χοίρους. An employment by all the ancient nations (even where there existed no religious prejudices, as in the case of the Jews) considered as among the vilest, nay, abominable. So Sota, fol. 292, 'Maledictus sit homo, qui alit porcos.'

16. ἐπεθύμει γεμίσαι] Render: 'was fain (or glad) to fill his belly from the κεράτια or fruit of the carob-tree,' still used in the East for feeding swine, though sometimes resorted to by the poor. So in Alciphir. Epist. iii. 34, a person similarly circumstanced says: Δέχου με μισθωτόν κατ' ἀγρόν πάντα ὑπομένων ('enduring any hardships or indignities') ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἀληρωτῶν ἐκπλήσαι γαστέρα'. The reading of three of the most ancient MSS., with several others, χορτασθῆναι, instead of text. rec. γεμίσαι τὴν κοιλίαν αὐτοῦ, arose, I doubt not, from alteration on the part of some Critic who was offended at the homeliness of the term; yet it occurs, we see, in a highly-refined writer.

In short, the present may best be regarded as a popular mode of speaking, expressive of extreme distress; as much as to say, that he would have been glad to have lived as the swine did, whose food, however coarse, was plentifully supplied. Whereas the food his wages would procure was very scanty, and no man gave [ought] to him.

By κεράτ. is meant the fruit of the ceratonia siliquosa, or carob-tree, common in the Southern and Eastern countries, sometimes now as an article of food, as were the siliquæ among the Romans.

17. εἰς ἐαυτὸν ἐλθὼν] A formula denoting properly, recovery from fainting or from insanity; but also used of deliverance from any delusion or error of mind. So Diod. Sic. xiii. 95, τοῖς λογισμοῖς εἰς ἐαυτοὺς ἐρχόμενοι. Arrian Epict. iii. 1, ὅταν εἰς ἐαυτὸν ἐλθῃς. Lucrēt. iv. 994, 'donec discussis redeant erroribus ad se.' Dionys. Hal. p. 2188, ἀνιχωρί δὲ πάλιν εἰς τὴν ἐαυτοῦ φύσιν. Homer, in his Odysæ. x. 395, inculcates a fine moral lesson in his representation of Ulysses' companions, as transformed into swine by the sorcery of Circe; thus depicting forcibly the wretched and degraded state of the vicious, as levelled with the brutes, yet even the meanest of them. He also furnishes an incentive to repentance, and encouragement to turning from vice to virtue, by representing the persons as, when disenchanting and again become human beings, proving superior in all respects to what they were before,—younger, taller, and far handsomer. His words are, Ἄνδρες δ' αἰψ' (namely, on transformation) ἰγύνοντο νεώτεροι ἢ παρὸς ἡσάν· καὶ πολλὰ καλλίους καὶ μείζονες.

I have now, with Lachm. and Tisch., admitted into the text ὡδὶ, from many uncial and some cursive MSS. (to which I can add a few Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence; since the word was more likely to be omitted than inserted;—not, however, omitted, as Alf. thinks, by Homœot.; for that could hardly happen in all the copies except comparatively a few, but from some other cause mainly. I find the Particle often omitted by the scribes where no Homœot. occurs, but oftener removed by the Critics, from their not perceiving its force, or thinking it unnecessary; which is scarcely ever the case;—certainly not here.

18. εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν] for εἰς τὸν Θεόν. This is placed first, since men's sins are chiefly against God, even when also against their fellow-men. Inasmuch that David, Ps. li. 4, while conscious of having deeply injured man, yet says, 'Against THEE only have I sinned;' or, as it ought to have been rendered, especially, or particularly. It is, indeed, the best evidence of the genuineness of a man's repentance, when it is accompanied with the strong feeling of the heinousness of his offences as regards God.—Ἐνώπιόν σου, 'in respect of thee'; namely, by wasting his substance, and thus occasioning him great unhappiness and some disgrace.

19. καί] This, not found in very many of the best MSS. and Versions, including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, is with reason cancelled by almost all Editors. The Asyndeton is intensive.

20. καὶ ἀναστὰς ἦλθε, &c.] Thus immediately putting his good resolution into practice.

—εἶδεν] This implies, together with seeing, also recognition.—Ἐπέσιν ἐπὶ τὸν τράχ. The haste of the affectionate father to rush into the embraces of his son is in fine contrast with the tardiness and hesitation, which would naturally be felt by the son, as conscious of deep blame, and without hope of full forgiveness.

21. πάτερ, &c.] The penitent prodigal, we see, set about the confession he had meditated, notwithstanding he had the embrace of forgiveness; yet he does not finish his speech, being, we may suppose, interrupted in uttering the last words ποιήσόν—σου by the address of his father.

22. Ἐξενέγκατε—εἰς τοὺς πόδας] It is worthy of remark, that all the articles called for are such as were never allowed to servants, nay, are such as implied not only freedom, but dignity; as the best robe, and a ring; on the use of which latter, as a mark of distinction, see Greawell.

—πρώτην] 'of the first quality.' This use of the word is rarely found, except in the Scriptural writers; as Ezek. xxvii. 22, μετὰ τῶν πρώτων ἡδυσμάτων. The most apposite Classic example is Athen. l. v. p. 197, ταύταις δ' ἀμφὶ ταῖς ἀλουργαῖς ὑπὸ στρωμνῇ τῇ πρώτῃ ἐβλεπε, 'of the finest wool.'

The former τὴν is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from 7 uncial and 1 cursive MSS.; to which I can add 3 Mus. copies; but that is authority far too slender, espec. since internal evidence is equally balanced. It might have been added to raise the sense; but it was more likely to be removed, as not agreeable to Classical composition. However, the τὴν might spring from the τε preceding. But there is no case for change.

—δότε δακτύλιον εἰς τ. χεῖρα] lit. 'bestow a ring to his hand.' In such a case the Class. writers used περιτίθημι, and it is found even in the Sept. Version of Gen. xli. 42, περιέθηκεν (scil. δακτύλιον) εἰς τὴν χεῖρα Ἰωσήφ, which form of expression (considering that the Hebrew original there has נתן, 'gave it to his finger') probably suggested the use of the present. Shoes are added, since slaves, and even servants went unshod. So we read in Plautus, Casin., 'Si effexis hoc, soleas tibi dabo, et annulum in digito Aureum.'

Ὁ οὖν πατήρ αὐτοῦ ἐξελθὼν παρεκάλει αὐτόν. ²⁹ Ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπε τῷ πατρί· Ἴδού, τοσαῦτα ἔτη δουλεύω σοι, καὶ οὐδέποτε ἐντολήν σου παρήλθον· καὶ ἐμοὶ οὐδέποτε ἔδωκας ἔριφον, ἵνα μετὰ τῶν φίλων μου εὐφρανθῶ. ³⁰ Ὅτε δὲ ὁ υἱὸς σου οὗτος, ὁ καταφαγὼν σου τὸν βίον μετὰ πορνῶν, ἦλθεν, ἔθυσας αὐτῷ τὸν μόσχον τὸν σιτειπὸν. ³¹ Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Τέκνον, σὺ πάντοτε μετ' ἐμοῦ εἶ, καὶ πάντα τὰ ἐμὰ σὰ ἐστίν.

φίρετε, from B, L, X, and the Ital., Vulg., and Copt. Versions; and Alf. terms living, an emendation of construction. But φίρετε may justly be regarded as an alteration of construction, but no improvement; and I cannot consent to receive a reading so harsh and disjointed on such very slender authority. The reading of D and X throws light on the origin of Tisch. and Alford's reading, as being a mere critical alteration suggested by the Latin Versions, where the idiom of the Latin language called for the use of a verb in the Imper. followed by καὶ.

— τὸν μόσχον τὸν σιτ.] Such as, we may suppose, most opulent rustic families would be usually provided with, for any extraordinary call on their hospitality, as poultry is with us; see Gen. xviii. 7. Moreover, veal was by the ancients reckoned a delicacy. So Hor. Ep. I. iii. 36, 'Pascitur in reditu vetula jumenta.'—θύσατε, 'slay, butcher;' on which sense see on Matt. xxii. 4, and my Lex.

24. νεκρὸς ἦν, καὶ ἀνέζησε] Render (here and ver. 32), 'was dead, and has come to life again.' In each passage the expressions νεκρ. ἦν and ἀνέζ. may be taken, in a popular sense, for 'was regarded as one dead, lost to his family.' But to this (too feeble a sense of itself) the air of the context requires us to at least superadd the moral import of the terms, as used of spiritual death, by unrepented and unforsaken sin, and a spiritual coming to life again by repentance and reformation. The sense often occurs in Scripture (see Rom. iv. 19. Eph. ii. 1. v. 14. 1 Tim. v. 6. 1 John iii. 14. Rev. iii. 1), and is not unexampled in other ancient writers. Thus the Pythagorean Philosophers used to speak of such of their disciples as abandoned the master's precepts as dead, and their state a living death; nay, erected cenotaphs to their memories. So Lysias the Pythagorean (cited by Kypke) says to such a person, εἰ μὴ οὖν μεταβάλλοι, χαρήσομαι; 'if de μὴ, τίθωμαι μοι. The καὶ before ἀπολωλὼς is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from several uncial and not a few cursive MSS., to which I could add a few Lamb. and Mus. copies.

But internal evidence is in favour of the word, whose use is suitable to Hellenistic, but not Class. Greek, and was thus removed by the verbal Critics.

25. ἤκουσε συμφωνίας καὶ χορῶν] A brief mode of expression, meaning, 'he heard [the sound of] persons playing on instruments and singing together, and [the noise] of persons dancing;' according to a very ancient and Oriental custom, of having concerts of music, vocal and instrumental, at entertainments; see Hom. Od. p. 358.—Συμφωνία, equiv. to ὁμοφωνία, and may be rendered concertus, denoting properly the sound of concerted music, whether vocal or instrumental, or both; whether of many—which may be supposed here meant—or of few, which are to be understood in Athens. p. 615, ὄρχησται δύο εἰσήγοντο μετὰ συμφωνίας, denoting probably a duet of aἰόλοι or pipes. Μετὰ is used, as in Polyb. xvi. 10, 5, παρὴν ἐπικυμάζων μετὰ κεραιῶν (tibia) καὶ συμφωνίας, meaning vocal music accompanying the 'curva tibia' of Virg. Æn. xi. 736.

27. υγιαίνοντα] For the Classical σῶν καὶ ὑγιῇ, found in Hdot. iii. 124, and Thucyd. iii. 34. Yet the moral sense, inculcated at ver. 24, may be united with the physical one. So Plutarch, cited by Kypke, ἵνα μὴ τοῦ ὑγιαίνοντος καὶ τεταγμένου (orderly) βίου καταφρονήσωσι.

30. ὁ καταφαγὼν σου τὸν βίον] A metaphor to denote the wasting of any one's substance by prodigality, common in the Greek writers from Homer downwards. By the use of this term, and espec. of πορνῶν, it is evident that the elder brother, while he overrates the obedience he had himself rendered to his father, exaggerates his brother's guilt.

31. πάντα τὰ ἐμὰ σὰ ἐστίν] lit. 'all things that are mine are thine' (comp. John xvii. 10, τὰ ἐμὰ πάντα σὰ ἐστί), 'all my goods are thine,' i. e. are destined to be such, namely, 'as my heir,' κύριος πάντων, for his brother had forfeited all title to inheritance. Such a person the Romans called herus minor.

32. ὁ ἀδελφ. σ.] Abp. Newc. thinks 'this is said, and not ὁ υἱός μου, to suggest the endearing relation of brethren.' This is the truth, but not the whole truth. It was meant also (by a play on the words ὁ υἱός σου οὗτος at v. 30) as a covert rebuke of the elder son for unfraternal contumely; though the expression touched on does not, as Mr. Alford says, express 'the last degree of scorn and contempt.' Indeed, the father himself uses the οὗτος at v. 24, but then only before ὁ υἱός μου.—though there several MSS. of the Alexandrine recension place it after; a critical alteration proceeding, as is perpetually the case, from sheer ignorance. For ἀνέζησας, Tisch. and Alf. read ἐξήσας, from B, L, Δ; but Lachm. retains ἀνέξ., rightly; for the extreme slenderness of external authority would require internal evidence of the strongest kind to justify the adoption of ἐξ. But that is not the case; for to suppose with Alf. that it was altered from the ἀνέξ. at v. 24 involves great improbability; and that the alteration should have come into all the copies but three is incredible. In those few copies it was probably lost by accident; though it may have been removed by the Alexandrine Critics, who felt a sort of horror at the very semblance of tautology. Thus it is no wonder that the ἦν just after ἀπολωλὼς should be absent from several uncials, and expunged by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., though its genuineness might be vindicated even against far stronger external authority than exists; for, I find very few of the Lamb. and Mus. copies without it. Indeed, there is here something very touching and forcible in the repetition; and the sense of the context will not allow us to suppose that for the former strong term a weaker one is subjoined at the close. That the Critics have tampered with ἀνέξ. elsewhere will appear from Rom. vii. 9. xiv. 9, and perhaps Rev. xx. 5.

XVI. 1—9. Parable of the unjust Steward.

1. ἔλεγε δὲ καὶ, &c.] Render: 'Moreover, he spake also to his disciples as follows;' for the δὲ καὶ denotes 'continuation.' As the preceding parable had been addressed by our Lord espec. to the Pharisees and Scribes (in vindication of his conduct, and in illustration of the dealings of God with sinful man), so was this to the disciples at large, including, doubtless, some of the lately converted publicans and rich men; for whom, indeed, it should seem to have been principally intended; as meant to set forth the danger of the love of money, and the impossibility of 'serving God and Mammon;' also to show the right use of wealth, and how it ought to be employed to advantage; thus teaching them to imitate in their spiritual concerns the foresight and prudence of worldly men in their temporal concerns; in short, so to use the worldly goods they are entrusted with, as God's stewards on earth, as to lay up for themselves treasures in heaven.

— οἰκονόμον] The οἰκονόμος was a domestic, generally a freedman (and, in the time of our Lord, always of free condition), who acted as general manager of the affairs of a family, to whom all the property and the expenditure were committed in trust, and all the household subject. Thus the office will not exactly answer to that of the Roman dispensator, still less to that of the villicus, but was more analogous to that of the Greek ἐπίτροπος, and comprehended all the duties of our land-steward, house-steward, and bailiff.

— διεβλήθη] 'was accused,' lit. 'maliciously reported.' This use of the word to denote, as here, a true, and not a calumnious charge, is almost confined to the Sept. and the later Greek writers.

— ὡς διασκορπίζων] 'as wasting.'

2. τί] for διατί, 'how!' importing expostulation and displeasure at such breach of trust (see Gen. xxix. 4); or rather, 'what is this that I hear of thee?' Τὸν λόγον, 'the account,' viz. which you are bound to give. So Plato, Phæd. § 8, ὑμῖν δὲ τοῖς δικασταῖς βούλομαι τὸν λόγον ποδοῖναι.

— οὐ δυνήσῃ] 'thou canst not, must not.'

3. σκάπτειν] Meaning, to work as a day labourer; of which occupation digging, as being the most laborious and servile, is put as a part for the whole. So Phocyl., εἰ δὲ τις οὐ δίδασκε τέχνην, σκάπτειτο δικάλλῃ, and Aristophan. Av. 1432, τί γὰρ πάθω; σκάπτειν γὰρ οὐκ ἐπίσταμαι.

4. ἔγνων τί ποιήσω] In my note here I have not in the former editions quite fairly reported Kuinoel's interpretation. He renders ἔγνων by ocio (meaning 'opportune jam succurrit') quid mihi faciendum.' For which there is the authority of all the ancient Versions, and, what is more, of Scripture itself; for so Rev. ii. 17, ὄνομα κρινόν—οὐδεὶς ἔγνων, εἰ μὴ ὁ λαμβάνων. So in the text. rec. and the bulk of the MSS.; though some ancient ones have οἶδεν, which is received by all the recent Editors; but wrongly, since it is a manifest gloss. See other examples of this idiom in my note on John vii. 26, where I have shown that the true sense is 'cogitum habeo,' 'I have obtained the knowledge;’ understanding the expression to denote that clear idea as to knowing what to do, which arises from previously casting about in the mind what course to take,—a process implied in the τί ποιῶ at v. 3.

— μετασταθῶ] Μισθίασθαι is often used of ‘removal from office.’ With the expression δέχονται εἰς τοὺς οἴκους αὐτῶν we may compare Arrian Epict. iii. 26, εἰς οἶκόν σου δέξασθαι. Here, as in that passage, it is to be understood not only of hospitable entertainment, but also (from the adjunct) of that kind attention and support, to which eminent benefactors are justly entitled from those whom they have served: what we express by having a claim upon any one. The word δέξ. may, as Kuinoel directs, be taken impersonally; but on account of the αὐτῶν following, it is better to supply ἀνθρώποις from the subject matter; since there seems to be a reference to certain persons in the mind of the steward,—namely, his master’s debtors.

5. ἔλεγε τῷ πρώτῳ] Two cases are specified, as a sample of what was said to all.

6. δέξαι σου τὸ γράμμα, &c.] There has been no little debate as to the sense of γράμμα, &c. The almost invariable opinion of Commentators, ancient and modern, is that it signifies a bond, or engagement; of which sense four examples are adduced by Kypke from Josephus and Libanius. And Grotius has proved that γράμμα, like the Latin littera, had the signification both of syngrapha or chirographa, and of cautio. These bonds, he shows, were kept in the hands of the steward. According to the explanation given by Dr. Mackn. the γράμμα denotes a contract (probably on lease) for rent. The common interpretation, however, may be, and, I think, ought to be united with this, in order to express the true sense. These γράμματα were, it should seem, both bonds for the payment of a certain rent, and also contracts. And Grotius has shown that γράμματα in this sense was synonymous with συμβόλαια and συνθήκαι. Those who took land were, we may suppose, required, previously to occupancy, to sign an engagement, binding them to pay as rent a certain portion of the produce to the proprietor. This was, no doubt, countersigned by the proprietor, or his steward, accompanied with an acceptance of the rent (thus ratifying the contract), of which document a copy, also signed by the steward, was given to the occupier for his security. Thus the γράμμα being both a bond and a contract, a permanent and binding alteration of that contract for a less amount would be permanently beneficial to the χρεωφειλῆται, and consequently confer on them a lasting obligation.

For τὸ γράμμα, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read τὰ γράμματα, from B, D, L, and the Ital. Vers.; and Alf. regards the text. rec. as a correction, because but one sum is mentioned. But that such a correction should have crept into all the MSS. but three, and the Psch. Syr., is incredible. It is quite clear that τὰ γράμματα was a critical alteration founded on the Latin copies, which have littera, but in a singular sense, for a writing, γραμματίον, as some copies read by a gloss.

8. ὁ κύριος] i. e. ‘the lord, or master of the steward.’

— ἐπήνεσε] ‘commended him,’ not for his fraud, but (besides his prudence in securing his future subsistence) for the shrewdness with which he had contrived it. So in Ter. Heaut. iii. 2. 26, Chremes thus justifies his praise of a knavish servant: ‘In loco ego verò laudo.’ Τὸν οἶκον τῆς ἀδικίας is put, by Hebraism, for τὸν οἶκον τὸν ἀδικον, ‘the fraudulent steward.’

— ὅτι οἱ υἱοί, &c.] These are evidently the words, not of the master, but of Christ, suggesting an important admonition. The force of the expressions υἱοὶ τοῦ αἵματος τούτου and υἱοὶ τοῦ φωτὸς is fully discussed by Bp. Sanderson in a Sermon on this text, and by Mr. Greswell. The words εἰς τὴν γενεὰν admit of various explanations, and accordingly have been diversely interpreted. Many take εἰς τὴν γ. for ἐν τῇ γενεᾷ; assigning various metaphorical senses to γενεᾷ. But in the case of a difficult and disputed expression like the present, it is best to keep as close as possible to the obvious construction, and the natural and usual sense of terms. Now to discern the force of εἰς τὴν γενεάν, we must consider its purpose, which, as Bp. Sanderson and Mr. Greswell point out, is that of limitation or ‘qualification.’ ‘The children of this world,’ observes Mr. Greswell, ‘are not affirmed to be superior to the children of light in the possession of the faculty of worldly prudence, the providently adapting means to an end (for such is the force of the expression φρον.), but in the use of it, and that with a view to a special purpose,—namely, unto, or for, their own generation.’

9. Having (as in Luke xviii. 6) taken occasion, from an example of wrong action, to excite his disciples to right, Christ now proceeds to urge on them the weighty consideration which follows.

† ἐκλείπητε, δέξωνται ὑμᾶς εἰς τὰς αἰωνίους σκηνάς. 10 ὁ ^cInfra 19.
πιστὸς ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ, καὶ ἐν πολλῷ πιστὸς ἐστὶ καὶ ὁ ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ ἀδικός, καὶ ἐν πολλῷ ἀδικός ἐστιν. 11 Εἰ οὖν ἐν τῷ ἀδίκῳ μαμωνᾷ πιστοὶ οὐκ ἐγένεσθε, τὸ ἀληθινὸν τίς ὑμῖν πιστεύ-σει; 12 καὶ εἰ ἐν τῷ ἀλλοτρίῳ πιστοὶ οὐκ ἐγένεσθε, τὸ ὑμέτερον

— ποιήσατε ἑαυτοῖς φίλους, &c.] Of these words there is no little diversity of interpretation. The expression μαμωνᾶ τῆς ἀδ. is evidently put for μαμωνᾶ ἀδίκου, by Hebraism. Yet the force of the epithet is by no means so obvious. Some take it to denote 'riches acquired by injustice.' Such a sense, however, cannot be admitted here, since it would involve a doctrine unworthy of the Gospel. It is best to take ἀδικ. as being opposed to ἀληθινός at ver. 11, in the sense false, inconstant, unstable; of which sense many examples are adduced by Commentators from the Sept., the Classical writers, and the New Testament.

That such must at any rate be the sense here, is manifest from the antithesis between ἀδικ. and ἀλθ. 'Since,' as Mr. Greswell observes, 'the same subject is spoken of in each of these instances, it follows that the unjust mammon must simply be the false mammon, as the true mammon must simply be the just and righteous mammon.'

At ἐκλείπητε there is an ellipsis of τὸν βίον, which is generally expressed in the Classical writers, though in the Sept. always omitted. With respect to the persons meant in δέξωνται, many Commentators, ancient and modern, understand the angels appointed to receive departed spirits. A view countenanced by Matt. xxiv. 31, supra vi. 38, and especially xii. 20, τὴν ψυχὴν σου ἀπαιτοῦσιν ἀπὸ σοῦ. Yet there the ἀπαιτοῦσι may be taken as an impersonal (as indeed almost all recent Commentators take δέξωνται in the present passage; q. d. 'that ye may be received'), but not here, since it savours of 'a device for the nonce,' to avoid a difficulty. As to the subject, it cannot well be the angels, as there is nothing in the context from which such a sense can be drawn. It is better to refer it, notwithstanding the harshness, to φίλοι, meaning those whom they have made friends by alms-deeds and works of beneficence; and who, in return, will justly hail their approach to the heavenly habitations.

In αἰωνίους σκηνάς (with which compare 2 Esdr. ii. 11, δώσω αὐτοῖς αἰωνίας σκηνάς) there is meant to be an opposition,—namely, of solid and lasting houses ('not made with hands'), to the temporary and frail tents of this world. A term which (as Bp. Jebb, Sac. Litt. 250, well observes) "forcibly calls up the recollection, that here we have no abiding habitation, and which may serve to impress the conviction, that in heaven God imparts his own eternity to things which in themselves might naturally be accounted void of duration, as 'the cottage of a night.'"

As to the readings ἐκλείπῃ or ἐκλείπη, adopted by Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from 5 uncials, but few or no cursives (and I can only add 3 Lamb. and Mss. copies), it is very specious, but is probably only a critical correction of those who did not comprehend the force of the term (as was also the case with the transcript, the Ital. and Syr. Versions), though even thus the difficulty is only shifted, by referring ἐκλ. to the 'true riches' of the preceding context. Besides, there is no proof that ἐκλ. can be so applied. Whereas, of the sense 'to fail by death,' examples occur in several later Greek writers, as Joseph., Diod. Sic., and Lucian, and often in the Sept. And so the general sense of the passage may well be expressed, with Bp. Lonsdale, thus: 'As the steward used the riches which were for a time in his keeping for the purpose of making himself friends among men, so do ye make such a use of the worldly goods which are entrusted to you for a while, as God's stewards; so that when ye shall be removed from your stewardship, ye may be received, not, like him, into earthly and temporary houses, but into heavenly, even into everlasting habitations, whither they will hail your approach with joy inexpressible.' So Baxter on supr. xv. 7: 'Is there joy in heaven at thy conversion, and will there not be at thy glorification?'

10. ὁ πιστὸς ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ, &c.] An adagial saying, to be understood only of what generally happens, and adverting to the principle on which masters act, who, after proving the fidelity of servants in small matters, at length confide more important business to their care. Our Lord however proceeds, in the next verses, to give it an application as respects the comparative importance of the riches of this world and those of heaven; q. d. 'As he who is faithful in small matters, &c., so he who has misapplied the riches committed to his stewardship,' &c.

11. τίς] Meaning, by implication, no one, q. d. God will not, &c. Τὸ ἀληθινόν, 'the true riches' (i. e. the favour of God, and admission to the mansions of eternal bliss), so called in opposition to the riches of the world, which are but a vain show, and promise what they never perform. See Hor. Epist. ii. 2. 170, and comp. Liban. Or. p. 814, οὐκ ἀγαθὸς τῶν ὡς ἀληθῶς κτημάτων.

12. εἰ ἐν τῷ ἀλλοτρίῳ—δώσει:] Here we have only another mode of expressing the same thing viewed in another light; q. d. 'If you have embezzled or wasted what another gave you in trust, how can he be expected to give you aught in perpetuity?' A similar sentiment, Dr. Owen observes, occurs, but inverted, in the Anthol. Gr. ἔγνω δ' ὅτι οὐκ ἔστι, κακῶς κεχρημένον ἀνδρὰ | τοῖς ἰδοῖς, εἶναι πιστὸν ἐν ἀλλοτρίοις. By τὸ ἀλλοτρίον are meant the goods of this life only; so called because they are, strictly speaking, not our own,—as being transitory and perishable,—but only committed to us as stewards; by τὸ ὑμέτερον the riches of an eternal inheritance in heaven, called our own, because the possession thereof is already secured to us on certain conditions, and will be wholly our own.

13. οὐδεὶς οἰκέτης—καὶ μαμ.] Our Lord, having inculcated on his hearers the duty of being faithful to God, as his servants and stewards, proceeds to warn them that they cannot be thus faithful to him, so long as they strive, at the same time, to serve both him and Mammon; on which sentiment see note on Matt. vi. 24.

14. The foregoing discourse was addressed, indeed, to the disciples; but the ground of it was the covetousness of the Pharisees, who were within hearing, and who, having expressed their contempt of our Lord's doctrine, by marked scorn and derision (lit. 'turning up their noses at him'; see my Lex. in ἐκμυκτήριζω), drew down upon themselves the rebuke couched in the subsequent verse, and paved the way for the deep censure conveyed in the striking parable of the rich man and Lazarus.

15. δικαιούντες ἑαυτοὺς] lit. 'making yourselves appear just,' arrogating to yourselves a virtue and sanctity not really yours; the very opposite to the frank and open confession to God of sin. See xv. 18.

—βδέλυγμα] for βδελυκτόν; abstract for concrete. A sentiment corresponding to that supra xi. 39. With which and the present compare Matt. xxiii. 23, 27. Is. i. 13. Amos v. 21.

16—18. The connexion between these verses and the preceding is but faint; inasmuch that many eminent Expositors think there is none. But surely if there be no connexion between this and the preceding context, as the connective link between vv. 14, 15, and 19, seqq., it would suppose the sacred writer to have introduced this declaration of our Lord entirely out of place, nay, so as to be worse than useless. Let us, however, see how the case stands. The present portion is indeed introduced in a different connexion at Matt. xi. 12, 14; nevertheless, the words might be, and doubtless were, spoken on two different occasions, and with some difference of intent.

Here the purpose seems to have been to stigmatize the hypocrisy of the Pharisees, by showing their grievous failure in the discharge of the moral and relative duties of man to man, even according to the standard of the Law of Moses. It is also intimated that the Law, so far from being abrogated by the Gospel, is rather fulfilled and perfected by it; as, for example (v. 18), in its more rigid enforcement of the seventh commandment.

It also seems to have been our Lord's intent (vv. 17, 18) to draw a tacit contrast between themselves and those whom they so abominated, the Publicans and harlots; so as to intimate the acceptance of the latter, and the rejection of the former; intimating that the Pharisees, notwithstanding their pretensions to peculiar sanctity, had really sunk far below even the comparatively low standard of righteousness established by the Law, and were utterly indisposed to enter the kingdom of God; whereas those who made no pretensions to this righteousness, the ignorant multitude (πάντες), were now with contrite hearts pressing forward to enter (βιάζομενοι εἰς, lit. 'forcing an entrance into') the kingdom of heaven, through the door of the Gospel; making good the converse of the proposition at ver. 15, and showing that persons may be held in abomination among men (so as to be what the Apostle calls 'the obscuring of all things,' 1 Cor. iv. 13), and yet be accepted, nay, be very precious in the sight of God. According to this view, the connexion is well traced by Bp. Lonsdale thus: 'Ye deride me [spurn at my admonitions], as though I had no authority to be your teacher. But I tell you that since the days of John the Baptist the Law and the Prophets have given place to that kingdom of God which is preached by me, and into which persons of every class are eagerly pressing for admittance (v. 16). I tell you also that I am come both to fulfil the design (v. 17), and to exalt the precepts of the law, of which I now give you an instance in the case of divorce.'

19. Having rebuked the covetous Pharisees for their contumeliously setting at nought his

doctrine, our Lord resumes the subject he had been discoursing on (supra 1—13), i. e. the use, and the abuse, of riches; and in the Parable there introduced he comprehends under his representation the main traits of the Pharisees' character, Godless, self-seeking, covetous. The design of our Lord in this Parable was, to impress on the minds of his hearers, by example, the foregoing precepts, as presented in another historical picture, like that with which he introduced the subject. In this he not only gives the substance of what had been previously said by him on the use of riches, but supplies a most impressive warning as to the highly penal consequences of its abuse. In short, the design of our Lord (as Dr. Campbell observes) is 'to admonish us not that a monster of wickedness (such as many Commentators unwarrantably and injudiciously here suppose) shall be severely punished in the other world; but that the man who, though not chargeable with doing much ill, does little or no good, and lives, though not perhaps an intemperate, yet a sensual life; who, careless about the condition of others, exists only for the gratification of himself,—the indulgence of his own appetites, and his own vanity,—shall not escape condign punishment. It is to show the danger of living in the neglect of duties, though not chargeable with the commission of crimes; and particularly to point out the perilous consequence, in woe everlasting, of considering the gifts of Providence as our own property, and not as a trust from our Creator, to be employed in his service, and for which we are accountable to him.' He thus solemnly warns the rich, that if they used the wealth entrusted to them for distribution, only for the indulgence of sensuality, and the gratification of vanity and pride, their portion in a future state could be no other than woe unutterable; while the poor man, whose sufferings they had left unheeded and his wants unrelieved, might exchange his state of destitution and misery in this world for one of rest and felicity in the world to come. It must not be left unobserved that the poor man here represented is one whose character is that of (as his name is meant to suggest, Lazarus = Eleazarus, 'God [is] a help') a God-fearing person. And this may serve to show that the following narrative cannot be, as many eminent Expositors suppose, a real history, but merely a story, or Parable; espec. since all the circumstances are parabolical. Indeed, a story very similar to it occurs in the Babylonian Gemara.

— πορφύραν] 'purple clothing.' The use of purple vestments was originally confined to kings, but had gradually extended itself to the noble and rich, and is still in very general use in most Oriental countries.

— εὐφραϊνόμενος καθ' ἡμέραν λαμπρῶς.] Render: 'enjoying himself sumptuously (i. e. in expensive luxury) day by day,' see supra xii. 19. xv. 23, and notes. Here, however, the expression may have reference to more than food, &c., and (as Greaswell observes) 'extend to every pleasure, satisfaction, and convenience, of dress, gaiety, &c., which wealth can supply, to minister to the daily enjoyment, amusement, and self-satisfaction of a rich voluptuary;' in short, whatever is comprehended in the description of St. John, 1 Ep. ii. 16, ἡ ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκός, καὶ ἡ ἐπιθυμία τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν, καὶ ἡ ἀλαζονεία τοῦ βίου.

20. πτωχός.] Render: not 'a beggar,' but simply 'a poor man,' as the usus loquendi and the contrast require.

— ἐβέβλητο] 'jacebat,' 'was lying,' 'had been laid;' intimating, perhaps, what had been customarily done; but espec. done on a certain occasion, when, his body being diseased and ulcerous, the dogs came and licked his sores.

— ἡλωμένος] 'full of sores' (see my Lex. in v.), as persons of this destitute condition often are (partly from the cutaneous disorders produced by meagre diet and bad living). So a Rabbinical writer (cited by Wets.), 'Rogabatur a mendico quodam ulceroso.'

21. ἐπιθυμ. χορτ. (sc. ἦν): not, for the reasons I have given, 'was glad to be fed,' but 'was desirous of being fed;' a desire which, as would seem from the context, was gratified, and he satisfied. His causing himself to be placed at the rich man's portal was to obtain the usual dole, from the ψιχίων, 'the broken meat,' the fragments and scraps of the domestic meals.—χορταχ. denotes 'to have the hunger satisfied.' This use of πικτ. found also at Matt. xv. 27, of food sent away from table, as not meet for future use, is so rare (being probably an expression of common life), that I know of no other example, except in the maxim of Pythagoras, which enjoined τὰ πίπτοντα ἀπὸ τῆς τραπέζας μὴ ἀναίρεισθαι, i. e. not to gather up the scraps or leavings, but let them alone for the poor. This whole context is well illustrated by a passage of Hom. Od. ρ. 220, Πτωχὸν ἀνιρόν, δαιτῶν ἀπολυμαντήρα, 'Ὅς πολλὰσι φιλῆσι παραστὰς θλίψεται ὄμους, Αἰτίζων ἀκόλους. The second line illustrates the custom above adverted to of mendicants taking their station at a rich man's portal; and the expression denoting continuance there, though homely, is strong and graphic. The first and third lines are illustrated by a kindred passage at the Hymn to Ceres, 115, Αἰτίζων ἀκόλους τε καὶ ἱκβόλα λύματα δαιτός.

— ἀλλὰ καὶ οἱ κύνες, &c.] Render: 'nay, even the dogs used to come and lick his sores.' A circumstance intended to contrast the compassion and sympathy of brutes with the insensibility of the rich man; and to represent the helpless and miserable condition of the poor man (with his sores neither bound up nor mollified with ointment), and consequently the, in some degree, uncharitable neglect of Divs. For though, from the circumstance afterwards introduced of his asking for Lazarus to administer relief to him in his torments, it should seem that he regarded himself, in some measure, as a benefactor to him, in having relieved him with the broken meat from his table; yet he was undoubtedly guilty of the neglect, here intimated, of omitting to make himself acquainted with the miserable condition of Lazarus, so as to, at least, relieve his sufferings, and, if possible, restore him to health and strength.

²² ἀπενεχθῆναι αὐτὸν ὑπὸ τῶν ἀγγ., &c.] Αὐτόν, i. e. his soul. The older Commentators understand these words literally; while the more recent ones take them as a figurative mode of expression, to signify, under imagery accommodated to the opinion of the Jews, the simple idea, that 'Lazarus was removed to a state of supreme felicity in heaven.' The Jews, as it appears from Wetz. and Schoettg., held that the souls of the just were conveyed to the mansions of bliss by angels. So Targum on Cant. iv. 12, 'None but the just can enter Paradise, whither their souls are conveyed by angels.' The same opinion also extended to the Greeks and Romans, who ascribed to Hermes, or Mercurius, the office of ἀγγελοι πομπαῖος as he is called in Soph. Aj. 843. So Hor. Od. i. 10, 17, 'Tu piis letis animas reponis sedibus.' Equally certain is it, that in speaking of this removal to the seats of bliss the Jews expressed it either by being conveyed to Paradise, or, figuratively, by being carried away into Abraham's bosom. So Joseph. de Maccab. § 13, οὕτω γὰρ θανόντας ἡμᾶς Ἀβραάμ καὶ Ἰσαάκ καὶ Ἰακώβ ὑποδέχονται εἰς τοὺς κόλπους αὐτῶν. Kidduschin, fol. 72, 1, 'Ada hodie sedet in sinu Abrahae.' According to this view, the expression, as Bp. Lonsdale observes, is derived from the ancient custom of reclining on couches at meals; and in the subsequent description of departed souls is represented by expressions taken from the condition of men while on earth. However, on more mature consideration, I am inclined rather to acquiesce in the first-mentioned view. And I agree with Mr. Alf., that "it is impossible to suppose that He whose essence is Truth, would have assumed as existing any thing that does not exist. It would destroy the truth of our Lord's saying, if we could conceive him to have used popular language which did not point at the truth." It is obvious how suitable such an office as that in question would be to the benevolent nature of the Angels, to their other employments (see Matt. xiii. 41. Heb. i. 14), and to the circumstances of a departed spirit.

²³ ἐν τῷ ᾄδῃ] The best Expositors are agreed that the term here describes the place of departed souls and disembodied spirits, till the resurrection (see note on Matt. xi. 23, and Acts ii. 27), which the Jews, as well as the Greeks, supposed to be divided into two parts, Paradise and Gehenna, contiguous to each other, but separated by an impassable chasm [Comp. Hor. Carm. ii. 13, 23, 'scedaeque discretas piorum']; so narrow, however, that there was a prospect of one from the other; nay, such that their respective inmates could converse with each other. Thus both the rich man and Lazarus would be equally in Hades, though in different parts.—ἐν βασάνοις may be rendered, 'under torture,' not that of eternal condemnation, namely, such as was suited to the τάρταρος, or prison of Hades, called Tartarus (where spirits are reserved for judgment, see 2 Pet. ii. 4), but, properly speaking, not Gehenna, the lake of fire, the second death; see Rev. xx. 14.

This parabolical representation is, indeed, accommodated to Jewish ideas, and the invisible state is described by images derived from the senses. But it is going much too far to say, with Dr. Jortin (in D'Oyly and Mant), that 'we are only to infer from hence the doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments.' It must surely be concluded from hence that there is an intermediate state before the general resurrection; since that is far too prominent a feature of the representation to be numbered with circumstances merely ornamental. On which subject see Mr. Greswell.

ἐν τῇ ζωῇ σου, καὶ Δάζαρος ὁμοίως τὰ κακά· νῦν δὲ † ὁδε παρακαλεῖται, σὺ δὲ ὀδυνᾷσαι. ²⁶ Καὶ ἐπὶ πᾶσι τούτοις, μεταξὺ ἡμῶν καὶ ὑμῶν χάσμα μέγα ἐστήρικται ὅπως οἱ θέλοντες διαβῆναι ἔνθεν πρὸς ὑμᾶς μὴ δύνωνται, μηδὲ οἱ ἐκείθεν πρὸς ἡμᾶς διαπερῶσιν. ²⁷ Εἶπε δὲ Ἐρωτῶ οὖν σε, πάτερ, ἵνα πέμψῃς αὐτὸν εἰς τὸν οἶκον τοῦ πατρός μου ²⁸ ἔχω γὰρ πέντε ἀδελφοὺς· ὅπως διαμαρτύρηται αὐτοῖς, ἵνα μὴ καὶ αὐτοὶ ἔλθωσιν εἰς τὸν τόπον τοῦτον τῆς βασιάνου. ²⁹ Λέγει αὐτῷ Ἀβραάμ· Ἐχουσι ^m ^{Isa. 8. 20.} ⁿ ^{Isa. 24. 16.} ^{John 8. 30.} ^{Acts 15. 21.} ^{† 17. 11.} Μωϋσέα καὶ τοὺς προφῆτας· ἀκουσάτωσαν αὐτῶν. ³⁰ Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν· Οὐχί, πάτερ Ἀβραάμ· ἀλλ' ἐάν τις ἀπὸ νεκρῶν πορευθῇ

Ἀπίλαβει here has the very same force as ἀπίχεται in Luke vi. 24, and ἀπίχουσι in Matt. v. 16. vi. 2, where see notes.

— ὁδε παρακαλ.] On further consideration I am inclined to prefer as genuine, and, were there more external authority, would adopt, the reading ὁδε, edited by Matth., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., which is supported by considerable external authority (having place, I find, in all the Lamb. and several Mus. MSS.), further confirmed by internal evidence of the strongest kind, as also by, I believe, all the ancient Versions; for though the Vulg. has hic, no reason is there why it should not be regarded as the adverb 'hic' for hæc, i. e. in this place, with a slight emphasis pointing to the idea of rest and delight, forming the opposite to that of unrest and agony. Nothing is more likely than that the 'hic' of Jerome should be taken for the pronoun, since the ille would seem to require it; though the opposition is, as we see, one rather of place, or condition, than of person.

— As respects ὀδυνᾷσαι, it was probably not merely an Alexandrian, but a common Greek form (like καυχᾷσαι in Rom. ii. 17, 23. 1 Cor. iv. 7, and other verbs, which see instanced in Lobeck on Phryn., p. 360), and from that source St. Luke and St. Paul probably derived their use of the idiom. As to the σὺ cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. on strong external, confirmed by internal, evidence, I cannot consent to part with it; since thus the main point of the passage as to the sad contrast is almost destroyed. And that a complete contrast was here intended is highly probable, and may be inferred from the use of νῦν δὲ as opposed to ἐν τῇ ζωῇ σου. The true force of the pronoun, and how easily it might be lost by the carelessness of scribes, will appear from note on John iv. 19.

ἰστηρίχθη) ἐν τῇ γῇ, and Hom. Il. xi. 28. The force of the expression here seems to allude to an irreversible decree which rendered it impossible for Abraham to comply with his request.

— ἔνθεν] This (for the common reading ἐνταῦθεν) is found in many MSS., including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and the Ed. Princ. and has been rightly adopted by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz, as being agreeable to later Grecism. The word is found, indeed, in Hom. Il. xiii. 13. Thucyd. vii. 81, and Xenophon; and had probably always prevailed in the common dialect; though, in the more refined diction of books, ἐνταῦθεν was early substituted.

²⁸. διαμαρτύρηται] 'may warn and admonish,' by bearing witness to them of the consequences of a worldly and carnal life.

— τῆς βασιάνου] To here render 'of torment,' is passing over the article, which, I have pointed out, whenever it is used (which, however, is very rare) in conjunction with βάσανου, always has its force, though that force may be difficult to be expressed in translation. No where does ἡ βάσανου signify simply a torture or a torment. Nor is this, I apprehend, the case here, the full sense of the clause being, 'in order that they too may not come into this (well-known) place of the torture or torment,' meaning a place where the torture or torment by way of punishment is being administered. This view of the sense derives confirmation from the reading of Cod. 235, which has εἰς τὸν τόπον τῆς βασιάνου ταύτης, evidently a mere alteration for the purpose of introducing a plainer form of expression, yet one proceeding on a correct view of the sense intended.

— εἰάν τις ἀπὸ νεκρῶν, &c.] Render, 'if one risen from the dead should go to them, they would repent;' reform, by a total change of life and conversation; q. d. 'him they would surely listen to, since from him at least they would expect to hear the truth, because he could have no motive to deceive.' So Artemid. Oneir. ii. 74, lays it down as an incontestable truth: τῶν ἀξιολύτων εἰσὶν οἱ νεκροί, ἐπεὶ πάντως ἀληθεύουσι. The participle ἀναστῆς is to be supplied from the context, as especially inherent in the ἀναστῇ in the next verse. The supplementum borne out by the authority of the Syr., Pera., and Vulg. Versions, and also confirmed by Chrysost.

31. εἰ Μωϋσέως, &c.] q. d. 'Occasions of repentance and newness of life are not wanting to them.' If, therefore, they will not embrace these, not even miracles could move their perverse and stubborn wills. And no wonder; for, as Mr. Greswell justly observes, if men violate their sense of duty under a sufficient degree of light, they will not be restrained from violating it under any degree of light; see John xii. 10, 11.

— There is much force in the term πεισθήσονται, which must not be understood of moral reformation; but of faith, such as might work repentance (so Acts xvii. 4. Heb. xi. 13). And this is called for by the allusion here to the case of the Chief Priests and Pharisees, who, as Bp. Lonsdale observes, 'were not persuaded (see John xi. 46—57. xii. 9—11) to receive Jesus as their Messiah (to have faith in him as such), either by seeing Lazarus after his resurrection from the grave, or by the resurrection of our Lord himself, of which they had full assurance given to them by those who saw him for a long time after his resurrection.'

XVII. In this Chapter are recorded various detached heads of discourses delivered by our Lord on various occasions, and most of them further enlarged on, on occasions not stated by Luke, but more particularly treated on in Matthew's Gospel, and the other parallel portions indicated in the margin. However, in the first verses there seems to be a continuation of the discourse in the last Chapter.

1. ἀνένδεκτόν ἐστι] for οὐκ ἐνδέχεται, which occurs supra xiii. 33, and denotes what necessarily must happen from the condition of man; see note on Matt. xviii. 7. The τοῦ inserted before μὴ ἐλθεῖν, from many MSS., including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, Fathers, and early Editions, by all the recent Editors, is probably genuine, being quite agreeable to the usage of the Evangelist. The σκάνδαλα here adverted to probably allude to the offence taken by the Pharisees, who had gone away in disgust at our Lord's language used of them.

3. προσέχετε ἑαυτοῖς] This may be referred either to what precedes, or to what follows. The former view, however, is greatly preferable, since this solemn form of warning (like that elsewhere, ὁ ἔχων οὗτ' ἀκούειν, ἀκούτω) is most suitable to what has just preceded. The δὲ, too, a little after, which seems to mark the transition to a new subject, rather shows that the words belong to the preceding. I mean not to say that the form in question might not introduce an injunction; for it sometimes does, yet never with a δὲ after προσέχετε, which would here be so unsuitable, that it was, as we find from the MSS., cancelled by some ancient Critics (who joined the formula with the words following), or changed to γάρ. It is strange they should not have seen the force of the Asyndeton. This view of the reference is confirmed by the suffrage of the best Expositors, ancient and modern. And although Luke has brought forward in this Chapter several heads of discourses, there is no reason why he should not have chosen to subjoin the solemn warning couched in προσέχετε ἑαυτοῖς to one of those heads; especially to that one which is couched in expressions of the most indescribably awful import. In short, this peculiar form, προσέχετε ἑαυτοῖς, put, as here, for ὁ ἔχων οὗτ' ἀκούειν, ἀκούτω, is hardly suitable except to a former context; and the latter formula is always so put in the Greek Testament, with the exception of about four passages of the Apocalypse, where it is made to introduce some solemn injunction, and that its nature may admit of, but not so well, προσέχετε ἑαυτοῖς. Comp. Luke xvii. 32, μνημονεύετε τῆς γυναικὸς Δάρ.

4. The ἐπὶ σὲ after ἐπιστρέψῃ, not found in very many MSS., Versions, and Fathers, is cancelled by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, Tittman, Vater, and Scholz. Yet the evidence for it is so strong, that it is more probable the words were omitted by some overnice Critic, to remove what seemed an inelegant repetition, than that it should have been brought in to complete the sense. Such sort of tautology as this strengthens the sense, and is found in the best writers. The Editors have chiefly been induced to cancel the words, as thinking that the existence of two readings, ἐπὶ αὐτῇ and ἐπὶ τῇ, showed that both were from the margin. But to that, as well as most other Critical canons, there are exceptions. And one is, where a phrase or clause is such as the Critics, from over-fastidiousness, would be likely to stumble at and alter. For, in such a case, there may be several ways by which the alleged imperfection might be removed, which may all be resorted to by the Critics. And yet that will not prove that the readings are all alike not genuine. Certainly, the existence of the words in the Pesch. Syr. Version attests their high antiquity. [Comp. Matt. xviii. 21.]

⁵ προσθεῖς ἡμῖν πίστιν 'increase faith in us,' equiv. to 'add to our faith,' 'give us more faith.' Comp. the phrase ἐλπὶδα προσθεῖναι τινι, 'to increase any one's hope.' The exact sense, however, will depend on the connexion. The question is, whether we are to consider this request as standing with the preceding, or as an independent and detached narrative, like very many in this Gospel. If we take the former view, we may suppose the increase of faith to have been entreated for the purpose of comprehending the nature and extent of the duty of forgiveness enjoined in the preceding verse, or as if faith in the Divine mercy and truth was the only principle on which it could proceed; see Whitby and Scott. If we adopt the latter view we must suppose, with the most eminent Expositors, from Calvin to Kuinoel, that there is no connexion with the preceding, but rather with what is recorded at Matt. xvii. 19, 20, the general sentiment being, that if they had the least measure of true faith already, they would be able to do all things possible, nay, even to human power impossible. But in this there is something unsatisfactory; so that the harshness involved in the application of the former view here may be thought preferable. Be that as it may, the petition of the Apostles to Christ shows (as Bp. Lonsdale observes) that they regarded him as possessing a power over their minds, which could not belong to a mere man.

— ἐκριζώθητι καὶ φυτ. ἐν τῇ θαλάσσῃ] A sort of proverbial mode of expressing a physical impossibility, and consequently not to be effected without a miracle. So Petronius, 134, cited by Wetstein, 'His ergo callens artibus Idæo frutices in gurgite sistam.'

^{7—10} Expositors are not agreed whether this section has any connexion with the foregoing portion, or whether it has reference to some other occasion than what is treated on here. Those who adopt the former view trace a connexion, but not without violence in drawing it, and harshness when drawn. Mr. Alford's method is very ingenious, and indeed specious, but liable to the fore-mentioned objection. It is only effected by arbitrarily supplying out of the context—to found the doctrine on,—'Ye are servants of your Master;' and then supplying as a link in the chain of connexion, 'and therefore endurance is faith and trust,' &c. But no dependence can be placed on any sense so wrong from the context. Accordingly the latter mode is far preferable. The doctrine here inculcated is well expressed by Bp. Lonsdale thus, 'that as a master commands his servant to go on, throughout the day, from one kind of work to another, and yet considers himself under no obligation to him for all that he has done, so we, to whose unceasing services God has a far greater right than any man can have to the services of another, must acknowledge that, however constantly we may have kept his commandments, we are but servants who have brought him no profit; and who, having done only what we were bound to do, have not thereby made him our debtor;' in short, that the rewards held out to Christians' obedience are not of merit, but purely of grace. For ἀνάπεσαι, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἀνάπαισαι, from most of the uncial and several cursive MSS.; to which I can add most of the Lamb., and not a few Mus. copies. The case is exactly the same as supra xiv. 10, but with somewhat authority here. Ἀνάπαισαι is probably, but not certainly, the genuine reading in both passages, since it may be only a critical correction of an Hellenistic idiom; for the Imper. Middl. does not, I think, occur in the pure Greek Class. writers. Whichever reading be adopted, εὐθέως must be construed with it.

⁹ μὴ χάριν ἔχει-δοκῶ.] Our Lord is not speaking of what should be, but what ordinarily is done and approved; and in so speaking he merely adverts to the relation which, if right, subsists between man and Him, whose he is, and whom he serves. The αὐτῷ has been, as destitute of authority, rejected by all Editors from Bengel downwards. As to the οὐ δοκῶ, it has been bracketed by Lachm., and cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., who regard it as supplementary. It may be so; but the evidence that it is quite insufficient—only 3 uncial and 5 cursive MSS.; to which I can add nothing from the Lamb. and

Mus. copies. As to the 2 MSS. alleged of the Ital. Vers., they are as nothing compared to the Pesch. Syr. Version. Internal evidence is not, as may be supposed, against it; since it may in so few MSS. have been omitted by accident, or passed over as unintelligible, because written, as I find it in some Lamb. and Mus. MSS., οὐδοκῶ. It was not likely to be brought in by the Revisers of text to supply what was thought wanting, since the expression was not likely to be known to such persons; it being so rare, that I have found only one example, which occurs in Plat. p. 554, and even there in answer to a question. The nearest approach to it is in the use of δοκῶ without the οὐ in Æsch. Prom. 289, and δοκῶμεν in several passages of Euripides and Sophocles. It was most probably removed by critics, who thought that as the interrogative with μή implies a strong negation, it was unnecessary as well as unclassical. The best rendering of the phrase will be, 'Nay, I trow,' equiv. to the Latin non puto. That it came from St. Luke we cannot doubt; especially since it has, like several others in his Gospel, a semblance of Latinism.

10. οὕτω καὶ ὑμεῖς — πεποιήκαμεν] Here the scope of the Parable is pointed by a forcible application to ourselves, showing the utter unfoundedness of our claim of merit, namely, for the reason subjoined, ὅτι δ' ὠφείλομεν ποιῆσαι, πεποιήκαμεν (supply μόνον), since, as Seneca says (Contr. ii. 13), 'non est beneficium, sed officium, facere quod debeas.' It is scarcely necessary to say, that the case supposed involves an argumentum a fortiori.

11—19. Healing of ten lepers. At what particular time and place, on the last journey to Jerusalem, this occurrence took place, we are not enabled to say. The only way of satisfactorily accounting for the mention of Samaria before Galilee (contrary to the true geographical position), is to suppose with many eminent Expositors (what I have fully proved in the parallel passages of Matth. and Mark), that our Lord did not proceed by the direct way (namely, through Samaria) to Jerusalem; but that, upon coming to the confines of Samaria and Galilee, he diverged to the East; so as to have Samaria on the right, and Galilee on the left. Thus he seems to have passed the Jordan at Scythopolis (where there was a bridge), and to have descended along the left bank, on the Persian side, until he again crossed the river, when he came opposite to Jericho. The reason which induced him to take this circuitous route, was probably to avoid any molestation from the Samaritans, and at the same time to impart to a greater number of Jews the benefits of his Gospel.

14. πορευθέντες ἐπιδείξατε τ. 1.] This gracious direction contained (like the 'Go in peace') an implied assurance that they should be healed. — Tois ἱερεῦσι is either to be taken in a collective sense; or rather, we may suppose, the priests of both Jews and Samaritans, as each person belonged to one or the other nation. The reason for sending them to the priests was, that there might thus be a public attestation of the miracle, and that they might again be received into society. See note on Matt. viii. 4.

15. μετὰ φωνῆς μεγάλης δοξάζων τὸν Θεόν] An Hebraistic mode of speaking, equiv. to δόξαν δοῦναι τῷ Θεῷ, infra v. 18, signifying to publicly proclaim and celebrate with praises the mercy and benignity of God, as evinced in some signal benefit to the person (as also in Matt. ix. 8, Luke v. 25. xiii. 13. xxiii. 43), probably expressed in some such words as those at Pa. xxx. 1—3.

17. ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ ὁ Ἰ. εἶπεν] This should not be rendered 'answered and said' (for no previous question had preceded), nor, as it is by Wakef. and Campb. (after the Arabic and Persic Versions), simply 'said.' This being one of those cases in which ἀποκρίβ. (after the model of the Hebr. תָּעַן) is used at the beginning of a speech where there is no reply to any foregoing interrogation. Of this, see examples in my Lex. N. T. in v. In such cases the true sense intended is simply that of addressing, which elsewhere has place where the words of the address are interrogative, e. g. Mark x. 51. ix. 19. xii. 35. Luke xiv. 3. Acts iii. 12, and viii. 34. Rev. vii. 13, in which case the persons addressed are almost always specified; which, however, is not the case δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν Οὐχὶ οἱ δέκα ἐκαθαρίσθησαν; οἱ δὲ ἐννέα ποῦ; ¹⁸ Οὐχ εὐρέθησαν ὑποστρέφοντες δοῦναι δόξαν τῷ Θεῷ, εἰ μὴ ὁ ἀλλογενὴς οὗτος. ¹⁹ Καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ Ἀναστάς ^{1 Matt. 9. 22. Mark 5. 34. & 10. 52. supra 7. 50. & 8. 48. infra 18. 12.} παρεῖναι ἡ πίστις σου σέσωκέ σε.

here, nor at Mark xii. 35. But there the persons addressed may be collected from διδασκῶν ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ, viz. the bystanders who had come thither for instruction. Here, however, there is nothing expressed from which we can determine the persons addressed; though, from the circumstances of the case, we may suppose it to be the bystand-ing Apostles and disciples who accompanied our Lord in his journey.

¹⁹ ἡ πίστις σου σέσωκέ] Namely, because it was a saving faith. The other nine had indeed a faith in Jesus (otherwise they would not have been healed), such a faith as was sufficient to fully persuade them of the power of Jesus to heal, but not sufficient grace of heart to give grateful thanks to God for his unspeakable gift. And as to the one, perhaps Jesus thus addressed him in order that even his faith (which had already saved his body) might thus be so confirmed as in the end to produce faith unto salvation of soul.

^{20—37}. In this discourse we have, as Alford remarks, several sayings which our Lord afterwards repeated in his last prophetic discourse to the four Apostles on Mount Olivet; yet there is here much matter—and that highly important—peculiar to Luke.

²⁰, ²¹. When the Pharisees (prob. with an evil purpose of entrapping our Lord in his words) propound to him the question, 'When the kingdom of God (that which they expected their Messiah would set up among them with worldly pomp of power and splendour) is to come (ἔρχεται),' our Lord, instead of gratifying their curiosity, was pleased so to answer, as to correct their false notions respecting the Messiah's true advent and kingdom upon earth, telling them, 'it is not to come μετὰ παρατηρήσεως, meaning 'with any thing connected with close watching for,' so as to anticipate its approach,—any sign, or portent, whereby its approach may be traced out by attentive looking for it, so that all men might say, 'It is here, or, 'It is there.' The sense of ἐντὸς ὑμῶν might be 'within you,' 'in your hearts,' i. e. spiritual, as opposed to temporal. Comp. Rom. xiv. 17. But this is so unsuitable to the context, and to the case of the persons addressed, that it is far better to take it as put for ἐν ὑμῖν = 'among you.'

²². There is here a transition in subject, with the change of the persons addressed,—namely, from the Pharisees to the disciples; though the saying is taken up from the preceding ἐντὸς ὑμῶν ἔστω. The character of the address is prophetic, and suggested by 'the kingdom of God' just before; q. d. 'He of whom you ask, the Son of Man, is among you, now; but only for a short time, to be succeeded by a long period of removal from his presence, by, as it were, an eclipse of the Sun of Righteousness, involving darkness and woe ineffable,'—until at length they would ultimately see his power manifestly but fearfully revealed. The general sense may be thus expressed: 'The time shall arrive when ye will with deep sorrow regret me, when ye can no longer behold me, and shall long for even the smallest portion of that intercourse which you now continually enjoy with me.' It is intimated, that so great will be the calamities of the times shortly to supervene, that the Jews will desire to enjoy the comparatively peaceful days they enjoyed when the Messiah was with them (see Matt. ix. 15), but in vain; they shall not see one such day, nor any day of deliverance; while the expectations of the multitude will be mocked by the successive appearances of false Christs; whom they themselves are warned to avoid and beware of. The remaining predictions are such as we find recorded in the parallel portions of Matt. xxiv. 23—28, and 37—41, where see the notes; and comp. Matt. xxiv. 13, and 19—22.

²⁴. See note on Matt. xxiv. 27.

²⁵. The words of this verse are, as Mr. Greswell says, parenthetic, and not connected with the prophecy before and after. With this intimation compare the more plainly expressed assurances at Matt. xvi. 21. Mark viii. 31, and supra ix. 22, 26.

28. The words ἡγόραζον, ἐπώλουν, ἐφύτευον, and ὠκοδόμουν, implying a pursuit of the ordinary occupations of worldly existence, are, in the case of Lot and Sodom, not found in the passage of Matthew, though subjoined in the present, and not unsuitably as regards what was probably a rich commercial city, and, like Petra, afterwards the great dépot of the merchandize of the East conveyed to the West, and the contrary. This well illustrates the force of the expressions ἡγόραζον and ἐπώλουν. The inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah doubtless bought from the East, and sold to the West, being then probably the great medium of communication between both. The terms ἐφύτευον and ὠκοδόμουν are not less suitable; for the rich merchants would buy lands and estates up and down in the rich plain of Sodom, planting the ground, where necessary, with various fruit-trees, for the supply of the large cities of the plain or of Syria, and building villas for their country residences, —exactly as Horace frequently describes the rich inhabitants of Rome as doing.

29. ἔβρεξε] Supply Θεός, which is expressed in Gen. xix. 24. Πῦρ denotes 'lightning;' and such is the proper sign of θεῖον, i. e. divine fire. Thus places struck with lightning were said to be θεῖα, and were separated from human use. Since, however, in such places there are (to use the words of Lucret. vi. 219) 'inusta vapore Signa notæque, graves halantes sulphuris auras;' and since lightning has a sulphureous smell, hence the word came to be used for sulphur, as here and in Apoc. xiv. 10. xix. 20. Therefore by πῦρ καὶ θεῖον is meant, by Hendiad., 'a sulphureous fire,' such as proceeds from lightning, by which it seems the whole country of Sodom and Gomorrah, a tract we have good reason to believe whose soil was full of bitumen and pools of naphtha. But bitumen and naphtha are among the most combustible of substances; so that when the overwhelming flames originating in the lightning had ranged far and wide, the globarum compages being destroyed, the whole tract gradually subsided, and the sock from the adjacent parts settling into it, it presented the appearance, first of a marsh, and then of a low stagnant pool, gradually enlarging into the present Lake of the Dead Sea.

32. μνημ. τῆς γ. A.] These words, for the reasons which will appear from my note on Luke xvii. 3, ought not to have been made a separate verse, since what is here said is closely connected with the matter at v. 31, as is well pointed out in the annotation here of Matthew Henry. I have now pointed accordingly. Whatever may be the view taken of the occurrence in question —whether Lot's wife was literally turned to a pillar of salt, or, as many recent Commentators say, figuratively so, by being suffocated, and the corpse indurated by the saluginous vapour—the warning is equally forcible against the sin of disregarding these awful predictions, and moreover against a love of the world, or other carnal dispositions.

34. 35. So great is the variation of reading in the MSS. (the Lamb. ones as well as the Mus.) as respects the words ὁ ἢ, ἡ μία, and μία, that most difficult is it to form a text on sure grounds. I should not hesitate to retain both the ὁ and the ἢ (for they must both either be retained or both expunged, there being no difference in the cases, and external authority being decidedly in favour of ὁ and ἢ) could I bring myself to think the criterion, which Bp. Middl. adduces, here and in his note on Matt. vi. 24, as founded on the proprietas linguae Græcæ, a safe one to adopt, when applied to writers like the Evangelists. But that, I apprehend, is not the case; and therefore I would now place the words in angle brackets.

36. This verse, absent from a great number of the best MSS., including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and some Versions, is cancelled by almost all recent Editors, as an interpolation from the passage of Matthew. But as it is found in most of the MSS., and almost every Version of antiquity and credit, it may be genuine, and only omitted accidentally, 'propter homoteleuton.'

ται ἐν τῷ ἁγρῷ· ὁ εἰς παραληφθήσεται, καὶ ὁ ἕτερος ἀφεθήσεται.] ³⁷ Καὶ ἀποκριθέντες λέγουσιν αὐτῷ· Πού, Κύριε; ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· ¹ Ὅπου τὸ σῶμα, ἐκεῖ συναχθήσονται οἱ αἱετοί. ² ^{Matt. 24. 28.} ³ Ἐλεγε δὲ καὶ παραβολὴν αὐτοῖς πρὸς τὸ δεῖν πάντοτε προσεύχεσθαι, καὶ μὴ ἐκκακεῖν, ² λέγων· Κριτὴς τις ἦν ἐν τινὶ πόλει τὸν Θεὸν μὴ φοβούμενος, καὶ ἄνθρωπον μὴ ἐντρέπόμενος. ³ Χήρα δὲ [τις] ἦν ἐν τῇ πόλει ἐκείνῃ, καὶ ἤρχετο πρὸς αὐτὸν, λέγουσα· Ἐκδικήσόν με ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀντιδίκου μου. ⁴ Καὶ οὐκ ἠθέλησεν ἐπὶ χρόνον μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα εἶπεν ἐν ἑαυτῷ· Εἰ καὶ τὸν Θεὸν οὐ φοβοῦμαι, καὶ ἄνθρωπον οὐκ ἐντρέπομαι, ⁵ διὰ γε τὸ παρέχειν μοι κόπον τὴν χήραν ταύτην, ἐκδικήσω αὐτήν, ἵνα μὴ εἰς τέλος ἐρχομένη ὑπωπιάξῃ με. ⁶ Εἶπε δὲ ὁ

37. πού, Κύριε;] scil. ταῦτα ἵσταται ὡς γινήσεται; i. e. 'where shall these calamitous events take place?' A question likely to arise from the dark phrasing, and awful air, of our Lord's saying, of which the disciples did not perceive the generality. The answer returned could not be direct, but only expressive of a general truth, probably proverbial (comp. Job xxxix. 30); q. d. that where wickedness and impenitence are prevalent, there shall these things take place; since instruments of destruction will never be wanting when the work of destruction is to be accomplished. Whosoever those who are to suffer these things shall be found, thither those who are appointed to inflict them shall be gathered together. See Matt. xxiv. 28, and note. Our Lord, indeed, we may suppose, was not, in all that he then said, understood at the time; but he was afterwards: and therefore these declarations partake of the nature of a prophecy—to be understood completely only by the event, and when they came to be fulfilled.

XVIII. The best Expositors are, with reason, agreed that the first eight verses of this Chapter, on the subject of perseverance in prayer, in the hope of success, form a continuation of the discourse in the last Chapter; as is clear from the resumption at v. 8, of the topic which formed the subject of ch. xvii. 22, fin., the coming of the Son of Man. I have now pointed accordingly. The purpose of the parable which follows it, and evidently arose out of it, was, that the disciples might be excited to constant prayer, with an implicit reliance on the Divine aid;—inasmuch as prayer, patience, and perseverance would be their best support under the trials and tribulations, which must usher in the first advent of the Son of Man at the destruction of Jerusalem; and of not fainting in their minds, though they might not obtain deliverance in answer to their prayers.

1.—8. The unjust judge. Here the argument, as in that of the unjust steward, is one à fortiori; q. d. 'If such be the power of earnest entreaty, even with reference to man, even with reference to one the opposite to benevolent, or God-fearing, how much more will it prevail that right should be ultimately brought about, through the Just and Holy One, in answer to the continued prayer of his faithful people!'

1. πρὸς τὸ δεῖν] i. e. 'respecting its being needful that they (i. e. the disciples) should pray,' &c. See supra ix. 18, and note. Of this sense of πρὸς (denoting reference) with verbs of speaking and writing, an example is adduced by Kypke from Plutarch. Πάντοτε signifies constantly, perseveringly. Ἐκκακεῖν denotes a remissness therein, whether from weariness or despondency. Ἐκκακεῖν and ἀποκακεῖν signify, properly, 'to retire from one's post, from cowardice; and fig., 'to abandon any action or pursuit,' whether from despondency (as Eph. iii. 13. 2 Cor. iv. 1. 16) or weariness, as here and in Gal. vi. 9, τὸ δὲ καλὸν π. μὴ ἐκκακεῖν, and 2 Thess. iii. 13. In all these passages some uncials and a few cursives have ἰγκακ., which is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but it seems to be only a correction of Critics, who adopted a more Class. but less forcible expression.

2. τὸν Θεὸν—ἐντρέπομαι] A proverbial form, expressive of the most unblushing wickedness; of which examples are given by Elsner and Wetstein.

4. εἰ τὸν Θεὸν οὐ φοβ.] The οὐ is to be closely connected with the verb φοβ. (coalescing with it, so as to form one single, but opposite idea to that of the verb itself) which it renders negative, as if οὐ φοβ. had been written. Accordingly one might literally render so as to draw out the whole force of the idiom as follows: 'What though I am a non-fearer of God, and a disregarder of man.' So in Matt. xxvi. 26, we may render: 'It had been good (i. e. better) for that man εἰ οὐκ ἔγεννηθῇ, if he had been [left] unborn,' or unbegotten.

5. εἰς τέλος] An Hellenistic phrase (formed on the Hebr. עַד־עַד) instead of the Classical one διὰ πάντων, and denoting perpetually, as we should say, popularly, for ever. So εἰς is used in a kindred passage of Hdot. iii. 119, ἡ δὲ γυνὴ—φοιτῶσα ἐπὶ τὰς θύρας τοῦ βασιλέως κλαίει καὶ ὠδυνίσκετο ποιεῖσα δὲ αἰ τὴν αὐτὴν, τὸν Δαρῖον ἵππεισε οὐκταίρην μιν.

ὑπωπιάζειν is properly a pugilistic term. It signifies, 1. to bruise any one under the eyes; 2. to bruise generally; 3. to stun any one by dinning in his ears, and, figuratively, to annoy, weary out any one. No certain example of this sense has been adduced from the Classical writers; but it is frequent in the correspondent Latin term obtusare; and, accordingly, this would seem one of the Latinisms which occur here and there in this Gospel.

7. βωόντων is to be understood of earnest supplication. The word is often found in the Classical writers, but only as used of reproach, or of expostulation; which latter may here be included.

— καὶ μακροθυμῶν ἐπ' αὐτοῖς;] If, with most Expositors, we understand μακροθυμῶν in its ordinary sense in the New Test., to denote the long-suffering of God, we must refer the αὐτοῖς to those who aggrieve the righteous. Yet this cannot, without violence, be referred to any other word than to ἐκλεκτοῖς. We must therefore suppose some other sense of μακροθυμῶν. And as the word signifies properly 'to be slow-minded,' it may well denote 'to be slow in avenging or affording them assistance.' Thus we may render, literally, 'though he be long-suffering [as regards the injurious] in their behalf, long in interposing for their succour.' This sense is supported by the authority of the ancient Expositors, Chrysostom and Euthymius, and confirmed by a kindred passage of Ecclesi. xxxii. 18, Sept., καὶ ὁ Κύριος οὐ μὴ βραδύνη, οὐδὲ μὴ μακροθυμήσει ἐπ' αὐτοῖς (scil. τοῖς ταπεινοῖς).

8. πλὴν ὁ Υἱὸς—τὴν πίστιν ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς;] It is observed by Mr. Gresw. (Parab. iv. 234), that "as the whole of this discourse, from xvii. 22, was addressed to the present representatives of the future Hebrew Church, the first Christian community properly so called, and as this mention of the coming of the Son of Man at the end of it is evidently a recurrence to the subject of the discourse from the first, namely, as appears, that special dispensation of redress to the servants, and punishment to the enemies of the Son of Man, in which the believing and the unbelieving part of the Jewish community respectively would be properly concerned; hence by Christ's finding the faith in the land, must certainly be meant primarily in and among the Jews at the time of his coming to the destruction of Jerusalem; q. d. notwithstanding however all has been said,—notwithstanding the promise of an effectual redress in due time,—notwithstanding the gracious encouragement, in particular, to hope that the redress itself, the more it should be needed, and the more it should be desired, the sooner it might be accorded,—would there not yet be reason to doubt whether the day of relief to some, and of visitation to others of the Hebrew community, would find the faith in the land, the Christian religion still maintaining its ground, still active and unimpaired in the faith and constancy of its professors?" To all this I readily accede, but the existence of a reference to the first advent of our Lord will not disprove a concurrent reference to the second and final advent, as alluded to in other parts of the Gospels, e. g. Matt. xxiv. xxv. xxvi., and the parallel portion of Mark and Luke; and, as there, there is throughout always a primary and often a secondary subject carried on, so it may be here. A secondary sense carried on in conjunction with a primary, the subordinate to it, is often found in the prophetic portions of the Old Testament; why not, then, here in a portion of which the character is quite prophetic, since the interrogative form here is equiv. to the declarative, and is only a stronger form of expression? And the recognition of this principle here will, as in the portions just adverted to, afford a clue to guide us through the intricacies of the interpretation. Indeed, Mr. Gresw. himself admits that, though it is not improbable our Lord delivered the above words, principally meant in reference to his coming to the destruction of Jerusalem: yet that he had also in view his coming on another occasion, which would be more literally an advent of the Son of Man, and a state of things upon the earth with respect to his religion, to which the words would be much more literally applicable, viz. his coming in person to the decision of the great antichristian contest,—an event to be preceded by an almost universal apostasy from Christianity, where the religion of the Gospel, founded on faith in the true Christ, was previously in being. But does not this show that the opinion in question is not only not improbable, but next to certain here? And here, as in Matt. xxiv. xxv., the secondary sense is more impressive and deeply important, and consequently to be excluded. However, two modes of interpreting ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς must be adopted, as suited to the two references as above; in the primary, it must be rendered 'in the land,' in the secondary, 'on the earth.' The second mode of rendering is one which has frequently to be adopted both in the New Test. and Sept.; while the first is so unusual, as never to have place in New Test., and very rarely in the Sept., in Gen. xii. 10, ἐγένετο λιμὸς ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς (meaning Canaan),—a circumstance which tends in no small degree to strengthen the high probability of the secondary application. I cannot, however, approve of taking τὴν πίστιν (as does Mr. Gresw.) in the sense the Christian religion; for, although the expression sometimes bears that sense in the Acts of the Apostles, and several times in the Epistles, yet it never has place in the Gospels; and no wonder, since at the period when the Gospels of Matth., Mark, and Luke were written, the faith of Christ had not become established as a system of faith and practice, i. e. a religion. Hence no wonder is it that we read of πίστις understood purely as the principle of faith, i. e. as taken abstractedly, and understood not objectively, but subjectively, i. e. faith as a principle of action. In this very sense, and with this very application to the first and figurative advent of our Lord, I would understand πίστις in Heb. x. 38, ὁ δὲ δίκαιοι ἐκ πίστεως ῥησται, 'but the just shall live,' i. e. be saved, by faith (meaning sure trust), viz. in God; a sentence formed on the Sept. Version of Habak. ii. 4, ὁ δὲ δίκαιοι ἐκ πίστεως μου ῥησται, where πίστις is, as Stuart observes, put as the means of preservation, in opposition to apostasy, or drawing back by defection, in the other part of the verse. The general sense being, that "a persevering faith and trust in Christ will be the means of preservation when the Lord shall come to execute his judgments on the Jewish nation." Finally, as applied to the second advent of Christ our Saviour, ἐν νεφέλαις or ἐπὶ τῶν νεφελῶν (as spoken of in Matt. xxiv. 30. xvi. 64. Mark xiii. 26. Luke xxi. 27. Rev. i. 7), which will be 'with power and great glory,' the term τὴν πίστιν will denote faith in Jesus as the Christ; it is the sense that ἡ πίστις bears in 1 Tim. ix. 1, ἐν τοῖς ὑστέροις χρόνοις ἀποστήσονται τινες τῆς πίστεως. 'H πίστις may here be taken as a noun subst. used in its most abstract sense, which then requires, or, at least, admits, the article. See Bp. Middl. on the Greek Art. ch. v. § 1. Abstract nouns used in their most abstract sense, as in Rom. iv. 14, κακίνωται ἡ πίστις: and x. 8, τὸ ῥῆμα τῆς πίστεως: and 17, ἀρα ἡ πίστις ἐξ ἀκοῆς: and xiv. 1 and xvi. 13. 2 Cor. xiii. 5. Gal. iii. 14. Eph. ii. 8. iii. 17. iv. 29. Phil. i. 23. iii. 9. 2 Thess. iii. 2. James ii. 14, 17, 18, 22, 24, 26. v. 15; and sometimes mutatis mutandis, in the Class. writers. But it is very possible that here, as well as in some other passages, where the article is supposed to be placed by way of imparting to the noun its most abstract sense, it may have the force of reference to some word implied in the context, which would be here αὐτοῦ, 'faith in him,' viz. Jesus; which word is expressed in the frequent forms of expression, ἡ πίστις 'Ἰησοῦ, or Χριστοῦ, or Θεοῦ, as Mark xi. 2. Rom. iii. 22. Gal. ii. 16 bis and 20. iii. 22. Eph. iii. 12: διὰ τῆς πίστεως αὐτοῦ, i. e. 'Ἰησοῦ, James ii. 1. Rev. ii. 13. xiv. 12. It should be borne in mind that the term τὴν πίστιν here admits and indeed requires, an interpretation somewhat different, as it is applied to one or other of the two advents of Christ here adverted to, in this somewhat prophetic intimation. As applied in its primary and more immediately direct sense to the advent of Christ at the destruction of Jerusalem, and the Jewish state, as τῆς γῆς must mean the land, so may τὴν πίστιν denote that faith and patience, constancy and perseverance, which endureth without fainting unto the end.

9. From the necessity of constant prayer, &c., our Lord now turns to the kindred duty of humility, placing before his hearers in the following parable of the Pharisee and the Publican (to use the words of Mr. Greswell) 'a fine moral example, levelled against three capital errors in practical religion, in each of man's threefold relations, to himself, his Maker, and his fellow-creatures: the want of sobriety of judgment in his estimation of himself,—an ignorance or dissimulation of his true moral position in respect to God,—and an equal injustice and uncharitableness in his estimate of others, whose situation in all moral respects is the same with his own.' The parable was, we are told, spoken πρὸς τοὺς πεποιθότας, addressed to, certain of the bystanding multitude, τ. πστ., 'who trusted in themselves as being righteous.' However, when we consider that the verbs following are in the Present tense, it would seem that πστ. is to be taken as a Present of custom; an idiom found in the best Class. writers from Homer downwards, e. gr. Soph. Aj. 761, πίποιθα τοῦτ' ἐπισπάσειν κλῖος. Thus the sense will be, 'He spake this unto (as levelled at) those who trust in themselves as being righteous—rely on their own righteousness [for salvation].'

— ἔξουθεν. lit. 'set utterly at nought' the rest of men (who did not so rely), held them as vile and abominable, see v. 11. Of this use of πειποθ. followed by ἰαυτῶ, I know of no example in the Class. writers; though it is found elsewhere in Script. at 2 Cor. i. 9. x. 7.

10. ὁ εἰς Φαρισαῖος—τελώνης] These two persons may, as Mr. Greswell suggests, be considered, not as individuals, but as representatives of the two classes in question, Pharisees and Publicans. In the same point of view may the prayers of each be considered as a specimen of the prayers used by each class respectively.

11. πρὸς ἑαυτὸν] There has been some doubt whether this should be connected with σταθεῖς, in the sense apart, i. e. 'by himself;' or with προσήχετο. The latter mode can alone be sustained; the former proceeding on a confusion of πρὸς ἑαυτὸν with καθ' ἑαυτὸν. Πρὸς ἑαυτὸν can only denote 'apud sese,' 'with himself,' and is not unfrequently joined with verbs of speaking or thinking; of which examples are adduced by the Commentators, both from the New Test. and the later Class. writers. Wetstein renders it secum tacitus; comparing the Horatian 'labra movet metuens audiri.' The illustration is better than the version; for it is not mental prayer that is here learnt, but secret prayer, when the words are pronounced by the lips, but not so as to be heard by a by-stander. Comp. Aristen. Ep. i. 6, πρὸς ἑαυτὸν ἔφη. Σταθεῖς, considens (with which Valcknaer compares ιστάθῃ ἀφθόγγος from Æschylus and Callimachus) has reference to the posture of prayer among the Jews, which was standing.

— ἄρπαγες, ἄδικοι] Ἀρπαξ denotes one who injures another by force; ἄδικος, one who overreaches him by fraud, or under a semblance of justice.

12. δις τοῦ σαββ.] Namely, on the second and fifth days of the week, as appears from Epiphanius and the Rabbin, cited by Wetstein. On the former, because Moses ascended Mount Sinai on that day; and on the latter, because he then descended on account of the worship paid to the golden calf. By these are to be understood, not public, but private and voluntary fasts. On ἀποδεκ. see note at Matt. xxiii. 23.

13. μακρόθεν ἐστῶς.] Namely, in the court of the Gentiles, if he was a Gentile; or, if a Jew, placed far apart from the Pharisees.

— οὐκ ἤθελεν, &c.] 'could not bring himself to,' &c. See my Lexicon. Schoettgen and Wolf here notice it as a maxim of the Rabbin, that 'he who prays should cast down his eyes, but raise his heart to God;' contrary to the custom of the Greeks and Romans, which was to lift up the eyes and hands in prayer. Yet in this picture of real contrition and genuine humility we must suppose every thing unstudied.

— Ἰλάσθητί μοι.] Render: 'be propitiated, or propitious to me.' On the significancy and propriety of which expression see my Lex. in voc. Though I agree with Mr. Alford, that "we are not here to find [qu. 'seek?'] any doctrinal meanings in the term." We know of only one way in which the prayer could be accomplished; but the words could not have any reference to that.

— μοι τῷ ἁμ.] Wetstein and others, as Grew. and Stier, think that the Article here is emphatical, and used κατ' ἐξοχήν, q. d. 'me the sinner.' But its force is better traced by Bp. Middleton thus: 'Whenever an attributive noun is placed in apposition with a personal pronoun, such attributive has the Article prefixed. Thus in Luke vi. 24, ὑμῖν τοῖς πλουσίοις: xi. 46, ὑμῖν τοῖς νομικοῖς. We have the same form of speech also in Hdot. ix. p. 342, μὲ τὴν ἱκέτιν. Plut. Conv. vii. Sap. p. 95, ἐμὲ τὸν δύστηνον. See also Soph. Elect. 282. Eurip. Ion 348. Aristoph. Av. 5. Acharn. 1154. Eccles. 619. Of the usage in question the ground is sufficiently obvious. The Article here, as elsewhere, marks the assumption of its predicate; and the strict meaning of the publican's prayer is, "Have mercy on me, who am confessedly a sinner;" = "seeing that I am a sinner, have mercy on me." Mr. Alford, however, positively pronounces the Article to be generic. But he has not established that point. I agree with him, that any emphasis here (on the Article) would detract from the solemnity and simplicity of the prayer. But to take the Article as does Bp. Middleton, so far from detracting, adds to the solemnity of the prayer by blending it with that confession of sin, without which pardon could not justifiably be even prayed for.

14. ἡ ἱκέτις.] Most expositors supply μάλα, as Gen. xxxviii. 26, δεδικαίωται ὁ ἄμαρ ἡ ἐγώ. But here the comparison is, as Calv. remarks, impropria. We may suppose that, as the Hebrews often express a simple negation by a comparative, so here the sense is, that the Publican went away justified; but not the Pharisee. This is evinced by Calv. in an able note, from which it is clear that the sense is, that of the two one returned home with his prayer answered, in the forgiveness of his sins; and that as the other prayed not for it, so he obtained it not. Thus the one was approved of God, the other not; the one went away with the favour of God, the other not. Thus we are taught that he who seeks justification before God must seek it by lowly humility, and from confession of sin, not by self-righteousness. Hence, too, as Calv. remarks, we learn, 'quid proprie sit justificari, nempe stare coram Deo ac si justus essemus;' indeed, exactly in the Pauline sense.

For ἡ most of the MSS. and almost all the early Editions have ἡ γάρ, which is adopted by almost every Editor from Wetstein to Scholz, and also by Tisch. But though the more difficult is usually to be considered the preferable reading, yet that principle does not extend to manifest violations of the propriety of language. And notwithstanding what those Editors say, this use of γάρ cannot be defended; as, indeed, appears from the vain attempts made to explain it. For to render it enē, or simul, or to consider it as having reference to a clause omitted, is alike inadmissible. And as ἡ γάρ differs so slightly from another reading (namely, ἡπερ, found in some MSS. and St. Basil), we may suspect the ἡ γάρ to be an error of the scribes, who had ἡπερ in their originals. Whether, indeed, that be the true reading, I doubt. It seems to have been a very early correction of Luke's Greek. For elegance of style would require ἡπερ, rather than ἡ. It may be added, too, that every ancient Version of credit represents ἡ or ἡπερ, not ἡ γάρ. How περ might be confounded with γάρ (espec. by those who did not consider the construction) is obvious from the strong similarity between π and γ and α and ε. I suspect, however, that of those who wrote γάρ many had in their originals περ ἱκέτις, which is found in several very ancient MSS. and the Pesch. Syr. Version; and that περ had arisen from περ. Then ἱκέτις would easily be altered to ἱκέτις. Thus it appears that the original reading was ἡ, from which arose ἡπερ and ἡ γάρ. Now it is one of the most certain of Critical Canons, that, among several readings of a word or passage, that from which all the rest might easily have originated, is to be preferred. Moreover, that ἡ, rather than ἡπερ, is the true reading, is probable, from the former occurring in a similar construction, supra xv. 7, sine var. lect. Lachm. and Alf., indeed, edit καρ' ἐκείνου, solely from B, D, in violation of the most certain of Critical Canons, as well as against the weight of external authority. Alford pronounces ἡ ἐκείνου as a gloss; as if so plain a reading, meaning 'beyond him,' could require a gloss. The other reading is a critical alteration to get rid of the harshness of the text. rec.

15—17. Little children brought to Christ. This Section is here introduced in a very different connexion from the parallel Gospels. There it is brought forward after the narration of the inquiry made by the Pharisees as to the lawfulness of divorce; and that simply because it took place immediately afterwards. Luke introduces it here, as intending to classify things according to their subjects; and indeed the connexion is here very suitable.

23. πλούσιος σφόδρα] From a multitude of examples, Scriptural and Classical, which might here be adduced, it appears that σφόδρα, and similar intensive particles, are almost invariably placed last in the clause.

24. [Comp. Prov. xi. 28.]

27. τὰ ἀδύνατα] Bornemann takes it as an admitted principle, that τὰ ἀδύνατα is equivalent to ἀ ἀδύνατα. But if so, why was not ἀ ἀδύν. written? The truth is, that τὰ ἀδύνατα is not quite equivalent; since it is (as being the direct instead of the indirect phrase) the stronger mode of expression, and espec. when placed, as here, first in a sentence, and thereby made prominent.

28. ἀφήκαμεν πάντα] MSS. A and B have ἀφάντες τὰ ἴδια, and D τὰ ἴδια ἀφῆκ. The former of which, Bornemann thinks, is the true reading: 1. because of the weight of testimony in its favour; 2. from the expression being 'acquisition;' 3. because the common reading might have been formed after the model of Matt. xix. 27. Mark x. 28. Luke v. 11; whereas the other has nothing similar to it in Scripture; and so Lachm. and Tisch. edit. But the learned Critic is, I apprehend, quite wrong, and the Editors not justified. The external testimony for the common reading is almost as strong as can be desired for any reading. All the MSS. (300 in number, to which I add all the Lamb. and Mus. copies) except three, have it. And internal evidence is, when properly considered, strongly in favour of the common reading. It is surely far more likely that in MSS. so notorious for being tampered with by Alexandrian Critics, a reading somewhat plain and homely should have been altered into one exquisitoris Græcismi, than that a somewhat elegant reading should have been altered, all but universally, into a plain one. And as to what Bornemann urges, as gravissimum argumentum, that the common reading might be formed from other passages, while the new one has nothing like it in the Gospels. The latter part of the argument is quite futile. It cannot be denied that the text, rec. may have been derived from the parallel passages of Matthew and Mark; but the proof that they were is very feeble; espec. as being unsupported by internal evidence.

³⁴ οὐδὲν τούτων συνήκαν] They understood the words, but did not comprehend the things themselves, or how what had been said could be reconciled with the prophecies. In fact, their prejudices, and their unwillingness to believe the things in question, obscured their understandings. In the words following there may seem to be somewhat of pleonasm. But we may suppose the two modes of expression intended to set forth in the strongest manner the assertion that 'they were utterly unable to understand what was said to them;' for such is the true force of τὸ ῥῆμα τοῦτο, meaning as to the sufferings, death, and resurrection of the Messiah. The singular ῥῆμα is used, though the plural had preceded, τούτων, with respect to the great doctrines involved in those things,—the mystery of a suffering Saviour, which under the circumstances they were placed in was sure to be hidden from them. Besides, the disciples may have, in some measure, understood the things said with the head, yet not with the heart; and of the latter alone it is that the Evangelist seems here to speak, denoting that sort of imperfect comprehension which results from the heart being shut up, and unprepared to receive and entertain certain deep and mysterious truths. See Is. xlv. 18. vi. 9, 10, compared with John xii. 40, and viii. 43.

σου σέσωκέ σε. ⁴³ Καὶ παραχρῆμα ἀνέβλεψε, καὶ ἠκολούθει αὐτῷ δοξάζων τὸν Θεόν καὶ πᾶς ὁ λαὸς ἰδὼν, ἔδωκεν αἶνον τῷ Θεῷ.

^{43.} ἠκολούθει αὐτῷ] Mark adds ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ, 'on the way,' along the road,—a graphical touch. The following words, δοξάζων—τῷ Θεῷ, are peculiar to Luke, and state the result of the miracle, as on some other occasions. See supra ix. 43. xiii. 17. In fact, Luke (as Alf. remarks) of all the Evangelists takes most notice of the glory given to God on account of the miraculous acts of the Lord Jesus.

XIX. 1—10. Narrative respecting Zacchæus the publican.

1. διήρχετο] 'was passing through.' So Campbell and Wakefield, supported by the authority of the Syriac Version, and confirmed by the suffrage of Canon Tate, in a letter to me; wherein he adds, that 'Luke, in the use of the tense, is remarkably, perhaps uniformly, correct. Thus, for instance, whenever he uses the expression ἵκοντο, we may be sure that something took place in the meanwhile, and on the way, which would not have been so if ἵκοντο had been used.'

— ὀνόματι καλ. Ζακ.] Some ancient MSS. and Versions are without καλ., which Mill and other Critics think ought to be cancelled; but wrongly. There is little doubt that the omission arose merely from certain Critics who considered καλ. as unnecessary and better away; not aware that such vestiges of the wordiness of early phraseology are found in the best Greek writers. Thus, for instance, Soph. Phil. 605, ὄνομα ἐνομάζετο "Æleus, and Ennius in his Med. 'quæ nunc nominatur nomine Argo.'

2. ἀρχιτελώνης] A sort of receiver-general or treasurer of the taxes of a district in which several inferior collectors were employed. See Recens. Synop. That Zacchæus was a Jew, and not, as some have imagined, a Gentile, is pretty certain from v. 9, and from his name, which is Hebrew, צדק. The occurrence of καὶ οὗτος after καὶ αὐτός may seem harsh; but examples from the Classical writers are adduced by Bornemann. It will, indeed, appear less so, if we consider the words καὶ οὗτος ἦν πλούσιος as in some measure a parenthetical clause. Render: 'and the man was rich.'

4. προδραμὼν ἔμπροσθεν] Similar pleonasm is adduced by Commentators from the Classical writers. Yet it may be doubted whether there is here, strictly speaking, a pleonasm at all. There is rather an intensity of sense, = 'running forwards, and getting before.'

— ἀνέβη ἐπὶ συκ.] lit. 'ascended at,' i. e. by going to a fig-mulberry-tree. (See my Lex.) This mode of obtaining a view of any object was not unfrequent, inasmuch that it gave rise to a proverbial expression. Thus Libanius: οὐδὲ ἰκονώμεθα τῶν παρατάξιων—οὐτὶ ὡς στρατηγός, οὐτὶ ὡς στρατιώτης· ἀλλ' ἀπὸ δένδρου ποθὶν ὑψήλου τὴν θίαν ἡνευκα ἴδω.

— ἐκείνης] Supply ὁδοῦ, and indeed διαί, which, though it be found in the common text, and in very many MSS., yet has no place in most of the ancient MSS., including a few Lamb. and many Mus. copies; and is, with reason, cancelled by every recent Editor. This ellipsis, however, as well as the similar one at v. 19, is so harsh, that Bornemann thinks there can be little doubt but that the true reading there is ποίε, and here ἐκείνη.

5. εἶδεν αὐτόν, &c.] The best Commentators are with reason agreed in referring our Lord's knowledge of the name and circumstances of Zacchæus to his Divine omniscience. See John i. 48, 50.

— ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ σου δεῖ με μείναι] Here δεῖ may mean either what is necessary to be done, as a means to some end (see Luke xii. 12. Acts xxvii. 21. ix. 6. xvi. 30, τί με δεῖ ποιεῖν, ἵνα σωθῶ); or, what is arranged or decreed in the purposes of Divine Providence. The question, however, was hardly worth debating, inasmuch as the narrative shows that our Lord looked into his heart,—which must imply the other power.

— σπεύσας κατὰβηθι:] The language and tone of command here employed by our Lord to a person of authority and wealth, though totally unknown to him, is remarkable; as is also the prompt obedience of Zacchæus to the order. The subjoined reason for the injunction ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ σου δεῖ με μείναι ('stay for the night') is equally so; where δεῖ does not merely denote 'purpose,' but 'determinate purpose'; for I agree with Mr. Alford, that in these last days of our Lord's ministry every event may be considered as fixed and determined by a Divine plan, well adverted to in the expression 'I must.'

χαίρων. ⁷ Καὶ ἰδόντες * πάντες διεγόγγυζον, λέγοντες· Ὅτι παρὰ ἁμαρτωλῷ ἀνδρὶ εἰσῆλθε καταλύσαι. ⁸ Ὁ Σταθεὶς δὲ Ζακχαῖος εἶπε πρὸς τὸν Κύριον· Ἰδοὺ, τὰ ἡμίση τῶν ὑπαρχόντων μου, Κύριε, δίδωμι τοῖς πτωχοῖς· καὶ εἰ τινὸς τι ἐσυκοφάντησα, ἀποδίδωμι τετραπλοῦν. ⁹ ^b Εἶπε δὲ πρὸς αὐτὸν ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Ὅτι σήμερον σωτηρία τῷ οἴκῳ τούτῳ ἐγένετο· καθότι καὶ αὐτὸς υἱὸς Ἀβραάμ ἐστιν. ¹⁰ ἦλθε γὰρ ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ζητῆσαι καὶ σῶσαι τὸ ἀπολωλός.

— ἁμαρτωλῷ] i.e. who by his occupation might be presumed to be such; and who, indeed, seems, from the subsequent context, to have been at least occasionally rapacious and unjust.—For καταλ. see note on Luke ix. 12.

⁸ σταθεὶς] Render: 'quum constitisset,' 'having stood forth publicly;' the posture of making declaration of his purposes of restitution and future amendment with present clarity.

— εἰ τινὸς τι ἐσυκοφ.] 'whatsoever I have exacted of any one by false information.' A sense of εἰ τις occurring also at Phil. iv. 8. 2 Thessa. iii. 10, and al. On ἐσυκ. see note supra iii. 14, and my Lex. The ample extent of the alms (τὰ ἡμ. τ. ὑπαρχ.), and the fulness of the restitution thus publicly declared attest the sincerity of his repentance, and the genuineness of his faith. In the ἰδοὺ is implied publicity. It is not improbable that Zacchæus had heard the substance of the Parable of the unjust steward (supra xvi. 1) from some of his brother-publicans; and that the concluding words ποιήσατε ἑαυτοῖς φίλους—ἀδικίας had made a deep impression upon his mind. As to the Present δίδωμι, as ushered in by ἰδοὺ, it imports a finished transaction, in the half being actually given; but as to ἀποδίδωμι, it can, in the nature of things, only denote purpose as to the payment of the amount, which he should ascertain that he had unfairly exacted of any. The fourfold restitution was the largest measure of restitution recognized by the law of Moses; and Zacchæus' application of it to his own case showed his full readiness to make the amplest amends to any one whom he had wronged. Our Lord evinces his entire approbation of this promptitude of Zacchæus in doing the right thing immediately, by the announcement of the immediate offer of salvation to himself and his family, by the opportunity of salvation having that very day occurred to him. The πρὸς at v. 9 must not, with some Expositors, be rendered 'concerning;' for, though that signification does occur, yet never, I think, after the phrase εἶπε δέ. And although Zacchæus is just after spoken of in the third person, yet we have only to suppose that the latter clause was addressed to the by-standers, and the former to Zacchæus, whose declaration required some reply thereto. I have pointed accordingly. At any rate we may suppose that our Lord's answer was so worded, as that, though directed to Zacchæus, it was meant also for the by-standers; who, indeed, seem alluded to in the reproof implied in the words καθότι, &c. q. d. 'inasmuch as he too, who, through his sins, was thought unworthy of being called a son of Abraham, has now, by repentance and faith in me, become restored to his birth-right with God, nay, reckoned a true Israelite (see Rom. ii. 28) and a genuine son of the father of the faithful,' Rom. iii. 11.

By οἶκος is meant the family, including the master of it, by whose example and precepts all its members would be brought into the way of salvation (see Acts x. 2).

¹¹ προσθεὶς εἶπε] Meaning, by Hebraism, 'he went on to speak.' At δοκεῖν repeat τὸ a little before, and render, 'were supposing.'

Our Lord's words just before declared his Messiahship; and the Apostles, no doubt, supposed them to imply his speedy entrance upon his reign and assumption of the character of liberator of the Jewish nation. This erroneous opinion Jesus corrects in the following parable, on which the notes at Matt. xxv. 14, seqq. may with advantage be consulted, since the two parables are very similar, though not the same, and, in some respects, different in design.

— λαβεῖν ἑαυτῷ βαρ.] i.e. 'to receive institution to a kingdom, procure for himself royalty;' as was the case with Archelaus, whom it is supposed our Lord had here in view; see Joseph. Antt. xvii. 11. Bell. ii. 6.

— καὶ ὑποστρέψαι] 'and [then] to return.' So Joseph. Antt. xviii. 6, 10, ἡξίου συγχώρησιν αὐτῷ γενίσθαι πλείυσαντι τὴν τὰ ἀρχὴν καταστήσασθαι, καὶ ἱκανίαν.

¹³ δούλοι] By these are here to be understood persons holding office, like ministers of

Πραγματευσασθε ἕως ἔρχομαι ¹⁴ Οἱ δὲ πολῖται αὐτοῦ ἐμίσουν αὐτὸν, καὶ ἀπέστειλαν πρεσβείαν ὀπίσω αὐτοῦ, λέγοντες· Οὐ θέλομεν τοῦτον βασιλεῦσαι ἐφ' ἡμᾶς. ¹⁵ Καὶ ἐγένετο, ἐν τῷ ἐπανελθεῖν αὐτὸν λαβόντα τὴν βασιλείαν, καὶ εἶπε φωνηθῆναι αὐτῷ τοὺς δούλους τούτους οἱς ἔδωκε τὸ ἀργύριον, ἵνα γνῶ, τίς τί διεπραγματεύσατο. ¹⁶ Παρεγένετο δὲ ὁ πρῶτος λέγων ^{o Matt. 25. 30.} Κύριε, ἡ μνᾶ σου προσειργάσατο δέκα μνᾶς. ¹⁷ Καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Εὖ, ἀγαθὲ δούλε· ὅτι ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ πιστὸς ἐγένου, ἴσθι ἐξουσίαν ἔχων ἐπάνω δέκα πόλεων. ¹⁸ Καὶ ἦλθεν ὁ δεύτερος λέγων· Κύριε, ἡ μνᾶ σου ἐποίησε πέντε μνᾶς. ¹⁹ Εἶπε δὲ καὶ τούτῳ· Καὶ σὺ γίνου ἐπάνω πέντε πόλεων. ²⁰ Καὶ ἕτερος ἦλθε λέγων ^{o Matt. 25. 34—35.} Κύριε, ἰδοὺ, ἡ μνᾶ σου, ἣν εἶχον ἀποκειμένην ἐν σουδαρίῳ· ²¹ ἐφοβούμην γάρ σε, ὅτι ἄνθρωπος αὐστηρὸς εἶ· αἶρεις δ' οὐκ ἔθνηκας, καὶ θερίζεις δ' οὐκ ἔσπειρας. ²² Λέγει δὲ αὐτῷ· Ἐκ τοῦ στόματός σου κρινῶ σε, πονηρὲ δούλε· Ἦιδεις ὅτι ἐγώ state under a king, such as this person at length was. Comp. Jos. Antt. xix. 8, 3, τῶν ὑπηρέτων τῶν ἐπιτηδείστατον, 'the most faithful of his court officers.'

— πραγμ. ἕως ἔρχομαι 'employ it in business till I come.' See my Lex. in v. This was not unusual. Thus Facciol. Lex. in v. peculium says, that the juriconsults often use that term of the stock of money which was sometimes put into the hands of a slave by his master to employ. And, in proof of this, they say, that he held the peculium, but not the property, as being liable to give an account of its use.

[5. ἵνα γνῶ, τίς τί διεπραγμ.] 'in order that he might ascertain what any one (each one) had gained by trading.' Such is the sense assigned by both ancient and modern Expositors down to Mr. Alf., who pronounces that such is not the sense; but 'what business each had carried on,' alleging in proof of the signif. Dion. Hal. iii. 72. But that is unsatisfactory evidence; and the sense so laid down is quite unsuitable, and presenting a circumstance inapposite. The various readings here only attest the various modes of correcting the composition; and certainly in pure Greek the plural would have been used in πραγμ.; or if the singular, the τίς would have been not expressed, but left understood.

16. προσειργάσατο] In this use there is the same metaphor as that by which we say 'to make money,' viz. by investment in trade. Money so employed was said to be ἐμργον; while what was allowed to lie dormant was said to be ἀργόν.

17. ἴσθι ἐξουσίαν ἔχων] Equiv. to ἴσθι σε ἔχειν, 'scias te habere,' 'know that thou hast,' &c.; for, according to a certain idiom (on which see Matthiæ, Gr. Gr. § 559), peculiar to verbs of knowing, &c., is added a Nom. of the Participle for an Infinitive preceded by a pronoun. So Æsch. Ag. 1660, ἴσθι δάσαν. Soph. El. 298, ἴσθι τί-σουσα. Aj. 1174, ἴσθι πημαινόμενος. It is not, however, in the present passage and those above quoted, a mere circumlocution, but conveys a stronger sense than the verb would.

— ἐπάνω] This sense of the word, as denoting authority over, is rare in the Class. writers, and almost confined to the later ones. We have here an allusion to the ancient Oriental custom of assigning the government and revenues of a certain number of cities to a meritorious officer as the reward of his services. On which see my note on Thucyd. i. 138, Transl.

20. σουδαρίῳ] This term (which is of Latin origin) denotes such a cloth as was, among the ancients, generally used as a kerchief, but sometimes as a napkin. And from the Rabbinical writers it appears that such cloths were sometimes used to wrap money in and lay it by.

21. αὐστηρὸς] The word signifies, 1. (as applied to feeling) dry, harsh; 2. (as applied to the taste) sour and crabbed. In a metaphorical sense it signifies severe and cynical; or, in another view, hard and gripping, which is the sense here and at 2 Macc. xiv. 30. Dio Chrys. Orat. 12, p. 207, ἀνδρα αὐστηρόν.

— αἶρεις δ' οὐκ ἔθνηκας] This is exegetical of the preceding; and, like that in Matt. xxv. 24, seems to have been a proverbial mode of expression, to denote a grasping disposition. It is formed on that sense of αἶρω whereby it denotes, not simply 'to raise from the ground,' but (like the Ang. Sax. hlifstan, and our old English to lift) denotes properly (in the Middle voice only) to take up and off; but was also used figuratively of appropriating any thing lost without inquiring for the owner. Hence it well designates that grasping spirit which exacts from others what it does not give to others; as in the case of a slave-master, who requires that personal service of his slave which he does not give him the power to render. In the application it well represents the language of the murmuring sinner against God, for demanding more of man than he has given him power to perform; see Rom. ix. 19, 20.

22. ἤδεις ὅτι ἐγώ, &c.] This (as Mr. Greswell observes) 'is an exquisite specimen of irony and refutation at the same time. It meets and exposes his plea on the proper principle of the argumentum ad absurdum, and the argumentum ad hominem, both; admitting apparently the truth of his premises, yet showing that even on his own assumptions they led to a conclusion condemnatory of himself.'

— αἶρων δ' οὐκ ἔθηκα, &c.] There is here an allusion to the Mosaic law, mentioned by Philo ap. Euseb. Præp. Evang., δ' μὴ κατίθηναι μηδ' ἀναιρῆσθαι. And so Ælian V. H. iv. 1, οὐδὲν ὦν μὴ κατίθετο ἀναιρῆται.

— ἔπραξα] This sense of πράσσειν for exigere is found also in the Class. writers, but generally in the Middle voice. Yet Thucyd. i. 99 has ἀκριβῶς ἔπρασσον.

Mr. Greswell has shown at large that the accessions which should have been made to the trust, under such circumstances, would be as liable to be claimed by the original owner, as the trust itself; and the mere non-use of his trust, according to his intentions, would be as much a violation of his rights, and as contrary to his wish, as its positive abuse in any conceivable way.

²⁶ Commentators are not agreed whether these are the words of our Lord, or of the King. According to the former view they may be supposed to be a parenthetical admonition to the disciples. This, however, would be very harsh, and make what is introduced in the next verse still more so. The latter interpretation is, therefore, preferable, especially as being required by the parallel passage of Matthew.

There is a greater difficulty connected with ver. 25; which, though it be diminished, is not removed, by placing the words in a parenthesis; nor does any one of the various modes of handling them seem satisfactory. I would suggest that the difficulty may be obviated by supposing that the insertion was interposed to express, by the by, the comparatively unimportant fact, that while the king was pronouncing the words ἄρατε ἀπ' αὐτοῦ τὴν μνᾶν, καὶ δότε τῷ τὰς δέκα μνᾶς ἔχοντι, the by-standers made the brief demur couched in κύριε, ἔχει δέκα μνᾶς; and that the abruptness discernible in what is subjoined, is meant to represent graphically the mode in which he dealt with the demur; namely, by passing it over unnoticed, smothering, as it were, the objection by inculcating the great maxim of morals (also occurring at Matt. viii. 12. Mark iv. 25, supra viii. 18), on which his determination was founded, and which would form its sufficient justification. The rule of the distribution being, that he who had most of its proper reward already, should receive the greatest share of the residue and extra reward also.

τὸν Ἰησοῦν. ³⁶ Πορευομένου δὲ αὐτοῦ, ὑπεστρώννουν τὰ ἱμάτια αὐτῶν ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ. ³⁷ Ἐγγιζόντος δὲ αὐτοῦ ἤδη πρὸς τὴ καταβάσει τοῦ ὄρους τῶν Ἐλαιῶν, ἤρξαντο ἅπαν τὸ πλήθος τῶν μαθητῶν χαίροντες αἰνεῖν τὸν Θεὸν φωνῇ μεγάλη περὶ πασῶν ὧν εἶδον δυνάμεων, ³⁸ λέγοντες· Εὐλογημένος ὁ ἐρχόμενος βασιλεὺς ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου εἰρήνῃ ἐν οὐρανῷ, καὶ δόξα ἐν ὑψίστοις ! ³⁹ Καὶ τινες τῶν Φαρισαίων ἀπὸ τοῦ ὄχλου εἶπον πρὸς αὐτὸν· Διδάσκαλε, ἐπιτίμησον τοῖς μαθηταῖς σου. ⁴⁰ Καὶ ἀποκριθεὶς εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Λέγω ὑμῖν, ὅτι ἐὰν οὗτοι σιωπήσωσιν, οἱ λίθοι κεκράζονται. ⁴¹ Καὶ ὡς ἤγγισεν, ἰδὼν τὴν πόλιν, ἔκλαυσεν ἐπ' αὐτῇ, ⁴² λέγων· Ὅτι εἰ ἔγνος καὶ σὺ, καὶ γε ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ σου ταύτῃ, τὰ πρὸς εἰρήνῃν σου—νῦν δὲ ἐκρύβη ἀπὸ ὀφθαλμῶν σου ⁴³ ὅτι ἤξουσιν ἡμέραι ἐπὶ σε, καὶ περιβαλοῦσιν οἱ ἐχθροὶ σου χάρακά σοι, καὶ περικυκλώσουσί σε, καὶ συνέξουσί σε πάντοθεν, ⁴⁴ καὶ ἐδαφιοῦσί σε καὶ τὰ τέκνα σου ἐν σοί, καὶ οὐκ ἀφήσουσιν ἐν σοί λίθον ἐπὶ λίθῳ· ἀνθ' ὧν οὐκ ἔγνος τὸν καιρὸν τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς σου.

39—44. The Pharisees murmur: our Lord's reply. I agree with Mr. Alf., that the spirit of these Pharisees was just that of modern Socinianism. The prophetic expressions used, and the lofty epithets applied to Him, who was in their view merely a διδάσκαλος, offended them.

40. οἱ λίθοι κεκράζονται.] Said to be a proverbial and hyperbolic form of expression, to denote that it is a moral impossibility for a thing to be otherwise than it is. Here, however, it is meant, that if those should be checked, God would even, miraculously, animate the very stones to celebrate his triumph. Of the examples adduced of this mode of expression the most apposite are Hab. ii. 11, 'The stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam shall answer it' (meaning, that even if men should be silent, the very stones would exclaim): Ptolemaeus ap. Suid. in v. ἀπορήξαι, who says, Οὐκ, εἰ σιωπήσῃμεν, οἱ λίθοι τάχα Φωνὰς ἀπορήξουσιν, τῶν πεπραγμένων. I add Æschyl. Agam. 36, οἶκος δ' αὐτός, εἰ φθογγὴν λάβοι, Σαφέστατ' ἀν' λίσσειεν.

41. ἰδὼν τὴν πόλιν, ἐκλ. ἐπ' αὐτῇ.] Comp. what is in Jos. Antt. vii. 9, 2, said of David, on his being obliged to abandon Jerusalem, and flee beyond Jordan, as follows: γυνόμενος δ' ἐπὶ τῆς κορυφῆς τοῦ ὄρους (namely, the Mount of Olives) ἀπισκοπεῖ τὴν πόλιν, καὶ μετὰ πολλῶν δακρύων, ὡς ἂν βασιλεὺς ἐκπασῶν, ᾗχετο τῷ Θεῷ. The difference, however, in that instance was, that David wept for himself; Jesus, for others, even his bitterest enemies. See note on Matt. xxiii. 37, where the words προσάκεις ἡθ' ἰλ' ἡσα—καὶ οὐκ ἠθέλησας, added to the record of the tear-shedding of our Lord, attest the freedom of man's will to resist the grace of God.

42. εἰ ἔγνομαι.] On the force of this mode of expression a difference of opinion exists. Some take εἰ for ἔθε, 'would that thou hadst considered!'—a use sometimes found both in the Scriptural and Classical writers. Others, more properly, suppose an ellipsis, per apostrophen, of εὖ ἂν ἔχοι, or such like; or, as apostrophes being frequent in language dictated by grief or strong emotion. Render: 'if thou hadst but known.' The pathos is here increased by the high emphasis in καὶ σὺ; q. d. 'even thou,' or, 'thou too' (as well as my disciples), the metropolis of the country to which I was especially sent. Καὶ γε may be rendered, 'et quidem.'

— ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ σου ταύτῃ.] Meaning, the present time, though so late, the καιρὸς τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς intended to lead them to repentance.

— νῦν δὲ ἐκρύβη, &c.] Meaning, 'But now (by an inexcusable ignorance) thou rejectest the light offered thee; and therefore perish thou must.'

43. ὅτι ἤξουσιν ἡμ., &c.] (namely), 'that the days shall come adverse to thee; ἐπὶ σέ, as it is said Gen. xlii. 36, ἐπ' ἐμὶ ἐγίνετο ταῦτα πάντα. Here is both a prediction and a declaration, and, in some measure, description (with which comp. Is. xxix. 3, 4. Jer. vi. 3, 6) of the siege of Jerusalem; as will appear by referring to Josephus, Bell. v. 6. 2, 3. ix. 1, 11. 1, 5, which passages illustrate the first stage—the χάρακα περιβ. — χάρακα] 'a bank, or rampart.' So called from the χάρακις, or strong poles, which were driven down to preserve the agger, or mound of earth, in due form; see Thucyd. ii. 75. 2. So we have in Polyb. v. 2, 5, χάρακα τῇ παρεμβολῇ περιέβαλον. The next term περικυκλώσουσι denotes the effectual blockade of the city by the building of a wall, which could not be burnt, as the χάραξ had been.

44. ἐδαφιοῦσί σε καὶ τὰ τέκνα σου ἐν σοί.] The best Commentators are agreed that there is here a hyperbaton, of demolishing the buildings, and of dashing the inhabitants, espec. the children, against the stones. Both these senses of ἐδαφ. were in use, and both here seem to be intended. The verb ἐδαφ. is to be applied both to σε and τὰ τέκνα σου in the two different senses which it bears,—namely, 'to level with the ground,' and 'to dash against the ground.' The former is the only sense known in the Class.; but the latter was doubtless in use in the language of common life, and is frequent in the Sept.

difference of opinion exists as to the import of ἐπισκοπή, which, as being a word of middle signification, admits of being taken for good or for evil. The latter is assigned by some Expositors; but the former (meaning the day, or time, in the favourable sense of being visited with the time of grace and mercy, mentioned at ver. 42) seems the more apposite. Comp. supra i. 68, 78. In this sense the word occurs in Job x. 12. So also 2 Cor. vi. 2, καιρὸς εὐπρόσδικτος, ἡμέρα σωτηρίας.

45, 46. Cleansing of the Temple. See on Matt. xxi. 12. Mark xi. 15—17.

47. οἱ πρῶτοι τοῦ λαοῦ] By these seem meant not the πρεσβύτεροι τ. λ., as Grot. and others think, but οἱ ἀρχόντες τ. λ. (as is expressed in MS. 130), as Beza explains; meaning the principal persons of the laity. So Mark vi. 21, τοῖς πρώτοις τῆς Γαλιλαίας. Acts xiii. 13, οἱ πρῶτοι τῆς πόλεως. xxv. 2. xxviii. 17, οἱ πρῶτοι τῶν Ἰουδαίων. Jos. Ant. vii. 9, 8, οἱ πρ. τῆς χώρας. x. 4, 5, οἱ πρ. τῶν ἱερῶν: and so in the Classical writers. See Steph. Thea. Dind. in v.

48. ἐκρέματο αὐτοῦ ἀκ.] 'hung on his words,' i. e. heard him with deep interest, implying admiration. Comp. Matt. xxii. 33, ἐκπλησσοντο ἐπὶ τῇ διδαχῇ αὐτοῦ. Of this sense of ἐκρεμάσθαι and the Latin pendere, examples are adduced by the Commentators, of which the most apposite are Eunapius in Ædisio, ἐκρέματο τῶν λόγων. Themist., Τριβωνίου ἐκρέμαντο. Virg. Æn. iv. 79, 'pendetque iterum narrantis ab ore.'

XX. 1—8. Our Lord's authority questioned;

his reply. Comp. Matt. xxi. 23—27. Mark xi. 27—33; and see notes.

1. ἐπίστησαν] Render: not, 'came upon him, as if with a hostile intention, or for surprise or treachery;' but, simply, 'came up [to him],' 'approached,' as Luke ii. 38, καὶ αὕτη—ἐπιστάσα, ἀνθρολογεῖτο, 'coming up,' &c.; also x. 40, ἐπιστάσα δὲ εἶπα, and often in Class. Thus it is merely equiv. to προσῆλθον αὐτῷ in the passage of Matthew, and ἐρχονται πρὸς αὐτὸν in that of Mark.

5. The οὖν is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., and bracketed by Lachm. There is, perhaps, authority sufficient to justify the latter course (the word is absent from several Lamb. and Mus. copies), but not the former.

6. καταλιθ. ἡμᾶς] Stoning was, indeed, enjoined in the Law of Moses as the punishment of idolatry, blasphemy, and other heinous offences; and its execution was committed, or permitted, to the people at large. Yet it appears from Exod. viii. 26, that such sort of irregular and tumultuary vengeance was in use before the Law. Nor was this confined to the Jews; for we find allusion to it in Hom. Il. γ. 26, and Thucyd. v. 60. The priests, indeed, had not restrained the people in the exercise of that violence (see Joseph. Hist. xvi. 7, 6), because they found it occasionally a useful instrument to work their own purposes. When they could not legally convict their enemies of any imputed crime, they invited the populace to stone them, by what was called the judicium zeli; see John x. 31. Acts xiv. 19.

bandmen. Matt. xxi. 33—46. Mark xii. 1—12, and notes. The parable was spoken πρὸς, 'to' the people; but, as we find from v. 19, directed πρὸς, 'at' the chief priests.

11. προσέθετο πέμψαι] for πάλιν ἐπεμψε at Mark xii. 4. This expression (as also that at xix. 11, προσθεῖς εἶπε) is an Hellenistic idiom formed on the Hebrew, and found in Gen. viii. 21. xviii. 29. Render: 'he proceeded to say.'

13. ἴσως] To the usual sense perhaps it is objected by Pearce, Campbell, and Schleusner, that this can have no place here, since the Spirit of truth could be under no doubt. Hence they would render it surely, adducing examples of that sense from the Sept. and the Classical writers, and referring to several notes of Critics. But the difficulty started is perhaps imaginary; for the term occurs in a parable, and thus may be supposed to be used per anthropopatheiam, and to keep up the verisimilitude of the story.

17. ἐμβλ. αὐτοῖς] 'looking fixedly at them,' to give greater effect to the subjoined address, in which the οὖν, as Alf. observes, infers the negation of μὴ γένοιτο, q. d. 'How then, supposing your wish to be fulfilled, could this which is written come to pass?' On the quotation following see note on Matt. xxi. 42.

18. λικμήσει] So Dan. ii. 35, λικμήσει πάσας τὰς βασιλείας, and Job xxvii. 21, λικμήσει αὐτὸν ἐκ τοῦ τόπου, 'shall make chaff of him, scatter him to the winds and bring him to an utter end.' So Plut. vii. 496, τὴν τίσφραν αὐτῷ λικμώντες ἠφάνιζον καὶ διάσπειρον.

19. ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ] 'at that very time,' 'that very instant,' as Luke ii. 38. These words (found in none of the other Gospels) have much meaning, as adverting to the attempts made to take Jesus, just after, by the same persons.

20—26. Our Lord's answer to an inquiry as to the lawfulness of giving tribute to Cæsar. Matt. xxii. 15—22. Mark xii. 13—17.

20. παρατηρήσαντες] 'watching for an opportunity.' Suppl. καιρὸν, as in Thucyd. iv. 26. 7, and often in the Classical writers. By ἔγκαθ. (on which see my Lex.) are meant lit. 'men suborned for the evil purpose in question,' merely to give the chief priests a handle against Jesus, by bringing forward some saying that he might utter.

²⁷—⁴⁰. Jesus' reply to the Sadducees respecting the resurrection. Matt. xxii. 23—33. Mark xii. 18—27.

— οἱ ἀντίλ. ἀν. μὴ εἶναι I have now removed the lines after Σαδδ. and αἰῶνι, considering that the above words come into construction with the rest, for the nominatives of ἀντίλ. are put for Genitives, τῶν ἀντιλεγόντων, not by attraction, as Mr. Alford says, but by a sort of negligence of composition (though found in the best writers from Homer downwards), by which, as Bornem. here points out, 'the writer deviates from legitimate composition, by having in mind a different word from that which he has put on paper.' 'For,' continues Bornem., 'though it is admitted that it ought to be accommodated to that noun which is circumscribed, yet we sometimes find it adhere to that word which serves to the periphrasis.' So Thucyd. i. 110, has τὰ τῶν Ἑλλήνων πράγματα ἐφθάρη ἔξ ἱτῆ πολυμήσαντα, for -ων, where the construction is accommodated to the word which here serves to the periphrasis, πράγματα. See more in my note there, as also the passages adduced by Lobbeck on Soph. Aj. 7. Trach. 965, and Plat. p. 270. The idiom connected with ἀντίλ. μή is one very common in the Classical writers, espec. Thucyd. and Xen.; but it does not follow because the other two Evangelists have not the ἀντίλ., that the sense is exactly the same in this passage of Luke, as in those of Matthew and Mark. In Luke it is stronger, the full import being, 'who strenuously deny that there is any resurrection.'

γαμοῦσι καὶ †[ἐκ]γαμίσκονται· ³⁵ οἱ δὲ καταξιοθέντες τοῦ αἰῶνος ἐκείνου τυχεῖν, καὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως τῆς ἐκ νεκρῶν, οὔτε γαμοῦσιν οὔτε ἐγκαμίσκονται· ³⁶ οὔτε γὰρ ἀποθανεῖν ἔτι δύνανται· ἰσάγγελοι γὰρ εἰσι, καὶ υἱοὶ εἰσι [τοῦ] Θεοῦ, τῆς ἀναστάσεως υἱοὶ ὄντες. ³⁷ Ὅτι δὲ ἐγείρονται οἱ νεκροὶ καὶ Μωϋσῆς ἐμήνυσεν ἐπὶ τῆς Βάτου, ὡς λέγει Κύριον τὸν Θεὸν Ἀβραὰμ καὶ τὸν Θεὸν Ἰσαὰκ καὶ τὸν Θεὸν Ἰακώβ. ³⁸ Θεὸς δὲ οὐκ ἔστι νεκρῶν, ἀλλὰ ζώντων· πάντες γὰρ αὐτῷ ζῶσιν. ³⁹ Ἀποκριθέντες δέ τινες τῶν γραμματέων εἶπον Διδάσκαλε, καλῶς εἶπας. ⁴⁰ οὐκέτι δὲ ἐτόλμων ἐπερωτᾶν αὐτὸν οὐδέν.

³² πάντων] is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on strong, but insufficient authority.

³⁴ ἐγκαμίσκ.] It is almost impossible to determine the true reading, so that I have seen no case for change; but [ἐκ]γαμίσκονται has the strongest external authority in its favour (and is found in almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), while ἐγκαμίσκ. has internal evidence in its favour.

For οὔτε propriety of language would require οὐδέ; for another οὔτε after two just preceding would be not a little harsh; and I know not a single instance of οὔτε occurring thrice. Xen. Mem. iv. 3, 14, seems, indeed, to present one; but I doubt not that the true reading there is, ὁρᾶται δ' οὐτ' ἰππῶν, οὐδὲ (ne quidem) κατὰ σκήπας, οὔτε ἀπῶν. And here οὐδέ is found in 4 uncial and 2 cursive MSS. (to which I can add a few Lamb. and Mus. copies), and edited by Tisch. and Alf. The same error (if it be such) was committed by the scribes at 1 Cor. iii. 2, where the common reading is ἀλλ' οὔτε ἔτι νῦν δύνασθαι. But the best MSS. and several Fathers have οὐδὲ, which has been received by the later Editors. However, I cannot venture to receive οὐδὲ, unless on stronger authority; espec. since internal evidence is so strongly in favour of οὔτε.

— ἰσάγγελοι εἰσι] Meaning, not 'are equal to,' but 'are like unto the angels,' equiv. to ὡς ἄγγελοι in the parallel passages of Matth. and Mark. In what this likeness consists, is their having spiritual bodies. The word is very rare; but it occurs elsewhere in Hierocles, σῖβειν ὁ λόγος παραιεῖ τοὺς ἰσοδαίμονας καὶ ἰσαγγέλους. By υἱοὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ are denoted not only 'those who resemble God in their dispositions and actions (see note on Matt. viii. 12, and xi. 19); but especially 'those who, having been regenerated by his Spirit, have thereby attained the adoption, so as to have the privilege of being sons of God;' see John i. 12, compared with 1 John iii. 1, 2. Rom. viii. 16.—21. ix. 4. Gal. iv. 5. MSS. A, B, L, 157, with Basil and Nysa, have not the τοῦ before Θεοῦ, which is expunged by Tisch., though retained by Lachm.; and its absence is confirmed by Matt. v. 9, υἱοὶ Θεοῦ. Hence I have now bracketed the word. Probably the τοῦ crept in on account of the τῆς before ἀναστ., though the words are separate in construction. By υἱοὶ τῆς ἀναστ. are meant (by a Hebraism found at Matt. viii. 12, and elsewhere) 'partakers in the resurrection,' viz. unto glory.

³⁸ πάντες γὰρ αὐτῷ ζῶσιν] This seems to be an addition from the Evangelist, meant to confirm and illustrate the foregoing proposition, that 'God is not God of the dead, but of the living;' ὡς αὐτῷ αὖ, θεὸς αὐτῶν, they all live unto him, in dependence on him; and, in fact, live with respect to him. Comp. Jos. Maccab. § 16, where the martyr-father encourages his seven sons to die, rather than transgress the law of God, since they know that οἱ διὰ τὸν Θεὸν ἀποθνήσκοντες ζῶσι τῷ Θεῷ, ὥσπερ Ἀβραὰμ, Ἰσαὰκ, καὶ Ἰακώβ, καὶ πάντες οἱ πατριαρχαί, meaning that God considers them alive; because, if alive, their life is in his life, and, if dead, he can at any time recall them to life.

45—47. Denunciation of the Scribes. Matt. xxiii. 6, 7, 13. Mark xii. 38—40, where see notes.

47. προφ. μακ. προσεύχ.] I still retain the text. rec. The reading of Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. originated in Mark xii. 40. See note on Matt. xxiii. 13.

XXI. 1—4. Comp. the more detailed account in Mark xii. 41—44. The comma which I have placed after γαζοφ. is, if not required by the parallel passage, at least permitted by it; and it is, I think, demanded by propriety of language; for I would not, with Bornem., suppose at πλουσίους an ellipsis of εἶναι; since, however, that idiom may be justified by examples, it is here inadmissible, as leading to a sense quite unsuitable. Πλουσίους is, indeed, in apposition with τοὺς βάλλοντας, and should be rendered 'nempe divites.'

4. τοῦ περισσεύοντος] For τοῦ περισσεύματος, which, indeed, is found in several MSS., but is there, doubtless, a mere emendatio, introduced for better correspondence to ὑστερήματος, just after.—Εἰς τὰ δῶρα, abstr. for concrete; the gifts, for the treasury which received the gifts or donations, τὸ γαζοφυλάκιον, as in the parallel passage of Mark.

5—36. Our Lord's prophecy of his coming, and of the end of the times, Matt. xxiv. 1—5. xxv. 1—40. Mark xiii. 1—37.

5. In addition to the circumstances adverted to in the parallel passages of Matth. and Mark, viz. ποταποὶ λίθοι and ποταπαὶ οἰκοδομαὶ (meaning the stones as worked up into the buildings), we have here ἀναθήματα, or 'votive offerings laid up, or apart, from common use, and consecrated to Jehovah;' and which was the name given to those votive offerings hung up in the heathen temples, either out of gratitude for past benefits, or in hope of future favours, such as chaplets, vases, rich arms, or furniture; a custom which, as appears from several passages of the Maccabees and Josephus, had been adopted into the Temple at Jerusalem. That these ἀναθήματα were very numerous and rich, we find from 2 Macc. v. 16. ix. 16. 3 Macc. iii. 17, and Josephus.

6. ταῦτα, ἃ θεωρ.] On further consideration I cannot admit the accus. absol. of Bornem., still less the nomin. absol. of Alf.; but suppose, with the Pesch. Syr. and Arab. Versions, and most modern Versions and Interpretations, not indeed an ellipse of κατὰ, but the use of ταῦτα as a nomin. pendens by an anacoluthon; an idiom by which (as Kühner says, Gr. Gr. § 477, 1) a word of especial significance, in a sentence, is placed at its beginning in the nomin. to represent it as the fundamental subject of the whole sentence, though the grammatical construction would strictly require a dependent case. So Platon. p. 474, καὶ μὴν τὰ κ.τ.λ. Thus here the full sense may be rendered, 'As for these things, (i.e. the stupendous buildings and their adornments), at which ye now gaze with admiration.' This intensity of meaning, not inherent in the verb, is imparted by the context, and the parallel passages of Mark, where the interrogation carries with it the force of exclamation.

8. The οὖν before πορευθ. is cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., from B, D, L, X, and 2 cursive MSS.; but it is retained by Lachm., rightly.

πολέμους καὶ ἀκαταστασίας, μὴ πτοηθῆτε· δεῖ γὰρ ταῦτα γινέσθαι πρῶτον· ἀλλ' οὐκ εὐθέως τὸ τέλος. ¹⁰ Τότε ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς· Ἐγερθήσεται ἔθνος ἐπὶ ἔθνος, καὶ βασιλεία ἐπὶ βασιλείαν· ¹¹ σεισμοὶ τε μεγάλοι κατὰ τόπους, καὶ λιμοὶ καὶ λοιμοὶ ἔσονται· φόβητρά τε καὶ σημεῖα ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ μέγала ἔσται. ¹² Πρὸ δὲ τούτων * πάντων ἐπιβαλοῦσιν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς τὰς χεῖρας αὐτῶν καὶ διώξουσιν, παραδιδόντες εἰς συναγωγὰς καὶ φυλακὰς, † ἀγομένους ἐπὶ βασιλεῖς καὶ ἡγεμόνας ἕνεκεν τοῦ ὀνόματός μου· ¹³ ἀποβήσεται δὲ ὑμῖν εἰς μαρτύριον. ¹⁴ Θέσθε οὖν εἰς τὰς καρδίας ὑμῶν μὴ προμελετᾶν ἀπολογηθῆναι. ¹⁵ ἐγὼ γὰρ δώσω ὑμῖν στόμα καὶ σοφίαν, ἣ οὐ δυνήσονται ἀντειπεῖν οὐδὲ ἀντιστῆναι πάντες οἱ ἀντικείμενοι ὑμῖν. ¹⁶ Παραδοθήσεσθε δὲ καὶ ὑπὸ γονέων καὶ ἀδελφῶν, καὶ συγγενῶν καὶ φίλων· καὶ θανατώσουσιν ἐξ ὑμῶν· ¹⁷ καὶ ἔσεσθε μισούμενοι ὑπὸ πάντων διὰ τὸ ὄνομά μου· ¹⁸ καὶ θριξὶ ἐκ τῆς κεφαλῆς ὑμῶν οὐ μὴ ἀπόληται. ¹⁹ Ἐν

9. ἀκαταστασίας] 'Ακαταστασία denotes that unsettled state which arises from sedition and faction, wherein the laws cease to have any force, and things are carried on by force and violence. The word is found only in the later Greek writers and in the Sept. See my Lex. in v.

— μὴ πτοηθ.] Equivalent to μὴ θροῖσθε in the passages of Matthew and Mark. Bornemann compares a passage of Plutarch, Moral. π. 451, where πτοῖαι and φόβοι are conjoined.

11. φόβητρά] lit. 'objects of terror, terrific prodigies.' These verbals in τρον have all an active force, signifying what causes, or 'is productive of;' as φόβητρον, μίσητρον, θιάτρον, ἱατρον, λώετρον, φέρετρον, θύρετρον, θίλγυτρον.

— καὶ is inserted before κατὰ by Tisch. and Alf., from MSS. B, L, and one cursive MS.; but Lachm. retains the text. rec.; and rightly; since the authority for the change is quite incompetent. The other reading evidently arose from critical alteration.

12. πρὸ δὲ τούτων πάντων ἐπιβαλοῦσιν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς τὰς χεῖρας] In the parallel passage of Matth. we have, πάντα ταῦτα ἀρχὴ ὁδίων; and in that of Mark, ἀρχαὶ ὁδίων ταῦτα. But the seeming discrepancy will disappear by taking πρὸ here not physic. of place (which is quite excluded by those passages), but metaph. of what is 'momentous' (as in 1 Pet. iv. 8. James vi.) or of what is especial, like the Latin præ as used for supra, beyond, besides. And such is the use of πρὸ in Plato, Menex. fin. πρὸ γε ἄλλων. Hodian. v. 4, 2, καὶ πρὸ γε (read γε) ἀπάντων. Thus the sense will be: 'But, besides all these things (intimating that something worse will supervene), they will lay hands upon you,' &c. This is quite accordant with the words of St. Matth. and Mark, ἀρχὴ ὁδίων ἐστί, a phrase always intimating that the subsequent evils to be suffered are worse than the first.

— ἀγομένους] MSS. B, D, L, and some cursive ones have ἀπαγ., which is adopted by Tisch. and Alf., but rejected by Lachm., who also at John xviii. 13, and at xix. 16, alters ἀπάγαγον into ἡγάγον, on the authority of B, D, L. On the other hand, at Acts xxiii. 10, he alters ἀγειν into ἀπάγειν, on slender authority, and against the context, to which the sense of carrying off (namely, to punishment) is quite foreign. True it is that ἀπαγ. here may have come from critical alteration; but considering that Luke elsewhere (as infra xxiii. 26, and Acts xii. 19) uses the judicial sense (so suitable here), found also in John xviii. 13. xix. 16. Matt. xxvi. 57. xxvii. 2, 31. Mark xiv. 44, and 53, it is more probable that he used it here, and that ἀπ. was omitted from the carelessness of the scribes.

13. ἀποβ. ὑμ. εἰς μαρτ.] The full sense, expressed and implied, is, 'This public persecution of you shall turn out to be a testimony to your innocence, and to the truth of the Gospel for which you suffer; also of your faithfulness in that cause.' The αὐτοῖς added in Mark denotes 'against them,' 'to their condemnation.' Comp. Phil. i. 28. 2 Thess. i. 5.

14. θέσθε οὖν εἰς τὰς καρδ. ὑμ.] i. e. 'lay it down in your minds as a firmly fixed and heart-felt principle,' &c.

18. There exists a close connexion between v. 17 and this verse, as will plainly appear by a comparison of the parallel passages in Matt. xxiv. 9—13, and Mark xiii. 13, and especially Matt. x. 22, though in none of these several passages are to be found the words καὶ θριξὶ ἀπόληται, which probably made Marcion (as we learn from Epiphani.) cancel them. But we have only to regard them as an insertion incidentally thrown in by way of assuring them, when in trouble and fearful peril, q. d. 'but ye shall suffer no material or serious injury,—none but what will be more than made up to you.' That the words ἐν τῇ ὑπομονῇ—ὑμῶν are meant to be connected with v. 17, is plain from Mark xiii. 13. Matt. x. 22, and even from Matt. xxiv. 10—13, where, as I have shown, the true connexion of v. 13 is with v. 9, and that vv. 10, 11, 12 form (as here) an interposed insertion; and hence I doubt not that the words of v. 19 here, ἐν τῇ ὑπομονῇ ὑμῶν, &c., τὰς ψυχὰς ὑμῶν are meant to intimate the same sentiment as that more plainly inculcated in those passages of Matth. and Mark, ὁ δὲ ὑπομένει εἰς τέλος σωθήσεται. And though there τῇ ὑπομονῇ ὑμῶν † κτήσασθε τὰς ψυχὰς ὑμῶν. ²⁰ Ὅταν δὲ ἴδῃτε κυκλομένην ὑπὸ στρατοπέδων τὴν Ἱερουσαλὴμ, τότε γινώτε ὅτι ἤγγικεν ἡ ἐρήμωσις αὐτῆς. ²¹ Τότε οἱ ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ φευγέτωσαν εἰς τὰ ὄρη, καὶ οἱ ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῆς ἐκχωρεῖτωσαν καὶ οἱ ἐν ταῖς χώραις μὴ εἰσερχέσθωσαν εἰς αὐτήν. ²² ὅτι ἡμέραι ἐκδικήσεως αὐταὶ εἰσι, τοῦ * πλησθῆναι πάντα τὰ γεγραμμένα. ²³ Οὐαὶ δὲ ταῖς ἐν γαστρὶ ἐχούσαις καὶ ταῖς θηλαζούσαις ἐν ἐκεῖναις ταῖς ἡμέραις· ἔσται γὰρ ἀνάγκη μεγάλη ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, καὶ ὄργη [ἐν] τῷ λαῷ τούτῳ. ²⁴ Καὶ πεσούνται στόματι μα-

be no particle δὲ, or such like, in our present copies, yet the Pesch. Syr. Translator had it in his, and so perhaps the Arab., Pera., and Æthiop. Translators. And even suppose no particle was written, it was only dropped for the sake of imparting more force to the words by the Asyndeton. It only remains for me to observe, that I find the view which I have taken of the affinity of this passage to those of Matth. and Mark above adduced, supported by the opinion of Dr. Campbell, but he unjustifiably confines that affinity to Matth. x. 22; and errs far more widely in expressing the sense by 'save yourselves by your perseverance,' which, as he professedly understands the words to refer to eternal salvation (though he admits that this may have reference also to a temporal salvation), suggests the idea of any thing but sound doctrine. The above error was, doubtless, occasioned by his very imperfect knowledge of Greek, for the words could not by any possibility bear that sense; and as to the one assigned by Mr. Alford, who renders: 'By your endurance of all these things possess ye your souls'—(according to which the words will signify, as he explains, that this endurance is God's appointed way whereby their salvation is to be put into their possession); this is almost equally objectionable, since though the theology is somewhat more correct, yet it is not very scriptural; and the sense in question cannot be elicited without great violence. If I am not mistaken, the various unsuccessful methods of interpretation that have been propounded may be traced to a false reading. I do not now see how the reading κτήσασθε can be called for by Matth. xxiv. 13; and the paraphrase I have hitherto laid down is only produced by the amalgamation of both verses; making that of Luke an adjunct to that of Matth., which is objectionable. If we keep the passages distinct, and regard that of Luke as only another mode of expressing the same sense as that conveyed by Matth. and Mark, all will be right; but not unless we read κτήσεσθε, which is found in MSS. A, B, and several others, and has the support of both the Syriac Versions, as also the Vulg., Italic, Arab., and Æthiop., and of Origen, Tertull., and Macar. Accordingly it was put into the inner margin by Griesb., and adopted into the text by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.—perhaps rightly, for in MSS. the letters α and ε are often confounded by the scribes, and hence external evidence has not its usual weight. If it be admitted, there will still be the double sense which Dr. Campb. assigns, and which subsists in the kindred passages of Matth. and Mark, namely, 1. the temporal salvation, q. d. that by their perseveringly bearing up under the evils in question they will, under Providence, preserve their lives; 2. the spiritual; that by their perseverance, under painful sufferings, in faith and duty, they will save their souls. This is a sense, which ὑπομονή not unfrequently bears. Of course the sense is not to be rigidly pressed, but taken populariter, especially considering that the whole discourse is not so much doctrinal as prophetical, and of course partakes of the usual obscurity thereof. The double sense here is exactly the same as the double sense in the passages of Mark and that of Matth. xxiv. 13, ὃ δὲ ὑπομείνας εἰς τέλος—σωθήσεται, where, according to this view, the full sense intended is, 1. 'He who perseveres in faith and Christian duty until Jerusalem be destroyed, will be preserved in body from that awful destruction.' 2. 'He who perseveres in faith and duty unto the end of his course shall be saved by the salvation of his soul.'

20. στρατοπέδων] Meaning, 'encamped armies,' as in the case of a siege.

21. φευγέτωσαν εἰς τὰ ὄρη] Comp. Ps. cxxi. 1. By τὰ ὄρη are meant those mountains described in Ps. cxxv. 2, as 'round about Jerusalem.'

—ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῆς] Meaning, as appears from what follows, at Jerusalem itself; which was especially ἐν μέσῳ Ἰουδαίας, just as Delphi was said to be ἐν μεσομφάλῳ τῆς γῆς. So the Peraic Translator renders, 'within the city itself,' doubtless from a very ancient marginal gloss which had crept into the text. At ἐκχωρ. supply ἐκ μέσου, taken from ἐν μέσῳ. See Numb. xvi. 45, ἐκχωρήσατε ἐκ μέσου τῆς συναγωγῆς αὐτῶν. By ταῖς χώραις may be meant (as in Acts viii. 1) the country parts of Judea, whether towns or villages, &c., as distinguished from the metropolis, or the outlying provinces, especially those of Peræa.

22. ὅτι ἡμέραι ἐκδ., &c.] Meaning, 'for days of avengement (i. e. penal retribution) are those to be.' Τοῦ is for εἰς τὸ ὄσσε, meaning, 'whereby will be fulfilled all that was written [in the prophets] respecting the final destruction of the impudent city.' See Dan. ix. 26, 27.

For πληρωθῆναι very many MSS., including not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies, have πληρῶναι, which is received by most Editors, whom I have now chosen to follow.

23. ἀνάγκη] For θλίψις (which is found in the parallel passage of Matthew), a sense of the word occurring both in the Sept. and the Classical writers.

—ἐν τῷ λαῷ τ.] The ἔν, not found in most MSS., is cancelled by the recent Editors.

24. στόματι μαχ.] Στόμα μαχ. is said to be a Hebraism for ἔτι ν, as in Deut. xx. 13. Yet examples of the same expression are adduced by Wetst. and Elsner from the Classical writers.

— αἰχμαλωτισθήσονται εἰς πάντα τὰ ἔθνη] A prediction fully verified by the statements of the Jewish historian, especially Bell. vi. 9, 2, cited by Wetstein, τοῦ δὲ λοιποῦ πλήθους τοῦ ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ἔτι θύσας ἐπέμψεν εἰς τὰ κατ' Αἰγύπτου ἔργα, πλείονες δ' εἰς τὰς ἱππικίας διεδωρήσατο Τίτος, φθαρσομίμους ἐν τοῖς θεάτροις σιδήρεω καὶ θηρίοις· οἱ δὲ ἑντὸς ἡμέρας ἐπράθησαν.

— πατούμεν] Some take this to mean occupied, and consequently profaned. So Rev. xi. 2. 1 Macc. iii. 52, τὰ ἁγία σου καταπιπύονται καὶ βιβήσονται. Others interpret, 'ignominiously treated.' So Cic. ad Attic. viii. 11, 'Conculcari miseram Italiam videbis proximaestate, et quati utriusque vi.' and Æschyl. Eum. 110, καὶ πάντα ταῦτα λάξ ὁρῶ πατούμενα. The two significations, however, merge into each other, the full meaning being, that 'it shall be in the possession of, and under oppressive and insulting subjection to, the Gentiles, just as captives in war are trodden under the feet of the conqueror.'

— ἄχρι πληρωθῶσι καιροὶ ἐθνῶν] The sense of these words has been not a little disputed; and no wonder, since the prophecy is expressed in general terms, and of which the event predicted is only intimated, and probably is still in course of accomplishment. Some take it to be, 'the times when the Gentiles shall be visited for their sins,' see Jerem. xxvii. 7. Ezek. xxi. 25, xxii. 3, 4. xxx. 3. Yet that would suppose the words to be quite enigmatical. Others (as Lightf., Whitby, and Newton) understand 'the time when the number of Gentiles to be called to God shall be complete.' This, however, is negatived by Rom. xi. 12, seqq. Others again refer the words to a period when the Jews shall be restored; i. e. when the times of the four great kingdoms predicted by Daniel shall have expired, and the fifth, or kingdom of Christ, shall be set up in their place, when the scattered sheep of Israel shall be again collected, and become one fold under one Shepherd, as citizens of the new Jerusalem. The simplest and most probable interpretation is, perhaps, that of Bp. Lonsdale, who assigns the following general sense:—'Jerusalem shall be in subjection to foreign nations (see on Matt. vi. 32) until the times appointed by God for the continuance of the Gentile dominion over it be fully accomplished and brought to a full end.'

25. τῆς γῆς] The recent Commentators in general understand this of Judæa; while the ancient ones take the expression in its usual sense, 'the earth.' Much may be urged in support of either view; nay, both may have place, according as the passage is referred to the destruction of Jerusalem, or that of the world; see note on Matt. xxiv. 3.

— συνοχή] A term denoting, like the Latin angustia, such anxiety as holds the mind as it were enchained, hemmed in, and excluded from all hope and comfort. So 2 Cor. ii. 4, θλίψεις καὶ συνοχῆς καρδίας. Hence it is often associated with nouns denoting distress. So Job xxx. 3, συνοχὴν καὶ τάλαιπωρίαν; and Artemid. cited by Wetstein, τοῖς πένησι, καὶ δούλοις, καὶ δεδαιμένοις, καὶ καταχρόνις, καὶ τοῖς ἐν συνοχῇ οὖσι. Ἀπορία denotes ignorantia consilii, or the not knowing what to do. So Hdot. iv. 14, 1, ἀπορία τοῦ πρακτικοῦ.

— ἡχοῦσης θαλάσσης καὶ σάλου] These words involve a difficulty which has occasioned both variety of reading and diversity of interpretation. To first advert to the former,—the MSS. A, B, C, L, M, X, and a few cursives of the same family, with the Syriac, Persian, Arabic, Vulg., Italic, and Slav. Versions have ἡχοῦσι θαλ., which is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. The reading in question is very specious, but will not bear scrutiny; and it arose, I suspect, from certain ancient Critics, who stumbled at the intermixture of circumstances denoting, as they thought, physical, with those of moral agitation. Such, however, is frequent in the Old Test., and by no means rare in the New Test., especially in the Revelation; nay, is found in the Classical writers, as Æschylus. However, the words here must be understood chiefly in a metaphorical sense, as belonging to the same sublime description as that of Matt. xxiv. 29, and Mark xiii. 24, 25; where see notes. At σάλου supply ἡχοῦντες, taken from ἡχοῦσης preceding. Or we may suppose a sort of Hendiadys. By ἡχοῦσης θαλάσσης καὶ σάλου are, as Kypke observes, designated ἀκαταστασίαι 'et turbulentæ harum commotiones et tumultus.' Comp. Pa. lxv. 7, Ἡε 'stilleth the raging of the sea, and the noise of its waves, and the tumult of the people;' where strepitus maris is explained by the following fremitus nationum. There is in both passages a nautical metaphor, like many in the Classical writers. So Soph. Œd. Tyr. 23, πόλις γὰρ ἤδη σαλεύει· κάνακουφίσει κάρα Βυθῶν δ' οὐχ ὅλα τε φοινίον σάλου. See also Plut. Fab. Max. 37. Rom. 24. Theophyl. Sim. p. 72, 749, and comp. Pind. Pyth. iv. 464. Mr. Alf., indeed, pronounces the text. rec. to be an 'explanatory correction,' a wholly gratuitous supposition, and brings in a phrase of great harshness, 'despair on account of the noise' (as Alf. explains), and one not at all in Luke's manner. I continue to ascribe the reading to critical alteration, arising from ignorance of the construction, and yet more of the purport of the imagery. Yet the ἡχοῦσι. may in some of the copies have arisen from the termination -ης being, as often, written above, and then omitted through the carelessness of scribes. The figure denotes 'extreme agitation and utter distress of mind.'

26. ἀποφυγόντων ἀνθρώπων ἀπὸ φόβου καὶ προσδο.] An Hendiadys for 'a fearful expectation.' Ἀποψυχ. seems only to mean (like ἐκθνήσκω), as we say to die away with fear. These words are very suitable to the nautical metaphor above noticed; for in such distress at sea men's hearts may be said 'to die in them for fear.'

— αἱ δυνάμεις τῶν οὐρ. σαλευθ.] These words have the same sense as at Matt. xxiv. 29, where see note. In fact, the present passage, Matt. xxiv. 29, and Mark xiii. 24, 25, are all of the same nature, and relate to the very same events; i. e. primarily, to the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish state; but secondarily, to the destruction of the world. The imagery seems formed upon a passage of Is. xiii. 10, 13 (which treats of the destruction of Babylon), where Bp. Lowth remarks (after Sir Is. Newton), that 'when the Hebrews intend to express happiness, prosperity, the instauration and advancement of states, kingdoms, and potentates, they make use of images taken from the most striking parts of nature, from the heavenly bodies, from the sun, moon, and stars; which they describe as shining with increased splendour, and never setting; the moon becomes like the meridian sun, and the sun's light is augmented seven-fold (see Is. xxx. 26); new heavens and a new earth are created, and a brighter age commences. On the contrary, the overthrow and destruction of kingdoms is represented by opposite images: the stars are obscured, the moon withdraws her light, and the sun shines no more; the earth quakes, and the heavens tremble; and all things seem tending to their original chaos. See Joel ii. 10. iii. 15, 16. Amos viii. 9.'

ἐλπίσι. Dio Cass. 518, 42, οὐδ' ἀνέκυψεν ἐτι πρὸς ἀκριβὴ παρήσσαν ὁ δῆμος.

— ἐγγίξει ἡ ἀπολύτρωσις ὑ.] According to the primary application, this will signify, 'your deliverance from Jewish persecution, and the tribulations and calamities of Judæa'; when, as is suggested by ver. 31, the kingdom of God, or the dispensation of the Gospel, shall be fully established. According to the secondary application, it will denote redemption.

³¹ ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ Θεοῦ] i. e. the Christian dispensation firmly established. See note on Matt. xxiv. 14.

³⁴—³⁶. These verses contain a caution to the disciples to be on their guard, lest they should be entangled unawares in the ruin that was coming on their country. But they seem meant for general application also to all disciples, of all ages, as a warning against being so stupefied by the pleasures, and distracted by the cares, of this life, as to neglect due preparation, by watchfulness and prayer, for that last coming of Christ to judgment; of which the former advent, to execute vengeance on the Jewish nation, was but a type. Comp. Matt. xxiv. 37. xxv. 13.

³⁴ βαρυνθῶσιν αἱ καρδίαι.] Very many MSS. and early Editions have βαρυνθῶσιν, which is adopted by Wetstein, Matthæi, and others, down to Scholz. But I suspect that the η arose from a confusion with υν, the abbreviations being very similar. It is a great confirmation of the common reading, that the Sept. Translators very often use βαρύνεσθαι, never βαρίσθαι. They have indeed the phrase ἰβανύνη ἡ καρδία at Exod. viii. 15. ix. 7, 31. x. 1, and at Sap. Sol. ix. 15, φθαρτὸν γὰρ σῶμα βαρύνει ψυχὴν. So Hor. Sat. II. ii. 79, 'Quin corpus onustum Hesternis vitis animum quoque preagratua una, Atque affigū humo divine particulam aure.' The term κραιπ. being joined with μίθην (as in Hdian. ii. 6, 9, παρὰ μίθην καὶ κραιπάλην), they may be regarded as synonymous, with the exception of this slight difference,—that μίθην denotes the drunken fit itself; κραιπάλη, 'the state of giddiness, head-ache,' &c., which continues for the next day, or longer, and is a sort of half-ebriety,—a kind of half-delirious stupidity, only to be removed by another fit of μέθη. Here, however, it denotes neither the drunken fit itself, nor the half-drunken state which succeeds, but rather the habit of one and the other, —debauchery.

— μήποτε—αἰφν. ἐπιστῇ ἡ ἡμέρα ἐκείνη] Dr. Hales, S. Chr. vol. iii. 369, desiderates an antecedent to ἡ ἡμέ. ἐκ., to supply which he thinks it absolutely necessary that the 36th verse of the 24th chap. of St. Matthew should be inserted between vv. 33 and 34, to fill up the chasm of another verse hitherto unnoticed by Critics. But to so disentangle embarrassments of Harmony in the Gospels were to resort to more than Socinian rashness. How can we account for such a chasm in every copy of the original Greek, and of the Versions? Why should it have been removed, or could it have been passed over? Besides, no chasm can be proved to exist from the want of an antecedent; which, indeed, in an expression like the present is not needed, since the expression in question is a brief and highly emphatic one, denoting some particular day supposed to be well known to the reader, and standing for ἡ ἡμέρα ἡ μεγάλη, ἡ ἡμέρα τοῦ Κυρίου, equiv. to ἡ ἰσχύθη ἡμέρα, ἡ ἡμέρα τῆς κρίσεως. Indeed, ἡ ἐκείνη ἡμέρα so used occurs several times in N. T., e. g. Matt. vii. 22. 1 Thess. v. 4, in some uncial MSS., ἡ ἡμέρα ἐκείνη, in 2 Thess. i. 10, ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ. 2 Tim. i. 12, ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ. i. 18, ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ. iv. 8, ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ. Heb. x. 25, ὅσα βλέπετε ἐγγίζουσιν τὴν ἡμέραν, where it cannot mean 'the day of judgment.' Moreover, exactly as ἡ ἡμέρα ἐκείνη in this passage of Luke, so is the yet more brief, though somewhat less emphatic ἡ ἡμέρα used by St. Paul in 1 Thess. v. 4, ἵνα ἡ ἡμέρα καταλάβῃ, meaning 'the day of the Lord' before spoken of; nay, it is, not without reason, supposed by Grot. that the Evangelist derived this expression from the Apostle; and the former often employs the same words and phrases as the latter, as if from personal communication.

XXII. 1, 2. Conspiracy of the Jewish chief priests and scribes to put Jesus to death. Matt. xxvi. 1—5. Mark xiv. 1, 2; where see notes.

1. ἡ ἑορτὴ τῶν ἀζύμων] So Joseph. Bell. ii. 1, 3, τῆς τῶν ἀζύμων ἐστάσης ἑορτῆς, πάσχα παρὰ τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις καλεῖται.

2. ἐξήτουν—πῶς ἀνέλωσιν αὐτόν] Here ἐξήτουν answers to the calling of the council, and the deliberation spoken of at John xi. 47. In which, and the consequent determination to put Jesus to death, the Priests and Scribes unwittingly fulfilled the prophecy at Ps. ii. 2, as adverted to by Peter and John, Acts iv. 27. At τὸ πῶς ἀνέλ. a. there is that idiom, by which the Article is prefixed to a whole clause, then to be considered as independent, and itself forming an object; as Acts iv. 21, μηδὲν εὐρίσκοντες τὸ πῶς κολάσωνται αὐτόν, and often elsewhere. See Matth. Gr. § 280.

— ἐφοβούντο γάρ] The γάρ has reference to a clause here suppressed i. e. [but not on the feast day]; 'for,' expressed in the passages of Matthew and Mark.

3—6. Compact of Judas with the chief priests to betray Jesus. Matt. xxvi. 14—16. Mark xiv. 10, 11.

3. εἰσήλθε εἰς τὸ Σ.] Not implying a physical entry of Satan into Judas,—not, indeed, any entry at all; for it is plain from John xiii. 27, that Satan had not yet entered into Judas; but to be understood of mental influence and instigation, i. e. by putting it into his heart to betray Jesus. As those who obey the Divine motions are said to receive the Spirit as a Divine guest, so Satan is said to enter into those who consent unto criminal suggestions. See John xiii. 2. Acts v. 3. Ephes. ii. 2, and the notes on Matt. iii. 16. iv. 1. Luke ii. 27. This view does not at all negative the personality of Satan; that being implied.

The Article before Σατ., not found in many MSS., including several Lamb. and Mus. copies, is cancelled by all the recent Editors; but perhaps without sufficient reason: for though the word, as partaking of the nature both of a proper name and an appellative, may either admit or reject it; yet as here three-fourths of the MSS. have it, and as it is almost always found in the New Test. with Σατανᾶς, except in the Vocative case, it is best to retain it here.

4. στρατηγοῖς scil. τοῦ ἱεροῦ, expressed infra v. 42. By these I would understand, not, with some, the officers charged with the superintendence of the buildings of the Temple; but, with Lightf. and Bp. Middl., the commanders over those bodies of Levites who kept guard in the Temple, mentioned in Acts v. 26, and Joseph. Bell. vi. 5, 3, of whom one, the chief, is mentioned at Acts iv. 1, and sometimes in Josephus, as ὁ στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ. These στρατηγοί, however, were, properly speaking, not military, but civil officers, and, besides the duty above mentioned, acted as 'praefecti' and 'curatores Templi' generally.

6. On the terms ἐξωμ. and συνθ. denoting 'compact and agreement,' see my Lex. It is strange that so many learned Expositors, Beza, Wakef., Newc., and Translators of eminence, should explain ἄτερ ὄχλου, 'apart from the multitude, or common people,'—a sense specious indeed, but not to be sustained on philological grounds, since it would almost demand the Article, τοῦ ὄχλου, and then a sense forced and harsh would arise. The true import is evidently best represented by the rendering of the ancient Versions and the most learned and judicious Commentators, 'without tumult,' which is supported by Acts xxiv. 8.

7. θύεσθαι This term is used, because the slaying of the paschal lamb was a kind of sacrifice. Hence the phrase πᾶσι πᾶσι, to slay the passover, occurs in the Old Test. On this verse to v. 13, see the notes on Matt. xxvi. 17—19, and Mark xiv. 12—16.

10. εἰσελθόντων—βαστάζων Here for συναντήσαι, several MSS. have ἀπαντήσαι, which has been edited by Lachm. and Tisch. It is certainly a plainer term, perhaps more Classical, but evidently derived from the parallel passage of Mark. Render, 'when ye have entered into the city, there will meet with you (join your company) a man carrying a pitcher of water.' For εἰσελθόντων ὑμῶν, a Classical writer would have used εἰσελθούσιν ὑμῖν. Thus in Plat. Com. 'Eort., frag. iii. p. 362, we have Ἐξίστην γὰρ Ἀλιεὺς ἀπήτησεν φίρων μοι κιστρίας.

13. καθ. εἶρηκεν Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit εἰρήκει, from B, C, D, L, and one cursive MS. But I suspect that the reading arose from critical correction, though one wholly unnecessary, since the pres. may be taken in a pluperf. sense, as often in the New Test. and Sept.: e. g. ἰάρακε in Luke i. 22, and John iv. 18, ἀποκυλίκε in Matt. xxviii. 2. In fact, the pluperf. form εἰρήκειν occurs, I believe, no where in the Greek Test. or the Sept.—and, indeed, I cannot find any proof that it was ever used by the Classical, or, indeed, any other Greek writers.

15. ἐπιθυμία ἐπεθύμησα A Hebrew idiom, as in Gen. xxxi. 30, ἐπιθυμία γὰρ ἐπεθύμησας ἱελεθὶν εἰς τὸν οἶκον τοῦ πατρὸς. Here Blackwall, Winer, and Bornem. produce what they call similar phrases from the Greek writers; but, in truth, they are not quite similar. In Hebrew the idiom has a strongly intensive force; in the Greek Classical writers scarcely ever so.

The reason why our Lord thus ardently longed for the arrival of the passover, was, 1. because he knew he should then enter on that conflict, which should terminate in a glorious victory over sin and Satan, and produce the most blessed results to his faithful people of every age. And as he was so soon to leave them, he wished to open his mind freely, and prepare them for the loss they were so soon to suffer, and the trials which ere long awaited them; that they might bear the one and sustain the other. Doubtless, too, he then anticipated the period so shortly to arrive, when he should institute for their use, and that of his followers of all ages, the sacred feast appointed as a sacramental memorial of his death and passion.

16. οὐκέτι οὐ μὴ] Here is a negative of the strongest kind, and somewhat unusual; though examples are adduced by Bornemann from the Classical writers.—Ἐξ αὐτοῦ, 'henceforward.' This is also an expression extremely rare, and almost without parallel in the Classical writers. The next words, οὐ μὴ φάγω ἐξ αὐτοῦ, ἕως ὅτου πληρωθῇ ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ are of the same character with those at Matt. xxvi. 29, and to be explained in the same manner; meaning, that 'he should hold no more social converse with them on earth, up to the period when the work of redemption by his blood (that sacrifice of which the Passover was the type) should be accomplished, and the kingdom of God established.'

18. I have now, with the recent Editors, adopted γινῆμ. from very strong external authority (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies), confirmed by internal evidence.

19. τοῦτο ποιεῖτε, &c.] 'Do this,' namely, that which I have just done,—break bread, &c.

20. τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον, &c.] Meaning, 'by the administration of this cup I institute a new religion, to be ratified by my blood.' comp. Matt. xxvi. 27—29. Mark xiv. 23—25, and also 1 Cor. xi. 23, 26.

— ἡ καινὴ διαθ. — μου] a brief form of expression for 'the sign of the New Covenant, which is to be sealed and ratified by my blood.' See note on Matt. xxvi. 28.

21. ἡ χεὶρ — τραπέζης] i. e. 'the hand (dipped with mine in the same dish).' Comp. Matt. xxvi. 23, and see notes. This is a highly figurative and truly graphic mode of describing treach-ery of the basest sort, i. e. on the part of intimate friends, just as at Pa. xli. 9.

22. For καὶ—Ἰῶδς, Tisch. and Alf. edit ὅτι ὁ μὲν Ἰῶδς from B, D, L, one cursive, and the Copt. and Sahid. Versions; but Lachm. retains the text. rec.; very properly; since the external authority for the other reading is next to nothing, and internal evidence is quite adverse, it being evidently a critical alteration. As to Alf. accounting for the text. rec. by the remark that OTI is omitted before OYI, and the connexion supplied by καὶ, it is 'risu quam refutatione dignus,' and only shows Mr. Alford's slender acquaintance with Palæography. See my note on Mark xiv. 21. That the Pesch. Syr. translators had the text. rec. is quite plain.

24—30. Dispute for pre-eminence: our Lord's reply.

24. ἐγένετο δὲ καὶ φιλονεικία, &c.] From the difference of circumstances, notwithstanding the identity of the thing itself, some Expositors have maintained that this represents an occurrence distinct from that recorded at Matt. xx. 20, and Mark x. 35; while others urge that 'we cannot suppose such a contention for superiority should have occurred immediately after so affecting a lesson of humility.' Accordingly they maintain that this is the same circumstance with that mentioned by Matthew and Mark, but here brought in out of the regular order, of which St. Luke is less observant than the other Evangelists. For myself, I regard this as quite an open question. From what Mr. Alf. has said it would appear that the occurrence of the contentious rivalry at this particular time is not altogether unaccountable. I should be inclined to regard his inference that 'the strife did happen at this time,' in the order related here, were not the data on which it is founded precarious, and scarcely admissible; at least as far as regards the supposing that there has been a transposition of some of the circumstances respecting these various contentions among the Apostles.

existimatur, is accounted. Bp. Pearce remarks, that if the reading δοκεῖ be retained, which he thinks it may (nay, he might have said must, for ἂν εἴη is evidently a mere altered reading, introduced, for its greater easiness, from the parallel passage of Luke ix. 46), we should read δοκεῖν. But this form is a mere barbarism. A far milder emendation would, indeed, arise by reading (so that we adopted the common Greek form of the optative) δοκοῖ. But there is not a single MS. that gives any countenance to such a reading; and hence the common one is best retained, though explained as if δοκοῖ had been read; for there is reason to think that, in the common Greek dialect, the Indicative mood was often used where strictness of propriety would call for the Optative, or the Optative with ἂν. With respect to the present passage, in τὸ, τίς αὐτῶν δοκεῖ εἶναι μείζων, there is much of the appearance of a pleonasm; and so thought the bold ancient Critics who altered δοκεῖ εἶναι into ἂν εἴη (found in the Cod. Cantab. and most of the ancient Versions), and so doing adopted what is found in a kindred passage, supra ix. 46; though even there no absolute pleonasm exists, but only a softening of the more direct and blunt form of expression, τίς ἂν εἴη.

25. ἐνεργεῖται καλοῦνται] Εὐεργετῆς was among the Greeks a title of honour, assigned to all who had in any way deserved well of the monarch or state; and was the title arrogated by, and through flattery bestowed on, the princes or magistrates of antiquity. Comp. Joseph. Bell. iii. 9, 8. σωτήρα καὶ ἐνεργήτην ἀνακαλοῦντας. Diod. Sic. xi. 26. See Hdot. iii. 140, and my note on Thucyd. i. 129, καίταί σοι εὐεργεσία.

26. Our Lord now takes occasion to explain the nature of his kingdom; intimating that it was established on different principles from those of the world, so that he who would be most advanced in his kingdom must be the most humble. At οὕτως supply ἔσεσθε, equiv. to the fuller expression in Matt. xx. 26, οὐχ οὕτως ἔσται ἐν ὑμῖν.

— ὁ μείζων] From the antithetical word νεώτ., this has been by some supposed to denote 'one who is elder,' like the Latin major. But, from the parallel passage of Matth., it is plain that νεώτ. is rather to be accommodated to μείζων than vice versa; and Kypke has adduced several Classical authorities for νεώτερος in the sense of an inferior. He shows that the expressions employed throughout have reference to office, or station in the kingdom of Christ.

27. Comp. John xiii. 13—17.

28. πειρασμοῖς μου] Meaning 'the trials that have befallen me by persecution.' Comp. supra viii. 13 with Matt. xiii. 21; and see Heb. ii. 18. iv. 10.

29. On διατίθ. see my Lex. in v. In the former of the two exx. of the word here it means 'to engage for,' 'to promise:' in the latter, 'to grant,' 'to bestow.' See on Matt. xix. 28, and Rev. ii. 27. The subst. βασιλείαν belongs to both those verbs; q. d. 'I appoint to you—as my Father hath appointed to me—a kingdom, that ye,' &c.

30. καθίσεσθε] This, instead of καθίσθησθε, found in many of the best MSS., including several Lamb. and Mus. copies, has been received by all the recent Editors; and rightly; for, as Bornem. observes, the Future was more likely to be changed into the Subj. than the contrary. And that the Future is meant to be construed with ἵνα, is probable from a similar construction at John xv. 8.

31—34. Our Lord here directs his discourse to Peter (though intending his admonition for all present), in order to forewarn him, and put him on his guard against the temptation soon coming upon him; and also to supply him with an admonition, to be hereafter made use of on being brought to repentance. Although there is an evident connexion with the preceding, yet it is not so close as to confirm the absence of the words in MSS. B and L, and the Copt. and Sahid. Versions, from which Tisch. and Alf. cancel the words. Internal evidence may indeed seem against them; but it is in vain to oppose it to all the copies except two, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Ital., and Vulg. Versions. Mr. Alf. takes for granted the suddenness of the address, and the occurrence which might have occasioned it. Nothing, but what is devoid of proof, could justify the harsh abruptness of the address. I doubt not that in the ancient archetype, whence were derived B and L, the words were accidentally omitted.

31. ἐξητήσατο ὑμᾶς] See my Lex. New Test. in v., from which it is clear that the sense is, 'hath obtained his request that you should be delivered to him (for harm, even destruction).' This is not unfrequent in the Class. writers, but σινιάσαι ὡς τὸν σίτον· ³³ ἐγὼ δὲ ἐδεήθην περὶ σοῦ, ἵνα μὴ ἐκλείπῃ ἡ πίστις σου καὶ σὺ ποτε ἐπιστρέψας στήριξον τοὺς ἀδελφούς σου. ³³ Ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Κύριε, μετὰ σοῦ ἐτοιμός εἰμι καὶ εἰς φυλακὴν καὶ εἰς θάνατον πορεύεσθαι. ³⁴ Ὁ δὲ εἶπε· Λέγω σοι, Πέτρε, οὐ μὴ φωνήσῃ σήμερον ἀλέκτωρ, πρὶν ἢ τρεῖς ἀπαρνήσῃ μὴ εἰδέναι με. ³⁵ Καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ὅτε ἀπέστειλα ὑμᾶς ἄτερ βαλαντίου καὶ πήρας καὶ ὑποδημάτων, μὴ τινας ὑστερήσατε; οἱ δὲ εἶπον· Οὐδενός. ³⁶ Εἶπεν οὖν αὐτοῖς· Ἀλλὰ νῦν ὁ ἔχων βαλάντιον ἀράτω, ὁμοίως καὶ πήραν· καὶ ὁ μὴ ἔχων, πωλησάτω τὸ ἱμάτιον αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀγορασάτω μάχαιραν. ³⁷ Λέγω γὰρ ὑμῖν, ὅτι ἔτι τοῦτο τὸ γεγραμμένον δεῖ τελεσθῆναι ἐν ἐμοί, τό· Καὶ μετὰ ἀνόμων ἐλογίσθη καὶ γὰρ τὰ περὶ ἐμοῦ τέλος ἔχει. ³⁸ Οἱ δὲ εἶπον· Κύριε, ἰδοὺ μάχαιραι ὧδε δύο. ὁ δὲ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ἰκανόν ἐστι.

mostly in the Active voice; yet exx. of the Midd. occasionally occur, as in Æschyl. Ag. 662. Hdnt. i. 159. Dion. Hal. 1315, 7. Xen. An. i. 1, 3. Eurip. Hec. 49. Med. 971. But the obtaining for oneself, one's own purpose, is, I believe, invariably for good; not, as here, for evil. It is accordingly a peculiar form of expression, used by a strong figure of speech, with allusion to the narrative in Job i. 6—12, of the temptation, or trial, of Job, by Satan having obtained of the Lord power over him to try him in every way short of touching his life. By ὅπως is meant 'you all'; and by σινιάσαι (on which see my Lex.) is meant 'for to sift' ('in order to sift) you, put your fidelity and constancy of allegiance to the test by scrutiny. Comp. 1 Pet. v. 8 with Amos iv. 9, also Milton, Par. Reg., 'Opportunity I here have had to try thee, sift thee.'

^{32.} ἐπιστρέψας] Neut. for reciprocal, 'having recovered thyself from that lapse which will befall thee, by hearty repentance, and turning to God.'

^{35.} The connexion here with the preceding context is obscure, and may best be traced by considering the purpose of our Lord in what he was now saying; namely, to forewarn his disciples of, and prepare them for, future trials. This could not be better done than by contrasting their past state with that so near at hand. They are apprised that a total change will shortly take place in their condition, which consequently will require a corresponding change in their plans and measures. Before he had sent them forth for a brief period only, and in their own country; in which case there was no need of long preparation in provisions for their journeys, or precautions against perils. But now they were to go forth to the world at large (see Matt. xxviii. 19), and would have to encounter every form of hardship, necessity, and peril (see 2 Cor. xi. 26, 27). Hence there would be need to provide for altered circumstances by suitable precautions.

duty at any sacrifice, we have conveyed no other than a prophetic intimation of impending perils, as opposed to the quiet and security of former times; our Lord here expressing himself after the manner of the ancient Prophets, who were accustomed to warn men of dangers near and enemies at hand, by representing the means commonly employed, and proper to be resorted to, under such circumstances.

^{37.} ἔτι τοῦτο—ἐν ἐμοί] The connexion is, 'After all that I have suffered, this last endurance remains,—namely, that I should (as was long ago prophesied of me) be brought unto an ignominious death. And as I have suffered, so must you; for the hatred and reproach encountered by the master shall extend to you his disciples.'—Τέλος ἔχει is synonymous with τελεσθῆναι, 'to come to completion by accomplishment,' and is used by the best Class. writers of the completion of predictions.

^{38.} ἰδοὺ μάχαιραι ὧδε δύο] 'See here are two swords.' Since the road from Galilee to Jerusalem was infested with robbers, travellers, it may be supposed, took swords. Nay (as Schoettgen, has shown), at that time in Judæa even the Priests carried arms when on a journey. Inasmuch that, as we find from Josephus, even the pacific Essenes took swords when travelling. So Bell. ii. 8, 4, διὰ καὶ ποιοῦνται τὰς ἀποδημίας οὐδὲν μὲν ἔλκω ἐπικομιζόμενοι, διὰ δὲ τοὺς ληστές ἱσχυροί.

—ἰκανόν ἐστι] The best Commentators, ancient and modern, are agreed that ἰκανόν ἐστι has here a sense not unfrequent, in this and similar expressions in all languages (see the examples adduced in Rec. Syn.), as employed on occasions when we do not care to rectify a dull misapprehension, but dismiss both the person and the thing with 'It is very well; that will do.' See, however, note on Matt. xxvi. 46. Render, 'Enough!' So Shakesp. Macb., 'Dismiss me; Enough!'

41. ἀπεσπᾶσθη] Render: 'withdrew himself from them.' So 2 Macc. xii. 10, ἐκείθεν δὲ ἀποσπασθέντων σταδίου δέκα. Ach. Tat. ii. 10, ἀποσπᾶσθη μὲν ἡ Κλείω, ἡ δὲ παρβίος κατὰλείπειτο. So also in Plutarch, Op. Mor. p. 77, B, we have ὅταν δὲ ἀποσπᾶσθαι in antithesis to ἐν τῷ παρίειναι.

—λίθου βολήν.] A rough mode of estimating distance, which originated in the simplicity of primitive times, and was afterwards retained in the ordinary phraseology used by writers who employed the language of common life. Thus Procop. p. 236, 17, διεστήκει γὰρ αὐτοῦ ὅσον λίθου βολήν.

42. εἰ βούλει—ἀπ' ἐμοῦ] Supply παρίνεγκαι. Or, rather, we may suppose a sort of aposiopesis, by which request is merely intimated, not expressed.

43, 44. These verses are rejected by some Critics, and bracketed by Scholz. But the external evidence for their omission is trifling (only five MSS. being without them), and the internal is quite in favour of the verses; since no reason can be imagined why they should have been introduced, but many why they should have been cancelled. That might very well happen, not only from the heterodox, who denied the human nature of Christ, but also from certain orthodox, but injudicious, persons; who, it should seem, regarded what is here narrated of Christ (similarly to what is elsewhere recorded, of his weeping over Jerusalem, and weeping at the grave of Lazarus) as unworthy of his exalted character, and affording too much countenance to the Arian heresy; and therefore, to take away a stumbling-block, removed the portion (thus I find them obelized in a few Lamb. and Mus. copies), whose genuineness, however, is attested by the weighty authority of Irenæus, iii. 22, 2, and Just. Mart. c. Tryph. p. 331.

44. ἀγωνία] Polyb. viii. 21, 2. iv. 56, 3,—for there, instead of ἦσαν ἐν ἀγωνίᾳ, must be read, ἦσαν ἐν ἀγωνίᾳ. On the nature of this ἀγωνία, and how it is to be understood, see a Dissertation of Hoffman, Lips. 1830, 4to.; also Bp. Jeremy Taylor's 'Considerations,' Works, vol. iii. p. 318, 324.

—ὥσει θρόμβοι αἵματος] It has been generally supposed, that our Lord's sweat was actually blood, or at least bloody; and examples of such a phenomenon have been adduced. But the most eminent Expositors, ancient and modern, understand the meaning to be, 'his sweat became like drops of blood;' a sense, they think, demanded by the words themselves. Compare Acts ix. 19. Nay, Theophylact and Photius (Epist. 13) consider this as merely a proverbial mode of expression, by which it is said of those who labour, that they sweat drops of blood,—a view, however, quite inadmissible. Surely the very existence of the saying in the Greek, as well as in our own and other languages, at least attests the existence of bloody sweats, under excessive perturbation of mind or distress of body. See Lucan, Phars. ix. 809—14, where, among other expressions, we have sudor rubet. So that, after all, those who understand it of a sanguineous appearance in the sweat, probably take the most correct view; espec. as such sweats have been, by numerous authorities adduced or referred to by me in Rec. Synop., proved to have sometimes attended extreme mental agony. So Aristot. Hist. Anim. iii. 19, adduces an instance of sanguineous sweat from extreme agitation; and Dr. Mead, in his Medica Sacra, gives the same attestation from Galen. This view is, I would add, strongly supported by the following citation from an eminent medical writer, Blainville, for which I am indebted to the British Critic for 1831, p. 1: 'On l'a trouvée (la sueur) colorée en rouge dans une affection qui a reçu le nom de Diapedese, maladie dans laquelle il n'y a pas une véritable transpiration, mais qui constitue plutôt une hémorragie par exhalation, comme celle que l'on observe à la surface de la membrane pituitaire. Cette transsudation a lieu dans les cas où, par suite d'une frayeur subite, ou d'une vive émotion, il se fait congestion;' thus denoting a conflict of mind, a wrangling of spirit. In this rare sense it occurs also 2 Macc. iii. 14, 16.

45. κοιμώμενους ἀπὸ τῆς λύπης] The force of the expression may best be understood by considering, that extreme grief has a stupifying tendency, and tends to induce a sort of heavy, though unrefreshing, sleep; an effect which is alluded to in Hom. Od. μ. 310. Quint. Curt. xiv. 13, 17, and other passages adduced by Weta.

Ἰησοῦ φιλήσαι αὐτόν. ⁴⁸ Ὁ δὲ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν αὐτῷ Ἰούδα, φιλήματι τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου παραδίδως; ⁴⁹ Ἰδόντες δὲ οἱ περὶ αὐτὸν τὸ ἐσόμενον, εἶπον αὐτῷ Κύριε, εἰ πατάξομεν ἐν μαχαίρᾳ; ⁵⁰ Καὶ ἐπάταξεν εἰς τις ἐξ αὐτῶν τὸν δούλον τοῦ ἀρχιερέως, καὶ ἀφείλεν αὐτοῦ τὸ οὖς τὸ δεξιόν. ⁵¹ Ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν Ἐὰν ἐως τούτου! καὶ ἀψάμενος τοῦ ὠτίου αὐτοῦ ἰάσατο αὐτόν. ⁵² Εἶπε δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς πρὸς τοὺς παραγενομένους ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ στρατηγούς τοῦ ἱεροῦ καὶ πρεσβυτέρους Ὡς ἐπὶ ληστὴν ἐξεληλύθατε μετὰ μαχαίρων καὶ ξύλων; ⁵³ καθ' ἡμέραν ὄντος μου μεθ' ὑμῶν ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ, οὐκ ἐξετείνατε τὰς χεῖρας ἐπ' ἐμέ. 48. φιλήματι τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου παραδίδως:] The three terms contained in this assertion are all emphatical, and there is a sort of climax; q. d. 'Betrayest thou thy Master, and him the Son of Man, and that with a kiss?' Φιλήματι, as denoting that which constituted the greatest aggravation of the guilt, is purposely placed first, in order to be made most prominent.

49. εἰ πατάξομεν] Ei may here be rendered nam, as in Mark viii. 23, where see note. The full sense is: '[What] if we strike?'

51. εἰ ἄντε ἴως τούτου] These words (obscure from brevity) admit of two different interpretations, according as they are supposed to be addressed to the multitude, those who came to apprehend Jesus, or to the disciples. Agreeably to the former view, the sense is, 'Suffer me thus far, i. e. to touch the ear of the wounded man, —leave me free till I shall have healed the wounded man.' This, however, besides supposing a very harsh ellipsis, yields a sense not a little frigid. According to the latter view, the expression will denote (by an ellipsis of αὐτοῦς after ἄντε), 'let them do what they please,—desist.' See more in Rev. Lonsdale, who ably, but not satisfactorily, maintains this interpretation. Indeed this ellipsis of αὐτοῦς is not a little harsh. The true ellipsis after ἄντε would seem to be rather τὸ πρᾶγμα; and ἄντε may well stand for ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ, 'let alone.' There is also a peculiar pregnancy of sense, as in Thucyd. i. 71, μίχρι τοῦδε ὀρίσθω ὑμῖν ἡ βραδύτης, where see my note. Thus the sense will be, 'Let the matter rest [after its having proceeded] thus far!' q. d. 'Enough of this.' After all, however, the interpretation may be regarded as an open question.

52. ὡς ἐπὶ ληστὴν] The construction is: ἔξιλ. μετὰ μαχαίρων καὶ ξύλων ἐπ' ἐμέ, ὡς ἐπὶ ληστὴν; The ἐπὶ signifies against,—namely, for apprehension; as in Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 11, 6, ἐξελαβεῖν ἐπὶ Μάλιχον πειθῆναι μετὰ ξιφιδίου.

53. ἀλλ' αὕτη—σκότους] There is here again

a certain obscurity, occasioned by the sense being, from intensity of feeling, but imperfectly developed. Some take the words to mean, 'This is the time most opportune for your purpose; this is the hour fitted for deeds of darkness,'—an interpretation supported by several passages adduced from the Classical writers. Others explain, 'This is the time destined and permitted by God, and this is the power of iniquity;' i. e. iniquity has obtained this power; αὕτη ἐστὶ being supplied before ἐξουσία. The latter sense is preferable; and the interpretation, as far as concerns the first clause, is confirmed and illustrated by Matt. xxvi. 45, 56, and Mark xiv. 49; inasmuch as the words here stand in the place of that declaration. The sense of the second clause, however, has not been so well cleared up. It should seem that ἐξουσία τοῦ σκότους is, as it were, a personification of the Prince of darkness, the Devil, called at Eph. ii. 2, ὁ ἀρχὼν τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ ἀέρος, and his subordinate agents ἐξουσίαι τοῦ σκότους. Of ἐξουσία, as used for ἀρχων, examples occur supra xii. 11. Rom. xiii. 1. 1 Cor. xv. 24. Eph. i. 21. iii. 10. Col. i. 16. ii. 10. Thus the complete sense is: 'This is the time when power is given you against me by the determinate counsel of God (Acts iv. 28), and in which the Power, or Prince of darkness, is permitted to exercise his rancour against me.' In the latter clause there is an ellipsis of αὕτη ἐστὶ, to be supplied from the preceding one. Moreover, that there is an emphasis on ὑμῶν, is clear from its position, and is certain from several other passages of the N. T., where the same position before the noun carries with it an emphasis, e. g. Matt. v. 16. xiii. 16, and xx. 26, 27. Mark x. 43, 44. Luke xii. 30, 35, and xxi. 34. John xiii. 14. In all these passages the pronoun has more or less of emphasis, though the Commentators have rarely perceived it, and the early Critics, stumbling at the position, altered it.

⁵⁵ ἐκάθητο—ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν] MSS. B and L read μέσος αὐτῶν, which is adopted by Tisch. and Alf. But Tisch.'s second thoughts were here not wiser, and both he and Alf. had better have retained ἐν μέσῳ, with Lachm. I doubt not that μέσος was introduced by some Critic, whose purpose it was to get rid of the tautology existing in ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν καὶ ἐν μέσῳ αὐτῶν: and he was induced so to do, by bringing to mind such passages as John i. 26, μέσος ὑμῶν ἵστηκεν: Acts i. 18, ἐλάκησε μέσος, where the adjective is used instead of the adv. μέσῳ, with ellip. of κατὰ, as in Aristoph. Ach. 571. Ran. 469. Eq. 388, ἔχουσιν μέσος. Jos. Antt. vi. 7, 3, οὗτοι—μέσοι κατώκηνται, scil. αὐτῆς. And such is the use of medius in Latin. Yet there exists far too little evidence for the reading in question to warrant its being adopted; and indeed I am half inclined to think that μέσος is only an error of the scribes for μέσῳ, equiv. to κατὰ μέσῳ, as in Phil. ii. 15, according to the texts of Lachm. and Tisch., and perhaps in Matt. xiv. 24, as also occasionally in Sept., e. g. Numb. xxxv. 54, πόλις μέσῳ τούτου ἵσται ὑμῖν.

⁵⁶ ἀτενίσασα αὐτῷ] 'having fixed her eyes intently on him.' See my Lex. in v.

⁵⁷ ὁ δὲ ἡρνήσατο αὐτόν, λέγων, &c.] The MSS. B, D, K, L, M, S, X, Δ, and many cursives, to which I add 12 Lamb. and Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B. x. 16, together with the Syr., Ital., Pers., Ar., and other later Versions, have not the αὐτόν, which is bracketed by Griesb. and Alf., and cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch. And certainly there is much to countenance this. It would seem that the αὐτόν is not called for, considering that the denial here recorded was only of a certain allegation on the part of the damsel, that he was one of Jesus's companions and disciples, a denial not of a person, but of a thing. And, accordingly, the word has no place in the parallel Gospels of Matthew and Mark. But it is not improbable that each of these reasons may have occasioned the word's being thrown out by two different classes of Critics, the one on the former grounds, the other on the latter just adverted to. Nevertheless, the first reason is of no force when applied to the phraseology of the Gospels. And, as to the other, the persons who acted on it did not consider, that the words of the denial as contained in the several Gospels differ not a little. In the parallel passages of Matthew and Mark we have οὐκ οἶδα [οὐδὲ ἵστανται] τί σὺ λέγεις: in that of Luke, οὐκ οἶδα αὐτόν, 'I do not know the person you speak of.' It would seem to have been the intention of St. Luke to make as prominent as possible Peter's denial of his Master. Hence he used the words οὐκ οἶδα αὐτόν. And hence at v. 61, we have πρὶν ἀλέκτορα φωνῆσαι ἀπαρνήσθαι με τοῖς, in allusion to the words of Jesus recorded by the Evangelist supra, v. 34, οὐ μὴ φωνῆσαι ἀλέκτωρ πρὶν ἢ τοῖς ἀπαρνήσθαι μὴ ἰδίῳι μὲ. Thus, too, may we account for the Evangelist's writing at xxii. 57, notwithstanding the trifling verbal slip in phraseology, ἡρνήσ. αὐτόν. The extreme antiquity of the reading αὐτόν is attested by its being found in the Alexand. MS. and most of the other uncial MSS. As to Cod. Cant., it is wrongly alleged as authority for the omission, since the MS. originally had it (though afterwards it was removed by some Critics); and, accordingly, it is found in the Latin Version of that MS. Thus it appears that strong internal evidence is combined with overpowering external authority in favour of the authenticity of the word, which by all the rules of criticism ought to be retained in the text. Mr. Alf., profiting by the above critical discussion, has now removed the brackets, and traces the removal of the word to its absence from the parallel Gospels.

—λέγων· Γύναι, οὐκ οἶδ. α.] MSS. B, L, X, place γύναι after αὐτόν. How the position of γύναι came to be altered will appear from my note on John iv. 21. If Tisch. and Alf. had considered the matter in as expansive a view as I have there done, they would not have, injudiciously, caught up this alteration of the Alexandrian Critics. The position of γύναι last in a sentence, though frequent in the Poets—as Homer and Eurip.—is never, I think, found in the prose writers. As to the force of the γύναι, it may here fall under that head which I have treated of in my note ubi supra, where it is characterized as a term of courteous address.

⁵⁸ ἕτερος] In the passage of Matthew we have ἄλλη, 'another maid-servant.' This discrepancy, however, may be removed on the principle suggested by Wetstein,—that ἕτερος may be used with reference to δύο persons being understood, which is sometimes used of a scotoma. Examples of this idiom are frequent. Thus Pausan. ii. 21, speaking of two women, τοῦτον δὲ φασιν; and Soph. Elect. 977, τὰς τὴν κασιγνήτην.—For εἶπεν Tisch. and Alf. read ἔφη, from B, K, L, M, and six cursives, to which I could add a few Lamb. and Mus. copies; and internal evidence is rather in favour of the reading. Yet there is no sufficient authority for the change; as Lachm. saw, who retained the text rec.

uncial and cursive MSS.; to which I add most of the Lamb. and many of the Mus. copies; and, as internal evidence is rather against the word, I have placed it within brackets.

61. After φων. Tisch. and Alf. add σήμερον, from B, K, L, M, X; and about three cursives and two others insert it before φων.; to which I could add several Lamb. and Mus. copies; but it would nought avail, since internal evidence is against the word, which was more likely to be brought in, because thought necessary by some Critics, than removed by others, because not in Matthew and Mark; a principle against whose application I have already more than once protested. I suspect that the word was introduced from the Latin Versions.

66. τὸ πρεσβ. τοῦ λαοῦ] Luke alone, in this passage, and in Acts xxii. 5, gives this name to the Sanhedrim. At Acts v. 21 he calls it ἡ γερουσία.

— ἀνήγαγον αὐτόν] MSS. B, D, K, and many others, with Origen, read ἀνήγαγον,—manifestly a critical alteration, arising from a mistaken view of the true force of this forensis term, of which the exact sense is, 'brought him up for examination (adduxerunt, as two MSS. of the Ital. Vers.) unto their tribunal;' (So Acts xii. 4, ἀναγ. αὐτόν τῷ λαῷ. 2 Macc. vi. 10, and Xen. Hist. iii. 3, 11,) 'brought him up unto (i. e. before, as Coverdale) the council.'

67. εἰ σὺ—εἰπέ ἡμῖν] These words admit of being rendered in three different ways. 1. 'Art thou the Christ? tell us.' 2. 'If thou art the Christ, tell us [so].' 3. 'Tell us whether thou be the Christ [or not].' The first mode has far less to recommend it than the 2nd and 3rd, of which the former is, on account of its greater simplicity and suitableness, entitled to the preference.

68. ἐὰν δὲ ἐρωτήσω] The best founded sense of this variously interpreted expression is, 'If I simply tell you [I am Christ], ye will not believe me; and if I propose questions in argument, to support my claim, ye will not answer me;' or, in other words (with Bp. Lonsdale), 'If, besides telling you that I am the Christ, I also put questions to you, in order to convince you that I have spoken the truth, ye will not answer me,' &c. For an instance of our Lord's questioning his enemies, with a view to expose their wilful unbelief, and of their declining to answer him, see supra xx. 1—7. Accordingly, I agree with Mr. Alf. in regarding these words as a sort of formal protest on the part of our Lord against the spirit and tendency of the question asked him, before he gives an answer to it; q. d. 'I am aware of the design with which this question is put; but, however (πλὴν in Matt.), the time is come for the plain avowal to be made,—ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν, &c.' The πλὴν of Matt. introduces more of definiteness; but there is here greater force and gravity in the ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν.

XXIII. 1. τὸ πλῆθος αὐτῶν] Πλῆθος. Render: 'cortex,' 'the bulk,' 'the number sufficient to form a quorum;' and by αὐτῶν understand the chief priests, &c. Or πλ. may here have simply the sense number, without reference to great or small. So Thucyd. i. 47, τῶν εἰκοσι νῆων, ἀπὸ ἑκαττακτονος πλῆθους, οὐ παρὸντων, and elsewhere. Ἦγαγον (instead of the text. rec. ἤγαγεν) is found in almost all the best MSS., and has been adopted by all the later Editors.

αὐτὸν ἐπὶ τὸν Πιλάτον. ² Ἦρξαντο δὲ κατηγορεῖν αὐτοῦ, λέγοντες· Τοῦτον εὖρομεν διαστρέφοντα τὸ ἔθνος, καὶ κωλύοντα Καίσαρι φόρους διδόναι, λέγοντα ἑαυτὸν Χριστὸν βασιλέα εἶναι. ³ Ὁ δὲ Πιλάτος ἐπηρώτησεν αὐτὸν, λέγων· Σὺ εἶ ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν Ἰουδαίων; Ὁ δὲ ἀποκριθεὶς αὐτῷ ἔφη· Σὺ λέγεις. ⁴ Ὁ δὲ Πιλάτος εἶπε πρὸς τοὺς ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ τοὺς ὄχλους· Οὐδὲν εὐρίσκω αἴτιον ἐν τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ τούτῳ. ⁵ Οἱ δὲ ἐπίσχυον λέγοντες· Ὅτι ἀνασεύει τὸν λαόν, διδάσκων καθ' ὅλης τῆς Ἰουδαίας, ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τῆς Γαλιλαίας ἕως ὧδε. ⁶ Πιλάτος δὲ, ἀκούσας Γαλιλαίαν, ἐπηρώτησεν εἰ ὁ ἄνθρωπος Γαλιλαῖός ἐστι· ⁷ καὶ ἐπηγούους ὅτι ἐκ τῆς ἑξουσίας Ἡρώδου ἐστίν, ἀπέπεμψεν αὐτὸν πρὸς Ἡρώδη, ὄντα καὶ αὐτὸν ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις ἐν ταύταις ταῖς ἡμέραις. ⁸ Ὁ δὲ Ἡρώδης ἰδὼν τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἐχάρη λίαν ἦν γὰρ θέλων ἐξ ἱκανοῦ ἰδεῖν αὐτὸν, διὰ τὸ ἀκούειν πολλὰ περὶ αὐτοῦ· καὶ ἠλπίζε τι σημεῖον ἰδεῖν ὑπ' αὐτοῦ γινόμενον. ⁹ Ἐπρωτὰ δὲ αὐτὸν ἐν λόγοις ἱκανοῖς· αὐτὸς δὲ οὐδὲν ἀπεκρίνατο αὐτῷ. ¹⁰ Εἰστήκεισαν δὲ οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ οἱ γραμματεῖς εὐτόνοος κατηγοροῦντες αὐτοῦ. ¹¹ Ἐξουθενήσας δὲ αὐτὸν ὁ Ἡρώδης, σὺν τοῖς στρατεύμασιν αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἐμπαίξας, περιβαλὼν αὐτὸν ἐσθῆτα λαμπράν, ἀπέπεμψεν αὐτὸν τῷ Πιλάτῳ. ¹² Ἐγένοντο δὲ φίλοι

2. εὖρομεν] The full sense of this law-term is, 'we found, ascertained on due inquiry.'

— κωλύοντα] 'hindering the payment of tribute to Caesar,' indirectly at least, by himself, claiming a kingship over the Jews; though, in fact, the kingship of the Messiah was only a spiritual sovereignty. See John vi. 15, and note.

5. ἐπίσχυον] lit. 'grew strong, or stronger, more vehement, or urgent,' in the accusation. The reading of D, H, and a few cursives, ἐνίσχυον, was derived from the Latin Version, invalocabant.

— ἀρξάμενος ἀπὸ τῆς Γ.] On this form see note at Matt. xx. 8. Here the terminus ad quem is added, ἕως ὧδε; where ὧδε is for ταύτης τῆς πόλεως.

9. ἐπρωτὰ] 'interrogated him;' the word being used in a judicial sense, as John xviii. 21. Our Lord returned no answer to these interrogatories, as well knowing that they were not put from any desire to know the truth.

11. ἐξουθενήσας] 'having treated him with insult and ignominy.' How, and in what manner, see Matt. xxvii. 29, and Mark xv. 18; though what is here said is chiefly meant of Herod's στρατ.,—meaning, as in Acts xiii. 10, 'his body-guards' in attendance.

— καὶ ἐμπαίξας, περιβαλὼν, &c.] Though almost all the Translators and Expositors conjoin περιβαλὼν ἐσθῆτα with the ἀνέπεμψεν a little after, yet I doubt whether this was intended by the Evangelist. They seem to have done this merely for the purpose of getting rid of the awkwardness involved in two Participles coming together so soon after another Participle, ἐξουθ. And, although this construction with what follows may seem borne out by Matt. xxvii. 29—31, yet it is not; since what is there recorded is the ἐμπαίξις of the Roman soldiers just before leading Jesus to crucifixion, not what is here recorded, the ἐμπαίξις of Herod and his body-guards. Accordingly, I am inclined to think that περιβαλὼν should be conjoined with the preceding ἐμπαίξας, regarding the second Participle περιβαλὼν as answering the purpose of the Latin gerund, and meant to denote the mode or manner of the thing,—namely, by putting on him a scarlet robe. Render thus: 'And having, in derision, arrayed him in a scarlet robe.' The Participle thus used to denote mode or manner is indeed rarely found, except after a verb; though sometimes after a participle, as here and in Joseph. Ant. xiv. 15, 7, ἀεθόμενος αὐτὸν διημαρτηκότα παρακούσαντα, 'having got wrong by having disobeyed.' Eurip. Phœn. 1014, μόλις κατηγορήσαντι εἰμι. Soph. El. 652, ξυνούσαν—εὐμερούσαν. Moreover, instead of three participles associated in one clause, we have in Eurip. Suppl. 231, no less than four.

12. ἐγένοντο φίλοι] 'were made friends.' See Acts iv. 27. It is observed by M. Saurin, that 'the reconciliation of Herod and Pilate is more wonderful than their enmity.' The enigma, however, is solved by the profound remark of the Stagirate, that 'it contributes much to the formation of friendship, or to the recovery of it, to either love or hate the same person; to be engaged, no matter how, as colleagues in the same business.' That, in the present instance, was the putting down of the Gospel; and in doing this the interchange of civilities would tend to promote the reconciliation. Comp. Æschyl. Agam. 659.

ὁ τε Πιλάτος καὶ ὁ Ἡρώδης ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ μετ' ἀλλήλων προϋπήρχον γὰρ ἐν ἔχθρᾳ ὄντες πρὸς ἑαυτοῦς. ¹³ Πιλάτος δέ, συγκαλεσάμενος τοὺς ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ τοὺς ἄρχοντας καὶ τὸν λαόν, ¹⁴ εἶπε πρὸς αὐτούς· Προσηνέγκατέ μοι τὸν ἄνθρωπον τούτον, ὡς ἀποστρέφοντα τὸν λαόν. καὶ ἰδοὺ, ἐγὼ ἐνώπιον ὑμῶν ἀνακρίνας, οὐδὲν εὔρον ἐν τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ τούτῳ αἴτιον, ὃν κατηγορεῖτε κατ' αὐτόν· ¹⁵ ἀλλ' οὐδὲ Ἡρώδης· ἀνέπεμψα γὰρ ὑμᾶς πρὸς αὐτόν· καὶ ἰδοὺ οὐδὲν ἄξιον θανάτου ἐστὶ πεπραγμένον αὐτῷ. ¹⁶ Παιδεύσας οὖν αὐτὸν ἀπολύσω. ¹⁷ Ἐάνγκην δὲ εἶχεν ἀπο-

o Matt. 27, 16, 18, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

— ἐν ἔχθρᾳ] Classical usage would require ἐπ' ἔχθρᾳ, as in Thucyd. i. 69. Schleusm. and Kuin. say that προϋπ. has the force of an adverb here and at Acts viii. 9. But, in fact, ὑπάρχειν here follows the construction of τυγχάνειν, and ὄντες could not be dispensed with. For though we may say εἶναι ἐν ἔχθρᾳ, yet we cannot, with due respect to propriety of language, say ὑπάρχειν ἐν ἔχθρᾳ.

derstood, but usually of a milder sort of correction. Here punishment by flagellation is meant, which however may, as Hammond thinks, have been proposed to the people by Pilate, as a lighter punishment, to serve instead of a heavier. And this sort of scourging was usual among the Jews for offences not capital; and also indeed among the Greeks and Romans, being administered especially in cases where the offender could not be convicted on certain proof, and yet had evidently been guilty of some misdemeanour. Now, as Pilate was evidently averse to inflicting capital punishment, so he perhaps thought that this flagellation might, by exciting the compassion of the multitude, do away with the other. He might even think, that in awarding this punishment he was administering wholesome correction to one whom he regarded in the light of an imprudent fanatic, as appears from his address, John xviii. 37, οὐκ οὖν βασιλεὺς εἰ σύ; and that question of careless contempt, τί ἐστὶν ἀλήθεια;

²¹. ἐπεφώνουν] Render: 'shouted thereupon, responded to,' scil. ἐπὶ τοῖς ἐρημίμοις.

²³. ἐπέκειντο φωναῖς μεγ.] 'instabant alta voce,' 'were urgent with him in loud voices.' So Aristoph. Equit. 252, καί, καὶ δῖωκε, καὶ τάραιτε—καπικαίμενος βόα, ἐπὶ τοῖς vociferā.

ἐπέκρινε γενέσθαι τὸ αἴτημα αὐτῶν ²⁵ ἀπέλυσε δὲ [αὐτοῖς] τὸν διὰ στάσιν καὶ φόνον βεβλημένον εἰς τὴν φυλακὴν, ὃν ᾗτουντο τὸν δὲ Ἰησοῦν παρέδωκε τῷ θελήματι αὐτῶν.

24. ἐπέκρινε] 'judicando decrevit,' 'decided.' The word may denote the final adjudication, or decree, of a judge. So Plutarch, 864, B, ἐπαγαγὼν τοὺς μάρτυρας καὶ ἐπείκρινας, &c. But it should rather, I think, be regarded as employed in a popular sense, like the Lat. decernere, and Eng. to make up one's mind, determine on any course of action.

25. ἀπέλυσεν αὐτοῖς] i. e. 'he pardoned at their request;' αὐτοῖς being a dat. commodi. In many MSS., including many Lamb. and Mus. copies, &c., the αὐτοῖς is not found; and it is cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Tisch., and Alf., but without sufficient reason. Lachm. has bracketed the word; which is all that I feel warranted in doing, though internal evidence is rather against it.

26. τοῦ ἐρχομένου] The τοῦ, not found in the greater part of the MSS., including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and early Editions, is cancelled by almost all Editors. Propriety of language will not admit it; and it seems to have arisen from the ιου preceding.

— ὀπισθεν τοῦ [I.] i. e. he laying hold of the hind part, and Jesus of the fore part.

27. αἱ καὶ ἐκόπτοντο] Render: 'who also were bewailing themselves and lamenting him.'

28. μὴ κλαίετε ἐπ' ἐμὲ, &c.] Meaning, 'Weep not so much for me as,' &c. 'Here,' observes Grotius, 'our Lord speaks agreeably to the manner of men, who weep rather for their own evils, than for those of others.' So Soph. Phil. 339, οἵμαι μὴ ἄρκειν σοὶ γὰρ καὶ τὰ σ', ὡς τὰλας, Ἀλγήμεθ', ὥστε μὴ τὰ τῶν πῖλας στάνειν, q. d., 'If you could see the calamities which await you and your children, you would have no tears left for me.' Of the former many perished in the siege of Jerusalem; but on their children chiefly fell the miseries here spoken of.

29, 30. How awfully the predictions contained in these verses were fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem, the narrative of the great Jewish historian abundantly attests. The first of these verses alludes to a pathetic circumstance, to which numerous parallels from the ancient writers are adduced by Pricæus, Grotius, and Wetstein. The second contains a yet more touching feature of this graphic sketch; with which may be compared similar descriptions in Is. ii. 19. Hos. x. 8. Rev. vi. 16, 17. ix. 6. See espec. Hos. ix. 12—16. So Joseph. Bell. ii. 6, 2 (speaking of what had taken place under Herod's reign), σαῶν, πλείστων γούν ἀνηρημένων ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, τοιαῦτα πεποιθέναι τοὺς καταλιφθέντας, ὥστε μακρῆξισθαι τοὺς ἀπολωλότες. Here, however, I cannot agree with Kuinoel and certain recent Commentators, that 'per montes et colles intelliguntur cavernæ et speluncæ;' see Matt. xxiv. 16. To suppose any allusion to the caves as places of refuge (though during the siege of Jerusalem some took refuge in subterranean vaults and sewers) would be to mar the beauty of the idea, which simply expresses that they would even wish for speedy death to rid them of their troubles. So Bp. Lonsdale remarks, that this is a strongly figurative description of a people in such extremity of terror and despair, as to desire to be buried under their own mountains and hills, rather than meet the wrath of an offended God, alluded to in the passages of Scripture above referred to.

31. ἐν τῷ ἡγρῷ—γίνονται] A proverbial form of expression, which, as here applied, may be, with Bp. Lonsdale, thus understood: 'If these things be done to me, who am as unfit to be destroyed as a green and flourishing tree (comp. Ps. i. 3. lii. 8), what shall befall those Jews, who, by their wickedness, shall have become as fit for destruction, as dry wood is fit for fire!' Comp. Ezek. xx. 47, where the words 'every green tree, and every dry tree,' seem descriptive of the persons who, in Ezek. xxi. 3, 4, are called 'the righteous, and the wicked,' who are there spoken of as about to be destroyed. This view is confirmed by the admirable exposition of Theophyl. (probably derived from Chrysost.), εἰ ταῦτα ποιοῦσιν ἐν ἡμοῖς ἡγάρτω, καὶ αἰσθαλεῖ, καὶ αἰχλῶν, διὰ τὴν θυσίαν, τί γίνονται ἐν ὑμῖν ἐκάρποι καὶ πάσης δικαιοσύνης ζωοποιῶ ἱεστημένοι; Comp. 1 Pet. iv. 12—18 with John xv. 6, where see notes.

32. Most Commentators are of opinion that

39 ° Εἰς δὲ τῶν κρεμασθέντων κακούργων ἐβλασφήμει αὐτὸν, ^{o Matt. 27. 44. Mark 15. 32.} λέγων· Εἰ σὺ εἶ ὁ Χριστὸς, σῶσον σεαυτὸν καὶ ἡμᾶς. 40 Ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ ὁ ἕτερος ἐπετίμα αὐτῷ, λέγων· Οὐδὲ φοβῆ· σὺ τὸν Θεὸν, ὅτι ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ κρίματι εἶ; 41 Καὶ ἡμεῖς μὲν δικαίως· ἄξια γὰρ ὧν ἐπράξαμεν ἀπολαμβάνομεν· οὗτος δὲ οὐδὲν ἄτοπον

Christ is here reckoned with the malefactors, agreeably to what was said supra xxii. 37, καὶ μετὰ ἀνόντων ἰλογισθῆναι, and because he was so considered by the Jews. This view, however, as it involves no little harshness, must not, and, indeed, need not be adopted, if, with many of the best Commentators, we regard κακούργοι as not in concord, but in apposition, with ἑτεροί; by which the expression will be equiv. to οἱ ἥσαν κακούργοι. So in Thucyd. iv. 67, οἱ δὲ μετὰ τοῦ Δημοσθένους Πλατταίης τε φίλοι καὶ ἑτεροί, περίτολοι (for οἱ ἥσαν π.), ἀνέβρισαν, &c. See another example in Routh's Reliq. Sac. iv. 117.

By this term κακούργοι are, it is supposed, not meant strictly speaking, 'robbers,' but 'insurgents, brigands.' It is true that these are called by Matth. and Mark λῃσταί. But λῃσταί and κακούργοι were, as Kypke and Wetstein have shown, convertible terms; and from the examples they have adduced, it is clear that both of them were applied not only to robbers, but to plunderers and ravagers in war. On the latter term see Thucyd. ii. 67. vii. 4, 10. ii. 22. iii. 1. vi. 6; and on the former, Thucyd. iv. 2. viii. 40, and my notes there. Probably, however, the persons in question were both insurgents and robbers; persons who, having taken up arms on a principle of resistance to the Roman oppression, were, indeed, professedly opposed to the Romans only; but, when engaged in their lawless courses, made less difference between Romans and Jews than they at first set out with doing.

34. Πάτερ, ἄφες αὐτοῖς, &c.] The complete construction is an Accus. of the thing (the offence) and a Dat. of the person, i. e. the doer of it, as in Matt. vi. 12. As to the next words, οὐ γὰρ οἶδασιν τί ποιοῦσι, 'they know not what they are doing,' considering that they were uttered probably at the very time when the soldiers were nailing our Lord to the cross, they must have especial reference to them, who, as Romans, were probably ignorant of our Lord's true character; yet we cannot but suppose that the prayer likewise included such of the Jews as, through ignorance, had been instrumental in procuring his condemnation and death. Comp. Heb. iii. 17. xiii. 27. 1 Cor. ii. 8. Our blessed Lord, compassionating their ignorance, whatever might be its cause, implores God to pardon them, praying that opportunity for repentance might be granted to the guilty, and that pardon might be extended to such as should lay hold on the mercy of God. I agree with Mr. Alf., that between the two members of this prayer lies the work of the Spirit, leading to repentance—the prayer, that they may have their eyes opened, and know what they have done. Comp. 2 Tim. ii. 25, 26.

35. σὺν αὐτοῖς] This is to be closely connected with ἐξεμυκτῆριζον; as if the sentence had been thus written: καὶ εἰστήκει ὁ λαὸς θεωρῶν καὶ ἐμυκτῆριζον. Συνεξεμυκτῆριζον δὲ καὶ οἱ ἄρχοντες, λέγοντες, &c. The thing is more clearly expressed in the passages of Matth. and Mark, where it is said that the people, or 'passers-by,' reviled him, &c.; and likewise also the chief priests mocking him, with the scribes and elders, said, He saved others, &c.

38. ἦν δὲ καὶ ἐπιγραφὴ γεγραμμένη ἐπ' αὐτῷ] See note on Matt. xxvii. 37, and Mark xv. 26. The Turks have at this day the same custom (which was also that of the Romans. See Sueton. Domit. 1. and Calig. 32), and the ἐπιγραφὴ is called yafia.

40. οὐδὲ φοβῆ· σὺ τὸν Θεόν, &c.] The best Commentators are agreed that the οὐδὲ must be connected with σὺ; q. d. 'Dost thou, too, not fear God,—seeing that, &c. In other words, 'Art thou so void of the fear of God, as to rail at this person in his sufferings, though thou thyself art undergoing the same punishment with him?'

41. οὐδὲν ἄτοπον] not 'nothing amiss,' as our common Version, from Tyndale, renders (a rendering also adopted by Wakef. and Newc.); but, 'nothing base, unseemly, unbecoming (lit. 'out of place'), unsuitable to a good man.' This sense (occurring also at Acts xxv. 5) is very peculiar. The only other examples I know are in Polyb. v. 11, 3. xviii. 37, 9. Dio Cass. p. 54, 6. 500, 74. 543, 6. 998, 68. Ed. Reim.

sures-grounde, stocked with beasts for the chase, pertaining to the country residences of eastern monarchs or princes (see Neh. ii. 8, comp. with Eccl. ii. 5), in which view the term frequently occurs in Xen. and other Greek writers. It was employed by the Sept. to denote a garden to walk in, watered by a river, for the growth of plants and fruits, and especially the Gan, or garden of Eden; and in later Jewish usage (Jos. Antt. xviii. 1, 3. Bell. ii. 8, 11. iii. 8, 4. Chagiga on Cohel, vii. 15), it was applied to denote that pleasant abode in Hades appointed for the reception of the just, until they should, after the day of judgment, be again united to their bodies in a future state; see Josephus, Bell. Jud. iii. 8, 4. ii. 8, 11; the intermediate state of faithful souls,—that between death and the resurrection to bliss,—where, like Adam and Eve in Eden, the just are admitted to a participation of the true tree of life, which 'is in the midst of the Paradise of God.' This, indeed, Chrysostom has shown, was the idea entertained of Paradise by all the orthodox believers of his time. The sense, therefore, intended to be expressed was, that 'the penitent malefactor might hope from the mercy of God for something far beyond what the Jewish teachers attached to the idea of Paradise; even a secure and quiet retreat for the time, which should intervene between death and the resurrection: and also (which was implied in the other) an admittance into the regions of that eternal felicity, of which the other was but a foretaste and earnest.'

full sense is, 'had not assented to their counsel, or taken part in the deed done by them.' How συγκ. comes to have this sense see my Lex. in v.

— προσεδέχετο τὴν βασιλείαν τ. Θε.] This expression (which occurs also at Mark xv. 43) means, 'he, in firm faith, was expecting the coming of the Messiah.' It is, however, implied in the context, that he believed JESUS to be that Messiah. Thus the present expression is nearly equivalent to the one used, in this same case, by Matt. xxvii. 57, ἡμαθήμενος τῷ Ἰησοῦ, and John xix. 38, ὡν μαθητὴς τοῦ Ἰησοῦ.

53. ἐν μνήματι λαξευτῷ] i. e. 'hewn out of the solid rock' (so Matthew and Mark have δὲ ἐλατόμῳ ἐν τῇ πέτρᾳ); not, as the term would import in a Classical writer, 'of hewn stone.' Indeed all the Jewish μνημεῖα were subterranean caves or vaults, and (in so rocky a country) would of course have to be cut out of the solid rock.

54. ἐπέφωσκε] 'was just dawning,' i. e. commencing. As the Sabbath commenced in the evening of the preceding day, the expression ἐπέφωσκε requires to be taken by a metaphor which may seem strange. Yet it is justly observed by Kuinoel (after Wetstein), that however incongruous it might sound to Greek and Roman ears, when they heard of the evening, or approach of night, expressed by ἐπιφώσκει, yet to Jewish ones it was so familiar that it could present no harshness.

XXIV. 1. μιᾷ] for πρώτη, by Hebraism. — ὁρθρου βαθέος] lit. 'at deep dawn,' while one yet needs a light. Βαθὺς is often used with words denoting time, espec. evening, night, or the dawn of day, as here. With respect to ὁρθρου, Hemsterhus. on Lennep Etymolog. in v. says, 'the phrase properly means, "when the day already dawns forth;" and that by rendering it here primo mane no discrepancy will be involved with the accounts in the other Evangelists.' The only expedient is, however, unnecessary; and seems to have been resorted to from a notion that the word had something to do with light; which is not the case. The word may rather be said to denote that period which immediately precedes day-light, i. e. the morning twilight (see Lobeck in Phryn. p. 276), what Gray alludes to in his fine line, 'The breezy call of incense-breathing morn;'—better 'the breezy stir.' So an old English writer, in a passage which may have been in Gray's mind, says, 'The crowing of the cock, the noise of little birds, every small stirrings waketh them.' The word derives its origin from δρω, to stir; and denotes properly that slight stir of the air which ushers in the dawn. This will account for and illustrate the use of the epithet βαθ., also found in the purest Greek writers. It is strange that Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. should have adopted the reading βαθέως, though supported by strong authority; to which I could add not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies; but it would nought avail, since the reading is a manifest Itacism. Mr. Alf. says it may be an old form of the Genit.; but he should have proved that such a form ever existed.

4. διασπορ.] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἀπορ., from B, C, D, L. but in addition to infinitely stronger external authority, internal evidence is in favour of διασπ., considering that while the compound verbs often pass into simple, not so the contrary. Besides, the term διασπορ. was likely to be used by the Evangelist, since it occurs often in his Gospel and in the Acts, but not elsewhere in N. T.

— ἀστραπτούσαι] The term does not mean, as some explain, 'streaming out light'; it merely denotes 'the shining of pure whiteness,' and may be rendered, 'dazzling white.' So Luke ix. 29, ὁ ἱματισμὸς αὐτοῦ λευκὸς ἕξαστράπτων. Also Mark ix. 3, ἱμάτια στιλβόντα. White garments are, indeed, appropriate to angelic messengers, see John xx. 12. Acts i. 10; and hence the expression is employed of the accepted of God, Rev. iii. 4, 5. See note on John xx. 12.

5. κλιν. τὸ πρόσ.] Τὸ πρόσωπον is put for τὰ πρόσωπα, as in Matt. xvii. 6, and Rev. vii. 11, and sometimes in Sept., espec. in the phrase ἐπὶ πρόσωπον ἔπισον. Many ancient MSS. have τὰ πρόσωπα, evidently from a marginal explanation, though by Tisch. injudiciously adopted into the text. The term κλιν. indicates that mixed feeling, of reverence and of terror, which forbade them to look up; agreeably also to the notion (founded on Exod. iii. 6. xix. 27. Judges xiii. 20, et al.) which regarded it as highly dangerous to look at any heavenly appearance.

— τί ζητεῖτε, &c.] This, as appears from the citations in Wetstein, was a popular adage among the Jews to denote that any one is employing himself to no purpose.

— τὸν ζῶντα] 'one who is alive,' 'a living person.' The "deeper meaning" sought by Origen, and caught up by Olsh., and nearly so by Alf., is a baseless fancy.

10. αἱ λοιπαὶ] 'the other women;' meaning that company of women who, along with the two Marias and Joanna, are mentioned so frequently in this history; see supra viii. 3.

11. ἐφάνησαν λῆρος τὰ ῥήματα αὐτῶν] 'seemed idle talk.' Comp. Lucian Tim. i., ἅπαντα ταῦτα λῆρος ἦδη ἀναπείφηναι.

— ἠπίστανον αὐταῖς] It is not meant that they believed them to have fabricated the account, but as regarding them in the light of foolish women; since, as it is truly observed by Thucyd. vi. 33, οἱ τὰ μὴ πιστὰ δοκοῦντα εἶναι ἀπαγγέλλοντες, οὐ μόνον οὐ πείθουσιν, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀφρονες δοκοῦσιν εἶναι.

12. With this verse compare John xx. 4—12. Lachm. brackets, and Tisch. cancels, the verse, but solely on the authority of D and some Latin copies;—a most insufficient warrant, and, when standing alone, next to nothing. Alf. grants that it could not have been interpolated from John xx., but for a reason only entertained to countenance his vain notion that 'the two passages had a common origin.'

— παρακύνφας] Παρακύνπτειν prop. signifies 'to stoop to any thing,' and espec. 'to stoop in order to look down or into any thing.' This last is the sense in the present passage, and in Theocr. Id. iii. 7, τοῦτο κατ' ἄντρον παρακύνπτωσα.

— μόνα] scil. τοῦ σώματος, 'apart from the body of Jesus.' So John xvi. 32.

— ἀπῆλθε, πρὸς ἑ. θ.] The sense here will depend upon the construction. Πρὸς ἑαυτὸν may be construed either with the preceding, ἀπῆλθε, or the following, θαυμάζων. Several ancient and some modern Commentators adopt the former mode, adducing in its support certain passages from the Classical writers and from the New Test. But of the latter only one is to the purpose, John xx. 10, ἀπῆλθον οὖν πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς οἱ μαθηταί; and, at all events, that will only show that such might be the sense, if the context should permit it. Yet this it does not; for as to the sense which they assign, 'he went home to his inn or lodging,' it is truly observed by Campbell, that 'it seems more probable from infra v. 24, and John xx. that Peter did not go directly home from the sepulchre, but returned to the place where the Apostles and disciples were assembled.' Hence it is better to construe the words with θαυμάζων, as is done by most Expositors, ancient and modern (supported by the authority of all the best ancient Versions and Theophylact); espec. as, from the occurrence of the similar expression, διελογίζοντο πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς at xx. 14, it appears to be very suitable to the style of the Evangelist.

13. δύο ἐξ αὐτῶν] These words must be referred to v. 9, ἀπήγγειλαν ταῦτα πάντα τοῖς ἑνδεκα, καὶ πᾶσι τοῖς λοιποῖς. The two persons here mentioned are, with reason, supposed to have been of the number of the Apostles, or at least of the Seventy. The name of one of those persons the Evangelist has recorded; that

ἡ ὄνομα Ἐμμαούς¹⁴ καὶ αὐτοὶ ὠμίλουν πρὸς ἀλλήλους περὶ πάντων τῶν συμβεβηκότων τούτων.¹⁵ * Καὶ ἐγένετο, ἐν τῷ ὠμίλειν αὐτοὺς καὶ συζητεῖν, καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἐγγίσας συνεπορεύετο αὐτοῖς.¹⁶ οἱ δὲ ὀφθαλμοὶ αὐτῶν ἐκρατοῦντο τοῦ μὴ ἐπιγινῶναι αὐτόν.¹⁷ Εἶπε δὲ πρὸς αὐτούς· Τίνες οἱ λόγοι οὗτοι, οὓς ἀντιβάλλετε πρὸς ἀλλήλους περιπατοῦντες, καὶ ἐστε σκυθρωποί; ¹⁸ Ἀποκριθεὶς δὲ ὁ εἰς, ᾧ ὄνομα Κλεόπας, εἶπε πρὸς αὐτόν· Σὺ μόνος παροικεῖς [ἐν] Ἱερουσαλὴμ, καὶ οὐκ ἔγνως τὰ of the other he has omitted to mention, and has thereby exercised the misplaced ingenuity of the Commentators in guessing it.

— Ἐμμαούς] There were two places of this name; one a town, 160 stadia from Jerusalem, and often mentioned in Josephus, the Books of Maccabees, and the Rabbinical writings; the other (the one here meant) a village distant only 70 stadia. These persons probably lived at Emmaus, and were returning thither from the feast of the Passover.

14. ὠμίλουν πρὸς ἀλλήλ[.] 'were conversing with each other.' This signif. of ὠμ. is rare in the Class. writers, but not unfrequent in the Hellenistic ones.

16. οἱ δὲ ὀφθαλμοὶ αὐτῶν ἐκρ[.] It is not agreed among the Commentators, whether this being prevented proceeded from natural causes, or supernatural. The ancients and early moderns take the latter view, and attempt to trace the mode in which this was effected; adducing several passages of the Class. writers, where a similar effect is ascribed to the influence of some Deity, ex. gr. Soph. Aj. 85, ὡς σκοτώσει βλίσφαρα καὶ διδορόκτα. The more recent Commentators ascribe it to natural causes, taking the word metaphorically; and refer the hindrance to the inattention of the observers, or to our Lord's being so situated as not to be distinctly seen, espec. with the change of apparel mentioned at Mark xvi. 12. According to this view it is considered as an Oriental and popular mode of expression, importing that they were prevented from recognizing, i. e. failed to recognize him. But ἐκρατοῦντο, when coupled with διηνολήθησαν just after, is far too strong a term to permit us to suppose aught less than Divine agency, on either the body or the mind, or both. Comp. Mark xvi. 12. John xxi. 4. 'Though, as there is a marked economy in all the preternatural operations of the Deity, it is not for us to pronounce how far that agency might be exerted, or how far the natural causes might contribute to the effect in question. Be that as it may, the words ought to be rendered, 'their eyes were held fast, so that they did not see him,' i. e. recognize him.

17. The various readings of the only five MSS. that present any variety (for all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS. have the text. rec.) are evidently only three several modes of removing the difficulty involved in the construction—namely, either by omitting the words καὶ ἴσται, or by altering ἴσται to ἴστησας or to ἰσθῆσαν:—but the strongest external authority, confirmed by internal evidence and the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, forbids any conjectural emendation; and the supplying of τι (proposed by Beza, Kuin., and Bornem.) supposes an unprecedented ellipsis. Were there any competent authority for the omission of καὶ ἴσται, there would be no difficulty in supposing an ellipsis of ὄντας. See Matth. Gr. § 549, 6, Oba. 3, and Jelf's Gr. § 705. But the authority of MS. D, notorious for its falsification, is next to nothing. But why all this fluctuation of judgment? The construction is merely one partaking of the slight irregularity, occasioned by that resorting to the language of common life, which is observed on occasions in which strong emotion makes the writer, or speaker, forgetful of the strict rules of grammatical propriety. So here the verb is used where rigid propriety of language would have required the participle ὄντας with σκυθρωποί, and in that case no ellipsis of ὄντας would be admissible. In short, the matter is placed almost beyond doubt by a passage of Soph. Aj. 327, τοιαῦτα γὰρ πᾶς καὶ λέγει κἀδύρεται, which Brunk renders, 'tales nimirum vobis, et questus, edit'; evidently considering this use of the second verb in Indicat. as standing for the Participle, διδυρόμενος. Nevertheless, Tisch. and Alf. catch up this manifest παράδοξοις, found in MS. D, regarding the text. rec., καὶ ἴσται, as an insertion to break a harshness, where it is plain the words were removed to avoid a difficulty in construction, which Origen more effectively removed by cutting out all these words. The text. rec. must be retained, and regarded as a slight flaw in composition, occasioned by bringing in the graphic, which has here a fine effect (the term σκυθρ. may be rendered 'sad-visaged,' as in Milt. Par. L. x. 23, 'dim sadness did not spare, | that time, celestial visages; yet, mix'd with pity, violated not their bliss.' So I would point, to do justice to an incomparably fine thought.

— ἀντιβάλλετε] The word properly signifies 'to toss backwards and forwards,' as a ball; but is here used of the reciprocation or interchange of remark in conversation, or discussion. So 2 Macc. xi. 13, πρὸς αὐτὸν ἀντιβάλλον, 'reasoning with himself.' The reading ἀμφιβ. (commended by Wakef.) of some ancient MSS. (not the Leicr. MS., teste Jacks.) came from the polishing school; and the passage of Pindar adduced by Wakef. only confirms my opinion.

18. σὺ μόνος παροικεῖς, &c.] Some difference of opinion exists as to the exact import of these words. The ancient and earlier modern Commentators take the sense to be, 'Art thou the only sojourner in Jerusalem who art ignorant of these things?' The later Expositors, however, from Whitby and Wolf downwards, take παροικεῖς in the sense 'art thou a stranger?' and regard the words as a form of speech applied to those who are ignorant of what is doing around ἐμφοβοὶ γενόμενοι· ἐδόκουν πνεῦμα θεωρεῖν. ³⁸ Καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Τί τεταραγμένοι ἐστέ; καὶ διατὶ διαλογισμοὶ ἀναβαίνουνσιν ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ὑμῶν; ³⁹ Ἦ ἴδετε τὰς χεῖράς μου καὶ τοὺς πόδας μου, ὅτι αὐτὸς ἐγὼ εἰμι· ψηλαφήσατέ με καὶ ἴδετε ὅτι πνεῦμα σάρκα καὶ ὀστέα οὐκ ἔχει, καθὼς ἐμὲ θεωρεῖτε ἔχοντα. ⁴⁰ Καὶ τοῦτο εἰπὼν ἐπέδειξεν αὐτοῖς τὰς χεῖρας καὶ τοὺς πόδας. ⁴¹ Ἔτι δὲ ἀπιστοῦντων αὐτῶν ἀπὸ τῆς χαρὰς, καὶ θαυμαζόντων, εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ἐχέτε τι βρώσιμον ἐνθάδε; ⁴² Οἱ δὲ ἐπέδωκαν αὐτῷ ἰχθύος ὀπποῦ μέρος, καὶ ἀπὸ μελισσίου κηρίου. ⁴³ καὶ λαβὼν ἐνώπιον αὐτῶν ἔφαγεν. ⁴⁴ Εἶπε δὲ αὐτοῖς· Οὗτοι οἱ λόγοι οὗς ἐλάλησα πρὸς ὑμᾶς ἔτι ὧν σὺν ὑμῖν, ὅτι δεῖ πληρωθῆναι πάντα τὰ γεγραμμένα ἐν τῷ νόμῳ Μωϋσέως καὶ Προφῆταις καὶ Ψαλμοῖς περὶ ἐμοῦ. ⁴⁵ Τότε διήνοιξεν αὐτῶν τὸν νοῦν, τοῦ συνίεναι τὰς γραφάς· ⁴⁶ καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ὅτι οὕτω γέγραπται, καὶ οὕτως ἔδει παθεῖν τὸν Χριστὸν, καὶ ἀναστῆναι ἐκ νεκρῶν τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ, ⁴⁷ καὶ κηρυχθῆναι ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι αὐτοῦ μετάνοιαν καὶ ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν εἰς πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, ἀρχά-

it was peculiarly suitable, as addressed to them in their present state of alarm, and coming from Him who had, before his death, said, 'My peace I leave with you.' See John xiv. 27.

37. πτοηθέντες καὶ ἐμφοβοί, &c.] This extreme fear doubtless arose from the suddenness of the appearance. So Quintil., cited by Wetstein: 'Inopinata subito amici mei species effulsit: obstupui, totumque corpus perfudit frigidus pavor.'

38. διαλογισμοὶ ἀναβ.] By διαλ. is meant 'reasonings,' 'discussions by mutual questionings.' This fig. use of ἀναβαίνειν with διαλογ. occurs with ἐν or ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ at Acts vii. 23. 1 Cor. ii. 9, and also in the Sept. at Is. lxxv. 17. Jer. iii. 16, and elsewhere; answering to the Heb. בְּלִבְךָ יִשְׁמְרֶנּוּ.

39. ψηλαφήσατε—ἔχοντα] The reading, presented by the MS. D, supported by some MSS. of the Italic, ought not to have received any countenance from Lachm. The βλέπετε, for ἴδετε, is a mere gloss, and the ἴδετε is strongly supported by the words of an exceedingly ancient writer, St. Ignat. ad Smyrn. § 3 (nay, as Bp. Pearson, on the Creed, p. 452, thinks, the Hebrew Gospel of St. Matthew, from which I grant Ignat. may have derived the words), who, referring to this circumstance, says: λάβετε, ψηλαφήσατέ με καὶ ἴδετε, ὅτι οὐκ εἰμι δαιμόνιον ἀσώματον, where the με serves to defend the με of our text; and the words οὐκ εἰμι δαιμόνιον supply a good illustration of the scope of our Lord's address.

— πνεῦμα σάρκα καὶ ὀστέα οὐκ ἔχει] From the citations adduced by Wetstein and others, it is plain that both the Jews and the Gentiles alike believed in the immateriality of departed spirits. See Hom. Od. xi. 217, and Virg. Æn. vi. 700. And so Max Tyr. Diss. xv. 1, οὐ γὰρ σάρκες αἱ δαιμόνων φύσεις, οὐδὲ ὁσά αὐτὰ αἷμα, agreeably to Ovid, Met. iv. 413, 'errant exsangues, sine corpore et ossibus umbræ.' It is, however, the opinion of the recent Commentators in general, that our Lord is not to be understood as confirming those notions, but as meaning to show his hearers that, according to their own ideas with respect to the nature of spirits, he could not be one. But that is a very unsatisfactory view; and I quite agree with Dr. Burton, that our Lord's assertion must not be taken as representing merely the popular notion concerning spirits, but as declaring the truth of the matter from Him who is the Truth; not only as knowing what is in man, but what is Man, whether corporeal or incorporeal, in the body or out of the body.

41. ἀπιστοῦντων αὐτῶν ἀπὸ τῆς χ.] This is sometimes the case on the occurrence of events very felicitous, which happen suddenly and unexpectedly. We think the news too good to be believed, and fancy we are dreaming. So Ovid: 'Tarda solet magnis rebus inesse fides.' Liv. xxxv. 40, 'Vix silimet, prae necopinato gaudio, credentes.'

42. ἀπὸ μελισσίου κηρίου] A frequent food with the ancients, espec. among the abstemious. So Porphy. Vit. Pyth. 34, says of Pythagoras: τῆς δὲ διαίτης τὸ μὲν ἄριστον ἦν κηρίον, ἡ μέλι: δέπεινον δ' ἄρτους ἐκ κευχρίων.

44. οὗτοι οἱ λόγοι (scil. εἰσι) οὗτοι ἔλ. &c.] Meaning: 'The words spoken by me, when I was with you, imported that all things written of me (that I should die, &c.) should be fulfilled.' The Psalms stand for the Hagiographia, as being the chief book of that division.

45. διήνοιξεν αὐτῶν τὸν ν.] This is quite distinct from the explanation of the Scriptures supra v. 27, and imports an enlightening of the mind by assisting the natural powers; and it may also include inclining and disposing the mind to attend to the knowledge in question.

47. ἀρχάμενον ἀπὸ 'Ι.] That the commencement should be made from Jerusalem, was a prerogative of the Holy City.

49. καὶ ἰδοὺ, ἀποστέλλω τ. ἰ.] The ἰδοὺ is absent from D, L, and a few cursive MSS., owing either to carelessness on the part of the scribes, or to the temerity of the Critics, who deemed it unnecessary; which also caused it to be passed over in some ancient Versions. The clause has occurred elsewhere, e. gr. Matt. xxviii. 7. Mark v. 22 (where Tisch. rashly cancels it), 2 Cor. xiii. 1. Rev. iii. 11. v. 6. vi. 12. xv. 5. The ἰδοὺ derives confirmation from Matt. xi. 10, ἰδοὺ ἐγὼ ἀποστέλλω, and Luke x. 3, ἰδοὺ ἐγὼ ἀποστέλλω. For ἀποστ., Tisch., in his second Ed., and Alf. read ἐξαπ., from B, L, X, Δ; while Lachm. retains the text. rec.,—very properly; since there is not sufficient authority (I find no confirmation in the Lamb. and Mus. copies) to warrant any change, though that would yield a very suitable sense. The case is different at Acts xiii. 26, where Lachm., from strong authority of MSS., adopts ἐξαπιστάλη,—perhaps rightly. See my note.

— ἐνδύσησθε] Ἐνδύεσθαι answers to the Heb. נָדַח, and the Latin induere; but, like them, when taken in conjunction with δύναμις, denotes that supernatural energy from on high so indispensable to qualify them for their important functions. It is true that almost every Translator, ancient and modern, has assigned to ἐνδύσθαι a passive sense, 'until ye be endued with.' But there is no proof that ἐνδύσθαι was one of those verbs of which the fut. middle was used in a passive sense. And in N. T. this very form ἐνδύσομαι, ἐνδύσεσθαι, several times occurs in a mid. sense (Matt. vi. 25. Mark vi. 9. Luke xii. 22), but never in a passive. And such is the case in the Classical writers. Hence it would seem that this is one of those many future middle forms used apparently in a passive, though, in reality, in a middle sense. See Jelf, Gr. § 364, 4, a.

52. προσκυνήσαντες αὐτόν] The term here must denote no less than the performance of religious worship, now first rendered to Christ by the Apostles, even though absent and invisible; a decisive proof of their opinion of his Divinity.

I. 1 • ἘΝ ἀρχῇ ἦν ὁ Λόγος, καὶ ὁ Λόγος ἦν πρὸς τὸν Θεόν, καὶ Θεὸς ἦν ὁ Λόγος. ² Οὗτος ἦν ἐν ἀρχῇ πρὸς τὸν Θεόν.

OF all the Gospels this must be considered the most important, both as regards the subjects treated of, and the doctrines thence to be deduced. In no other have we the real Person of the Redeemer so fully exhibited; inasmuch that with reason was it called by the Fathers THE SPIRITUAL VOLUME. While the other Evangelists chiefly occupy themselves in narrating the events which marked our Lord's earthly course, St. John applies himself, almost exclusively, to record the Discourses of Christ, and whatever, either of words or deeds, was calculated to show forth his majesty and glory, his Divine origin, the nature of the office committed to him by the Father, and the efficacy of his death as an atonement for the sins of the world. The other Evangelists have, indeed, inculcated this fundamental course of Christian doctrine, but only occasionally and incidentally; St. John, professedly and systematically. In fact, the purpose of St. John in writing this Gospel differed materially from that of the other Evangelists. It was not to write a History of the life of Christ, but to select, with the utmost effect, some of the most remarkable parts of his personal history, in order thereby to introduce, and bring forward in outline, some of the most important of his discourses, in which he spoke of Himself, his person, and his office; intending thereby to demonstrate his Divine nature, to show the excellency of his office, and to vindicate the truth, as to doctrine, against the Jews and Judaizing Christians of those times, and sceptical persons of every age,—who, whether from the influence of error or deep-rooted prejudice, should entertain notions derogatory to the honour of the Saviour. This the Evangelist has effected; not by resorting to subtlety of argument, but by stating the evidence of facts, and urging the authority of our Lord himself. Accordingly, as St. John did not intend to write the life of Christ, he commences, not with his birth by the Virgin Mary, but carries us back beyond even the creation of the universe, and teaches that our Saviour existed before that period. He commences with a PROEM (forming, in some measure, the sum and substance of the whole Gospel; or, rather, a kind of Introduction, or Programme, placing us on such a platform of observation, as may afford a survey of the actions, and discourses, and the closing scene, which sealed the whole; thus imparting a tone to the whole of the following Gospel), which has been justly termed the Golden Proeme, and which Augustin tells us a Platonic Philosopher said ought to be written in letters of gold, and hung up in all the churches. On its contents, see note on i. 1—18. To advert to the subsequent matter;—after adverting to the strong testimony of John the Baptist, and recording the commencing miracles wrought in Cana of Galilee and the Temple of Jerusalem, it seems to have been the intent of the Evangelist to furnish his readers with some specimens of the Discourses of Christ, in order thence to establish and illustrate the positions laid down in the Introductory matter. For, in each year of Christ's ministry, St. John has narrated certain actions and miracles, and recorded certain discourses, in which our Saviour spoke of his person and office. These actions, however, he seems to have related principally with a view to the discourses, which gave rise to them. As to the miracles, it was not his intention to accumulate as many instances as possible of the miraculous powers exerted by Christ; but only to select such as were best adapted to the purpose of his Gospel. The later discourses of our Lord, and the history of his passion, death, and resurrection, St. John has more fully detailed, both that Christians might be assured of the reality—disputed by the Jews—of his death (to which so great an efficacy attached); and that they might be convinced of his resurrection, and the glory into which he was afterwards received. It is, too, from this Gospel especially that we collect the actual state of the controversy of the Christians with the Jews.

To advert to the personal history of the Evangelist himself;—suffice it to say that, as being the son of a respectable, and probably somewhat opulent master fisherman at Bethsaida, he must have had a tolerable education; and, although without pretensions to learning properly so called, could by no means be termed illiterate. He and his brother James had probably received an excellent religious education, under the sedulous care of their mother Salome,—who had been long “looking for the consolation of Israel,” and was afterwards devotedly attached to the Redeemer,—had been well grounded in the Scriptures; if not in the original, yet in the Syro-Chaldee, and in the Sept. Versions; and were probably not wholly unversed in the Rabbinical learning of the day. From the time that they received their immediate call from Christ, they became first his disciples, then his constant attendants; and, lastly, were appointed, with others, as Apostles, of whom John formed one of the three principal and most valued. With respect to the character and disposition of the Evangelist;—we have every reason to think that it was frank and amiable, yet uniting suavity with firmness. Hence he became the object of our Lord’s peculiar regard and confidence; which he repaid by the most devoted attachment to his Master, who had so great affection for him that he was called His ἑταῖρος.

The genuineness of the present Gospel is unquestionable; not only as being attested by the strongest internal evidence (namely, in its style and peculiar character, the circumstantiality of its details, and the evident marks of the writer’s having been an eye-witness of most that he relates), but from the strongest external evidence, in an unbroken chain of testimonies from writers in the Apostolic age down to that of Epiph., Chrys., and Jerome. It was, indeed, never disputed, until lately by Bretschneider—whose doubts, however, have been, as he confesses, entirely removed by the very able writers who came forward to maintain the authenticity of the Gospel—and since by Baur and Strauss, whose arguments have been completely refuted by others of their own countrymen, and recently by Davison, in his Introduction. On the genuineness of two portions of it, namely, the narrative of the woman taken in adultery, ch. viii. 1—11, and also of ch. xxi., see the notes there.

To advert to the characteristics of this Gospel. The Evangelist has a style and manner peculiar to himself, uniting plainness and softness with sublimity of character; not such as results from art, but such as is engendered by largeness of conception, united with a natural simplicity of expression; and which, coming from the heart, speaks to the heart. As to the diction, it is comparatively pure, though considerably Hellenistic, and even Hebraistic, in its character. The Hebrew characteristic is, however, chiefly apparent in the manner in which sentences are connected, which is totally different from that of Paul, and even of Luke. John generally connects sentences by καὶ, οὖν, and οὕτως, and is above all the writers of the New Test. remarkable for a very sparing use of the Particles,—where, indeed, his want of mastery over the Greek language is most apparent; which, notwithstanding, scarcely ever prevents him from employing appropriate terms to express his ideas, and suitable diction wherein to embody them. For a delineation of the chief peculiarities of phraseology the reader is referred to the able Synopsis of Credner, or to its epitome in Davison, also to the more elaborate work of Luthardt, which presents some words and idioms not readily elsewhere found; though the general stock of words at the Evangelist’s command seems to have been somewhat limited.

This Gospel is, however, notwithstanding the simplicity just adverted to, by no means without its difficulties, which may be accounted for in various ways. 1. From the abstruseness of the subjects treated on; besides that (as observes Campb.), it does not appear to have been our Saviour’s intention to express himself in such a manner as to be equally intelligible to all. Nay, his own disciples he brought only by little and little to the full knowledge of his doctrine. 2. From the obscure cast of style and manner of the writer. 3. From the strongly Hebraic character of the composition; and that not only in the acceptance of words (some of which are peculiar to himself), but in the structure of sentences, and espec. in the use of the Tenses; where Enallage of Past, Present, and Future is not unfrequent. Hence, after all the labour which has been so profusely bestowed upon it by learned and pious Expositors, there is not any book of the New Test. of which the interpretation has been so uncertain, and, in a great degree, undetermined.

But, to advert to some important circumstances connected with this Gospel,—namely, as to the place where, and time when, it was written,—the unanimous voice of antiquity testifies that the place was Ephesus. For this we have the weighty testimony of Irenæus; and, as the facts of the Evangelist’s life, as far as they are known,—are in harmony with this attestation, there is, as Davison observes, no good reason, nor any resulting advantage, for setting aside so weighty an authority. Indeed, on this all the principal modern inquirers are quite agreed. On the time, however, considerable difference of opinion exists. It has been the general opinion, both of ancient and modern inquirers, that it was drawn up about the close of the first century: while some of those who are fully able to judge of such matters (as Lampe and Lardner), suppose it to have been written, at any rate, before the destruction of Jerusalem; though they differ as to the exact date. The former opinion, however, would seem most agreeable to ancient authority; although the testimonies adduced are almost entirely from writers (such as Epiphanius, Theodoret, and Jerome) of a period too far removed from the Apostolic age to have much weight. In fact, the only ancient authority they allege is Irenæus ap. Euseb. Eccl. Hist. v. 8 (where, however, it is merely said that John wrote after the other Evangelists), and another passage cited from him by Lardner, vi. 187, from which it has been inferred, that this Gospel was written very long after the destruction of Jerusalem. But the opinion may have originated in the notion (prevalent both in ancient and modern times) that this Gospel was written for the especial purpose of confuting the heresies of Cerinthus and the Gnostics as to the person of Christ, and partly of confuting the notions of the

Sabeans, or Johannites. Now if we inquire what evidence can be alleged for that opinion, several expressions in the Proeme are pointed out, and a few others occurring up and down in the Gospel. Yet these cannot, without considerable influence from imagination, be thought to give any great countenance to it; and Expositors best acquainted with the contents of this Gospel (as Calvin, Lampe, Tittman, Kuinoel, and Tholuck) are decidedly of opinion that the notion is unfounded, and that the design of St. John in writing this Gospel was of a general nature,—namely, to convey to the Christian world just notions of the real nature, character, and office of that great Teacher, a Saviour, who came to instruct and to redeem mankind. So John himself says, xx. 31, 'These things are written, that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing, ye may have life in his name.' So long, however, as the opinion prevailed, that the Gospel was a polemical one, and written to confute heresies, men were obliged to suppose almost as late a date, as the life of the Evangelist would permit, for the publication of the Gospel; since the heresies in question were not prevalent before the latter end of the first century.

To advert to another opinion as to the purpose of the Gospel, that it was written to supply the deficiencies and omissions of the former Evangelists;—for this there is very slender foundation, at least in the Gospel itself. And when it is attempted to unite this notion with the very late date, the inconsistency is patent; for if the date were what those inquirers allege, and if St. John wrote to supply certain deficiencies in the former Gospels, why are so many things unaccountably omitted? as, for instance, the remarkable fulfilment of our Lord's prophecies respecting the destruction of Jerusalem; which would have tended in the highest degree to confirm whatever the Evangelist intends to prove. Moreover, if St. John meant, as they say, to supply the omissions, and confirm the authority, of the preceding Evangelists, is it likely that he would have suffered thirty or forty years to elapse without doing either one or the other? Those, indeed, who contend for a late date, ground their arguments not only on external testimony, but on internal evidence,—namely, the contents of the Gospel. The Evangelist, they allege, considers those whom he is addressing as little acquainted with the Jewish customs and names; since he gives various explanations, even more frequently than St. Mark and St. Luke. The reason of which, they think, was, that, at the time when St. John wrote, many more Gentiles had been converted; and thus it became necessary to explain several circumstances, which required no explanation while the Jewish Polity was in existence. These arguments, however, are rather specious than solid. For the very same reasons, in nearly the same degree, might exist some thirty years earlier. Upon the whole, it should seem that there is no conclusive evidence adduced for the very late date assumed by some. On the other hand, many arguments are pressed much too far in favour of an early date, even before the destruction of Jerusalem. To advert to a few of both;—

Lampe, Tittman, and others appeal to ch. v. 2, 'there is at Jerusalem by the sheep-market, a pool having five porches,' &c. as a proof that this Gospel must have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem; since it recognizes the city as in being when the words were written. To this others make answer, by remarking, that writers 'do not weigh their words so exactly;' and that 'the Present there may be put for the Past tense.' But the former is a frivolous excuse, and in its present application savours of irreverence; and as to the latter, such a confusion of tenses would, in narration, involve a harshness intolerable. To the utter destruction of Jerusalem, Josephus, Bell. vii. 1, bears decided testimony. And notwithstanding the city might in the course of some twenty-five years have been partially rebuilt,—though of this no historical evidence exists, nor could well be expected,—we have reason to think that the Roman emperor did not demolish every edifice in the city, but allowed some to remain for the use of the garrison thereat, just as was the case at Athens after its destruction by the Persians. That the pool of Siloam remained is clear from the testimony of Eusebius and Jerome in their Topography of Jerusalem; so that though the Romans might destroy it, by closing it up, they might permit the porticoes to remain for the convenience of the Roman soldiers who should use it as a bath. And I agree with Davison, that it is quite natural for the pool with its porticoes to be described as situated ἐν τῇ προβατικῇ, 'at the sheep-gate,' even though the gate had been destroyed; of which many instances occur in various cities of our own country formerly having walls and gates. But, to advert to an argument which must exclude any date so early as before the destruction of Jerusalem,—the character of the Gospel (as Davison well remarks) points to a period subsequent to the destruction of the Jewish polity,—when the writer, freed from Jewish prejudices, would be able, unfettered, to take a comprehensive view of the Christian religion, and accordingly exhibit, as we find is the case, a maturity of religious development. Besides, the diction of the Gospel certainly attests a writer far more familiar with the Greek language than the author of the Apocalypse; one who had lived among persons speaking it vernacularly, and been accustomed to use it in oral communication with them. In short, apart from all external evidence, I agree with Greswell and Davison, that the lateness of the publication would seem an incontrovertible point, by disputing which little advantage or credit can ever be gained.

Nevertheless, there are various considerations alleged by Lücke, Luthardt, and Alfrod, which strongly forbid our extending that lateness so far as towards the end of the first century. The style of the Gospel is, as Lücke has remarked, that of a matured, but not very aged, much less effete writer. In short, Luthardt and Alf. have given good reasons for thinking that the Gospel could not have been published earlier than A.D. 70; nor later than A.D. 85. I should prefer the latest date within that ample verge. Had, indeed, St. John written so late as the close of the first century, he would surely have done more towards repressing the heresies of the Gnostics, Cerinthians, and others, than merely employ a comparatively few expressions intended to repress their dogmas. If, however, the expressions in question should appear to be such as to imply a settled purpose in the writer, we may suppose that, together with the above-mentioned general design, adverted to at ch. xx. 31, there was united a particular one,—namely, to encounter, even by anticipation, those heretical notions, which probably were, even at the period above stated, starting up like weeds in the rising corn. The ancient Fathers, indeed (as Irenæus, Tertullian, and Epiphanius), tell us that John wrote his Gospel to counteract the errors of the early Heretics;—a view which cannot be substantiated, though that may have been one main purpose. Other Fathers, somewhat later in age, but with ample means of obtaining information from early sources, adopt what is now called the supplementary hypothesis as to the design of St. John in his Gospel. So Clem. Alex. ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 14, affirms τὸν Ἰωάννην, ἱσχατὸν (scil. οὐτα), συνιδόντα, ὅτι τὰ σωματικά ἐν τοῖς εὐαγγελίοις (I conject. ἂν τοῖς ἑσχατῶν) δεδήλωται· προτραπέντα ὑπὸ τῶν γυναικῶν, Πνεύματι θεοφορηθέντα, πνευματικόν (I conject. πνεύματι τε) ποιῆσαι εὐαγγέλιον, and further states, supra iii. 24, that 'while the other Evangelists wrote the history of the Official life of our Lord after the imprisonment of the Baptist, John, wishing that there should be a complete account, recorded in his Gospel the circumstances which preceded that event.' Such is the general sense of the passage as expressed by Alf.; but it deserves to be drawn forth more at large. This indeed has been done by Davison, but in a too free, and not altogether exact version. At τὰ κατ' αὐτὸν supply χρόνον, and render accordingly. Of the words τῷ κατ' αὐτὸν εὐαγγελίῳ παραδόναι, αὐτὸ τε τοῦτ' ἐπισημῆσαι the sense is, 'and committed them to his Gospel; and this very fact he has clearly marked out.' The concluding sentence of the whole deserves attention; though from some corruption in the text, and no little misapprehension on the part of the Interpreters, its sense has been indistinctly represented. The words are, Εὐλόγως δ' οὖν—παρεπιφυλαγμένην. Read περιφυλ., and render the whole thus: 'Accordingly, with good reason has John passed over in silence the fleshly genealogy of our Lord, inasmuch as it was previously written by Matthew and Luke,—but has commenced with the θεολογία, the doctrine of the Divinity (of our Lord), as if that subject had been carefully preserved for him, as a superior person, by the Divine Spirit.' I must not omit to notice, that at the preceding passage of Eusebius the somewhat dark expression τὰ σωματικά—(which has been strangely misconceived by the Latin Translator, and not less so by Dav. and Alf., who render 'carnal things')—means [merely] corporeal and external, as opposed to internal and spiritual. Compare 1 Pet. ii. 5, οἶκος πνευματικός—πνευματικὴν θυσίαν, 'spiritual,' as opposed to 'corporeal.' Thus σωματικὰ is nearly equiv. to ψυχικά, as used in James iii. 15. Jude 19, and so ψυχικῶς is explained by σωματικῶς in the Lex.

MS. Colbert. Notwithstanding what has been said so speciously urged by German Theologians, and set forth to the most advantage by Davison and Alf., I cannot bring myself to believe that St. John was quite unacquainted with the three preceding Gospels when he was writing his own. The remote antiquity of the Traditions recorded in the above passages of Eusebius is unquestionable; and when Mr. Alf. says he 'knows of no authority ab extra for them,' he is merely playing the Sophist. Davison grants that this view agrees substantially with the tenor of the Gospel, and with what is there recorded; and he does not hesitate to avow that the attempts which have been made to throw discredit on the accounts that have come down to us, on the testimony of Tradition, seem to him gratuitous.—On the whole I agree with him, that as the main object was not a doctrino-polemical one, so was it not for the especial purpose of supplying things wanting in the other three Gospels, since the supplementary hypothesis seems to be, notwithstanding that some truth lies at its basis, untenable. What led to the state of things existing at the time when St. John wrote, has been discussed at large by Dr. Davison, in whose general views I find little or nothing to object to; though in the drawing them forth there is much that is gratuitous, and more that is shadowy and imaginative. In discussing how far some truth lies at the foundation of the Supplementary hypothesis, he admits, indeed, that the far greater part of this Gospel is supplementary to the narratives already known to the Christians at Ephesus; but he maintains that it was not the Apostle's object to supply what was wanting to the three first Gospels, though he has adduced most important additional particulars connected with our Lord's words and works, which really do supply omissions, and thereby render the Evangelical History complete for the purposes of the Christian life; thus filling up the circle of truths necessary for the "perfecting of the saints," so as to complete the inner and holier places of the Temple of the Lord. And this,—I agree with Mr. Alf.,—ranging under it all secondary aims and purposes, is what we must term the great object of the Evangelist: to advance, purify from error, and strengthen that maturer Christian life of knowledge (the true, in opposition to the false γνώσις against which he contends), which is the fullest development of the Spirit in men; and this by setting forth the Person of the Lord Jesus in all its fullness of 'grace and truth' (John i. 17), in all its manifestation in the flesh, both by signs and wonders, and by discourses; and its glorification, through sufferings and death, by exaltation to the right hand of the FATHER.

I. 1.—18. In this noble Proem, or Prologus, to this Gospel, the principal purpose of the Evangelist is, as in the whole subsequent work, to set forth the Eternal Word of God, the source of all existence, life, and light, as having become flesh, having dwelt among men, been witnessed to by John the Baptist, been rejected by his own people generally, but received by some who had power given them to become sons of God; in short, shown to be the Perfecter and End of God's revelation of himself; which was partially made known in the law, but fully declared in Jesus Christ; the eternal pre-existence of the Logos; his essential unity with God, though personally distinct from him; his working in the creation of the world, and in the enlightening of men, however non-apprehended, or misapprehended, by them,—even before his manifestation in the flesh.

1. ἐν ἀρχῇ ἦν ὁ Λόγος] One cannot but notice the truly august majesty and dignity contained in this brief but comprehensive introductory clause, probably formed on the simple but noble commencement of Genesis, ἐν ἀρχῇ ἐποίησεν ὁ Θεὸς τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ τὴν γῆν.

At ἐν ἀρχῇ understand τῶν πάντων, from the subsequent context at v. 3, πάντα—γένετο. The expression answers to the Heb. מֵאֲרֵכָה in Gen. i. 1, and denotes 'the origin of all things.' That ἀρχῇ must have this sense, and not that contended for by the Unitarians, 'the beginning of the Gospel dispensation,' is ably evinced by Dr. Pye Smith, Scrip. Test., vol. iii. 68, sqq. On account of the ἦν, many Commentators, indeed, explain the phrase to mean 'before the creation of the world;' referring, in support of this sense of ἐν ἀρχῇ, to John xvii. 5. Eph. i. 4, and Prov. viii. 23; in which last passage the meaning is more exactly defined by the preceding πρὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος and the following πρὸ τοῦ τῆν γῆν ποιῆσαι. But neither in the passage of Proverbs, nor in the one before us, has ἐν ἀρχῇ properly that sense; nor can it ever have it. It is only implied from the context; and no wonder, since what was existing at the creation of the world must have existed before it.

—ὁ Λόγος] On this most important subject (to which the limits of a work of this nature must be quite inadequate) the reader is referred to Tittman, pp. 27—29, and Kuin. Proleg. § 7. 13—90, or to the Epitome thereof in my Recens. Synop.; also and espec. to Lücke's and Olshaus. Comment, or to its substance in Alford, not omitting Dr. Pye Smith's Scrip. Test., vol. iii. p. 70. Whatever may have been the source whence St. John derived this term, all the most competent judges are agreed, that it designates a real subsisting Being, and not an attribute, as Wisdom or Reason. Indeed, the personality of the Logos is manifest from the whole passage.

—πρὸς τὸν Θεόν] The phrase εἶναι πρὸς τὸν Θεόν denotes close union (see Basil, cited by Lücke), so as to be in nature one with God; Lat. apud; Fr. chez; and in the present context, compared with infra xvii. 5, and 1 John i. 1, (where see note,) cannot be thought to mean less than communion of the Divine nature, and participation of the Divine glory and majesty, implying also a community of actions and counsels; meaning, as Dr. Smith expresses it, that 'the Word existed in the eternal period before all creation, naturally and essentially one Being with the Deity, yet possessing some species of relative distinction.'

This assertion is repeated in the next verse, in order to more fully explain what is meant by this communion with God, and to show how the Son evinced his majesty, and the Divine power which he had with the Father.

—καὶ Θεὸς ἦν ὁ Λόγος] The sense is clearly, 'and the Logos was God;' ὁ Λόγος being the subject, and Θεὸς the predicate, as in John iv. 24, πνεῦμα ὁ Θεός, and 1 John iv. 8, ὁ Θεὸς ἀγάπη ἐστίν. For, according to the idiom of the Greek language, it is the noun which is preceded by the Article that is the subject; the other is the attribute; ex. gr. ἡ ἀρετὴ πλουτοῦς ἐστίν. The temerity of Crellius, who, to destroy this irrefragable testimony to the Godhead of Jesus Christ, proposed to alter Θεὸς to Θεοῦ, met with well-merited chastisement from Bengel and Wetstein. Some, after his time, have attempted to compass the same end, by maintaining, that as Θεός has not the Article, it should be taken in a lower sense, to denote a God. But that position has been completely overturned by Bengel, Campbell, Middl., Kuinoel, and Smith.

2. The Evangelist here reverts to the two first clauses of v. 1, which he now combines, in order to glance at the Creative Works, which especially belong to the Logos.

3. πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ, &c.] By πάντα we are to understand all things in the world = ὁ κόσμος, v. 10.—Ἐγένετο, 'were brought into existence;' for ἐκτίσθη. See Ps. cxlviii. 5. Many take διὰ as denoting the instrumental cause, as in Heb. i. 2. But there is no reason to abandon the opinion of almost all the ancient, and the most eminent modern Interpreters, that it denotes the efficient and principal cause, as in Rom. xi. 36. 1 Cor. i. 9. Gal. i. 1, and often elsewhere. As to the passage of Hebrews, it is of quite a different nature from this of St. John; since in the latter only one agent is spoken of, but in the other two agents are adverted to. Thus the Logos is described as being 'very God,' and Creator of the universe; who, on account of his communion with the Divine nature, hath an equal power with the Father, and, by his co-operation with the Father, created the world.

The next words καὶ χωρὶς—γένετο are usually explained as yielding, by a Hebrew parallelism, an identity of sentiment with the foregoing clause,—the same thing being expressed both by affirmation and by negation. But it should seem that we have not merely the same thing expressed, but a much stronger sentiment. Even the dialysis οὐδὲ ἔν has an intensive force, containing, as Bp. Bull, Dr. Smith, and Mr. Alf. have shown, a more distinct and positive denial of the eternity and uncreatedness of matter, as held by the Gnostics.

4. Lightfoot observes, that to the physical creation by the Logos is here subjoined a new and moral one by the same. Strictly speaking, however, there is here (as Chrysostom and Tittman remark) a reason given for what has been just affirmed, implying that the Logos is the source of all life to the creature. Comp. 1 John v. 11, and infra vi. 33. The general sense of καὶ ἡ ζωὴ ἦν τὸ φῶς τῶν ἀνθ. is that 'He is the source of both natural and spiritual life, and also of light and knowledge;' for, as Lampe has shown, all knowledge, purity, and happiness arise from this life, which is the light, i. e. the true, equiv. to the only true light to every man (v. 9). The reading of D, ἐστίν for ἦν, injudiciously adopted by Lachm., sprang either from a marginal scholium, or rather a rash Critical alteration, which, though caught up by Origen, its source may be traced back to the Ital. Vers., and probably arose from Heracleon (a Gnostic of the 2nd century), mentioned by Origen. That the Pesch. Syr. Translators had ἦν in their copies cannot be doubted. Both ancient and modern Commentators have stumbled at ἦν, from not seeing its true force, which, when drawn fully out, shows that it contains a deeper and fuller sense than ἴστω, though the force of that may be included therein. And here Lampe is, as often elsewhere, instar omnium interpretum, to whose admirable Exegesis I can only refer my readers.

5. καὶ τὸ φῶς φαίνει] Σκοτία is in Scripture a frequent image of ignorance and sin, and also the death, or misery, consequent upon it, as φῶς is of ῥῆς. See Is. ix. 2. Matt. iv. 16. Acts xxvi. 18. Here the word is put (abstract for concrete) in the place of οἱ Ἰσκαριστινοὶ τῇ διανοίᾳ, Eph. iv. 18. namely, those immersed in ignorance, idolatry, and vice, and consequently far removed from light and virtue, holiness and happiness; in short, all except those adverted to at v. 12, such as received the light and the Life-giver. Thus the sense is: 'And this salvation was offered to wretched, corrupt, and miserable man; but (or, nevertheless) the plan of salvation they did not comprehend, much less accept and embrace.' Comp. v. 11, which vindicates this sense of a passage whose meaning has been variously laid down.

6—18. The manifestation of the Logos, Jesus Christ, the Son of God incarnate in our flesh.

6—8. The scope of these verses, of which the two first recite briefly what is in vv. 19—36 narrated in detail, is to show that John the Baptist, whom many so magnified, was not the Christ, but one sent by God to bear witness of him; and to prove, even on the evidence of John himself, the infinite superiority of Jesus to that Prophet; q. d. 'To bear witness of this light, and further its reception, was John sent from God; not as being himself that light,—namely, the Messiah, —but to bear witness to the Divine mission of Him who was so.'

6. ἐγένετο ἄνθρωπος, &c.] Lit. 'there was a man raised up, or brought forward, as a messenger from God.'

7. εἰς μαρτυρίαν, ἵνα μαρτ.] Here there is not so much a repetition of the same thing in plainer terms, as rather, in ἵνα μαρτ., &c., an epanorthosis upon εἰς μαρτυρίαν τοῦ φωτός. John was not only a Forerunner of the Messiah (as he is described in the three first Gospels), but a WITNESS, such as he is represented in this Gospel. After our Lord's baptism in the river Jordan, John's former character ceased, and his latter commenced. Even up to his death John ceased not, on all proper occasions, to bear decided testimony to the exalted character of Jesus —namely, that he was the true Light, in order that all men, through his witness, might believe in Jesus.

8. οὐκ ἦν ἡκεῖνος τ. φ.] The expression is emphatical, q. d. 'He was himself not that Light, but only the burning and shining light of that generation, in which he was raised up to bear testimony to the Light, to the end that all these might, through him, believe in the Light.' The caution of the Evangelist in thus putting a decided negative as to John being himself the Christ, and of John's similar caution in his decided disavowal thereof (see vv. 19—23), arose from the disposition of some of the Jews to regard John the Baptist as himself the Christ.

9. ἦν τὸ φῶς τὸ ἀληθινόν.] Render: 'that (meaning He) was the true light.' In the sense of reality there is here implied genuineness, attested by originality. See infra vi. 32. xv. 1, and elsewhere.

The next words ἐρχ. εἰς τὸν κόσμον are commonly taken with πάντα ἄνθρωπον. But the best Commentators are now agreed that they should be construed with τὸ φῶς; since in the former construction the words would seem unnecessary, and never occur in that sense; whereas in the latter the phrase is very weighty, and well suited to the connexion. Moreover, ὁ ἐρχόμενος εἰς τὸν κόσμον was an usual phrase to designate the Messiah. See vi. 14. xviii. 37. And so at iii. 19. xii. 46, he is designated as a 'light coming into the world.' Finally, the other sense would require the Article after ἄνθρωπον. Not to say that the sense usually assigned would be scarcely reconcilable with facts. Nor is the interpretation above stated without the support of ancient authority; since so the passage was taken by the author of the Test. xii. Patr. p. 578, τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου τὸ δοθὲν ἐν ὕμνῳ πρὸς φωτισμὸν παντὸς ἀνθρώπου. I find the punctuation, which I have hence adopted, in all the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies. With respect to the scope of the declaration, it seems to be this, 'which [by] coming into the world enlighteneth every man' (comp. Tit. ii. 11); i. e. every one who is willing to receive or admit this (comp. παρέλαβον αὐτόν, v. 11). Comp. iii. 19. xii. 46.

10. ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἦν] These words affirm the appearance and existence of the Logos on earth in a human form,—i. e. that he became incarnate. In this and the following verse there is a kind of climax in the four particulars now presented concerning the True Light; q. d. 'The only and true Saviour came to, and abode in the world,—a world created by him, but which (meaning 'the men of the world'), nevertheless, knew Him not, did not choose to know Him, recognized Him not as such. Nay, though he came to his own people especially, yet even they received him not as their Lord Christ.' The best Expositors are agreed, that τὰ ἴδια, sub. οικήματα, can only mean his own country, or people; a sense of which numerous examples are adduced by Krebs, Wetat., and Kypke. The metaphor (as observes Smith, Scrip. Test.) is that of a sovereign over a state, or the head of a family over his household. The Jews, indeed, might be called Christ's own people, as being the peculiar people of God, and consequently of Christ, as united in the Godhead, and being the King of Israel; thus constituting Judea his own inheritance in possession.

12. From the Jews, who rejected Jesus as their Saviour, the Evangelist turns to those, whether Jews or Gentiles, who received him.

— ἔσοι δὲ ἔλαβον α.] The reasoning may be carried out in full thus: 'His countrymen, as a body, rejected him. Yet his coming was not utterly without effect. Some few did acknowledge him as the Word of God, and the Light of men. And to such as did (or hereafter should) he gave the privilege of adoption into the number of God's children.' Note, ἐξουσία here denotes privilege or prerogative; a signif. sometimes occurring in the later Class. writers and the Sept. By τέκνα Θεοῦ are meant those who have experienced the birth from above mentioned at iii. 3—7;—a birth produced by the Holy Spirit of God; and consequently the latter is inseparable from the former; and 'to be born of the Spirit' is equiv. to 'being a son of God,'—one thus admitted to sonship;—the most supreme blessing a created being can receive, comprehending both the privileges of Christians in the present state, and their felicity in the future; a blessed resurrection and a glorious immortality; in short, to be eternally as happy as infinite Goodness, united with infinite Wisdom, can make men.

13. οἱ οὐκ—ἐγεννήθησαν] Meaning, 'who became such; obtained that privilege of sons, not by virtue of ancestry, as the Jews were God's children (Deut. xiv. 1) through their descent from Abraham, nor by any affinity or connexion of human descent, but by the free grace of God, through the working of his Holy Spirit.' The plural αἱμάτω is used by way of adaptation to ἔδωκεν before; though, of course, what is here applied to those who received Jesus as the Christ during his abode on earth, is equally applicable to those who should, at any future period, receive him. The plural αἱμάτων is also used to denote all the degrees of consanguinity and lines of descent, and has reference to the several ancestors from whom the children of Israel boasted their descent, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; see 2 Cor. xi. 22, sq. This use of the word in the plural is very rare; but I have noted it in Eurip. Ion, 693, ἄλλων τραφεῖς ἀφ' αἱμάτων, and Lycoph. Cassand. v. 804, 1249. The two phrases ἐκ θελ. σαρκ. and ἐκ θελ. ἀνδρὸς designate the natural mode of descent, as opposed to the spiritual one proceeding from the adoption of God.

14. καὶ ὁ Λόγος σὰρξ ἐγ.] This is closely connected with ver. 10, ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἦν, and is a resumption of what was there said; q. d. 'And [accordingly] the Logos was clothed with a human body, and sojourned among us [men].' This addition of the human nature to the Divine implies that conjunction by which the same person is both son of God and son of Man. Σὰρξ is, for σάρκινος, 'having a fleshly nature,' such as that of man. Comp. Artemid. ii. 35, ἴαν τε γὰρ σάρκινος οἱ θεοὶ φαίνονται.

— ἐσκήνωσεν] Here there is no need to suppose (with Lampe and Schoettgen) any reference to the Scheckinal; the sole object of the Evangelist being to prove that the Logos became incarnate. The full sense is that laid down by Wetstein: 'He who had dwelt in heaven descended from thence, that he might sojourn with men.' For σκηνοῦν signifies 'to take up one's quarters, or sojourn.' And it is here used in preference to ζῆν, with allusion to the life of man as a sojourn; and because it better designates that familiariter vivere, which seems here intended; suggesting that familiar intercourse and that intercommunity of all the functions of human life (according to the expressive terms elsewhere, Acts i. 21, εἰσῆλθε καὶ ἐξῆλθε εἰς ἡμᾶς), which evidenced our Saviour to have been really and substantially man, as well as God.

The next words καὶ ἐθεασάμεθα, &c., may be considered as, in some measure, another proof that the Logos became incarnate; yet they seem meant also to intimate, that though he was really man, yet he was also something far more; namely, Son of God; implying a community of the Divine nature. 'Ἐθεασάμεθα is a very significant, and even emphatic, term; q. d. 'Yea, we distinctly saw his glory.' Now there were many ways in which his disciples saw the glory of Christ; namely, in his miracles (see ii. 11); and not only in acts which evinced power, but wisdom and goodness also,—in that unspeakable love to men, for which he was content to suffer death, even the death of the cross, for their salvation. Nay, some of the Apostles had seen his glory in his Transfiguration on Mount Tabor. However, I am now inclined to think that the glory here spoken of may be especially that which was given to Christ in his mediatorial capacity, i. e. in his twofold nature, as differing from his glory as God and his glory as man. See John i. 14. xvii. 5 and 22. Though these, and the other evidences of Christ's glory in his mediatorial capacity, John did not choose to specify, being content with affirming it to have been δόξα ὡς μονογενοῦς παρὰ Πατρός, 'such a glory as might be expected in a Being the only-begotten Son of the Father;' who accordingly is (as it is said, Heb. i. 3) the ἀναγνώστης τῆς δόξης, καὶ χαρακτήρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ. The ὡς (as Chrysostom and Tittman remark) expresses not similitude, but identity and truth; meaning 'truly such.' On the full sense of μονογενῆς, a term peculiar to John, as put for μόνος γεννηθεῖς, see Lampe, Tittman, Dr. Smith, and my Lex. in New Test.

With respect to the construction of the passage, many, as Kuinoel, in order to avoid a slight irregularity, would make the words καὶ ἐθεασάμεθα—Πατρός parenthetical, referring πλήρως to ἐσκήνωσεν. A procedure which does violence to the whole sentence, in which the words thus attempted to be separated from the rest, are any thing but parenthetical. We may best regard the words πλήρης χάριτος καὶ ἀληθείας as consequatives of the foregoing idea, and intended to carry on the feeling of devout admiration, inherent in δόξαν ὡς μονογενοῦς παρὰ Πατρός. I am of opinion, that πλήρης is put, not by enallage, for πλήρη, found in D and a few other copies, and confirmed by Theoph. and Euthymius, but by a certain negligence as to style, involving anacoluthon, frequent in the present Evangelist (which, indeed, may be recognized more or less in the best writers), for πλήρου, as agreeing with μονογενοῦς, viz. the Logos. I am now disposed to reject the Hendiadys supposed by almost all Expositors; because, by keeping the words χάρις and ἀληθ. separate, we may consider the terms as (to use the words of Mr. Alf.) 'setting out the two ideas of the Divine manifestation in Christ,—χάρις, as the result of Love to mankind,—ἀληθ., as the unity, purity, and light of His own character.'

15. Having appealed, in a general way, to the testimony borne by the Baptist to Jesus, the Evangelist now proceeds to mention what that testimony was; and by κέκραγε he intimates that he uttered it openly, ex animo, and decisively.

—ὁ ὀπίσω μου ἐρχόμενος' Meaning, 'He who enters (i. e. is to enter) upon this office after me, He of whom I am the forerunner; in which sense ἐρχισθαι frequently occurs in the New Test., and sometimes in the Sept. The interpretation of ἔμπροσθέν μου γέγ. is uncertain; since the words may be understood either of time or of dignity. According to the former view the clause ὅτι πρῶτός μου ἦν must be considered as expressing the same sense as the preceding; and thus the meaning will be, that 'though he came after him in both birth and entrance into office, yet that he had existed long before him.' According to the latter, which seems preferable, the meaning will be, 'This is He of whom I said, He who cometh into the world [or entereth on his office] after me, is become of greater dignity than myself,—inasmuch as [by his own Divine nature] He was [always] before me; i. e. more honourable than I.' This verse is in some measure parenthetical, being meant to incidentally confirm, by this weighty testimony, the foregoing assertion, that the Word was made flesh; thereby showing that John bore solemn witness (μαρτ.) to the pre-existence of this Divine Personage. Thus the matter contained in v. 16, forms a continuation of what was said at v. 14, taking up what was said in πλήρης χάριτος, and further developing the idea of plenitude thereby conveyed. It is observable, that the force of μαρτ. is not a little raised by the subjoined words, καὶ κέκραγε λέγων: for worthy of attention is the peculiar sense of the term κράζω, here and infra, vii. 28, ἐκραξεν ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ διδάσκων, &c.; vii. 37, ἐκραξε λέγων 'Εάν τις διψᾷ, ἐρχέσθω, &c.; xii. 44. ἐκραξε καὶ εἶπεν 'Ο πιστεύων εἰς ἐμὲ, &c. Now here, as united with μαρτυρ., implying the giving testimony, it expresses that the declaration was public and decided. And so, too, at vii. 28, we may understand ἐκραξε λέγων. The peculiar expression ἔμπροσθέν μου, though it is more frequently used of time, yet cannot, with due regard to the context, be supposed used otherwise than of dignity (as it is done by the framers of our authorized Version); a sense which (notwithstanding what Wetst., Tittm., and Kuin. affirm) is found not only in Plato, p. 805, and Demosthenes, p. 1296, but also in the Sept. at Gen. xlviii. 20. Lampe, who has most ably discussed the interpretation, satisfactorily shows that the sense of the clause must be: 'He who cometh after me [in time] is [as the Christ] more honourable than I, inasmuch as He was [and is by his own eternal nature as God] existing before me.'

16—18. It has been disputed whether these verses are from the Baptist or from the Evangelist. The former opinion has been adopted by many Interpreters, though (as Tittman observes) 'it lies open to the objection, that what is contained in these verses could hardly have been said by John the Baptist of himself, his own times, and that of his disciples.' They are rather the words of the Evangelist; who, in using the term πληρώματος (answering to the Hebr. מִלְּאָ, which denotes the sum of any thing, and also plenty) seems to have had reference to the expression πλήρης χάριτος καὶ ἀληθείας at ver. 14 (for this verse is a continuation, and confirmation, of what was said at ver. 14, ver. 11 being in some measure parenthetical), and meant by it to express the idea of exuberant abundance. Thus ἐκ τοῦ πληρ. αὐ. means, 'from his rich storehouse of benefits and blessings.' Of the controverted phrase, χάρις ἀντὶ χάριτος, the only interpretation deserving of adoption is that of those who regard it as a periphrasis of the superlative, like the Hebr. מִן כָּל חֵן; an idiom not unknown in the Greek Classical writers. Thus Theogn. Admon. 344, δοῖναι ἀντ' ἀνίων ἀνίας. The sense will thus be, 'grace upon grace.' Render, 'Yea, of this fulness (i. e. his exuberant abundance) have we all received [grace], even grace upon grace, blessings superlatively great, by continual accessions one upon another,—a rich abundance of spiritual gifts.' So Plato i. 334, cited by Wetstein, says the Deity, after giving τάς πρώτας χάριτας, εἰσαυθίς ἑτέρας ἀντὶ ἐκείνων, καὶ τρίτας ἀντὶ τῶν δευτέρων, καὶ δὲ νέας ἀντὶ παλαιωτέρων ἐπιδίδωσιν. See also Philo, cited by Loesner. The notion, however, of superadding does not here come in. A few Expositors, with some appearance of reason, render, 'grace in us, answering to [each] grace in him; faith, love, humility, purity, obedience in Him, reflected, as in a mirror, in the hearts of His people. By ἡμεῖς is meant all who believe in Him, with the faith spoken of at v. 12, and not, as some of the heretics thought, a favoured few;—meaning themselves. "The Gnostics and the Cerinthians," observes Dr. Waterland, "talked much of the πλήρωμα or fulness by which they meant a fictitious plenitude of the Deity, in which the whole race of Æons was supposed to subsist, and into which all spiritual men (such as they esteemed themselves) should hereafter be received. It was the doctrine of the Valentinians, and probably of the elder Gnostics also, that they were themselves of the spiritual seed, had constant grace, and could not fail of being admitted into the plenitude above; while others were, in their esteem, carnal, had grace, but sparingly or occasionally, and that so as not to bring them so high as the plenitude, but to an intermediate state only. But St. John here asserts (whether, however, with reference to the Gnostics is not certain) that all Christians equally and indifferently, all believers at large, have received of the plenitude or fullness of the divine Logos, and that not sparingly, but in the largest measure." It has been well pointed out by Maldonat, that the "fulness of the saints differs from the fullness of Christ in three respects, 1. Grace and the Spirit are in others by participation only, as rivers have their waters from the fountains; but in Christ they are original and of himself only. 2. In Christ they are infinite and above measure. And, accordingly, it is said, further on, iii. 34, οὐκ ἐκ μέτρου δίδωσι (τῷ Υἱῷ) ὁ Θεὸς τὸ πνεῦμα. 3. The saints cannot communicate their graces to others (much less their merits); whereas the gifts of the Spirit are in Christ as a fountain-head to impart these to his members."

¹⁷ ὅτι ὁ νόμος—ἐγένετο] In these words are exemplified and illustrated the benefits received from Christ by his disciples; and the grace and fullness of the Gospel is opposed to the rigour and narrowness of the Law. The Law was given as a benefit to the Israelites; yet it was harsh and burdensome, its blessings scanty, and those confined to one nation; whereas the Gospel imparts its blessings, through Christ, plentifully to the whole human race. This χάρις Christians receive from the πλήρωμα of Christ, since to him (as it is said at iii. 34) οὐκ ἐκ μέτρου δίδωσιν ὁ Θεὸς τὸ Πνεῦμα. On the force of χάρ. see note supra 14.

¹⁸ Here the sentiment of v. 17—implying the superiority of the Gospel over the Law—is confirmed by adverting to the clear knowledge of God (no otherwise to be obtained than from One intimately conversant with God) which has been communicated by Christ, the only-begotten Son of God. The precise connexion is faint and obscure; but it may be what Alf. lays down thus, —[Moses could not give out the πλήρωμα of grace and truth,] for he had no immediate sight of God, nor can any mere man have,—Θεὸν οὐδ. ἑώρα, hath seen' (or 'will ever see'). No other ever did or could do this, because 'no one knoweth the Father save the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal Him,' Luke x. 22. By ἑώρακε is here to be understood not 'seeing' only by corporeal vision, but knowing; and not 'knowing' only, but, as in Luke x. 22, so 'thoroughly knowing' as to be able to fully declare God (comp. Ecclus. xliii. 31, τίς ἑώρακεν αὐτὸν καὶ ἐκδηγήσεται;), to declare both the nature of God (the Godhead as existing in the mysterious union of three Persons in one God) and his purposes in the redemption of man,—and the several offices of the three Persons of the blessed Trinity in the great work of man's salvation.

By ὁ μονογενής—ἐξηγήσατο it is meant that 'he alone who is nearest and dearest to God,—even his only-begotten Son,—hath fully disclosed him' (i. e. his nature, attributes, will, &c.). As to the peculiar expression ὁ ὢν εἰς τὸν κόλπον, I am now inclined to think, with Chrys., that it is derived from the intimate union of parents and children (comp. 1 Kings iii. 30, and Lam. ii. 12), arising from συγγένεια, but here denoting, as Chrys. says, ἐνότης τῆς οὐσίας. And so Euthym. (from some other Greek Father) says that the expression marks τὸ γήσινον τοῦ Υἱοῦ, καὶ ὁμοουσιν, καὶ ἀχώριστον. In our own language we use the prefix 'bosom' before a substantive, as denoting the closest intimacy, but with no reference to consanguinity. In ἐκείνος there is a strong emphasis, implying exclusion of any other. As to ἐξηγήσατο, it is true that both the verb and its verbal noun, ἐξηγήτης, were, as we find from the numerous passages adduced by Wets. and others, technical terms used of the declaration of Divine matter, and the interpretation of the Divine oracles; but I agree with Lücke that the word is, agreeably to the simple style of John, to be taken in its ordinary meaning.

¹⁹—28. The witness borne by John the Baptist to Jesus before the Deputation of inquiry from the Sanhedrim.

¹⁹, 20. The Evangelist, again reverting to John, points to the well-known public testimony of John, given by him to the great Council of the Sanhedrim, which had the charge of religion. Render: "And this is the testimony of John [concerning himself]: When the Jews had sent from Jerusalem Priests and Levites to him, saying, Who art thou? then he confessed and denied (or dissembled) not [who he was]; yea, he avowed, 'I am not the Christ.'"

—οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι.] Meaning those who are elsewhere called οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς τῶν Ἰουδ.,—namely, the Sanhedrim, who had the authority of making inquiry into the pretensions of prophets, and of which the persons sent were a deputation. There is no reason to suppose, with some, that the Evangelist has not given the whole address; for the τίς in the question evidently refers to the kind of prophetic character claimed by John, which implied an inquiry, 1. whether he was the Christ; 2. whether he was Elias. The form σὺ

τίς εἶ was (it appears from Wetstein's citations) not unusual, as addressed by those who demanded to know any one's authority to act in any business. Though the Sanhedrim knew that John's ancestry did not accord with that which had been predicted of Christ; yet, when they bore in mind what had happened to Zacharias in the Temple, and that his mother was of the lineage of David, they might think it possible that he was the Messiah; especially as it was not absolutely determined among the doctors whether Christ was to be born at Bethlehem or not.

— ὁμολόγησε—καὶ ὁμολόγησεν] These words contain the strongest assertation possible, since the two methods, assertion by affirmation and by negation of the contrary, together with a repetition of the affirmation, are here united. The sense above assigned to ὁμολ., 'he avowed' (i. e. 'openly and explicitly declared'), is required by the realis that occurs in the proposition, which forms the subject of the verb ὁμολόγ., and is confirmed by a similar use, however rare, in Xen. Cyr. vi. 3, 24, τούτους γὰρ τίς ἂν τάττοι, οἱ καὶ αὐτοὶ ὁμολογοῦσι ('avow,' lit. 'say plainly,' 'do not dissemble') μηδὲ μίαν μάχην ἂν ὑποκρίναι ἐκ χειρὸς.

20. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἐγὼ οὐκ εἰμὶ, from six uncials and one cursive;—quite insufficient authority; espec. since internal evidence is equally balanced. The same var. lect. occurs at iii. 28, where Tisch. and Alf. retain οὐκ εἰμὶ ἐγὼ.

21. τί οὖν (scil. ἐστὶ);] A popular form of expression; q. d. 'What is it, then, you mean to say?' The reading of MS. B, σὺ οὖν τί; is evidently a false correction.

— Ἠλίας εἶ σύ;] Having disavowed all pretensions to be accounted 'the Christ,' their next thought was that he might be Elias, whom they expected to re-appear upon earth just before the coming of their Messiah; espec. as the whole appearance of John (Matt. iii. 4, comp. with 2 Kings i. 8), and his announcement that the kingdom of God was at hand, must have brought to their minds the prophecy of Malachi. In the MSS. C, L, and 33, the σὺ is absent, as also in some copies of the Ital. Version, and in Cyril and Origen; and in several of the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies the (;) does not appear. Thus the declarative form will be used, as oft. in the Class. writers,—not so much for affirmation, as that an interrogation is implied; q. d. 'So then thou art Elias, art thou not?' But the direct interrogation found in all the copies but a very few, and confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version, is far more suited to the gravity of the occasion, and to the simplicity of the Evangelist's style.

— οὐκ εἰμὶ] i. e. not in the sense in which the question was asked, i. e. not personally, that Elias who had been taken up into heaven, and whose return to earth was expected; though in another sense he might be called Elias, as he came in the spirit and power of Elias; see Matt. xi. 14.

— ὁ προφήτης εἶ σύ;] It is plain that this cannot mean Elijah, since that would involve a vain repetition. The Article shows that it must denote some particular prophet. The best Commentators, ancient and modern, are of opinion that Jeremiah is meant; q. d. 'the prophet promised' (namely, in Deut. xviii. 15, 19. See Acts iii. 22), who, they supposed, would appear previously to the advent of the Messiah, to recover the ark of the covenant which he had hidden; see 2 Macc. ii. 5.

22. τίς εἶ;] lit. 'what sort of a person art thou?' 'what character dost thou bear?' whether prophet or not?

23. ἐγὼ φωνή, &c.] Meaning, that 'what they ask they will find sufficiently answered in the words of the Prophet' (Is. xl. 3), 'the voice of one crying in the wilderness,' &c.; for He it is who is there spoken of.

24. ἦσαν ἐκ τῶν Φαρισαίων] Why not (it may be asked) of the Sadducees too, since they also went to John's baptism? Because the Pharisees formed by far the greater part of the Sanhedrim, and held the whole power in their own hands. So Josephus, Antiq. xviii. 1, 4, πράσσει-ται δ' ἀπ' αὐτῶν (scil. Saddουκαίων) οὐδὲν ὥς εἰπεῖν ὅποτε γὰρ ἐπ' ἀρχαίς παρέρχονται ἀκουσίως μιν, καὶ κατ' ἀνάγκας, προσχωροῦσιν δ' οὖν οἱς ὁ Φαρισαῖος λήγει. The reason of this explanation (as Alf., indeed, says) is not very clear. Lücke refers it to the apparent hostility of the next inquiry; while Alf. asks whether it might be to throw light on their question about baptizing, as the Pharisees were the most precise about all ceremonies, illustrations, &c. But the former mode is far-fetched and yet jejune. The latter is preferable; but it would suppose the words to be those of explanation; which they are not,—unless, indeed, the reading of Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. be adopted from MSS. A, B, C, L, and Origen, by which the οἱ is removed; but the authority for cancelling it is quite insufficient; espec. since internal evidence is in favour of the οἱ, which was more likely to be absorbed by the αὶ preceding, than introduced by the Revisers. Besides, the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions strongly confirm the οἱ. Alf. says, 'it was introduced to make it clearer that the whole deputation were intended; and he renders, 'And they, i. e. the whole, were (or 'had been') sent by the Pharisees.' But no dependence can be placed upon a sense so wrong out of the words, and founded on the cancelling a word not likely to have been removed from all the copies but four, and all the most weighty Versions. In short, the word must be retained, and regarded as a remark, intimating (as Maldon., Brug., and Lampe are agreed) how it came to pass, and why the interrogation calling John to account was founded on baptism (the administration of which they thought confined to Christ, or, at least, to prophets); and 'since (observes Lampe) the greatest part of their theology consisted in defining ceremonies and external rites, espec. washings (as appears from Mark vii. 3, 4), they thought that the cognizance of such matters particularly pertained to them.'

²⁵ τί οὖν βαπτίζεις, &c.] Baptism had been hitherto confined to Gentiles, on their becoming proselytes to Judaism; and it had been unusual to baptize Jews. Now the Pharisees supposed that the power of baptizing Jews, and thereby establishing a new Religion, was confined to the Messiah, and his precursors the Prophets; who, they thought, would return to life for that purpose. Hence they were desirous of knowing on what authority John had introduced such an innovation; and they presumed, from this circumstance, that he claimed, in some way or other, a Divine mission, either as the Messiah, or as a Prophet, or some other authorized Legate.

— οὐτε Ἡλ., οὐτε] MSS. A, B, C, L, and 5 cursives (I add 1 Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies) have οὐδὲ—οὐδὲ, which reading is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., though against evidence of every kind, both external and internal; since it is plainly a mere alteration, having for its purpose to introduce purer Greek: the οὐδὲ—οὐδὲ being found supra v. 13 confirms the suspicion.

²⁶, ²⁷. ἐγὼ βαπτίζω, &c.] The general sense is, 'I only baptize with water; mine is but a baptism subordinate, and preparatory to that of One far superior,—from whom a very different and far superior baptism may be expected. Moreover, He whom you look forward to, and by whose authority I do this, is among you, though unknown to you.' The στίκει, edited by Tisch., not Lachm. and Alf., instead of ἑστῆκεν, from only three MSS., seems a mere critical alteration, from those who were ignorant of the idiom (occurring also in 1 Cor. vii. 37, εἰ ἑστῆκεν ἰδοῦμαι, by which the Perf. ἑστῆκεν is used for the Pres. στίκει. See Buttm. Gr. § 107, 2). Tisch. and Alf. cancel the words at v. 27, αὐτὸς ἐστίν, ὃς ἔμπροσθέν μου γέγονεν, on the authority of only B, C, L, and 7 cursive MSS. The latter clause may have been interpolated from v. 15; but the former must be genuine, since otherwise the Baptist will be made to express himself (for no imaginable reason) most enigmatically. It was removed by Critics, who cancelled what seemed to them unnecessary, and involved a breach of Classical propriety. See note on Matt. vi. 4.

²⁶. μέσος ὑμῶν] This use of μέσος, with a genit. of thing, is found, though very rarely, in the Class. writers (as Herodian iii. 9, 5); but used, as here, with a genit. of person, it is, I believe, there unprecedented. As to Joa. Bell. iii. 8, 8, adduced by the Commentators, the genit. is not expressed, but left to be supplied from the context, as also in Joa. Antt. vi. 7, 3, also as understood in Virg. Æn. v. 76, 'ibat—magnā, medius, comitante carvā.' However, medius in Latin is so used, as Ovid. Fast. v. 67, 'Et medius juvenum, non indignantibus ipais, ibat.'

The δι after μέσ. is wrongly cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from MSS. B, C, L. The particle, which cannot well be dispensed with, was probably omitted either by the ignorance of the scribes, who were unable to decipher the mark of abbreviation for δι, or through mere carelessness.

²⁷. αὐτὸς ἐστίν—γέγονεν] The full sense intended is: 'This is he who was to come after me, but to be before me in dignity.' I agree with Olshausen, who maintains that the declaration of John, that the Messiah was actually standing among, though then unknown to, them, was virtually an answer to their question, as to the legitimization of his claims to be a prophet, a σῴσις, that he was sent from God.

²⁸. Βηθανία] This reading (instead of the Vulg. Βηθαβάρ) found in almost all the best MSS. (including almost all the ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies), has been adopted by all the Critical Editors from Matth. and Griesb. downwards, and almost all the early Editions. The common reading they suppose to have proceeded from a mere conjecture of Origen, who, because the situation here does not correspond with that of Bethany, where Lazarus and his sisters lived, made the change in question; forgetting that there are in all countries several places of the same name. So in Judea there were Bethsaida, Bethlehein, Cana, and Emmaus. And Bethany, from its signification (namely, 'a ferry-place' or 'passage') was very likely to be one. Moreover, this Bethany seems meant to be distinguished from the other by the addition, πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου. The meaning, indeed, of the name Bethabara is almost the same with that of Bethany; since both of them denoted the ford or ferry at which the Jordan was crossed in the way from Jerusalem to Perea. Inasmuch that many learned men are, with reason, of opinion that Bethabara and Bethany were only two different names for the same place. We may suppose that Bethabara

was the more ancient one, and the original name of the place (probably the Bethabara of Judg. vii. 29), but that in the time of Christ it was usually called Bethany, as then better designating its situation (probably at about five miles from the embouchure of the Jordan into the Dead Sea); the original crossing by ford having now been changed to that by ferry; though notwithstanding this, the old name (of which many examples might be adduced) still continued in use. Inasmuch that in the time of Origen it seems to have been by the inhabitants called Bethabara. Hence he changed the reading to that name.

29. τῇ ἐπαύριον i. e. the day after the mission of the Priests and Levites. The words ὁ Ἰωάν., which I bracketed, have been cancelled by Lach., Tisch., and Alf., on rather strong authority; which I can confirm from several ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies; and internal evidence is at least equally divided.

— Ἴδε ὁ ἄμνος τ. Θ., &c.] 'Behold Him, who is the Lamb of God, who expiath the sins of the world'—who was appointed by God to be offered as a sacrifice of atonement for the sins of the whole world.' Jesus is in Scripture characterized by the designation of Lamb, with allusion to the paschal lamb typifying him, and the lamb daily offered up at the evening sacrifice, representing him. Moreover, he is designated as the Lamb of God, with reference to his being appointed and approved by God as the all-sufficient sacrifice for the sins of men. In this view John the Baptist must have considered Jesus, when he called him Lamb, namely, as suffering and dying like a victim; for it is clear that he meant to represent our Lord as one dying, and that is the place of others, by his subjoining the words ὁ αἴρων τὴν ἁμαρτίαν τοῦ κόσμου by way of explication. Now the phrase αἴρων τὴν ἁμαρτίαν answers to the Hebr. נָשָׂא מִן חַטֹּאתָם, which never signifies to remove sins, i. e. extirpate iniquity from the earth (as many recent Interpreters suppose), but to forgive sins (as in Gen. i. 17. Exod. xxxiv. 7. Numb. xiv. 19. Ps. xxxii. 1, 5. 1 Sam. xv. 25. xxv. 28), or to pay the penalties of sin, either one's own, or others', as in Exod. xxviii. 30. Lev. v. 1. x. 17, where are conjoined, as synonymous, the formulas to bear the sin of the people, and expiate and to atone the people with God. Therefore the formula 'to bear sins,' must denote 'to be punished, because of sins,' 'to undergo the punishment due to sins.' Again, as 'to bear one's own sins' denotes 'to be punished for one's own sins,' so 'to bear the sins of others' must mean 'to be punished for the sins of others,' 'to undergo the punishment which the sins of others have deserved.' Moreover, Christ is said 'to bear the sin of the whole world;' and therefore the interpretation above mentioned can have no place. There is, besides, in these formulas a manifest allusion to, and comparison with, a piacular vic- tim. For such a victim was solemnly brought to the altar, and then the Priest put his hands over and upon the head; a symbolical action, signifying that the sins committed by the persons expiated were laid upon the victim: and when it was slaughtered, it was then said to bear or carry away the sins of the expiated; by which it was denoted that the victim paid the penalty of the sins committed, was punished with death in their place, and for the purpose of freeing them from the penalty of sin. Therefore when Christ is called the Lamb bearing the sins of the world, it is manifest that we must understand one who should take upon himself the sins of men, so as to pay the penalties of their sins, and in their stead, for the purpose of freeing them from those penalties. In short, αἴρων denotes, in its full sense, 'taking away by having borne;' and thus it is well adapted to express the atoning sacrifice of Christ for the sins of the world.

30—34. John now mentions how he obtained this knowledge, that Jesus was the Messiah; namely, by an express revelation from God. Up to the period of his baptism, our Lord, it seems, had passed for a mere man. He was first made known as Messiah by John at his baptism, and through him to the multitude. Whether John had before any personal knowledge of Jesus is variously disputed. Certain it is that he did not know him to be the Messiah. That knowledge he obtained by a Divine revelation, which had given him the sign whereby he should recognize the Messiah, namely, the descent of the Holy Spirit, in symbolic figure, upon him. That sign he saw in Jesus, and was therefore sure he was the very personage.

30. For περί, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ὑπὲρ, from B, C, and Origen. But external authority is next to nothing; and internal evidence is in this case equally balanced, considering that ὑπὲρ may have been an alteration of the Alexandrian ἐκ, as in Mark xiv. 24, περὶ πολλῶν ἐκ, though at Acts xii. 5, προσευχὴ ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ, they have substituted περί, which has been adopted by the above Editors; and yet the sense 'in his behalf,' 'for his benefit,' is surely more suitable than, 'about, respecting his welfare.' On the other hand, at Col. i. 3, περί ὧν προσευχ., they edit ὑπὲρ, notwithstanding that περί derives confirmation from Col. iv. 3, προσευχ. περί ἡμῶν in all the copies, as also in 2 Thessa. i. 11, and iii. 1. In Rom. i. 8, εὐχαριστῶ ὑπὲρ πάντων, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit περί π., which is confirmed by 2 Thessa. i. 3, and 1 Cor. i. 4. But in 1 Cor. i. 13, ἵστασθαι ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, Lachm. and Tisch. have not done well in editing περί ὑμ. from only two MSS. B, D, and in the face of internal evidence; not to mention that the term ἵστασθαι requires, what is a weightier adjunct, ὑπὲρ, which is besides very frequently used after verbs or words implying the suffering of evil, or death, in behalf of any one, in his cause.

is repeated at v. 33, which is explanatory of v. 31. A certain difficulty here presents itself, which is this:—In the portion of St. Matthew we read that John wished not to baptize Christ, as not needing his baptism; while in the present he expresses that he did not know him when he came to be baptized. We may, I think, best suppose with Mackn., that while John must have personally known Jesus, have been aware of his holy life, and therefore have refused to baptize him with the baptism of repentance, which he needed not; yet that he knew him not as the Messiah. I am still further of opinion, that considering that John had been expressly told (i. 33) that a definite sign would be given him to point out the Messiah, namely by the visible descent of the Spirit, he might therefore not presume, before seeing the sign, to pronounce any one to be the Messiah, while yet his knowledge of the circumstances of Christ's birth and life might strongly incline him to believe that he would be declared so; and that feeling might dictate the address in the passage of St. Matthew, which certainly indicates no more than respect and veneration, and contains no distinct acknowledgment of Jesus being the Messiah. (H. J. Rose.) Thus it is as much as to say, in the words of De Wette, 'This testimony does not rest upon my long personal acquaintance with Him, but upon that which happened during my baptizing:—Ἄλλ' ἵνα φανερωθῇ, &c., should be rendered: 'But to the end that he should be made manifest to Israel am I come baptizing with water.' It is not said that this was the sole, but that it was the chief end; and that only as being an end leading to another more important one; for I agree with Alf. that it is only as a spiritual preparatory, through repentance, for the knowledge of Him, that John regarded his baptism; not as any thing making Him known to all.

— ἐν τῷ ὕδατι.] Lachm. and Tisch. cancel, and Alf. (ed. 1) brackets the τῷ, from MSS. B, C, G, L, X, and 12 cursive ones, confirmed by some Fathers. But their authority is slender in a case of this kind; and besides that external authority for τῷ is greatly superior (thus I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.), there is here a certain weight from internal evidence, considering that the word was more likely to be left out, through carelessness, or for the purpose of making what is here said square with vv. 26 and 32, than put in for any cause whatever, since it seems wholly unnecessary, and the force of the Article difficult to be accounted for;—and yet scarcely more so than at Acts x. 47, μήτι τοῦ ὕδατος, though there the article is found in all the

MSS. In either passage, however, the article has a certain force, namely, that of notoriety, q. d. not as Alf. 'the water which it is my custom to use, am using,' but 'the water which serves to purification, ministering the baptism of repentance'—which is the force of the article in Rom. vi. 4, τὸ βάπτισμα, and Col. ii. 12, συνταφέντες ἐν τῷ βαπτίσματι.

33. μὴν ἐπ' αὐτόν] In some way, and by some appearance, not revealed to us, the Holy Spirit was so manifested to John, as not removing from Jesus, after having settled on him; and that, probably, to point out to the Baptist the presence of Him to whom he was the forerunner.

34. What is here said is not so much, as Alf. thinks, 'a solemn reiteration of his testimony:—which might seem a vain repetition, inasmuch as it meant, as Calvin remarks, to intimate 'nihil se dubium proferre; quia Deus probe et penitus illi comperta esse voluit, quorum futurus esse mundo testis.' See more in Calv., and also in Lampe.

— μαρτ.] is a more significant term than μαρτυρῶ would have been, denoting that 'he hath borne and doth bear testimony,'—an act continuing, and for all future time.

35—43. On account of the above testimony, supposed to be the Evangelist himself, of John, Andrew, and another of John's disciples, and, through Andrew, Simon Peter, become known to Jesus.

35. τῇ ἡμέρῳ] Namely, two days since this testimony was borne, and after the mission of the Priests and Levites.

— εἰστήκει] 'was standing,' i. e. was there.

— Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel the ὁ before Ἰωάν., but only on the authority of B. L, and one cursive MS.; an authority quite insufficient, espec. considering that I find the ὁ in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS., and internal evidence is entirely in its favour.

36. ἐμβλέψας] 'having fixed his eyes intently upon him;' with that deep interest which he would naturally feel on beholding the long-expected Messiah; see note on Matt. xii. 49. Stier well remarks, that these "first words of the Teacher and Martyr (τὶ ζητεῖτε καὶ ἐρχεσθε καὶ ἰδετε)" bear upon them that unequivocal stamp of majesty and lowliness, which is impressed on the whole of his subsequent speech and action. They commence (continues he) with the most simple forms of address, seemingly arising from the circumstance of the moment: but when we think into utters these words, we perceive the beginning of the shining forth of his glory in them; so that soon does the master-word rise to its true dignity and authority in giving the new name, in piercing the hidden heart, in the disclosure of what was deeply secret, and in the promise of yet far greater things." He further remarks on the words τῷ Ἰησ. περιπατοῦντι at v. 36 ('walking in still abstraction'), 'waiting for his hour in full preparation for the world, and sin'.—στραφεὶς, at v. 38, 'turns about,' awaiting for some one to come unto him, and aware that the time was now come—and θεασάμενος, 'looking upon' the two first given to him by the Father, and addressing them in words of mild graciousness—all which would form a striking subject for the consecrated pencil of a great artist.' Euthym. remarks, that 'the question, τί ζητ., is merely meant to win them over to him, and to inspire them with courage, thus paving the way to the subsequent ἐρχεσθε.' This is the truth, but not the whole truth, which is fully opened out by Stier, who concludes with words adapted to the use of the Preacher on this interesting portion. 'Those only who seek come truly to him; but as they come they are met by the testing word, "What seek ye? and wherefore from me?" We must first of all be taught, by the glance of the Searcher of hearts turned full upon us, and by this question which he asks, what it is that we as men and sinners seek and need: then shall we ever, more and more, discover that it is Himself alone whom we seek, because in Him all that man seeks is found.' By addressing him by the title Ῥαββὶ = διδάσκαλε, they intimate their wish to become his disciples; and emboldened by Jesus' graciousness, they venture to ask him further, where abided thou? whether speaking of a fixed habitation, or of a temporary sojourn (and the term admits of either sense), is uncertain. At any rate, there is a wish latent in the question, q.d. 'we would forthwith cultivate thy nearer and still more private fellowship, so as to hear and learn of thee μὲν ἡσύχως,' as says Euthym.

40. ἐρχεσθε καὶ ἴδετε.] Jesus does not tell them where he abode, but, to encourage them, graciously bids them follow him, and they would see; implying an acceptance of their proffered discipleship. However, Stier may be right in discerning a deeper tone than one merely permissive, namely, that of invitation, even that of the urgency of love. He further remarks, that ἐρχ. καὶ ἴδετε, though an ordinary mode of address in common life, was used under some circumstances, and with great solemnity—as at the grave of Lazarus, John xi. 31. Cant. iii. 11. Rev. vi. 1—7, of the heavenly visions. Accordingly, 'They came and saw the lowly abode of Divine Majesty, and stayed with the Lord the remainder of that day;' so staying from 'the tenth hour' (four o'clock in the afternoon) until, we may suppose, the usual time for retiring to rest, probably about nine o'clock. Thus for four or five hours they "behold his glory, full of grace and truth;" they beheld, as it were in faith, the heaven open upon the Son of Man (infra 50, 51). All this we may infer from the subsequent admiring words of Andrew to his brother Simon, "we have found the Messiah."

—For ἴδετε, Tisch. and Alf. read ὄψεσθε, from MSS. B, C, L, and 6 cursives, with some Versions; but Lachm. retains the text. rec.; rightly; since the other is a manifest alteration coming from certain Critics, who, it seems, stumbled at an unusual expression, somewhat peculiar as a form of soliciting attention to a matter of moment (occurring also at v. 47, where see note; and xi. 34. Rev. vi. 2. Ezek. viii. 9), and perhaps not found in regular composition. Lachm. and Tisch. have, very properly, removed the δι after ὥρα, since for this internal evidence is added to external authority. Yet the same principle of criticism should have induced them to decline receiving the οὐν after ἦλθον, offered them by five of their favourite MSS., considering how remarkably the style of St. John is deficient in connective particles. Very properly have the above Editors removed the δι after ἀμβλείας at v. 43, from strong external authority, confirmed by internal evidence. Alike proper is their removal of ὁ before Χριστός at v. 42, and perhaps of ὁ before Ἰησ. at v. 44.

42. For Μεσς. here and at iv. 25, a large number of the best MSS. (including all the Lamb. and many Mus. MSS.) have Μεσ., which is confirmed by several of the most ancient Greek Fathers, and is preferred by Matth., though not adopted by any recent Editor. Yet it might have been, since, besides very strong external authority, here and elsewhere, it has the support of internal evidence, considering that Μεσ. was more likely to be altered to Μεσς. (in consequence of the Latin mode of speaking) than the reverse, and it is more agreeable to the Hebrew original מָשִׁיחַ. The Editors were here too much swayed by the testimony of the MSS. A, B, and at iv. 25, C, D. But the testimony of the B is only indi-

The reading πρῶτον for πρῶτος, edited by Lachm. from some uncial and several cursive MSS. (to which I could add some Lamb. and Mus. copies) is evidently a gloss, for the more difficult, but equally correct reading; espec. since the use of Adject. for Adverb is an idiom occurring not only in the Class. writers but in the Scriptural, e. gr. Mark iv. 28. John viii. 7. Of course it is implied that both disciples went to seek Simon, but that Andrew was the first to find him (comp. xx. 4, ἦλθε πρῶτος εἰς τὸ μνημεῖον), which seems intimated in the use of the Adject. However, to the half-learned Critical Reviser the marginal Scholium πρῶτον was more intelligible, by which the sense becomes this, that Andrew lighted on without seeking, or found after seeking, Simon, first of the two in time. But the Adject. is scarcely less appropriate, by which the literal sense will be, that 'Andrew was the first in finding Simon, of whom both had been in quest; though that the other, an unnamed disciple, was the Evangelist himself is next to certain. In John xx. 4, the sense is, that John was first (of the two) in coming to the tomb. Thus it appears, that though where πρῶτος is used the Adverb πρῶτον might have satisfied the sense, yet the Adjective is, strictly speaking, not put for the Adverb. Even in Rom. x. 19,—which passage is espec. appealed to in proof of the use of πρῶτος for πρῶτον,—that is hardly the case, as will appear from my note. So, too, in 1 John iv. 19, πρῶτος ἠγάπησεν ἡμᾶς (where almost all Critics unite in taking πρῶτος as standing for πρῶτον, which, indeed, is found in not a few MSS., and represented in most of the ancient Versions) the Adjective has its force, the sense being, 'because He was the first in loving.' That Andrew should have first of the two lighted upon and met with Simon must, as Lampe points out, be ascribed to the Providence of God in directing his steps, as in the case of Isaac and Rebecca, Gen. xxiv.

⁴³ καὶ ἤγαγεν] Tisch. and Alf. cancel the καὶ, from MSS. B, L; while Lachm., rightly, retains it; the abbreviation for καὶ being doubtless absorbed in the final s of the foregoing word. The αὐτὸν after ἤγαγεν ought not to have been bracketed by Alf., since it is absent from only one MS., the B, and that probably from the carelessness of the scribe. The δε after ἐμβλέψας is with reason rejected by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., for both external authority (since it has no place in the Lamb. MSS. 528, 1178, 1179, and several Mus. ones) and internal evidence are against it. The full force of ἐμβλέψας is, 'having looked fixedly,' or 'earnestly, upon him.'

—ὁ Ἰησοῦς is absent from most of the uncial and about 20 cursive MSS. (to which I could add most of the Lamb. and many of the Mus. copies), and it is cancelled by Matthæi, Griesb., Lachm., and Tisch., who, however, insert the words after λέγει αὐτῷ, on the authority of the same MSS. except two. Mr. Alford expresses ὁ Ἰησοῦς in neither one place nor the other. But there is no authority for doing this. I still prefer to retain the words, within brackets, in the former position.

⁴⁶ Ναθαναὴλ] Supposed to have been the same with the Bartholomew mentioned by Matthew; 1. because all the rest of John's followers mentioned in the chapter were received into the number of the Apostles; 2. because John nowhere makes mention of Bartholomew, nor the rest of the Evangelists of Nathanael; 3. because Luke vi. 14, in his list of the Apostles, puts Bartholomew after Philip, with whom Nathanael was converted. This opinion is, moreover, confirmed by Bartholomew's being a surname, as is plain from the simple Θεολομαῖος (Heb. נחמן) occurring in Josephus. The meaning of that is son of Thol. The reading Ναζαρέτ, adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from MSS. A, B, L, X, and a few cursive ones (to which I can add several Lamb. and Mus. copies), is probably (for the reasons given by Tisch. in his Proleg.), but not certainly, the genuine reading.

Λέγει αὐτῷ Φίλιππος· Ἔρχου καὶ ἴδε. ⁴⁸ ε Εἶδεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ^{Pa. 32. 2. infra 5. 20.} τὸν Ναθαναὴλ ἐρχόμενον πρὸς αὐτὸν, καὶ λέγει περὶ αὐτοῦ· Ἴδε, ἀληθῶς Ἰσραηλῆτης, ἐν ᾧ δόλος οὐκ ἔστι. ⁴⁹ Λέγει αὐτῷ Ναθαναὴλ· Πόθεν με γινώσκεις; ἀπεκρίθη [ὁ] Ἰησοῦς καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Πρὸ τοῦ σε Φίλιππον φωνῆσαι, ὅντα ὑπὸ τὴν συκὴν εἶδόν σε. ⁵⁰ Ἀπεκρίθη Ναθαναὴλ καὶ λέγει αὐτῷ· Ῥαββί, σὺ εἶ ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, σὺ εἶ ὁ βασιλεὺς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ. ⁵¹ Ἀπεκρίθη Ἰησοῦς καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Ὅτι εἰπὸν σοι· Εἰδόν σε ὑπο- ^{b Gen. 22. 12. As we should say, 'can any thing extraordinary come out of,' &c. It seemed little probable to Nathanael that a prophet, much less the Messiah, could come out of Galilee, still less from Nazareth; which was but a mean country town, whose inhabitants, as indeed all the Galileans, were held in contempt by the Jews; the cause for which has been attributed to their being a mixed race, partly of Gentile origin, very corrupt in their morals, and proverbially boorish and stupid. Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. prefix ὁ to Φίλιππος, from MSS. B and L; but without reason, for the external authority (I find it in none of the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.) is quite insufficient to establish it, and internal evidence is very much against it. It probably arose from the ω at αὐτῷ.

— ἔρχου καὶ ἴδε.] A proverbial formula, equivalent to 'Judge for yourself; seeing is believing.'

48. ἀληθῶς [Ἰσρ.] for ἀληθῆς [Ἰσρ. Comp. Plutarch de Is., Ἰσριακὸς ὡς ἀληθῶς. The appellation true Israelite (denoting one who imitates the virtues of the Patriarch Israel, see Rom. ii. 28, 29. ix. 6, one who is worthy of the name and privileges thereof) was given, among the Jews, to persons remarkable for uprightness and integrity; comp. also Rom. ii. 28. In the words ἐν ᾧ δόλος οὐκ ἔστι, there is supposed to be a reference to what is said of Jacob, Gen. xxv. 27. But it should rather seem that we have here a phrase derived from Pa. xxxii. 2. xiv. 3 (comp. 1 Pet. ii. 22), to designate a man of undoubted integrity towards men, and unfeigned piety towards God; what Martial Epigr. i. 40. 4, calls, 'vera simplicitate bonus.'

49. πόθεν με γ.] Meaning, 'whence knowest thou my disposition and character?' Nathanael, who appears to have overheard what was said of him, seems here to hint that Jesus had been previously informed of his character by his friends. In order, therefore, to remove this supposition, and show Nathanael that he knew him, not from the information of Philip, or of any other person, but from his own knowledge,—our Lord mentions, what none could know but Philip and Nathanael, πρὸ τοῦ σε Φίλιππον φωνῆσαι, ὅντα ὑπὸ τὴν συκὴν, εἶδόν σε. Now this circumstance of sitting under the fig-tree Chrysostom and Theophylact, with the best modern Commentators, well illustrate by supposing that Philip had found Nathanael under a particular fig-tree, and had then, as often before, conversed with him about Christ (that conversation and religious meditation, nay, prayer, were not unfrequently carried on under fig-trees is proved by the Rabbinical citations of Lightf. and Schoett.); and that now our Lord mentions this in order to evince his divine power. And no wonder; for there had been a conversation of only two, nor was there any one present, who could tell what had passed at it. That a conversation was alluded to, held at some time previous, and in a particular place, identifying it, and distinguishing it from any other, is plain. "Nathanael (observes Stier) understands something not ordinary and of every day life, but special and mysterious, connected with a time when he had repaired to his fig-tree, not for refreshment and solace, but for meditation, reflection, and prayer. There had been a solemn transaction between him and his God—quite alone, as he thought; the prayer of repentance, of deep longing for the 'Consolation of Israel,' and whatever else may have occurred. 'Then,' said the Lord, 'I saw thee—saw and knew thy inner man before God—saw the true Israelite in thee.'" A proof this of supernatural knowledge, and consequently of a Divine commission.

50. σὺ εἶ ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, σὺ εἶ, &c.] Equiv. to 'Thou art the Messiah.' See Pa. ii. 7, infra xi. 27. Matt. xvi. 16. Luke xxii. 70. To this usual expression, to denote the Messiah, Nathan. adds that of ὁ βασιλεὺς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, King of Israel; one of the titles designating the expected Saviour, and which is applied to Christ in various parts of the Gospel; but not so frequently as that of Son of David. This, from the circumstance that, under the Jewish theocracy God was King of Israel, has been supposed to allude to the Divinity of the Messiah. But I agree with Calv. that Nathanael can hardly have meant the appellation in any other than its popular import of earthly Kingship.

— For σὺ εἶ ὁ βασιλ., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from A, B, L, and one cursive MS., σὺ ὁ βασιλεὺς εἶ; but on slender grounds. I suspect that the transposition (which would here be out of place) arose from accident, the scribes inadvertently omitting the εἶ after σὺ, and then inserting it after ὁ βασιλ.

— Before εἶδόν Lachm. and Tisch. insert στῆναι, from MSS. A, B, G, L, and 5 cursive ones; but without sufficient authority: and internal evidence is against the στῆναι, which was, I doubt not, brought in by the Critics.

51. πιστεύεις.] On the scope of this address, Commentators differ; some recognizing reproof, others, more properly, praise. In applying this commendation, our Lord distinctly specifies, for praise, that one thing for which his eyes have looked from the beginning, and ever will look (Jer. v. 3), with which Man must come to Him, αὐτῶν Ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, [ἀπ' ἄρτι] ὄψεσθε τὸν οὐρανὸν ἀνεγρότα, καὶ τοὺς ἀγγέλους τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀναβαίνοντας καὶ καταβαίνοντας ἐπὶ τὸν Υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.

II. ¹ Καὶ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ τρίτῃ γάμος ἐγένετο ἐν Κανᾷ τῆς Γαλιλαίας καὶ ἦν ἡ μήτηρ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἐκεῖ. ² ἐκλήθη δὲ καὶ ὁ Ἰησοῦς καὶ οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ εἰς τὸν γάμον. ³ Καὶ ὑστερήσαντος οἴνου, λέγει ἡ μήτηρ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ πρὸς αὐτὸν Οἶνον οὐκ in order from Him to learn it still better, Faith; q. d. "Well, thou art come to me in the right way [πιστεύσαι γὰρ δεῖ τὸν προσερχόμενον τῷ Θεῷ, Heb. xi. 6]: thou longedst [and hast prayed] and hast sought: thou hast come, seen, and heard; and thou hast believed: I say, then, for thy further faith, 'thou shalt see greater things than these;' yea greater and greater." But principally do these words intimate to Nathanael, that if he believed by reason of this single, and comparatively slender, proof of our Lord's Divine power, his faith would acquire greater and greater strength, when the far stronger proofs of His glory should be brought to view.

52. ἀπ' ἄρτι is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from MSS. B, L, and the Vulg. and Ital. Versions. It may have been interpolated from Matt. xxvi. 64; but no reason can be imagined how it should have crept into all the MSS. but two; for I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS. It is strongly confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version; and, though Alf. says, that, with or without ἀπ' ἄρτι, the sense will be much the same, yet, on his own showing, the presence of ἀπ' ἄρτι as denoting continuity, 'from this time forward,' 'continually,' is far more suitable to the context, and is confirmed by Rev. xiv. 13, comp. with John xlii. 19. xiv. 7.

—With respect to the words ἀπ' ἄρτι—Υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, it has been disputed whether they should be taken literally, to denote such angelic manifestations as those recorded at Matt. iv. 11. xxvii. 2. Luke ii. 9, 13, 22. Acts i. 10; or figuratively, in the sense, 'henceforth shall ye see the power of God and His Providence most signally displayed to defend and protect me; ye shall see far greater works than this,—even signs and mighty deeds wrought by me, such as to prove of a truth that I am the Son of God.' The former view was adopted by many ancient and earlier modern Commentators; but the latter has been maintained by those of after times, and especially the recent Expositors; and it is far preferable, inasmuch as the angelic ministrations were past events; but it fails through not seizing the right gist of the question, in its true scope. The strongly figurative language couched in "the heavens opened;" though in its primary sense denoting such interposition from above as should evince the Divine Power of Jesus, yet in its secondary, but more important, even august, sense, must denote the opening of heavens by the Gospel dispensation, whereby the heaven, which had been closed to sinful man, was opened by 'the Mediator of the New Covenant.' Thus there is here a double sense;—one, as respected Christ personally; the other, as he was Son of Man, the representative of the human race. The first regarded the proof of his being sent from God; the second, of God's having come to man and visited him. Upon the whole I agree with Luther and Calvin, that when Christ became man, and had entered on his ministerial office, then was 'heaven opened,' and it remains open; and I agree also with Lücke, Olsh., and Alf. that the opening of heavens is a symbolical expression, denoting the impartment of Divine grace, 'to help in time of need,' and the revelation from on high of Divine truths; also that the words, plainly pointing at the ladder of Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 10—17, intimate, that what the Patriarch then saw, with the outward sight, was heretofore to be viewed by the eye of faith;—intimating that through the Son of Man were henceforward to descend all impartments of grace from above.

II. 1.—11. The first miracle, of turning water into wine, in fulfilment of the declaration, supra i. 52.—By τῇ τ. is meant 'the third day' after Nathanael's calling, or 'the third day' after Jesus' departure from Beth. into Galilee.

1. Κατὰ τῆς Γαλ.] It should seem that τῆς Γαλ. is added, to distinguish it from some other Cana in one of the other divisions of Judea; and Joseph. Vit. § 16, mentions Cana as a κώμη τῆς Γαλ., meaning one of those populous country towns, which he elsewhere says abound in Galilee. Dr. Robins. Bibl. Res. iii. 204, seqq. has shown that Kāna el Jellil, about three hours N. of Nazareth, is the true site of the place where the miracle was wrought.

2. ἐκλήθη] 'was invited.' On what ground, whether of relationship, or of acquaintance, Jesus was invited, has been variously conjectured. It is most probable that the bride, or bridegroom, or both, were related to his mother Mary, who, it is supposed, had been προμνηστρία, or νυμφαγωγός, and had been already there making arrangements for the feast, since it is plain that she had the chief direction therein. The house is conjectured to have been that of Alphaeus, or Cleopas, who married the sister of Jesus's mother. The disciples invited were probably those recently called, including John; but on what ground we are left to speculate.

3. οἶνον οὐκ ἔχουσι] Equiv. to ὀστερεῖ οἶνον, 'the wine is falling short.' Comp. Gen. xliii. 2. This might very well happen, without supposing any excess on the part of the guests, since these festivities lasted a considerable, though not any certain, number of days; not to mention the probable accession of many beyond the number of guests originally expected, attracted to the company by the presence of Jesus.

On the extent with which Mary addressed these words to our Lord, some difference of opinion exists. To omit several frivolous and wholly gratuitous suppositions, it should seem (according to the view adopted by Chrysostom, of the ancient, and almost all the earlier modern Commentators) that the words, while intimating the inability of the host to provide a further supply of wine, were intended to convey a hint to our Lord, that he should remove the want by a miracle,—a miracle most suitable wherewith to commence his ministry, as it would supply a decisive proof of his Divine mission, and, while benefiting his friend, or relative, would most signally evince his own Divine power. Certainly the directions given by Mary to the servants mark such an expectation of miraculous agency; an expectation, indeed, warranted by the wonderful circumstances of her Son's birth and childhood, and the recent testimony to his Divine mission by John the Baptist. Whether our Lord had, as Lücke supposes, and Stier is inclined to think, given some positive reason to expect that he would show forth his glory by miracles, is more than we are warranted in saying. That he had already worked some, but in secret, as Calv. supposes, is wholly gratuitous and utterly improbable.

4. τί ἔμολ καὶ σὺ, γύναι; These words cannot import (as some have supposed) strong reprehension; for that would seem unmerited by the address preceding. As far as the opinion rests on the expression γύναι it is groundless, this being, as I have already shown, a form of address used even to the most dignified persons, and, in fact, employed by Jesus to his mother on the most affecting of all occasions. In fact, they are a formula taken from the language of common life, and must be interpreted according to the occasion, and the circumstances of the case. It usually implies reproof of causeless interference, q. d. 'What hast thou to do with me' (i. e. with what belongs to me)? And such would seem to be the sense here; though it was probably modified by the tone of voice, and softened into a mild remonstrance with her for interfering with him, in a matter where her parental claim to respect could have no authority over him; espec. as his period of filial subjection to her (meant now to be announced) was at an end.

Of the words following, οὐδὲν ἔκει ἡ ὥρα μου, the full sense is, 'The time [for what you suggest] is not yet come.' See on Matt. iii. 15, —implying that He alone was the proper judge of that season, and would seize it when it arrived; thus mixing comfort with mild reproof. That time would be when the wine was quite exhausted, which it probably now was not (for the words οἶνον οὐκ ἔχ. are hyperbolic), whereby the reality of the miracle would be undoubted.

5. The λέγει, for λέγῃ, found in 8 uncial and many cursive MSS., also in some Lamb. and Mus. copies, and half approved by Tisch., was an alteration of those Critics, who did not perceive the propriety of the Subjunctive mood (expressed in all the ancient Versions): q. d. 'whatsoever he may say to you,' not 'shall say,' as Wakef. and Campb. render: for there is not, properly speaking, a use of the Subjunct. for the Fut. Indic., the presence of ἄν forbidding this. Moreover, the ἄν (which belongs to the relative pron.

and not the verb) serves to impart an indefiniteness, by annexing the notion, 'be the person who he may, or the thing what it may,' as in Hom. Od. i. 158, Τίτινε φίλ', ἢ καὶ μοι νυμεσθῆσαι, ἔγχευεν ἔπειτα: 'whatsoever I may say?'—Ποιῶντας signifies, not, as ποιεῖτε, 'be doing the thing,' but 'have it done directly;' for this use of the Aorist Imperat. denotes not only, as Kühner says, the momentary character of the action, but also its urgent nature, as demanding it to be done forthwith.

6. ὁδρία λίθ.] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read, from B, L, X, and one cursive MS., λίθ. ὁδρ.—but without good reason. The authority for this is insufficient, and the reading probably proceeded from the scribes inadvertently changing the position. All the Lamb. MSS. have the text. rec. except the Cod. Ephes., which has not λίθ., that word being evidently omitted propter homotel., and if so, its archetype must have had the text. rec. Lachm. and Tisch. place κείμεναι after 'λουδαίων, with MSS. B, L, X, and one cursive MS.—very insufficient authority, and in opposition to internal evidence; the reading being no other than one of four, or five, modes of amending the position of the words in this somewhat homely piece of composition, in which, however, perspicuity will be sufficiently imparted by pointing off the words κείμεναι κατά—'λουδαίων, either by placing commas or two —. The position, according to the texts of Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., supposes an altogether harsh transposition, where transposition seldom occurs. According to the above view, the words ἦσαν ὁδρίαί and ζε connect closely with χορεύοντες, and the words κείμεναι κ. τ. καθ. τ. ι. may be rendered (as they are in the Pesch. Syr. Version), 'placed [there] for the purpose of purification (or washing of hands before meals) practised by the Jews,' of which mention is made at Matt. xv. 2. Mark vii. 3, 4. The above use of κατά to denote 'purpose, object,' is indeed rare, but examples of it occur elsewhere, of which one must suffice, in Plut. Alex. c. 35 (a 'locus gemellus gemellus' with the present), κατά τὴν τιμὴν πολλοῦ παρήσαν ἀγύγεια πρὸς τὸ λουτρὸν ὕδατος διὰ χειρῶν ἔχοντες. From the Catena in Joann. edited by Cramer, p. 199, and from Euthym. and Theophyl., it plainly appears that these ὁδρίαί were vessels of a very large size, probably filled by pipes from the domestic cisterns, which supplied the place of a fountain. The quantity of wine thus created has been shown to be 126 gallons,—far too large a quantity to have been brought in, by whatever collusion, unobserved. But, besides that the largeness of the quantity would the more manifestly prove the miracle, this cannot be considered enormous for many days' consumption, if we take into account the great number of guests already assembled to partake of it; to which more would now be added by the fame of the miracle, and from curiosity to see the Worker of it. Not to say that we need not suppose all the wine to have been used. The surplus, if any, would be acceptable to the newly-married couple.

8. ἀντλήσατε] 'draw forth,' which was done with an implement like our cock; so iv. 7. vii. 15, also in the Sept., and in Xen. and Plato, and espec. Phærecr. Metall. frag. l. 30, πληρεῖς κύλικας οἶνον ἡντλουν διακονεῖς τοῖς βουλομένοις πίνειν.

— ἀρχιτρικλίνῳ] 'the director of the feast,'—namely, the person appointed to superintend the preparations for, and management of a feast; to examine the provisions and liquor brought forward, and pass among the guests to see that they were in want of nothing, and to give the necessary orders to the servants (see Ecclus. xxxii. 1). This ἀρχιτρικλίνος is to be distinguished from the συμποσιάρχης, βασιλεὺς, or στρατηγός, of the Greeks, and the moderator, arbiter, or rex convivii, of the Romans. This latter was one of the guests, chosen sometimes by lot, who presided at the table, and prescribed rules in regard to drinking, &c. Whereas the former was usually a hired official,—sometimes a domestic,—answering to the τραπεζοποῖς of the Greeks, and the Tricliniarches of the Romans. As confirmatory of which Juvenecus, in his Hist. Evang., terms the Architrachelus a 'summus minister.' The wine was, as usual, handed to the Architrachelus, in order that he might taste and see whether it were worthy of being set before the company.

9. ὥς—τὸ ὕδωρ οἶνον γέγ.] Render: 'As soon as he had tasted [by way of testing] the water that had become wine.' I entirely agree with Mr. Green, Gram. N. T., p. 272, that the expression (put by concord) ὕδωρ οἶνον γέγ. is not a mere epithet, but a predicate, as in Hdol. vii. 46, γλυκὺν γέυσας τὸν αἶωνα, which he thinks serves to account for the very unusual syntax, and the accus. of thing after γεύομαι. And accordingly he lays down the canon, 'that γεύομαι governs the accus. of a noun having associated with it, by concord, a term which is not a mere definite epithet, but a predicate.' Yet γεύομαι has sometimes the accusative of thing even when not accompanied by such a predicate. Thus in an ancient poet, cited by Aristot. Poet., § 37, as emended by Tyrwhitt, οὐκ ἂν γευόμενος τὸν ἐκείνου ἐλλίβορον, where Tyrwhitt adduces, as an example of the accus., Plat. Comic., τὸ γὰρ ἔψημά σου γεύομενος, ἔλαθον ἐκροφήσας, where he might have confirmed his emendation from Antigon. Caryst. c. xx., αἰγόλεθρον δ' τῶν μιν ἐγχερίων αἰλῶν οὐδεμία γεύεται, though I suspect that for δ' should be read οὐ, since it is required by the context. Here I would point as follows: γεγεννημένον, καὶ οὐκ ᾔδει πόθεν ἰστίν:

—οἱ δὲ διάκ. ᾔδεισαν ὁ ἡντληκότες τὸ ὕδωρ.—φωνεῖ. The ἰστιν stands for ἦν, the sense being, 'how it became such.' This permutation of tense is espec. found, as here, in narrative and secondary propositions, as again at iv. 1, ὅτι ἤκουσαν ὅτι ποιεῖ καὶ βαπτίζει.

— I still continue, with Lachm., to retain the marks of parenthesis (which have been removed by Tisch. and Alf.), and apply them to the same words. I would render thus: 'And he knew not whence it was; but the attendants who had pumped in the water knew.' This is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Persic, and Coptic Translators; and so even, I think, the Vulg., though the Editors point as if the parenthesis commenced at οἱ δὲ διάκονοι. However, that Jerome intended the words to be taken as I suggest, I doubt not; and indeed so, I find, they are pointed in the very early and rare Edition, penses me, of De Lyra, printed by Henry Eggestein, and also in an early MS. of De Lyra in my possession, also in the very ancient Lamb. MS., probably of the eighth century.

10. τίθησι] 'sets on [the table].' So Bel and Drag. 11, τὸν οἶνον τιθ. And so sometimes in the Classical writers. The present tense denotes what it was customary to do. Μεθύειν, from μέθυ (probably derived from the Northern word Med or Meth), signifies to moisten; and μεθύσθαι, 'to be moistened with liquor,' and, in a figurative sense (like the Latin madere vino), 'to be filled with wine.' In Classical use it generally, but not always, implies intoxication. In the Hellenistic writers, however, as Josephus, Philo, and the LXX, it (like the Hebr. יָצַק, as Gen. xliii. 34) seldom denotes more than 'drinking freely,' and the hilarity consequent; which is probably the sense here. It is to be considered, however, that the Architrachelus is not speaking of the guests present, but only makes a general observation as to what was usual on occasions like the present.

— σὺ τετήρηκας τὸν καλόν, &c.] To preclude the idea of any deception as to the water thus become wine, our Lord orders it first to be carried to the Director of the feast, who, being by his office obliged to observe the strictest sobriety, could not but pronounce correctly as to the quality of what was thus handed to him by the servants.

11. ταύτην. ἐπ. τὴν ἀρχ.] The τὴν is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, L, and 3 curvise MSS. (to which I add Scriv. y, ἐν Κανᾷ τῆς Γαλιλαίας, καὶ ἐφάνέρωσε τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐπίστευσαν εἰς αὐτὸν οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ.

¹² Μετὰ τοῦτο κατέβη εἰς Καπερναοὺμ, αὐτὸς καὶ ἡ μήτηρ αὐτοῦ, καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ αὐτοῦ, καὶ οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐκεῖ ἔμειναν οὐ πολλὰς ἡμέρας. ¹³ Καὶ ἐγγὺς ἦν τὸ πάσχα τῶν and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16), with some Greek Fathers, but without reason. The weight of evidence derived from Fathers is, in such a case, very slender; and usually, as here, pulls two ways. The MSS. which are without it are so few, that we may rather suppose the τὴν to have been left out through inadvertence on the part of the scribes. The mark of abbreviation for τὴν may have been mistaken for the ν ἰφελ-κυρτικόν; and I find this ν ἰφελκ. in two Lamb. MSS., 1177 and 1179 (as indeed in all the ancient Mus. copies), and also the τὴν, which Bp. Middl. shows is required by propriety of language. Undoubtedly the τὴν was more likely to be left out by scribes than put in by Critical Revisers. I would render, 'This beginning made,' not 'did Jesus,' which brings in a weightier sense than that yielded without the τὴν,—namely, as Alf. renders, 'This wrought Jesus at the beginning of his miracles.' Of course the glory mentioned is that at supra i. 14 (where see note), and the miracles espec. set forth the glory of the Logos δι' οὗ πάντα ἐγένετο, and by whom, therefore, it was easy for water to be made to become wine.

—σημείων] Σημείον properly signifies, 1. a mark or token, by which any thing is known to be what it is, and thus is distinguished from something else; 2. a pledge or assurance, taken in evidence; 3. a token of Divine interposition, A MIRACLE, either 1. in confirmation of the Divine power or legation of the worker of it; or 2. a miracle simply; in which case it is either joined with τίρας, or stands by itself. A miracle may be defined, with Bishop Malby, Sermon, 'every sensible deviation from, and every seeming contradiction to, the laws of nature, so far as they are known to us.' 'By thus expressing myself,' says the learned Prelate, 'I would guard against an objection which has been made to the language employed by some advocates, as well as enemies of Christianity, when they represent miracles as violations of the laws of nature.' Dr. Brown, a profound metaphysician, and the successor of the celebrated Dugald Stewart, contends that miracles, a priori, are possible; that they are not violations of the laws of nature, and are capable, under certain circumstances, of being made credible by testimony. 'The possibility,' says Dr. Brown, 'of the occasional direct operation of the Power which formed the world, in varying the usual course of its events, it would be in the highest degree unphilosophical to deny; nor can we presume to estimate the degree of its probability. The laws of nature, surely, are not violated when a new antecedent is followed by a new consequent; they are violated only when the antecedent being exactly the same, a different consequent is the result. A miracle is not a violation of any law of nature. It involves, therefore, primarily, no contradiction, nor physical absurdity. It has nothing in it which is inconsistent with our belief of the most undeviating uniformity of nature; for it is not the sequence of a different event, when the preceding circumstances have been the same: it is an effect that is new to our observation, because it is the result of new and peculiar circumstances. The antecedent has been by supposition different; and it is not wonderful, therefore, that the consequent also should be different. While every miracle is to be considered as the result of an extraordinary antecedent, since it flows directly from a higher power than is accustomed to operate in the common train of events which come beneath our view, the sequence which it displays may be regarded, indeed, as out of the common course of nature, but not as contrary to that course.' Such being the case, therefore, I apprehend, a miracle may be defined, 'such an interposition and direct agency of Almighty power, as either 1. brings forward certain phenomena, which, though not at variance with the general laws of nature, are yet effected without being, as consequences, the result of antecedent causes, and which may be termed preternatural; or 2. such a direct agency of Omnipotence as produces phenomena which the common course of nature (i. e. the ordinary concatenation of antecedents and consequents) never produces; for example, raising the dead, &c., which may be termed supernatural.' In the former class we may number the healing of the sick, the passage of the Red Sea by the Israelites, through the influence of a strong West wind which drove back the waves; the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah. In the latter the passage of the Jordan recorded in the third chapter of Joshua; the standing still of the sun at the prayer of Joshua, and the change of water into wine; which last (as appears from the citations in Rec. Syn.) was by the heathens regarded as especially evincing Divine power. Thus they attributed it to some of their gods; and Philostratus did not hesitate to claim it for his Apollonius.

¹³—²². Our Lord's first visit officially to Jerusalem at the Passover, and the cleansing of the Temple from profanation.

that at vi. 4 the third; and that at which Christ suffered as the fourth. Thus his ministry will extend to three years and a half.

14. εὗρεν—πωλοῦντας] It is plain that this circumstance was prior to, and consequently different from, the similar one recorded at Matt. xxi. 12, sq. There, indeed, seems a great propriety in this symbolical action (which intimated the purification of the Jewish religion) being used both at the beginning and the close of Christ's ministry.

—καὶ τοὺς κερματιστὰς καθημένους] Render καθ., 'not sitting,' as do Campb. and Wakef., but simply (in absolute construction) seated, viz., at the τράπεζα, or 'money-counter,' the term being used graphice. This is confirmed by a Rabbinical writer, Aruch, who says,—'There was always a little table fixed before the money-changers, on which they received or paid the money;' and accordingly these τράπεζαι were like our counters; with this difference, however, that they were fixed much nearer to the floor: so that the money-changers could not but sit to pursue their business; indeed, that is in the East at the present day the common posture of all tradesmen waiting in their shops.

—βόας] Render, not, 'oxen,' but cattle; including oxen and cows and calves. The number of victims of all sorts sometimes amounted to 2,500,000, and it is certain from the Rabbinical writers that immense traffic was carried on in beasts and birds for victims; and, as may be imagined, much extortion practised; a great part of the profits of which accrued to the priests. Even at the best very great indecorum must have been occasioned.

The κερματισταὶ here are the same as the κολλυβισταὶ at Matt. xv. 12; namely, 'the changers of the larger coin into the κέρματα or κολλυβοί, i. e. the smaller.'

15. φραγέλλιον ἐκ σχ.] 'a scourge of ropes,' or 'bands,' made of rushes, &c., strowed for the cattle to lie down upon—such as were used for tying up the cattle. We need not, however, suppose much, if any, use made of the φραγέλλιον (and that chiefly for the beasts): this being merely meant to serve as a symbol of authority. Indeed, there was no need of stripes. The traffickers, conscious of the unlawfulness of their proceedings, would not hesitate to obey Christ's injunctions; especially as even a non-commissioned person had a right to interfere in the removal of a glaring abuse, and the crowd of approving by-standers, especially of Zelotes, would be ready to enforce that obedience.

—κέρμα] The word denotes any kind of small coin, from κέρω. For the most ancient larger coins (especially the Oriental) being (like Spanish rials) of a square form, admitted of being cut, so as to form the lesser kind of money; and ἐξέχεε is a term especially suited to the dispersion of such minute coin. MSS. B, L, X, and 33, and Origen read τὰ κέρματα, which is placed in the inner margin by Lachm.; nevertheless it is no other than an alteration of the Alexandrian Critics, aware as they were that this collective force of the singular κέρμα was condemned by the Atticists, as being ordinary Greek (see Polux vii. 190. ix. 87). Yet this idiom is used by the very pure Attic writer, Eubulus ap. Athen. p. 568, F, where for κέρματος the metre would have allowed κερμάτων, had the writer chosen to adopt it: but he thought a mean word more fitted to a low and mean subject. It does not, I believe, elsewhere occur in any pure Greek writer, and very rarely in any Greek writer at all; the only examples known to me being the following,—Timæi Lex. Platon. p. 48, where he explains ἀργυράμοιβοι by ὁ κέρμα (money) ἐντὶ ἀργυρίῳ (read ἀργύρου, from Suid. Lex.) ἐλλασσόμενοι, 'one who changes money for silver metal.' Joseph. Bell. ii. 14, 6, κανὼν περιφέρειντες ἐπὶ τὸν αὐτὸν (namely Florus the Procurator) κέρμα, where, however, κέρματα is read in the MSS. Bigot and Lugd. Bat., and has been adopted by Dindorf, but injudiciously, since internal as well as external evidence is quite in favour of κέρμα, which was likely to be used by a Jewish-Greek writer. In fact κέρματα there comes from the same quarter as τὰ κέρματα here; and the same class of persons have exercised their function on a multitude of passages in Josephus as well as the New Test.—a fact to which the learned Editors seem to have been stone blind.

16. τὸν οἶκον τοῦ Πατρὸς μου] Thus claiming to be the Son of God; since the prophets never address the Deity as their Father, but only as their God.

17. The δὲ after ἐμνήσθ. is absent from MSS. B, L, X, and the Coptic Version, and is bracketed by Lachm., and cancelled by Tisch. The same uncertainty that here exists is found elsewhere in St. John's Gospel, e. gr., vi. 35. vii. 41. ix. 37. xvi. 20. xix. 14. xxi. 12, 20. But though the Evangelist's composition is peculiarly αὐνόμενος, yet here the absence of a particle were too harsh to be supposed.

—καταφάγεται με] External authority is so greatly in favour of this reading, for the text. rec. κατέφαγέ με, that that reading (which originated in the third Stephanic, and was derived from the Erasmus editions) may be said to be nearly destitute of solid proof. Internal evidence also is in favour of καταφάγεται, as being Alexandrian form, of frequent occurrence in the Sept. Yet the active form is not unfrequent in the Sept., and has place in the passage of the Psalms adverted to in all the copies. But this is not strictly a quotation. We must bear in mind, that καταφάγεται is a Deponent Midd.; and that, almost as often as it occurs in the Sept., it is taken in a Future sense; but at Job xxii. 20, and Eccles. vi. 2, the Heb. Fut. is taken in a Present, or Aorist sense, of what is customary. I conjoin the passage of Job with that in Eccles.; for I doubt not that the Sept. had in their copy ἔφαγε, as the Syr. Translator must have had: though then the Future will have to be taken, like the Greek Aorist, in a Present sense, as in our common Version. The reading κατίφαιγε arose from the termination εται being written above (as I find in the Codex Eph., Lambeth) as an abbreviation, and then omitted by the Copyist.

¹⁸ ἀπεκρ. οὖν] The οὖν is absent from six cursive MSS. (to which I could add a few of the most ancient Lamb. and Mus. copies), and several later Versions, and is marked as probably not genuine by Griesb., but retained by Lachm., Scholz, Tisch., and Alf. Nevertheless the occurrence of two other readings δὲ and τότε tends to increase suspicion. Inasmuch that were there more of external authority for the removal of the word, I should be inclined to bracket it. The case of ἐμνήσθησαν δὲ, supra v. 17, where see note, is quite in point here. Taking, however, for granted the genuineness of the Particle, we may render, 'accordingly the Jews addressed him, and said.' It is not quite clear whether by οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι be meant the Jews at large, or the chief priests and rulers of the Jewish people, who had the authority of putting such a question as the following. The Commentators are divided in opinion. Lampe and Tittm. take it of the people at large; Kuin. and most other Commentators, ancient as well as modern, of the priests and rulers: the latter view I prefer, as being more agreeable to the usage of John and the circumstances of the case; which seem to show that such must be the sense intended, q. d., 'Since thou presumest, of thine own authority, to abolish and reform what we have permitted, show thine authority thus to assume the office of a prophet, by the usual evidence of working miracles.' Now the Jewish people might have the power to speak such words, but the priests would be more likely to use them, as having been espec. annoyed, and were, as they thought themselves, aggrieved by such αὐθιγρία. And, what is more, we find that on other altogether similar occasions (if not, as some eminent Expositors are of opinion, the same), the priests, &c., were those who put the question, ἐν ποίᾳ ἐξουσίᾳ ταῦτα ποιεῖς; Matt. xxi. 23. Indeed that οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι may be regarded as equivalent to the priests and rulers of the people, is certain from several passages in which this peculiar form of expression has place in St. John (though not in the other Evangelists); e. g. supra i. 19, ἀπίσταν οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι ἐξ Ἱερουσολύμων (by which expression all the best Commentators explain to be meant οἱ Ἀρχόντες τῆς Ἰουδαίας, the Sanhedrim) ἰσχυροὶ καὶ Λευῖται, ἵνα ἰρωτήσωσιν αὐτόν Σὺ τίς εἶ; and v. 10, 'Ἐλεγον οὖν οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι τῷ θεράπευμένῳ, &c. v. 15, ἀπῆλθιν καὶ ἀνήγαγεν αὐτοῖς Ἰουδαίους, καὶ ἰδίων οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι τὸν Ἰησοῦν, καὶ ἔζητουν αὐτόν ἀποκτεῖναι. vi. 41, ἐγγόγγυον οὖν οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι ὅτι εἶπεν. vii. 1, ἔζητουν αὐτόν οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι ἀποκτεῖναι, and perhaps 11 and 13; as also viii. 48. ix. 18 and 22, bis. xviii. 12, οἱ ὑπηρέται τῶν Ἰουδαίων, and v. 14. xix. 38, κεκρυμμένοι δὲ τὸν φόβον τῶν Ἰουδαίων. The best mode of accounting for this remarkable form of expression is to suppose, with Lampe, that they are called the Jews, as being representatives of the Jewish people, forming, as such, a kind of ecclesiastical parliament.

— ὅτι ταῦτα ποιεῖς] Render, 'since thou doest these things.' As the seeming reference is only to the casting out of the money-changers and the hucksters, one might, for ταῦτα, have expected τοῦτο. But it is observable that the best writers not unfrequently use ταῦτα for τοῦτο, and so John i. 51. 3 John 4, meaning 'such sort of things as this.' However, it is possible that the interrogators had reference to other acts, whereby our Lord had claimed to be a Prophet, as in professing to work a miracle. See on Matt. xxi. 23, where ταῦτα is used certainly with reference to more than teaching and preaching the Gospel; namely, to the recent casting out of the money-changers and traffickers; nay, as Fritz. maintains, also to the working of miracles.

46th year since the time when Herod commenced the building, it was not yet completed. Herod formed it on a dilapidated one originally erected by Zorobabel, using the old materials, and sometimes building on the old foundations. In consequence of which,—and especially as it was raised by parts, the old buildings being gradually pulled down, and new ones erected in their place,—so the edifice was still commonly called Zorobabel's, and the second Temple.

— ἐπίστευσαν τῇ γραφῇ] i.e. by a comparison of those parts of the Old Test. (including Ps. xv. 10) which predict the Messiah's rising from the dead, with the words of Jesus, treasured up in their minds, and the fact of his resurrection, they thoroughly believed what the Scriptures declared, and were convinced of the Divine mission of Jesus.

— The ἐν before τῇ ἑορτῇ is bracketed by Lachm., from one MS. (B); but that arose solely from Critical emendation, prompted by a wish to remove tautology, and to improve the Grecism, perhaps with an eye to Luke ii. 41, ἐπορεύοντο — εἰς Ἱερουσ. τῇ ἑορτῇ τοῦ πάσχα, but forgetting that John's style is not Luke's, and not bearing in mind the kindred passage, infra iv. 45, ἐν Ἱερουσ. ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ, where ἐν was, in like manner, removed by the Critical framer of the text of the MS. D.

ever found in the case of the plural; and, as to the passage a little further on, iii. 30 and 31, that (as will appear from my note there) supplies no real example. The word here to be supplied can be no other than αὐτοῖς, to be fetched from αὐτοῖς preceding, as was done by Augustin and other Fathers, and by all the most eminent modern Commentators from Grot. downwards. When G. Wakefield proposed the singular version, 'because all knew him,' one might suppose that he was here aliquid agens, had he not in his note informed the reader that 'he still (namely, in his 2nd edit.) thought his translation right,' for a reason which he subjoins, but which is utterly without any force; not to mention that the sense he thus assigns to the πάντας would require the article τοῖς to be prefixed. And it is impossible to imagine any thing more calculated to detract from the force and emphasis of what is here a word highly significant and fraught with meaning, namely, the pronoun αὐτόν, of which the sense is he himself, in contradistinction to all human information or testimony, so denoting a prerogative of Divine omniscience; which truth, here implied, is plainly expressed in the words following, v. 25, καὶ ὅτι, &c., 'et quidem ita ut,' &c., meaning that he had no need of any such information, or testimony, concerning any man, since he thoroughly knew what was in max. every man; an irrefragable evidence as to our Lord's Divinity, see 1 Kings viii. 39, and Heb. iv. 12, to point out which seems to have been a principal aim proposed to himself by the Evangelist; on which purpose see the able remarks of Maldonati.

²⁵ περὶ τοῦ ἀνθρ.] Lachm. and Tisch. cancel the τοῦ, but without the authority of any one MS., for no valid proof is there that MS. B is without it. As to the authority of Origen, it is very slender, since he so often quotes loosely, and does not pay much regard to the presence or the absence of the Article. He probably thought—as did the Syr., Arab., and Persic Translators,—that the sense is 'any man,' and not seeing how that could consist with the Article, left it out. Nevertheless, considering that it has place in every MS. (all the Lamb. and Mus. copies have it), it must be retained, and be explained as best we may. Nor is there any great difficulty; for why should not the Article have the same force here as at Matt. iv. 4, and Luke iv. 4, οὐκ ἐπ' ἄρτῳ μόνῳ ζῆσ. ὁ ἄνθρωπος. Matt. xv. 11, βίς, κοῖνὸν τὸν ἄνθρωπον, 18 and 20, κοῖνὸν τὸν ἄνθρωπον. Mark ii. 27, διὰ τὸν ἀνθ.—ὁ ἄνθρωπος. 1 Cor. ii. 11, τὰ τοῦ

III. We are now advanced to a most important narrative, in which, as it has a bearing on the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, more than usual care should be taken to trace the true intent of the Evangelist in recording this transaction; and to ascertain the real import of the terms in which it is expressed. Now the design of the sacred historian was here, as in other parts of his Gospel, to set forth the glory of the Lord; and, in the present instance, especially to illustrate his omniscience. Another important point, as a key to unravelling the difficulties of the whole portion, is the true character and real motives of Nicodemus in seeking this interview. There, however, no little obscurity exists, since on these points we have no direct information from the Evangelist, but are left to collect the required information from the narrative itself; which, while it doubtless contains the substance of what was said by our Lord, yet probably records but a part of what was said, at least, by Nicodemus. Hence no little diversity of opinion exists as to the character and motives of this ruler. Some ascribe to him integrity, candour, and modesty, united, however, with timidity; and they suppose his motives in seeking this interview to have been of the most honourable kind. Others paint his character in very different colours, ascribing his visit to pride, cloaked under pretended humility, craftiness, and dissimulation, subservient to a purpose of treachery. Between these opposite views a middle course will probably conduct us nearest to the truth. We may suppose him to have been a proud, and at the same time a timid, and in a great degree a worldly-minded, man; though, it should seem that, in his character, the good preponderated over the evil; and his motives in this visit appear, upon the whole, to have been good. If this Nicodemus was (as is generally thought) the Nicodemus of whom so much is said in the Rabbinical writers, we may gather some information, which will prove important towards ascertaining his real character and views. He is there described as a man of unbounded wealth, of magnificent liberality, and of piety the most ardent; inasmuch that they ascribe to him the working of miracles. His splendid fortunes were, however, they say, attended by a reverse almost as great as that of Job. If to this we add (which we learn from the Evangelist) his official character, as a Ruler, and his high renown for learning, as the teacher of Israel, we have the picture tolerably complete. Now it is obvious, that a person so circumstanced,—with much to lose, and nothing, in a worldly point of view, to gain, by any change of religion in the Jewish nation,—would be naturally disposed to favour the present state of things, and to be tardy in embracing a new religion; and especially one so persecuted and evil spoken of as the Christian. No person of his rank in life had hitherto embraced it; and, accordingly, he might think that great caution was necessary on his part. Uneasy doubts had probably long weighed on his mind. His reason was, on due inquiry, convinced that the evidence for the Messiahship of Jesus was of the strongest kind; and he could not but consider, with alarm, what would be his punishment if he neglected so great salvation. But to yield to these convictions, and openly embrace the Gospel, involved sacrifices of the severest kind; all that was considered valuable in life, nay, probably life itself. Now Nicodemus was not one of those who are ready to give up all for religion's sake. In short, with many prejudices of the mind, was, doubtless, united a latent unsoundness of the heart. His convictions of the reality of our Lord's pretensions had probably been gradual, but were now decided. Yet he was not prepared to make those unsparring sacrifices, which the circumstances of his case demanded. Not venturing openly to avow what he secretly believed, he resolves, like most timid and selfish men, to steer a middle course; and, with the usual expedient of cowardice, seeks to do that privately which he was afraid to do publicly; and, accordingly, he seeks an interview by night, in order to be secretly admitted to discipleship. From the manner in which that interview was conducted, it is plain that our Lord fully penetrated into his real character. And if we bear in mind the various prejudices and infirmities of the man, in conjunction with his recent and sincere, but not deeply rooted, faith in Christ,—we shall be enabled to ascertain the real scope of what our Lord addressed to him. It seems to have been the especial intent of our Lord first to humble that pride of rank, wealth, and talents, which had, it seems, induced Nicodemus to think that Jesus would receive him as his convert on easier and less humiliating terms than those which he required from the people at large,—namely, that of submitting to public baptism, and thus owning his need of repentance, and a total change of character. We cannot, of course, ascertain precisely the nature of the information for which Nicodemus meant to have applied, had he been allowed to propound all his inquiries. But they were probably on the nature and properties of true religion, and the way in which those imperfections, which he could not justly discern in the Jewish, might be remedied. He commences the conversation with a sort of half-proud, half-flattering compliment, expressive of the conviction of himself and all who weighed the evidence of miracles to prove a divine mission, that Jesus was at least a teacher sent from God. Whether Jesus were the MESSIAH or not, Nicodemus was probably uncertain; and perhaps one chief purpose of his visit was to ascertain that point, in a close and confidential interview. Fluctuating between hope and fear, doubt and conviction, he was resolved to know how far the doctrines of Jesus, when stated in private and confidential communication, did, or did not, coincide with the notion which he had formed of the Messiah.

or exemplificatory force, as in Mark iv. 37. John vi. 10. Acts xxiii. 13. Rom. iii. 22. 1 Cor. x. 11. xv. 56. Accordingly there is a connexion of this portion, vv. 1—21, with the foregoing narration; and the narration is resumed at ver. 22. The purpose of the Evangelist, in the present narrative, was to illustrate our Lord's intimate acquaintance with men's characters, and perfect knowledge of the human heart; of which the transaction here recorded affords a remarkable example.

2. πρὸς αὐτόν] I have now chosen to defer to the authority of the Critical Editors of the New Test., who have all adopted the reading αὐτόν (which I find in several Lamb., and yet more of the Mus. copies); and, indeed, internal evidence is quite in its favour, considering that it is the more difficult reading, and not to be accounted for, except on the principle of its being the true reading. The passage which I have adduced, John xix. 39, does not detract from the authority of the MSS. here, which have αὐτόν, for no certainty is there that αὐτόν was an alteration of the Critics; nay, more probable is it, that it was the original reading, of which τὸν Ἰησοῦν was probably a marginal or interlineary gloss introduced at a very early period. No difficulty would have been found as to αὐτόν, had Biblical Critics perceived the main purpose of the Evangelist in the following narrative, which was, to illustrate the omniscience of our Lord, as strikingly set forth by the case of an individual, one of no ordinary distinction and eminence among his contemporaries; who, with all his high pretensions as a Master in Israel, was yet, by the great MASTER of all, discovered to himself and to others as, after all, wanting in the light which really enlightens, and in the knowledge which alone is able to save. Accordingly the present portion is so closely connected with the preceding context, that αὐτόν will appear to be more suitable than τὸν Ἰησοῦν, and may have been used in order to suggest the connexion and the scope of the narrative.

—οἶδαμεν] The plural here must not be taken for the singular (which in a private conversation would be harsh in the extreme); nor taken impersonally, which is a mere device for the nonce, and to take it, with Alf., as expressing the true conviction of both Nicodemus and his fellow ἀρχόντες,—in the latter case showing the conclusion of their own minds,—in contrariety to their public declarations, is futile. Alf. indeed sees in this an important fact, which renders the Jewish Rulers inexcusable. But the fact requires proof of its existence. The most simple and natural mode of viewing the plural, is to trace in it an allusion to some other of his fellow-rulers (as Joseph of Arimathea, who had come to the same opinion with himself), which is confirmed by xii. 42, ὅμως—ἐκ τῶν ἀρχόντων πολλοὶ ἐπιστεύσαν ἐς αὐτόν. Nicodemus, it would seem, came himself to know, and may have been sent on the part of others who wished to know, the character of this extraordinary Person, who had wrought such miracles.

The position of the words ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ

(placed out of the natural order) was not accidental, but had for its purpose to impart greater force to the sentiment; and accordingly I would render: 'We know that [it is] from God [not man] that thou hast come, as a teacher of Israel.' That the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., Æthiopic, and Persian Translators saw this, plainly appears from their Versions. I cannot agree with Schleiermacher and Stier, that there is involved in the term ἐρχόμενος a recognition by Nicodemus of the Messianic mission of Jesus, that it expresses his being ὁ ἐρχόμενος (Matt. xi. 3. al.); for though the term might admit of that sense, yet, as Lampe and Tittm. show, it is plain that Nicodemus did not as yet entertain such deeply spiritual thoughts as would be contained in ἐρχόμενος ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ex caelo venisse, occurring infra iii. 31. That is quite consistent with the subjoined word, διδάσκαλος, for, as Mr. Alf. observes, "who of the Jews ever expected a teacher to come from God? they looked for a King to sit on the throne of David, a Prophet to declare the Divine will; but never a mere Teacher." I agree with Lampe, that what Nicodemus at that time recognized in our Lord was, that he was a Teacher extraordinary, sent immediately from God, as were the Prophets of the Old Test., and such as was John the Baptist, who, supra i. 6, is characterized as "sent from God."

3. ἀπεκρίθη—ἐὰν μὴ, &c.] It is, with great probability, supposed by Beza, Calvin, Lampe, Tittman, and Kuinoel, that this reply of our Lord interrupted Nicodemus in his address; and that, in order to increase his faith, by evincing his perfect knowledge of what was passing in the mind of the Jewish teacher, our Lord, without waiting till he should have propounded his inquiries, anticipated him, by replying to them, while only in thought. What those inquiries were, has been much disputed. The earlier Commentators suppose them to have been on the mode of attaining eternal salvation; but most recent Expositors, on the person of the Messiah, and the nature of the salvation to be expected. There is, however, no reason why these views may not be united. The question, however, hinges on the force of the expression γινώσκῃ δυνάμει. Many recent Expositors (as Rosenm. and Kuinoel) maintain that it here denotes a total change of sentiment and opinion as to the Messiah, the nature of his kingdom, and the benefits thereof. But no proof has been made out, that the expression in question was ever used merely of a change of sentiments and views. Besides, it is plain, from a comparison of these words with those at vv. 5, 7, that such cannot be the sense here intended. It should seem that our Lord did not intend to advert to any particular heads of inquiry meant to be propounded by Nicodemus, but to cut off all such discussions at once, by laying the axe at the root of the prejudices and errors, which struggled with his faith, and made him only half a believer,—declaring that there must be an entire change of heart, disposition, &c., as implied in the sincere embracing of a new and spiritual religion, before he could hope for salvation through the Messiah. The phrase ἀνωθεν γενν. is plainly equiv. to ἀναγεννηθῆναι, or παλιγγενεσία, which denotes properly a new birth, as in Artemid. Onier. i. 13, but figur. a complete alteration and thorough reformation. Our Lord, however, evidently intended far more than that,—as appears from v. 5, which is of no little importance in determining the sense here. So Calvin well remarks: “Verbo renascendi non partis unius correctionem, sed renovationem totius naturæ designat.” And Lutlier, too, observes that this is as much as to say: “My teaching is not of doing and leaving undone, but of a total change in the man to do them; so that it is not new works done, but a new man to do them; not another life only, but another birth,” by being born anew, as the Peach. Syr. and Vulg. express it. So Barnab. ad Cor. xvi. says, with allusion to this passage and Eph. iv. 24, πάλιν ἐξ ἀρχῆς κτίσθαι. And what is true of life and works is alike applicable to knowledge and learning, a teaching for which Nicodemus, as a disciple of Christ, especially came, but which were equally inefficacious. That Nicodemus understood Christ’s words in the manner above explained, there can be no doubt; for the expression was a common one among the Jews to signify an entire change of heart and life; though it was almost always connected with baptism as the symbol or pledge of it. The expression, therefore, of Nicodemus, in his answer, ver. 4, γεννηθῆναι and δεύτερον γεννηθῆναι, must not be taken, with many Expositors, in a physical, but in a moral sense, q. d. As it involves not only a physical impossibility, but a moral unfitness, for an aged man to be born again, so it involves as great a moral unfitness for such a person to be figuratively ‘born anew, afresh,’ by a total change of mind and heart; meaning probably to hint that there would be a far greater moral unfitness in his case, a man of his great consequence in all respects; such as ought to exempt him from ordinary probations and empty ceremonies. So that the expression, as compared with the explanatory phrase at v. 5, must here include the notion of this change as being effected by Baptism and the influence of the Holy Spirit, as, indeed, is plain from the declaration of John the Baptist, Matt. iii. 11, and Luke iii. 16, αὐτὸς (He, Christ) ὑμᾶς βαπτίσει ἐν Πνεύματι ἁγίῳ καὶ ὕδατι, meaning, as opposed to his own baptism with water only. Accordingly, baptism with water and the Spirit (comp. Tit. iii. 5, ἔσωσεν ἡμᾶς διὰ λουτροῦ παλιγγενεσίας), can alone introduce to the kingdom of heaven; and the mere idea conveyed under it, to which certain German Neologians lower the sense in an empty orphism, can effect nothing. In the same united form of the two elements of baptism our Lord afterwards ordained the rite for perpetual use as a sacrament of his Church, in the expressive words of his parting address to his disciples, Matt. xxviii. 19. Mark xvi. 16, πορευθέντες οὖν μαθητεύσατε πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, βαπτίζοντες—ἐν ὕδατι καὶ Πνεύματος. Ὁ πιστεύσας καὶ βαπτισθεὶς σωθήσεται, &c.

—ὁ Ἰησ.] The ὁ is absent from several uncial, and not a few cursive MSS., including 2 Lamb. and several Mss. copies, and is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. Internal evidence is equally balanced, but external authority is in favour of the word, which may be bracketed, but ought not to be cancelled. At v. 5 there exists the same var. lect.; but external authority against the ὁ is far stronger, including 8 Lamb. and Mss. copies, so as almost to warrant its removal.

5. To the difficulty raised by Nicodemus, in order to a solution, our Lord replies by simply repeating his former assertion, but with a slight addition, for elucidation, ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ Πνεύματος, in order to show that it was not a natural, but a spiritual birth of which he had spoken, and leaving ἀνωθεν (for ἐξ ἀρχῆς = ‘anew’) to be understood, as unnecessary to be expressed; intending also to set forth the indispensable necessity of this regeneration by water and the Spirit, in order to the attaining of everlasting salvation; for that, as the mere natural, or animal, life depends upon flesh and blood, so does the spiritual life depend upon the baptism by water and the Spirit. Moreover, the former phrase, ἰδεῖν τὴν βασιλ. τοῦ Θεοῦ, is here explained by εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὴν βασιλ. τ. Θ., so that it cannot but mean, as Bp. Turton (against Wiseman) has said, ‘become [by actual discipleship] a true member of the Christian Society about to be established.’

6. τὸ γεγεννημένον—ἔστι.] To show the necessity of this total change our Lord directs Nicodemus’ attention to the natural condition of Man;—man as he is by nature in the circumstances of his natural birth; and so to intimate that another change was indispensable; q. d. The nature which a man derives from his parents is ‘fleshy,’ ‘corruptible,’ σαρκικὸν γέννημα, as Euthym., after Chrys., explains; but the nature which he receives from the Spirit is spiritual and incorruptible. As to the use of the neuter, where we might well expect the masculine, Bengel and Alf. think that the neuter is here used, as denoting not only the universal application of this truth, but the very first beginning of life in the embryo, “notat ipsa prima stamina vitæ.” But this surely involves harshness and a jejune-ness of sentiment. The most satisfactory solution of the difficulty is that of Lampe, who remarks that our Lord here employs the former rather than the latter, "ut doceret, se non diversas personas, sed tantum diversas qualitates, respicere; ita ut eadem persona, in qua est corruptio ex carne nata, capax nihilominus etiam sit novæ alicujus qualitatis per Spiritum producendæ."

7. μὴ θαυμάσῃς] 'Thou must not wonder,' 'be in amazement; emotions, perhaps, which the visage of Nicodemus now denoted, that he felt at what had been said as to the ἀνωθεν γεννηθῆναι; and in order to remove these feelings our Lord was pleased to exemplify the thing by a very apposite and striking illustration.—υμᾶς is ποῖ, as Alf. says, 'the weightiest word in the passage,'—our Lord could not avoid using the plural; and there may be an allusion to Nicodemus' ἡμᾶτε—but θαυμάσῃς, expressive of amazement at a thing, as if utterly incredible, or incomprehensible; as, indeed, T. Aquin. observes, "Sciendum est, quod duplex est admiratio: Una devotionis, secundum quod aliquis magnalia Dei considerans, cognoscit ea sibi incomprehensibilia esse; unde relinquitur admirationi locus, secundum illud Ps. xciii. 4, 'Mirabilia in altis Dominus;' et alibi, cxviii. 129, 'Mirabilia testimonia tua;' et ad hanc homines sunt inducendi, non prohibendi. Alia est infidelitatis, dum quis ea quæ dicuntur, non credens, miratur. Unde dicitur Matt. xiii. 57, quod 'mirabantur in doctrinā Christi;' et sequitur quod, 'scandalizabantur in eo;' et ab hac admiratione Dominus Nicodemum removet, inducens exemplum, cum dicit, 'Spiritus ubi vult spirat.' In Johan. Evang. Lect. ii."

8. The argument here is, that, however amazing this twofold regeneration may seem, it is not to be thought impossible, any more than many wonderful phenomena in the natural world; which are obvious enough to the senses, though their causes defy all explanation; q. d. 'for if, in the natural world, powerful effects are produced by unseen and unknown causes, much more may it be so in the spiritual world.' In order to illustrate this spiritual truth, our Lord subjoins a popular example from the wind,—on the causes of which, or its laws, we are confessedly quite ignorant. Inasmuch that, both the Hebrews and the Ancients in general, used to denote any thing unknown or obscure by comparing it with the wind. See exx. in Wolf, and Wets. I add Xen. Mem. iv. 3. 14, where, in proof of the existence of the δώρατα ἐκ τῶν γιγνομένων, we find instances the thunder and lightning, and then the winds, as follows: ἃ δι ποιοῦσι, φανερά ἡμῖν ἐστί, καὶ προστιόντων αὐτῶν αἰσθανομένη. Ἀλλὰ μὴν καὶ ἀνθρώπου γε ψυχῇ, εἴπαρ τι καὶ ἄλλο τῶν ἀνθρωπίνων, τοῦ θείου μετρίχει· ὅτι μὴν γὰρ βασιλεύει ἐν ἡμῖν φανερόν, ὁράται δὲ οὐδ' αὐτῇ, ἃ χρῆ κατανοοῦντα—τιμᾶν τὸ δαιμόνιον. The literal sense of the words is, 'The air (in motion), the breath of wind (the breeze) bloweth.' Thus πνεῦμα is used for the Class. πνοή, to denote a gentle puff of air in motion; though πνεῦμα is used in Hdol. vii. 16. 1, πνεύματα δυνάμεων, 'puffs of wind.' So understood, we have a case in which, as Alf. says, the οὐκ οἶδας is more applicable than in that of a violent, steadily-blowing wind, a stiff wind, which would be here wholly unsuitable.

In ὅπου θέλει there is implied, in the Application, the freedom of Divine grace by the Spirit, 2 Cor. xi. 11, both as to nations and to individuals. The words οὕτως ἐστὶ πᾶς ὁ γεγεννημένος ἐκ τοῦ Πνεύματος are intended to apply the comparison; q. d. 'so it is with,' &c., meaning that there are points of resemblance between the effects of the wind in nature, and those of the Spirit in him who is born of the Spirit; and that they are of a kind which every one must ascribe to the Author of all good. He cannot, indeed, trace the exact process by which that heavenly agency was employed for this effect; but he does not the less believe its reality. This may be thought sufficient to refute the view taken by some professing Christians, who think they can fix the time and the manner of the working of the Spirit in the soul of man, though they are as undefinable as they are various; the persons being really born again, though in a way unseen and incomprehensible to human understanding.

9. On hearing this, Nicodemus, partly perplexed with what seemed obscure, and partly confounded with what, though he partly understood, he was not prepared to receive, exclaims, with unfeigned surprise, not unmingled with distrust, nay, unbelief, πῶς δύναται ταῦτα γινέσθαι;—a mode of expression which, however, Dr. South regards as a form of simple amazement at the above dictum of regeneration, as a great paradox and a sort of impossibility; and, he remarks (what is indeed a melancholy truth), that 'this is saying no more than the hearts of most men living are apt to feel concerning most of the articles of the Christian faith; who thus might appropriate to themselves the words of him who, humbled under a sense of the weakness of his wavering, if not staggering faith, exclaimed, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief!" (Mark ix. 24.) The saying may, however, imply a request for further information. Our Lord, however, before he communicated this, chose to humble Nicodemus' pride by adverting to his ignorance of what, as 'a teacher of Israel,' he might have known; because the Prophets of the Old Test. had, though obscurely, intimated these truths; see Isa. xlix. 21. lxvi. 8. Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27. xxxvii. 9, 10. His humiliation must have been great indeed, if the ἀμὴν λέγω σοι, ὅτι ὁ οἶδαμεν λαλοῦμεν, καὶ ὁ ἑωράκαμεν μαρτυροῦμεν καὶ τὴν μαρτυρίαν ἡμῶν οὐ λαμβάνετε. ¹² Εἰ τὰ ἐπί-

expression ὁ διδάσκαλος, in our Lord's reply, should mean, as Bp. Middleton, with great reason, supposes, 'the teacher of Israel'; a title which he goes so far as to compare with those given, in the middle ages, to the great Schoolmen; one of whom was called the Angelic Doctor, another, the Admirable, and a third, the Irrefragable.

10. ὁ διδάσκ.] All the Lamb. and Mus. MSS., as well as all others, have the Article, ὁ, and accordingly it ought not to be passed over. The force ascribed to it here by Bp. Middleton is ably maintained, and certainly it is greatly preferable to that assigned by Mr. Green (Gr. of N. T. Dialect, p. 221), who supposes that some particular individual of eminence was uniformly invested with the title of 'the Rabbi of Israel,' and that Nicodemus was at that time the possessor of this distinction;—a supposition this, both gratuitous, and carrying with it far less probability than that of Bp. Middleton, besides being liable to a grave objection from which that is free. But the only way by which the learned prelate's view can be placed on any thing like a sure footing is, by adducing some one passage from the Rabbinical writers, proving that such a mode of speaking was adopted to mark the highest distinction in any line. Yet neither Lightfoot, nor Schoettig, nor Meuschen, adduces any thing of the kind. Their illustrations are only apposite on the supposition that the Article is pleonastic. The ancient Versions, espec. the Vulg., cannot be expected to render here much service; nor do they, except the Pesch. Syr., though the two English Translators of the latter Version, Etheridge and Murdoch, both render the Syr.  by 'a teacher,' as if the Pesch. Syr. Translators read διδάσκαλος, or regarded the Article as pleonastic. But the above Translators pass unnoticed the final | emphatic, which may have been meant to give additional force to the word. The same emphatic form is found in the Version of the Pesch. Syr. at Mark v. 35, and Luke viii. 49, where the Greek original has τὸν διδάσκαλον, as the context demands. But in above a dozen other passages they use this emphatic form where the Greek διδάσκαλος is without the Article in all the copies. Yet in all of them διδ. is in the Vocative, which circumstance may account for the |, which will thus answer to the sign of the Vocative in Lat. and Engl. 'O.' However, in Rom. ii. 20, διδάσκαλος is rendered by this emphatic form, the Translator rendering freely, as if in the original there was τὸν διδάσκοντα; and accordingly, at Rom. xii. 7, he renders ὁ διδάσκων by this emphatic form. Though Murd. renders as if it were the subst. διδάσκαλος. Yet that will not prove that he supposed any such form to denote pre-eminence, q. d. κατ' ἐξοχὴν; nor is that idea called for in the present passage by the context; all that is required being, 'the teacher of others,'—which is all the reference needed by the Article. Nor is there any difficulty in supposing that in the Hebrew-Greek phraseology of St. John ὁ διδάσκαλος may stand for ὁ διδάσκων. No need is there to suppose any such hyperbolical title as Bp. Middleton takes for granted. From the learned and able remarks of Dr. Lightfoot (Works, vol. v. p. 42), it will appear that the distinction of being Divinity Professor, and a most dignified authoritative member of the Sanhedrim, is quite sufficient to point the argument, which is, as Dr. Lightf. shows, parallel to that of St. Paul, Rom. ii. 21, ὁ οὖν διδάσκων ἕτερον, σεαυτὸν οὐ διδάσκει; espec. considering that in that whole passage, Rom. ii. 17, 23, though the Apostle only uses the term σὺ Ἰουδαῖος, yet he may glance at the Jewish Teacher, the class of persons like Nicodemus and Gamaliel.

That the reproof conveyed in our Lord's words, "and art ignorant of these things?" is not, as some have imagined, too severe, has been most ably shown by Dr. Lightf. ubi supra. He points out how that ignorance, in the class of authoritative teachers above mentioned, had arisen,—namely, not from the doctrines in question being insufficiently revealed in the Old Test., but mainly from the blindness and perversity of the teachers. "How (says Dr. Lightfoot) Regeneration is taught in Ezek. xi. 19. Ps. l. 1, and other such texts, and how a new birth by baptism and the Spirit is taught in Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 26, he and the rest of his nation, might have learned; but 'they had eyes and saw not,' &c." Hence our Lord might justly reprove Nicodemus for daring to be a teacher, nay, a leading teacher, of others in things which concerned their souls and their eternal state, and yet himself knew not the chief, choicest, and, indeed, primary doctrines that concerned the one or the other.

11. ὁ οἶδαμεν—μαρτυροῦμεν] Many of the best Expositors are of opinion that the plural is employed here agreeably to the usage of persons in authority. See Mark iv. 30. But this is quite a gratuitous fancy, involves a harshness, and would be foreign to our Lord's manner, wholly removed from any worldly arrogance. The use of the plural may be best ascribed partly to a certain modesty, which, by the use of the plural for the singular, seeks to avoid any appearance of egotism, or vain glory, and partly to a certain delicacy, by which our Lord here, in addressing an eminent teacher of Israel, chose thus to express himself, though in a spirit of uncompromising plainness, yet with less of pointed personality than would have been conveyed by the singular. That our Lord here spoke of Himself, and himself only (as almost all the ancients were agreed), clearly appears from the next verse, in which he says: 'If I have told you,' &c., and may further be inferred from v. 32, where John the Baptist says the very same thing of Christ as Christ here says of himself. Comp. Rev. i. 5. iii. 14. To take the expression, with Alf., as a proverbial one is not only gratuitous, but uncharacterizes and dispiritualizes this touching address. The next clause, ὁ ἑωρ. μαρτ., is still more significant than that which preceded. And both are expressive of that complete knowledge which the Son, as united with God the Father, could not but possess. There is also implied knowledge by a virtue of his own, and not imparted by revelation.

12. Having, at v. 11, asserted the authority with which he was invested as a Teacher sent from God, and made his claim to absolute truth in every statement, and unerring knowledge and wisdom in every doctrine, our Lord here points out the improbability of producing conviction in greater matters, when his endeavours to convince upon the smaller had been thus unsuccessful; q. d. 'If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things?' as much as to say, The same absence of impartial inquiry—the same disposition to measure every tenet, offered to your consideration, by your own confined views or perverse prepossessions—the same unwillingness to examine the grounds upon which, as Teacher of Israel, you have grounded your pretensions to superior sagacity and sanctity,—these very same causes, which prevent you from believing what is more obvious to your understanding, will betray you into still more criminal incredulity, when I expatiate upon a subject of far greater difficulty and moment. By τὰ ἐπὶ γαῖα (as Raphaelius has shown) denoted 'earthly doctrines,' such as that of regeneration by water and the Spirit, so called because they are things done upon earth, conversant with earth, and therefore comprehensible. By ἐπουράνια (as the same writer proves) are meant the purposes of God for the salvation of man; involving the doctrines mentioned in the subsequent part of this discourse, and also other doctrines, which, though not adverted to in this conversation, were afterwards revealed by the Holy Spirit; namely, the mysterious union of Christ with God, and his being subject unto death not only for the Jews, but for the Gentiles, as the vicarious sacrifice of Christ for the sins of the whole world; such as are by St. Paul termed μυστήρια.

13. The connexion, however obscure, may be traced by supposing the following link in the chain of thought: 'Yet to One alone, even the Son of Man, belongs the knowledge of these heavenly things. He alone knoweth and can declare the counsels of God.' The general sense of this verse (which may have a reference to Prov. xxx. 4) is, that 'no one hath ever ascended to heaven, to bring down this knowledge from heaven; nor can any one, except the Son of Man (even Christ), reveal the purposes of God for the salvation of man; in other words, 'no one knoweth the counsels of God but he who is come down from God: inasmuch as 'to speak of these things requires intimate knowledge of them by sight; and as no one hath ascended into heaven and returned, so no one is qualified to speak of heavenly things but he who, leaving his abode in heaven, came down to speak of them.'—Of ὁ ὢν ἐν οὐρ., 'Who is (not 'was') in heaven,' the full sense is, 'whose proper dwelling-place is in heaven.' Thus the general sense may be what Mr. Alf. lays down,—that the Son of Man, the Word made flesh, was in, came down from heaven; nay, was in heaven, even while here; and ascended up into heaven when he left the earth;—and by all these proofs, speaking in the language of accomplished redemption, does the Lord say that He alone can speak of τὰ ἐπουράνια,

14. Our Lord does not content himself with stating that Nicodemus would not believe, if he told him of heavenly things, but he intimates his own peculiar knowledge of these things, showing that no mere man hath so understood these heavenly things as the Son of Man, who came down from heaven to reveal them. Having asserted that the Jews would not believe him when he spoke of heavenly things, and declared, that the knowledge of these is peculiarly His 'who had been in heaven;' he selects a most striking instance of that which the Jews refused to admit, and which He himself knew and came to reveal. He simply lays before Nicodemus two, as instances of the many purposes of Divine wisdom for the salvation of men, which unassisted reason never could have pointed out—his own Divine nature, and his sacrifice on the cross—purposes which, till revealed, might well be called mysteries—purposes which, having been revealed, instead of being any longer mysterious to the human mind, became at once level to our comprehensions, credible to our reason. Accordingly, there is at and from this verse forward a transition to the Person of Christ, and redemption by his blood, introduced by an intimation of the reason why he came into the world. In order to this he illustrates his design, and the momentous consequences of his coming, by a reference to the case of the brazen serpent of old; which by Moses, in obedience to the Divine command, was lifted up, as a symbol of forgiveness and redemption to Israel, and every one who looked up at it lived. Our Lord declares that he must (as it is decreed in the counsel of the Father that he should) be lifted on high, as was the brazen serpent in the wilderness; thus signifying, by a twofold comparison, 1. by what death (even the death of the cross) he should die, and 2. the purpose of his death, as stated at v. 15. Thus, then, he intimates that, as in old times they who had been bitten by serpents were directed to look on the brazen image of the serpent (which is with reason supposed to be a type of Him who hath said, 'Look unto me and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth,' Is. xlv. 22), and, thus looking, might be healed; so now may sinners, who come to the foot of the cross, look up unto their crucified Saviour with a sure faith that they shall be healed of the moral diseases of their corrupt nature. The comparison evidently lies between the brazen serpent lifted up on the pole, and the first lifted up on the cross, and then exalted, Saviour. See Erskine, On the Brazen Serpent; who remarks, that "the same thing is predicated of both; both are lifted up, and cognate consequences follow,—body-healing on the one hand, and soul-healing on the other." A further and deeper correspondence is traced by Erskine; a gr. that "as the brazen serpent was made in the likeness of the serpent which had bitten them, so was our Saviour made ἐν ὁμοίωματι σαπῶν ἀμαρτίας." Rom. viii. 3. See more in Ersk., ubi supra. Indeed, the correspondence was pointed out by Euthym., Theophyl., August., and T. Aquin., whom see. A Continental divine has well observed, in reference to the correspondence between the type and the great Anti-type, that 'as the brazen serpent was made in the likeness of the living one, without the venom, so was our Lord made in the likeness of man, without the stain and guilt of sin.'

15. ἵνα πᾶς—αἰώνιον] Here the corresponding clause to the type is left understood; yet there is a sufficiently distinct reference to the purposes and the effects of our Lord's being thus lifted up. And this is stated both negatively and affirmatively. Now those purposes were, 1. to save the human race from utter perdition by sin, original and actual; 2. to acquire for them eternal salvation. The effects were, 1. deliverance from perdition; and 2. restoration to that favour of God which is 'better than life.'

— εἰς αὐτόν] Lachm. and Alf. read ἐπ' αὐτόν, with MS. A.; Tisch., ἐν αὐτῷ, with MS. B. But these are both mere alterations of Critics, who did not bear in mind that πιστεύειν εἰς with accus. is almost peculiar to St. John, though found once in Matt. and once in Mark.

The words μὴ ἀπόληται, ἀλλ' are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from B, L, and 7 cursive MSS. (to which I can add nothing), with some later Versions and Fathers. The reading ἐν αὐτῷ was an alteration for greater plainness. That Alf. should think it used this once by John to imply our Lord's exaltation (!) is extraordinary. Had that been the original reading, the εἰς αὐτόν in all the MSS. but one would be unaccountable. Internal evidence is, indeed, rather against the words, which may have been, as Mr. Alf. pronounces, interpolated from v. 16; but the vast weight of external authority, confirmed by the Pesh. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, decides that they are genuine. They were, I suspect, removed by fastidious Critics, to get rid of a tautology.

16—21. Many Expositors, from Erasm. down to Tholuck, Olsh., and Lücke, maintain that our Lord's discourse breaks off here, and that the rest, to v. 21, contains the remarks of the Evangelist. This they infer from certain repetitions, from the style, and from other matters of doubtful disputation. But the opinion is unworthy of any serious refutation, and scarcely deserved the complete refutation which it has received from Stier and Alf.

16. The expression τὸν κόσμον is, —as Grot., Lightf., and Tittman remark,—used to intimate, that the salvation to be attained by the Saviour, was to be extended to all the nations of the earth, even to every individual of the human race, in contradiction to the notion of the Jews, that he would come to bless and save their nation alone. Comp. 1 John ii. 2. There is great force in the term ἠγάπησεν (the weightiest in the sentence), which points at the great truth declared by St. John repeatedly in his first Epistle, at ii. 5. iv. 8, 16, ὁ Θεὸς ἀγάπῃ ἐστίν, thus pointing at love as the one ground in the Divine counsel for the redemption of man; just as in the next clause the salvation of man is the one grand purpose of that counsel. In the term μονογενῆ there is allusion to the offering up of Isaac, in order to call to Nicodemus's mind, as Alf. thinks, the love there required, the substitution there made, and the prophecy there uttered. The force of the emphasis in μονογ., 'whereby God commendeth his great love to us' (Rom. v. 8), is drawn forth with even more than his usual ability by Calvin. 'Ἐδωκεν is here equiv. to παρέδωκεν in Rom. viii. 32; and also in ἐφείσατο there is an allusion, as Stier says, to the οὐκ ἐφείσω in Gen. xxii. 16, and signifies, 'hath delivered him to death,' implying that he was a ransom for a sinful world.

17. What is said from v. 17 to 21 is levelled against the Jewish notion, that the Messiah would come for the benefit of the Jews only, nay, would rather destroy the Gentiles.

— οὐ γὰρ ἀπέστειλεν—αὐτοῦ] Meaning, 'God sent his Son into the world not to exercise severe judgment and inflict harsh punishment on any nation of the world; but that every individual of them all might, through his atonement, be put into the way of salvation.'

18. The same truth is here repeated (as at v. 16; v. 17 being illustrative; q. d. and no wonder that any one, who believeth on him, shall be saved, since the very purpose of God's sending his Son was, that the world should be saved by Him'), but so as to show that there will be no distinction between Jew and Gentile, since every one, of whatever nation, will have part in this salvation. Our Lord, however, engrafs upon it another sentiment in ἤδη κέκριται, —namely, that he who refuses the offer of salvation, is for this not only doomed to perdition, but is already as good as punished, so certain is his condemnation; nay, is self-condemned, and past all hope of salvation. By a similar mode of expression it is said by Joseph., Bell. ii. 8. 6, that the Essenes thought that he who cannot be believed without resorting to an oath, ἤδη καταγνώσθαι.

19. αὕτη—ἡ κρίσις, &c.] The nature, and the ground, of this decisive condemnation is now set forth, by saying that 'the light is come into the world; and yet (καὶ for καὶ τοι) that men (the world at large) have loved and do love (the true force of the Aorist) the darkness (of unbelief and sin) [rather] than the light [of truth and virtue], because their practices were evil; lit. 'evil were their practices,' 'habits of action.' By what is here said, it is intimated that unbelief is not a speculative error of judgment, into which an honest mind may fall, but originates in the enmity of the heart to God; and that Christ is not the cause of any evil such men suffer by not listening to his doctrine, but that the blame rests solely on themselves, who are indisposed to receive the truth, though coming with the fullest evidence; and who spurn the gracious offer of salvation, to their own perdition. So that if, notwithstanding the gracious offer of salvation through Christ, men spurn that offer, and refuse to receive the truth, though coming with the fullest evidence, they do this at their peril, and shall perish by their own fault.

20, 21. The sentiment at the last clause of v. 19 is here illustrated, our Lord showing how it comes to pass that any should thus reject the counsel of God to their perdition, and close their eyes to the light,—namely, because the light of truth is against them, by disclosing their own ruined and lost state. In short, the words are an illustration of ἦν γὰρ πονηρὰ αὐτῶν τὰ ἔργα,—where the reading of Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from 6 uncial and several cursive MSS. (to which I can add a very few Lamb. and Mus. copies), is unsustained by competent evidence, and weakens the force of the declaration. A very unbased change of text, too, is that of αὐτοῦ τὰ ἔργα, by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. The discourse concludes with a sentiment of general application (aimed at the Pharisees at large), showing the evil effects of a corrupt life on all inquiries after truth, and evincing (to use the words of an old writer), that 'when truth is against a man, a man is against truth.'

20. ὁ φαῦλα πράσων] Lit. 'he who practises evil things,' i. e. commits them habitually. On ἐλεγχθῇ see note at Eph. v. 13, and my note on Thucyd. vi. 38.

21. ὁ δὲ ποιῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν] The idea of truth here is that of rectitude and goodness, as opposed to what is evil and wicked. Similarly as in 1 Cor. xiii. 6, ἀλήθεια is opposed to ἀδικία. Yet the phrase ποιῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν is so rare, that it has been supposed peculiar to St. John. This, however, is overturned by the fact, that it often occurs in the Rabbinical writers. Its propriety is well vindicated by the remark of Doddridge, that 'there really is a truth or falsehood in actions as well as words.' Indeed, as Bp. Warburton has finely observed in his Sermon on

2 Pet. i. 5, 'Truth and Virtue are twin-born sisters, with only a name of distinction; truth being speculative virtue, and virtue practical truth.'

— ὅτι ἐν Θεῷ—εἰργ.] Meaning that 'they are wrought in God,' i. e. in his faith and fear, with a single eye to his approval, as the great end of human action, by those living and acting in and unto him, doing all to his glory. So Euthym. and Theoph., Thom. Aquin., Calvin., and Mald. Alf. refers it to 'the candle of the Lord being kindled within him, and he himself being born again in the kingdom of God.' But true as this is, it is only a part of the truth. The full import of what is contained in this locutio prænans is ably opened out by Lampe in his elaborate Analysis, where, however, it only forms one of the five heads. He says that the principle of action in such persons is from God by the new birth, whereby they are of God (1 John iv. 46. v. 19), and sanctified in God (Jude 1). Accordingly, all their good works are the work of God in them, who worketh in them, not only to will, but to bring that will into work (Phil. ii. 12). Whatever they do that is right is the fruit of the Spirit of God in them (Gal. v. 22), in whom they walk (Gal. v. 25). Accordingly Mr. Alford brings in 'the candle of the Lord' quite out of place.

22—24. Soon after this conversation our Lord left Jerusalem, and withdrew, with his disciples, into the more retired parts of the country, in the neighbourhood of John the Baptist (who took occasion to bear another decided testimony to him), where he preached and collected followers, and his more stated disciples baptized them.

22. εἰς τὴν Ἰουδ. γῆν] Not, 'into the land of Judæa,' since any one in Jerusalem must necessarily be in Judæa; but 'the territory,' or country parts, of Judæa, as distinguished from its metropolis; just as we speak of the country, as opposed to the town.

It is not said to what place our Lord went to after his baptism. We may, I think, not improbably conjecture it to have been Bethany, or Bethabara, where John had been baptizing; on which see note supra i. 28. It should seem that John had removed from Bethabara to Ænon, in order that the Samaritans might the more conveniently come to his baptism.

— ἐβάπτιζεν] Namely, through the medium of his disciples; for Christ did not himself baptize. See iv. 2. Thus what a king's servants do, is often spoken of as done by himself. Our Lord declined himself baptizing, because baptism bound the persons to religious obedience to himself, and might therefore, with less ostentation, be administered by another; partly, too, because of the evil which might have attended it, from the per-

23. Σαλείμ] The spelling of this name varies in the MSS. One uncial, and not a few cursive MSS. have Σαλήμ, which I find also in not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies. But external authority is quite in favour of Σαλείμ, and so also is internal evidence, considering that et is often altered by the scribes into η, by what is called Itacism. The spelling Σαλείμ is also confirmed by Eusebius, and by the Onomasticon of Jerome, both of whom fix the place at 8 Roman stadia s. of Bethsanean, in or near the valley of the Jordan. And nothing has yet been said to show that that is not the place; for, as to the reason stated by Alf., that "thus it would be in Samaria, whereas it was more likely that John should have been baptizing in Judaea than in Samaria"—it is insufficient to establish the matter, and leaves open the formidable objection,—but if not at the above site, where then are we to fix the place? As to Mr. Alford's own attempt to fix it at the Shellim (Sept. Σαλείμ) mentioned at Josh. xv. 32, where at 61 we have Αἰνῶν—those two places were far distant; and accordingly the Shilhim at v. 32 cannot be the Σαλείμ spoken of by St. John. Still less successfully has Schleusen endeavoured to identify it with the Shalim (Sept. Σααλίμ) of 1 Sam. ix. 4, because it is quite plain, from the context, that this town must have been rather within the tribe of Benjamin (or very near to it, on the southern declivity of Mount Ephraim), and at a very great distance (40 miles) from the Ænon here mentioned. Strange is it that Reland should, in his Palest. p. 977, say of Σαλείμ, 'locus aquis abundans,' as if the words ὕδατα πολλὰ ἦν ἐκεῖ did not refer to Αἰνῶν, which must, by the force of its Hebr. original, גִּי, denote as much; since it is not, as Alf. says, an intensive form of אין, but formed on the Chaldee plural, גִּימ, Fountains (comp. Καλοὶ—λίμνες, Acts xxvii. 8). I quite agree with Dr. Robinson, that it was situated in one of the lateral valleys running down to the valley of the Jordan from the west, the place mentioned in Judith iv. 4.

25. Instead of the text. rec. Ἰουδαίων, very many MSS., Versions, and Fathers, have Ἰουδαίου, which (including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies) is adopted by almost all the Editors from Wetstein downwards; and with reason; for the ellipsis of τινός is frequent, whereas that of τινῶν would be anomalous. Besides, the change of Ἰουδαίου into Ἰουδαίων was likely to take place, from the plural just before. This Jew may be supposed to have been one of those who had been baptized by Christ's disciples.

—περὶ καθαρισμοῦ] Some understand this of the comparative merit, or efficacy, of John's baptism with that of Jesus, or the various ceremonial washings founded on tradition; but it should rather seem that the discussion was on the nature, efficacy, and necessity to Jews of baptismal purification, as καθαρισμός signifies in 2 Pet. i. 9: which, however, was closely connected with another on the comparative efficacy of the baptism of John, or that of Jesus, with the Jewish. If the nature of Christ's baptism were duly considered, it might well be thought that that of John was unnecessary.

26. ἦν μετὰ σοῦ] Namely, for baptism; meaning, 'was baptized by thee.' The words ᾧ σὺ μεμαρτ. perhaps have reference, not so much to the testimony borne by John to Jesus, as to the increase of Jesus's celebrity, and the credit consequent on it. They thought that John, through excess of modesty, had exaggerated the dignity of Jesus; whom it is plain they did not consider as the Messiah.

27—30. John here represses their jealous feelings for the honour of their master, by showing that there was no real ground for them. To avoid, however, the impropriety of any seeming comparison, where none could exist, he gets rid of personality, by couching what he has to say under a brief moral maxim of general application—that 'all superiority and success come from God,' and therefore ought not to excite envious feelings in those whose progress seems impeded by it. In this it is implied, that no one entrusted with a Divine commission must exceed his commission. John then proceeds to show that he has ever acted on this principle; reminding them of his public and private avowal, that he was not the Messiah, but only his Forerunner. And he takes the opportunity of bearing still stronger testimony to Jesus's Messiahship than he had before done.

29. ὁ ἔχων τὴν νύμφην, &c.] The subject is here illustrated by a similitude derived from common life (as in Matt. ix. 15, and Mark ii. 19); in which the Baptist compares Christ to the bridegroom at the marriage feast, and himself to the παράνυμφος, or bridegroom, i. e. a friend who had been employed to negotiate the marriage, and had acted as his agent throughout the whole affair. There were indeed two such persons; one on the part of the bridegroom, the other on that of the bride; who, as they had at first, before the marriage, acted as agents, afterwards served as mediators, to preserve harmony between the new-married pair. The allusion at ἐσθηκῶς—χαίρει διὰ τὴν φωνὴν τοῦ νυμφίου is variously traced. But the words are, with most probability, supposed to allude to the ceremony of the formal interview, previous to marriage, of the betrothed pair; who were brought together by the bridegroom into a private apartment, at the door of which they were themselves stationed, so as to be able to distinguish any elevation of voice on the part of the future bridegroom in addressing his intended bride; from which, and from the tone of it, they would easily infer his satisfaction at the choice made for him by them, and feel corresponding joy. The sense, then, may be thus expressed: 'As at a marriage the bridegroom is the principal person, and his bridegroom willingly cedes to him the preference, and, rejoicing in his acceptance, is content to play an under part, so do I willingly sustain the part of a humble forerunner of Christ.'—Πεπλήρ., 'is consummate.' An expression (as Schoetgen observes) used by the Rabbinical writers to denote the bliss of a future state; ex. gr. Sohar Chadaach, p. 42, 2, 'They exercise themselves in the praises of God, and thus is their joy made complete.'

30, 31. The Baptist goes yet further, and to cut off all future occasion for comparison, shows that there will be less and less room for it; since the celebrity of the one must increase, that of the other decrease; and so resplendent will be the glory of the former, as to cast that of the latter entirely into the shade, and cause it to fade away like the morning star, or the waning moon, at sunrise. (Euthym. and Tittman.) At v. 31 is shown the vast difference between Christ and all others, and his infinite superiority to them.

31—36. It has been not a little disputed whether these are to be considered as the words of John the Baptist, or of the Evangelist. The latter is the opinion of many recent Commentators, as Kuin., Lücke, Olsh., and Thol., and is grounded on the style and manner being like that of the Evangelist. But such is surely a very precarious sort of argument. Besides, as Tittman remarks, 'there is a complete connexion of these words with the preceding, without the interposition of any expression, from which it could be inferred that what follows is from the Evangelist.' Nor is there any reason why the Evangelist should have subjoined these words, and thus chosen to confirm by his own judgment the testimony of the Baptist; which must have been to his readers deserving of entire credit. On the other hand, there are obvious reasons why this portion should be from John the Baptist; for in it he seems to have intended to confirm what he had just said, —namely, that, inasmuch as He must increase, but himself decrease, the precedence is due, not to him, but to Jesus.

31. ὁ ἄνωθεν ἐρχόμενος, &c.] The absence of any particle to introduce what follows from this verse to the end of the chapter, will by no means prove that they are not from the same speaker (namely, John the Baptist), since the ἀνυπόθετον here, as frequently elsewhere, serves to strengthen the assertion, of which the purpose is to show why such must be the case, namely, because the one is from heaven, and, accordingly, is above all.

— ἐκ τῆς γῆς, for γῆινος, equiv. to χοῖκός at 1 Cor. xv. 47, with an implied notion of what is gross and sensual as opposed to what is heavenly and spiritual.

— ὁ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρ. ἐρχόμενος.] Supply καὶ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ λαλεῖ, to correspond to ἐκ τῆς γῆς λαλεῖ. An antithesis evidently involving the Divinity of the Lord Jesus. At ὁ ἑώρακε καὶ ἤκουσε supply ἐξ αὐτοῦ, i. e. ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ. The meaning may be thus expressed: 'A mere man is not endued with that knowledge of Divine things, has not that intimate acquaintance with the secret counsels of God, which He possesses who is of celestial origin (to whom God giveth not the Spirit by measure, v. 34); he therefore teacheth, and can teach, only what is earthly, incomplete, and imperfect. But he who cometh from God knoweth the counsels and speaketh the words of God; and as he possesses a nature superior to man, so he possesses a knowledge of divine things far above that of the Prophets.'

With the expression ὁ ὢν ἐκ τῆς γῆς Wetstein compares the Classical γῆγγις, or γῆινος (terrestrial), as opposed to οὐράνιος. Very similar are the words of Æschyl. in Stob. Sermon. Eth. p. 98, τὸ γὰρ βρότειον σπέρμ' ἱψημέρια φρονεῖ. See also 2 Esdr. iv. 21, 33. Such, however (he shows), as have received this testimony, have no reason to be ashamed of the paucity of their number, since they have God as the author of their faith; and He is surely abundantly sufficient to them. See more in Calvin.

33, 34. These verses are closely connected together, and I have adjusted the punctuation accordingly, as in R. Stephens's edition. An emphasis too rests on ὁ Θεός, which is in antithesis to the foregoing αὐτοῦ ('Ἰησοῦ) ἡ μαρτυρία. By ἀληθής is designated, as Lampe points out, the great attribute of the Deity, his perfect TRUTH,

'veritas ac veracitas.' How each of these terms applies to the Deity, and suits the present occasion, he has ably pointed out. Answering to ἀληθής here is ἀληθινός at 1 John 5. 3, and Rev. iii. 7. vi. 10. 2 Cor. i. 18. The course of argument here pursued is as follows: 'He who hath received the testimony of Christ as true, hath thereby solemnly acknowledged (lit. 'set his seal to,' attested, his acknowledgment) that the words of God [spoken by Christ] are true; for Christ, the Sent of God (called, Heb. iii. 1, ὁ Ἀπόστολος τοῦ Θεοῦ), speaketh the very words of God, as from heaven (see Deut. xviii. 18 sq.), the words themselves, as if God Himself spoke, and not, like the Apostles, ὡς λόγια Θεοῦ, so that, in the words of Calv., 'in thus receiving Christ, we have in reality to do with God, since Christ came from God; and God it is who speaks by him.' Moreover, the connexion of these with the next words may be thus traced: ['And he may well speak the very words of God to the utmost extent;] for God giveth [unto him] without limit the spirit of truth, and not [as he does to human prophets, by measure and sparingly]. Comp. 1 John v. 10. Comp. Xenoph. Symp. iv. 43, where, speaking of the riches of the mind and soul as consisting in truth, &c., imparted by Socrates to Antisthenes, he says that this wealth makes free, adding, Σωκράτης οὗτος, παρ' οὗ ἐγὼ τούτων τὸν πλοῦτον ἱκτησάμην, οὔτε ἀριμύθῳ οὔτε σταθμῷ ἱπάρκει μοι (did not furnish it to me by measure and by weight, i. e. sparingly;): ἀλλ' ὅσους ἰδυνάμην φέρσθαι (i. e. lit. carry off for my use) τοσούτον μοι παρέδιδον.

33. ἰσφράγισεν is a very forcible term for ἔδειξεν, allest, confirms, professes his belief; a metaphor taken from deeds signed and sealed. For as testimonies of contracts were confirmed by the addition of a seal, any confirmation of truth was called σφραγίς; and as, by the imposition of a seal, any thing is rendered unsuspected of fraud, hence σφραγίζεω came to mean confirm, as here and in Eph. i. 13. 2 Cor. i. 22. Wisd. ii. 5, and in some passages of the Classical writers.

35. πάντα δίδωκεν] Meaning the regulation of all things respecting man and his salvation, as unlimited a gift as that of the Spíritu without measure.

36. ὁ πιστεύων, &c.] The Baptist concludes with a solemn repetition of the great truth, which is the very key-stone of the Gospel, and which, as such, was stated by our Lord to Nicodemus supra iii. 16.

— ἔχει is not simply for ἔξει; but the Present is used to show the certainty of the thing; q. d. 'it is laid up for him.' Nay, a Present sense may be justified, if we suppose the meaning to be, 'is in possession of that principle, which places him in the pathway of salvation, and which, if it be not his own fault, will terminate in everlasting salvation.' By ὁ ἀπειθῶν is not merely meant 'he who refuseth to yield this faith; for the expression ἀπειθῶν, instead of μὴ πιστεύων or ἀπιστῶν, was probably used to imply disobedience, as well as disbelief;—intimating that the faith to which the promise of salvation is here annexed is alone based on a principle of unreserved obedience to Christ. Indeed he who obstinately refuses belief cannot obey. At the same time, even without the antithesis, it would be implied in πιστεύων that his belief was a source of obedience. Upon the whole, the full sense of the passage is well expressed by Bp. Jebb as follows: 'He who with his heart believeth in the Son, is already in possession of eternal life; he, whatever may be his outward profession, whatever his theoretic or historical belief, who obeyeth not the Son, not only does not possess eternal life, he does not possess any thing worthy to be called life at all. But this is not the whole; for as eternal life is the present possession of the faithful, so the wrath of God is the present and permanent lot of the disobedient; it abideth on him, not being removed by the atoning merits of the Redeemer.'

IV. The above decided testimony of the Baptist to the celestial character of Jesus, taken in conjunction with the miracles wrought by the latter, had, it seems, made considerable impression on the minds of the people, and had both attracted the notice and excited the displeasure of the rulers, who sought to lay hold of him. Our Lord, however, it is probable, continued for some time yet in the more remote and retired parts of the country, preaching and collecting disciples. At length, so great was the umbrage taken by the Rulers, that, in order to avoid anticipating that which should be, our Lord left Judea for Galilee, to go to Capernaum; and in his way thither, through Samaria, occurred the conversation here recorded with the Samaritan woman; which led to a confession of His Messiahship by the Samaritans; and the circumstances attendant on the whole affair tend not a little to illustrate the real character of our Lord.

that Paul did not baptize, at least usually; and for other reasons that may be imagined.

3. πάλιν] This is absent from 10 uncial and several cursive MSS. (to which I add 7 of the most ancient Lamb. MSS. and many more of the Mus. copies), and several Editions, confirmed by some later Versions; and its absence is approved by Mill, Griesb., and Matth. But it has place in B, C, D, L, M, and the great body of cursive MSS., confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions; and it is retained by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. Yet it was more likely to be inserted (because of supra i. 44), than removed.

4. ἰδεὶ δὲ αὐτὸν δ.] It was so far necessary, as being in the direct road, and by a much shorter route than through Perea, being the one usually taken by the Galileans. So Joseph., Vit. 52, says, πάντες ἰδεὶ τοῦτε ταχὺ βουλομένους ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰερουσαλὴμ (namely, from Jerusalem to Galilee) δι' ἐκείνης (Samaritania) πορεύεσθαι. He calls it a three-days' journey. Yet the other route was occasionally taken; and Jesus might have some reason for taking the more direct way beside that of speed, —namely, with a view to the evangelization of Samaria.

5. ἔρχεται εἰς] 'cometh (came) unto,' i. e. as far as; for from v. 6, it appears that he rested outside of the city, while his disciples entered it, to procure provisions, and on returning from thence found Jesus talking with a Samaritan woman.

— Συχάρ] This, found in very many MSS., including all the Lamb. and all the more ancient Mus. copies, for text. rec. Συχήμ, has been received by all the best Editors. The place was originally called Συχήμ, from the name of the person of whose family Jacob bought the land, and built an altar. See Gen. xxxiii. 18. The name is supposed to have been altered by the Jews by way of contempt (as Βασιλεβούλ for Βεελζεβούβ) to Συχάρ, to denote the drunkenness (from συχ, 'drunkard,' or the 'falsehood' in idolatry, from συχ, 'falsehood,' 'deceit,' 'fraud,' of the inhabitants; and this seems preferable; espec. since it is confirmed by a most ancient authority, the Test. xii. Patr. p. 564, ἵσταται ἀπὸ σήμερον Σιχήμ (read Συχ.) λεγομένη πόλις ἀσυνήτων, read ἀσυνήτων, and see note on Rom. i. 31.

6. ἐκαθέζετο οὕτως] Rejecting, with reason, the sense assigned to the οὕτως by several Commentators, therefore, or afterwards, I have hitherto given the preference to the view of those who take the οὕτως as standing for οὕτως ὥς ἢν or ὥς ἐτυχῇ: adducing as examples Acts xxvii. 17, οὕτως ἐφύοντο, and Hor. Od. ii. 11, 17, 'jacentes sic temere.' This, however, though supported by the authority of the ancient Commentators, would seem somewhat forced and factitious. Besides, such is not really the sense in the above passage of Acts; and in that of Horace it is only communicated by the added word temere. Hence I am now inclined to think that the οὕτως simply denotes consequence, as when one event follows another, either in the change of events, or from some cause, as in the present case: and thus its sense may be expressed by accordingly; a use occurring in Acts xxvii. 17. Hom. Od. v. 146, οὕτως νῦν ἀπόμεμπε, and Soph. Aj. 1182, κείμεαι δ' ἀμείμνους (uncared for) οὕτως, where the Commentators explain οὕτως, as they do in the present passage, by sic temere. But it there signifies, in an emphatic sense (as in Hom. Il. xxi. 184, κείσθ' οὕτως), by the circumstances and condition described above, v. 1175, 1181, —namely, wet and starved. The situation was well suited to the purpose of refreshment, since wells or fountains, from their coolness (being in the East almost always shaded by trees), are usually chosen by travellers as places for rest and recreation. So Philostr. Vit. Apoll., ἀριστοποιουμένων δὲ αὐτῶν πρὸς πηγῇ ὕδατος.

— For ὥσει, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit ὥς, from A, B, C, D, L, and one cursive MS. (to which I can only add one Lamb. copy): —a very slender authority for the word, espec. since internal evidence is in favour of ὥσει, which was more likely to be altered by the Critical Revisers into ὥς, than the contrary by the scribe. Thus, in almost every instance where ὥσει occurs, the MS. D, and sometimes one other or more of its fellows, has ὥς, undoubtedly from emendation; for this use of ὥσει instead of ὥς before words of number in the sense about is Hellenistic; though it must be admitted that the several Evangelists, Mark, Luke, and John, do occasionally use the purer Greek ὥς.

7. δός μοι πιεῖν] The verb is here employed as a noun, as often in the Greek Classical writers. So Athen. p. 4, ἔρχεαι πιεῖν μοι. —For πιεῖν here and at vv. 9 and 10, the MSS. A, C, D, L, fluctuate between πιεῖν and πιῖν, of which two readings Tisch. edits the latter, while Lachm. and Alf., with myself, adopt neither. Were I to choose between the two, I should prefer πιεῖν, for which there exists greater authority at this verse, and nearly equal at vv. 9 and 10. Moreover, πιῖν occurs in MS. D at Mark xiv. 25. Indeed, πιῖν has every appearance of being a mere barbarism (and that arising from the carelessness of the scribes), as being quite inconsistent with any rules of contraction, and, I believe, nowhere else found; for as to the line of the Epigrammatist Lucilius (Anthol. Pal. ii. 140), directed against grammarians—Οἷς οὐ σκῆμμα λέγειν, οὐ πιν φίλον—there the best MS. has πιεῖν

(which is, I doubt not, the true reading, and the form arose from a blunder of the scribes). Liddell, indeed, in his Lex. in v., refers for the forms πῖν and πῖν, besides the passage of the Anthol., to Meinecke, Euphor. Fr. 105. But I find no such writer as Euphorion, and I doubt whether such a writer ever existed. Probably he meant Euphron; but I can find no such form as πῖν or πῖν in the Fragments of Euphron, as collected by Meinecke. Nay, I can discover no vestige of πῖν any where, neither in the Sept. nor in Josephus; and I suspect it to have been a form almost confined to common life, though it might be adopted by a Poet to suit his metre; and hence I should rather think it came from the scribes than that it should have been used by St. John. I suspect, however, that Itacism alone produced this barbarous πῖν; thus in Lamb. 1193 (swarming with Itacisms) we have in all three passages πῖν, but by Itacism for πῖν, which is found in all the other Lamb. MSS.

9. ὡς σὺ, Ἰουδαῖος ὢν] That he was such, she had inferred from his dress and language; for the Ephraimitish dialect differed from that of the rest of Israel, as the Galilaean from the rest of Judaea. She expresses wonder at any favour, however small, being asked by a Jew from a Samaritan. So Raschi, in his Gloss. on the Gemara, says, 'it is an abomination to eat the bread or drink the wine of a Samaritan.' On the origin of this reciprocal hatred between the Jews and the Samaritans I have treated at large in Recena. Synop. The reason why the woman asked this question the Evangelist subjoins (for the information of his Greek readers) in the words οὐ γὰρ, &c., where συγχ. must be understood of familiar intercourse and society; thus Euthymius explains by οὐ κοινωνοῦσι; for the intercourse of buying and selling was still kept up. Συγχρᾶσθαι signifies properly 'to use any thing in common with others'; which implies more or less of society. This last use, however, is only found in the later writers. The earlier ones employ instead of it ἐναλλάσσεσθαι, as Thucyd. i. 121.

— The οὗσης is removed by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from before γυναικὸς to after Σαμαρεῖτιδος, but only from 4 MSS. (A, B, C, L);—very insufficient authority, espec. as all the Lamb. and Mus. ones have the ordinary position; and contrary to internal evidence, considering that the change was manifestly made for the purpose of improving the composition.

10—15. Here our Lord does not expressly notice the woman's narrow prejudices, but directs her attention to matters of far greater importance. (Scott.)

10. τὴν δωρεὰν τοῦ Θεοῦ] The import of these words has been seldom judiciously interpreted, chiefly from not perceiving the comprehensiveness of the phrase. The ancients generally, and most early modern Expositors,—as Beza, Pisc., and Calv.,—take it to mean CHRIST himself; and this is, indeed, an implied sense. But, since the Messiah is no where else called by this name, and there would be something too limited for the occasion, others (as Grot., Lampe, Rosenm., and Kuin.) take it, in a more extensive sense, to mean 'the favour which God graciously vouchsafes to thee, in this opportunity of knowing the Messiah, and receiving the offer of free salvation from himself'; 'in which,' says Lampe, 'is included also the means for obtaining it,—faith [and grace].' See Rom. vi. 25, and compare Acts viii. 10. xi. 17. Heb. vi. 4. Both these senses are, indeed, involved in the general idea; but the former is the more important, espec. as it may include the gift of the Holy Spirit, procured by Christ, and bestowed by him. See vii. 37—39. The water may be, as Alf. thinks, the point of connexion, whereby to direct the woman's thoughts to the proper quarter, or, as Calv. says, 'acueret mulieris desiderium.' This enlarged view of the import of words, so pregnant in meaning as these, is confirmed by the authority of Calvin, who, in an able note, remarks, 'Ut ad remedium quis aspiret, eum prius necesse est malis suis affici. Itaque Dominus non ebrios, sed stientes; non saturos, sed famelicos invitat, ut comedant et bibant. Et quorsum ad nos mitteretur Christus cum Spiritus plenitudine, nisi nos vacui essemus?' The third of the above senses is drawn forth, and distinctly marked, in the next words, ὕδωρ ζῶν. The expression properly signifies running water (as that of fountains and rivers), in opposition to the dead, i. e. stagnant, water of pools or cisterns. It occurs in Gen. xxvii. 19, and Levit. xiv. 5, where Joseph. expresses it by πηγαῖον καὶ αἰὲναῖον ὕδωρ. The Classical writers, for ζῶν, use the epithets δαΐδροντον, or δέναντον; nay, Plato has ἐμψυχον ὕδωρ. In this natural sense the woman understood the expression. But our Lord employed it figuratively for ζωοποιούν, denoting the blessings of the Gospel, espec. the gift of the Holy Spirit, and the fulfilment of the various promises of a similar import in the Old Test.; see the marginal references. It is, indeed, common in the Scriptures and the Rabbinical writers to liken unto spring water that which refreshes and blesses the souls of men. See infra vii. 38. Rev. xxi. 6. Prov. x. 11. Eccclus. xv. 3. xxiv. 21, and espec. Jerem. ii. 13, which seems the origin of the expression.

[2. μείζων] 'a person of more consequence.' This has reference to what our Lord had just εἰ τοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν Ἰακώβ, ὃς ἔδωκεν ἡμῖν τὸ φρέαρ, καὶ αὐτὸς before said, 'If thou hadst known what it is that speaketh to thee.' The words following are as much as to say, 'It was good enough for our ancestor Jacob, who himself drank of it, &c.; which he would not have done, if he had known a better. If thou canst show us a better, thou wilt, in that respect, be greater than Jacob.'—Οἱ υἱοί, i. e. the family in general, including the servants, as in Gen. xlv. 11. This, and the mention of the cattle conjoined, is agreeable to the simplicity of early times, especially in the East.

13, 14. Our Lord does not directly answer her inquiry, but intimates something from which the answer may be inferred; showing that he does not depreciate Jacob or his well, but that, however great was the benefit bestowed by the Patriarch, he can bestow a far greater, and thus is superior to Jacob.

14. οὐ μὴ διψήσῃ εἰς τὸν αἰ. i. e. 'shall have his desires for ever satisfied.' (See Rev. vii. 16.)
 Meaning, that such shall be the vivifying effect of the 'word of life,' as to satisfy the most ardent desires of the soul; which, placing its happiness in God and his worship, no other desire will be thought of any importance; and so like that good spoken of by an ancient Philosopher (Seneca, Epist.) 'quod non fiat in dies deterius, quo non melius possit optari.' Also, that such is the nature of that truth, that by its purifying and sanctifying influence on the soul, it is, as it were, an ever-springing fountain of holy affections, producing comfort here, and everlasting happiness hereafter.

— The reading of Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., διψήσει for διψήσῃ, from MSS. A, D, and several cursives, I find in not a few of the Lamb. and Mus. copies; and, as internal evidence is in its favour, it is probably, but not certainly, the true reading.

— πηγὴ ὕδατος ἀλλομένου, &c.] To drink, Lampe observes, signifies to fully imbibe Christ's doctrine. Of which, and of πηγὴ and also ἀλλασθαι, as involving the idea of perennial abundance, he adduces several examples; to which I add, Philostr. Vit. Apoll. iv. 24, λόγων κρατῆρες ἱσταντο, καὶ ἡρύοντο αὐτῶν οἱ διψῶντες.
 Plutarch, p. 387, διψῶν ἡρύσατο πηγῆς, namely, the wisdom of Socrates.

15. δός μοι, &c.] It is a matter somewhat disputed whether this was spoken in simplicity, or ironically; i. e. half in banter, half in earnest.
 The best Commentators, ancient and modern, adopt the former view, which carries with it the stamp of truth; for that a person of this description should have thus taken our Lord's words in a literal sense, was quite probable. As to the latter view, it is founded upon what Alf. terms

 'the complication of the woman's character,' which he, by implication, professes to be able to master (all purely gratuitously). Nam ego!
 That the woman speaks in earnest, and with some faint apprehension of the sense intended by Jesus, I doubt not. Euthym. (after Chrys.)
 truly remarks, ὅτι ἰτίρας φύσεις ὕδωρ δίδωσιν, ὑψηλοτέραι, ἐνόςαν· ὑπέλαβε δὲ τὸ διδομενον ἀναιρετικὸν τυγχάνειν ταύτης τῆς διψῆς τῆς ἀσθητῆς. Ὅτε οὖν εὐκολοί (levis, 'a good, easy person') ἡ γυνὴ αὕτη, οὐ γὰρ ἀπλῶς εἰδέετο τὰ λεγόμενα, ἀλλὰ μετὰ πολλῆς συζητήσεως. It would seem, that it is Mr. Alf. who has not been able to enter into the woman's character; the complication of which is purely in his imagination, or in that of his German guides.

16. After αὐτῇ the words ὁ Ἰησ. are absent from MSS. B, C, and Origen, and are cancelled by Tisch. and Alf., while Lachm. reads, with MS. A, Ἰησοῦς, but in brackets. I should be inclined to follow his example, considering that internal evidence is rather against the words;
 but this I have not done, because the mark of abbreviation for Ἰησοῦς (written obscurely, or become illegible from damp) in the ancient archettype, might very easily be passed over by the scribe. I find that all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.
 have the words.

— φώνησον τὸν ἄνδρα σου] This direction might, at first sight, seem little to the present purpose; but upon a nearer inspection we shall see how admirably, by this sudden transition from what was above her understanding to something immediately appealing to her consciousness, our Lord contrived at once to fix the attention of the woman; and, by the answer which he knew would be returned, give himself an opportunity of displaying such a supernatural knowledge, as would at once prove him to be a 'Teacher sent from God,' and lead to her subsequent conviction that he was no less than the Christ, the promised Messiah.

For τὸν ἄνδρα σου, Tisch., in his 2nd Ed., and Alf., read σου τὸν ἄνδρα, from MS. B, and 6 cursive ones; while Lachm. retains the text.
 rec.,—perhaps with more caution than sound judgment, since internal evidence is quite in favour of σου τὸν ἄνδρα: which I am enabled further to confirm from some Lamb. and Mus.
 copies. The ἄνδρα οὐκ ἔχω of MSS. C, D, L (to which I can add nothing), and one cursive MS., arose, I doubt not, from critical emendation; whence also sprung the ἔχαις for ἔχω of ἐλθὲ ἐνθάδε. ¹⁷ Ἀπεκρίθη ἡ γυνὴ καὶ εἶπεν Οὐκ ἔχω ἄνδρα. Λέγει αὐτῇ ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Καλῶς εἶπας, "Ὅτι ἄνδρα οὐκ ἔχω· ¹⁸ πέντε γὰρ ἄνδρας ἔσχες· καὶ νῦν, ὃν ἔχεις, οὐκ ἔστι σου ἀνὴρ· ¹⁹ τούτο ἀληθὲς εἶρηκας. ²⁰ Ὁὶ πατέρες ἡμῶν ἐν τούτῳ τῷ ὄρει προσεκύνουσιν καὶ ὑμεῖς λέγετε, ὅτι ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις ἐστὶν ὁ τόπος, ὅπου δεῖ προσκυνεῖν. ²¹ Λέγει αὐτῇ ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Γύναι, the MS. D, and the omission of the οὐ in D at the next verse.

17. καλῶς] Not said ironically (see note supra v. 15), but simply, for ἀληθῶς, as is plain from the words following.

18. οὐκ ἔστι σ. ὁ.] 'is not [really] thy husband.' It appears that the woman had been five times married; but whether those marriages had been dissolved by death, or by divorce, does not appear. Both might be the case; and as divorce was then shamefully prevalent, this implies no certainty of infidelity on the part of the woman; to represent whom (with some Commentators) as a harlot, is unjustifiable; though this is better than the other extreme, into which some recent Expositors run, of representing the woman as free from all blame, by supposing that, though not actually married to this person, she was espoused to him. That would require the οὐ to be taken for οὐπω; which is a straining of the sense, and is refuted by the words οὐκ ἔχω ἄνδρα; and as ὃν ἔχεις implies cohabitation, she cannot be acquitted of living in concubinage; which, however common in the East, and though neither there, nor in the West, then accounted very disgraceful by the multitude, yet was held, by persons every where of any pretensions to virtue, as sinful and impure, because transgressing the primeval and sacred institution of matrimony.

19. θεωρῶ ὅτι προφήτης εἶ σὺ.] The woman is justly amazed that a Stranger should be acquainted with the general tenour of her life. (See v. 29.) Such knowledge she knew could not be acquired but by Divine revelation, and therefore she justly inferred that Jesus must be at least a prophet; and, as such, be a proper authority to appeal to for the solution of the controverted question, as to the comparative holiness of the Jewish and the Samaritan places of common national worship. To this question our Lord so answers as to give her to understand, that it is not necessary to discuss it at all; since there was at hand such a total change of religious institutions, as to render it nugatory. To advert to matters of criticism, as to the text. The Cod. D, and some very early MSS. of the Vulg. are without the ὅ, which, I suspect, was put out by rash Critics, as superfluous:—and, indeed, the same MS. leaves out ὅ in Matt. xxvi. 73; as also in Mark xiv. 30, where it is undoubtedly genuine; which it is, again, at John viii. 53, though not found in many MSS., and cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. So far from being here superfluous, it is highly emphatic, and the very position of προφ. before, and not after, εἶ σὺ, has an intensive force; as in Heb. i. 5 (where, cited from Ps. ii. 7, are the words υἱός μου εἶ σὺ). And John i. 49, ὁ βασιλεὺς εἶ, found in MSS. A, B, L, would supply another example, if we could be sure of the reading; but that, as I have shown, is not the case. Here the very position in question has an intensive force, and serves to enhance the avowal. However, the words are, I apprehend, those not of confession (as they are generally regarded) but of conviction, and that arising from inference. The woman concludes, from the knowledge which the Stranger evinces of her whole life, that he is certainly a prophet,—a term which was applied not only to those who predicted future events, but to those who could reveal things hidden, and which, without immediate Divine revelation, could not be known. So Samuel showed to Saul what was in his heart, 1 Sam. ix. 29. See also 2 Kings v. 25, vi. 12. Moreover, the term θεωρῶ does not merely bear the sense to perceive, but 'fully to comprehend by the mind, and, by the exercise of the reason, discover and know.' Comp. Demosth. p. 1224, λογίζεσθαι τις ὑμῶν καὶ θεωρεῖ τὸν τρόπον, &c.

20. ἐν τούτῳ τῷ ὄρει] i. e. Mount Gerizim, on which the Samaritans maintained that Abraham and Jacob had erected an altar, and offered sacrifices to Jehovah; and, therefore, that the Deity had willed blessing to be pronounced from thence, and an altar to be erected, alleging in proof Deut. xxvii. 4, 12; and, in order to 'make surety doubly sure,' interpolating the text at v. 4, and changing ἔβη into Γερίζιμ. Hence they called it 'the blessed mount,' 'the Holy place.' Not only did the Samaritans then worship on Mount Gerizim, but the remnant of them yet subsisting continue to do so three times in the year, with great solemnity.

I am now half inclined to read, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., ἐν τῷ ὄρει τούτῳ, which I find in all the Lamb., and most of the Mus. copies, and which seems required by very strong external authority, and not forbidden by internal evidence, properly weighed. Grotius and Lampe notice and illustrate the custom (probably antediluvial) of worshipping the Deity on mountains, as being thought nearer to heaven; or rather, from high mountains being more suited to devotion, by their being removed from the din of men, which Milton had in mind when he wrote, 'Sing, heavenly Muse, that on the secret top of Horeb, or of Sinai,' &c.

21. Γύναι] Elsewhere in the New Test., that is in the Gospels (for it does not occur in the Acts, nor in the Epistles more than once), γύναι is always found at the beginning of the clause or address, as Matt. xv. 28. Luke xiii. 11. xxii. 57. viii. 10. xix. 26. xx. 13, 15; nor is this without example in the Class. writers, where, however, the vocative, γύναι, is of very rare occurrence, except in Eurip., in which author it often occurs, and, nine times out of ten, after the introductory words of address, though sometimes before them; e. gr. Hec. 218, Γύναι, δοκᾷ μιν, and Med. 720,

It is plain that this very frequent use of γύναι in Eurip. was borrowed from Homer, in whom it often occurs, espec. when placed at the beginning of an address of respect, like the French Madame; but when placed after the beginning, rather one of courtesy, or even affection and kindness; as in Theocr. Idyl. xv. 12; and so in Hom. Od. xi. 247, χαῖρε, γύναι, φιλότῃ. In the New Test. there is usually a dignified gravity implied in its being placed first, espec. when coming from our Lord, as here, and such as well serves to justify the position in the text. rec. When not used by our Lord, it is very different; as Luke xxii. 57, where see note.

—πίστευσόν μοι] Our Lord here claims, at least, the belief due to a Prophet, such as the woman acknowledged him to be.

For γύναι, πίσταυσόν μοι, Tisch. and Alf. read, from B, C, L, πισταύει μοι, γύναι; but Lachm., γύναι, πισταύει μοι, from D and some few cursives; which latter I should prefer, were any change necessary; which is, however, not the case; and indeed too slight is the authority (unsupported by internal evidence) existing for πισταύει, which seems to have proceeded from certain Critics, who, scrupling at the unusualness of the form πισταύουσαν, substituted the more usual one, πισταύει. Though indeed the form is not so very rare, but that it is found in Acts xvi. 31. Eccus. ii. 6; and in Class. writers, as Eurip. Hel. 710, λόγοις μοῖς πισταύουσαν τάδε. Soph. Œd. T. 646, πισταύουσαν, Οἰδίποῦς, τάδε. Philostr. Epist. 67, πιστ. τοῖς ποσὶ, passages, it seems, not known to the above Revisers, who accordingly made the change we see. And as to the Fathers, they, we may suppose, cited from memory, and unconsciously adopted the more usual form. Even the paucity of the MSS., only three (for I find the reading in none of the Lamb. or Mus. Codices), would forbid its adoption.

In nearly the same way may we account for the altered position as respects γύναι, considering that the word γυνή is seldom used at the beginning of a clause, and before the verb, but generally after it, in the Class. writers, though not, as I have already observed, in the New Test., except in 1 Cor. vii. 16, τί γὰρ οἶδας, γύναι;

—ἔρχεται ὥρα, ὅτε οὔτε—οὔτε] 'a time is coming when neither in this mountain, nor even at Mount Zion in Jerusalem, shall ye, &c. It has been truly remarked by Stier, that 'the particles οὔτε—οὔτε have an exclusive force,' 'ye (i. e. converted Samaritans) shall worship the Father not on this mountain [only], nor in Jerusalem;' in other words, 'it will soon cease to be disputed between Jews and Samaritans which of the two mountains is the fitter place for worshipping God; for the time is fast coming when the worship of the common Father of all men, whether Jews, or Samaritans, or Gentiles, will no longer be confined to Mount Gerizim, or Mount Zion.

—προσκυνήσετε is not for προσκυνήσουσι by Hebraism, but is a more pointed expression. Wetstein has shown the exact fulfilment of this prediction, in the overthrow both of the Jewish and Samaritan holy places, by numerous citations from Josephus and the early Fathers.

22. ἡμεῖς προσκυνεῖτε δ' οὐκ οἴδατε] There is here somewhat of obscurity, which has occasioned a diversity of interpretation. Most Commentators refer the δ to the Deity, by the ellipsis of θειῶν, or by taking δ for δν; meaning, that the Samaritans knew not God aright, by confining him to place. Yet this charge, as well as that which others suppose here alluded to, of idolatry, has been disproved by the researches of Reland, Lampe, and Gesenius; of whom Lampe rightly supposes our Lord to accuse them, not of corruption, but of ignorance. Yet to confine it, as he does, to ignorance of the manner of worship, is an unjustifiable limitation of the sense. The best recent Commentators, from Bengel and Markland to Kuinoel and Tittman, are of opinion that δ is to be taken for καθ' δ, to denote, not the object of the worship, but the form, with reference chiefly to the manner and form of worship, but also, by implication, including place; q. d. 'Ye worship according to your ignorance, we according to our knowledge; and consequently in the manner and place appointed by Divine command.'

—ἡμεῖς προσκ.] 'we [Jews] worship:' our Lord is speaking as a Jew. The proof of the Jewish worship being the right one, is introduced in the next words, ὅτι ἡ σωτηρία—estis, of which the sense is, 'for the [promised] salvation (meaning the promised salvation to be effected by the great Deliverer, and waited for by holy men of old, Gen. xlix. 18) is from the Jews, to whom the promises of God were made.'

—In ὅτι ἡ σωτηρία—Ἰουδαίων there is a reason suggested why the Jews should best know the mode and the place of the national worship; namely, since from them, and no others, the promised Saviour (σωτηρία being for σωτηρ. as Luke i. 71, et alibi) was confessedly to spring. I agree with Mr. Alf. that the discourse here returns to the ground taken in v. 21, but not so as to make v. 22 parenthetical only: the spiritual worship, now to be spoken of, is the carrying out and consequence of the σωτηρία just mentioned, and could not have been brought in without it.

23. By οἱ ἀληθ. προσκ. are meant the genuine worshippers, as distinguished from those who (as hypocrites or formalists) only seem, but are not really such, at least not ἐν πνεύμ. καὶ ἀληθείᾳ, in a truly devout and earnest spirit (comp.

ματι καὶ ἀληθείᾳ· καὶ γὰρ ὁ Πατὴρ τοιοῦτους ζητεῖ τοὺς προσ-

Pa. cxliv. 18), as opposed to the mere worship and service of the lips, or, which rests in mere rites and ceremonies, forms of external worship.

— προσκυνήσουσι] Render, 'will worship him'; for the language of vv. 21 and 23 is simply prophetic, and therefore calls rather for will than shall. By προσκυν. ἐν ἀληθείᾳ it is meant, that these shall worship God not with external rites and ceremonies so much as with internal and spiritual devotion. Why God should be thus worshipped is briefly intimated in the words τοιοῦτους ζητεῖ τοὺς προσκυνοῦντας αὐτόν, where the construction is, ὁ Πατὴρ ζητεῖ τοὺς προσκ. αὐτόν [εἶναι] τοιοῦτους: 'for the Father requireth, seeketh for, expects those who worship him to be such,' i. e. worshippers in spirit, as opposed to gross and lifeless forms; in truth, from the heart, as opposed to mere lip service. Two reasons are here adduced why God is to be so worshipped. 1. From the sovereign will of the Deity, to whom spiritual and internal worship is alone acceptable. 2. From the nature of the Deity, who is far removed from any thing corporeal; and therefore must be worshipped in a spiritual manner, and also in truth, for he is 'a God of truth' and 'requireth truth in the inward parts.'

— καὶ τοὺς προσκυν. αὐτόν] In the compass of three verses we have no less than three variations in the government of the verb προσκυνεῖν. Instead of the Dative which is found at ver. 23, and is according to the customary usage of the New Test. and the later Classical writers, we have here, and at Matt. iv. 10, Luke iv. 8, the Accus. The reason why the verb in question should take a Dative is, we may suppose, from this being used with reference to the πρὸς in composition; since verbs which govern an Accusative out of composition, when in composition only direct the subst. to the Dative.

25. Though not objecting to what has been said, the woman seems not to have been fully satisfied, and therefore was disposed to leave the matter undecided till the advent of the Messiah, who would finally determine these controversies, and give them fuller instructions. The Jews of that age were accustomed to refer the decision of controverted questions to the coming of future prophets, and espec. of the Messiah. And so we find it said by Maimonides (cited by Wetstein): 'When the Messiah comes, all secret and hidden things will be disclosed.' And from what has been recently discovered respecting the opinions of the Samaritans of that age (see the article Samaritans, in Dr. Robinson's Calmet) it should seem that they expected in the Messiah chiefly a great spiritual ruler and teacher of religion.

— ὁ λεγόμενος Χρ.] The most eminent Critics are agreed that these words are those of the Evangelist, not of the woman. Ἀναγγ., which properly denotes 'the delivering of a message from one person to another,' here involves the idea of what we mean by a Revelation from God: see note infra xvi. 14.

26. ἐγὼ εἰμι, ὁ λαλῶν σοι] lit. 'I am He, I who am now speaking to thee.' The reasons why our Lord revealed himself so much more unreservedly to the Samaritans than to the Jews, were, we may suppose, 1. Because the Samaritans were a far better disposed sort of people than the Jews, and therefore more worthy of confidence. 2. Because the reason which induced our Lord to use caution with the latter (namely, to avoid exasperating the Rulers, and thereby anticipating what he should eventually suffer from them) did not apply in the case of the former. 3. Because the Samaritans seem to have had more correct ideas of the nature of the Messiah's kingdom, and therefore would not be likely to abuse what he said to the purposes of sedition; besides that they were orderly and quiet in their habits.

27. ἐθαύμασαν] Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit θαύμαζον, from eight uncial and a few cursive MSS., confirmed by the Syriac and Vulg. Versions; and certainly that tense is much more suitable. But whether this be the genuine reading, or a correction of Critics, is uncertain. It may be, as Alf. thinks, a correction to the foregoing Aorist; but the probability lies the other way, and the slenderness of external authority forbids any change. If θαύμαζ. be read, the sense will be, 'they were wondering.' I suspect it to be no other than a critical correction of the Revisers, introduced because propriety of language would rather require the Imperf. Retaining the Aorist, I would render: 'Whereupon his disciples came [up]; and they wondered that he was conversing with a woman.' The two clauses τί ζητεῖς; and ἡ τί λαλεῖς μετ' αὐτῆς; are not to be distributed (as they are by some) so as to suppose the former addressed to the woman, the latter to their Master. More natural is it to suppose both questions spoken of as addressed to the latter. Accordingly, I would point thus: τί ζητεῖς, ἢ τί λαλεῖς μετ' αὐτῆς; Nor will this involve (as some have objected) the inconvenience of a mixture of two constructions, τί ζητεῖς παρ' αὐτῆς; and τί λαλεῖς μετ' αὐτῆς; for we have only to take μετ' αὐτῆς twice. In the former clause the μετὰ will be used by a colloquial idiom of common life, which has its parallel in our familiar idiom, 'what do you want with such an one?' Finally, the τί before λαλεῖς I would render, not as it is done in E. V., 'why talkest,' but 'what talkest thou, what art thou saying?' &c.

— μετὰ γυναικός] Meaning, 'with a woman.' That the Article τῆς is here implied, is maintained by Beza, Doddr., and Bp. Middl.; but they only show that the Article may, not that it must, be implied. The position of the phrase, which implies emphasis, and the circumstances of the case, as to the Jewish sentiment respecting the matter in question, makes it probable (we can rise no higher) that the meaning is as I have now laid it down.

28. ἀφῆκεν τὴν ὑδρίαν αὐτῆς] Struck with astonishment and filled with joy at such a discovery, the woman hastens to the city to proclaim the good tidings, forgetting her bucket, or leaving it in order to go the quicker.

29. πάντα] Meaning, by an hyperbole natural to great excitement of mind, the leading events of her life, on which the rest hinged. For ὅσα here and at v. 39, Tisch. reads δ, from B, C, and some MSS. of the Vulg.; while Lachm. retains ὅσα,—very properly; for the authority for the latter is insufficient, and internal evidence adverse, δ being seemingly a correction of certain Critics who thought the term would be more suitable to plain deeds and facts. But ὅσα has a stronger sense, implying variety, equiv. to 'all whatsoever I did.'

— μήτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ Χρ.] It has been disputed whether the words should be rendered, 'is this the Christ?' or, 'is not this the Christ?' The latter version, however, is quite inadmissible; 1. because there is no authority for μήτι in the sense annon? 2. Because it is less suitable to the case in question. For the woman seems to have meant, courteously, to propose this rather as a question for their consideration, than to affirm it, at least by implication. In short, the sense expressed in full would be, 'Is this the Christ, or is he not?' The latter member being implied and suggested by the τι indefinite, which signifies perhaps. So I would understand Matt. xii. 23, μήτι οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ υἱὸς Δαυὶδ; besides other passages. The context, indeed, can alone, in such cases, decide whether belief or disbelief preponderates, and thus determine the exact sense.

30. The οὖν here is cancelled by Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from almost all the uncial and very many cursive MSS. (to which I add nearly all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies), confirmed by several late Versions. The Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. may be thought to favour the word; but Versions are not strong authority for any such word. It is probably not genuine, though the Asyndeton is harsh.

31. ἐν δὲ τῷ μεταξὺ] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. cancel the δὲ, from MSS. C, D, L. But I cannot find a single instance of the formula ἐν τῷ μεταξὺ, when commencing a sentence, without a particle of connexion. In the only two passages elsewhere supplying examples of this position,—namely, Thucyd. iv. 25, f, and Xen. Symp. i. 14, there is found a particle of connexion; in the former case οὖν, in the latter δέ. Moreover, the Pesch. Syr. recognizes the particle; nor is the Vulg. adverse, considering that it is against the usage of the Latin language to subjoin any particle to interea when commencing a sentence.

32. Here we trace our Lord's usual endeavour, from things corporeal, to excite the attention of his disciples to things spiritual.

— βρώσιν ἔχω] The same figure as at βρώμά ἐστιν, ver. 34. In the Scriptural and Rabbinical phraseology that is said to be any one's meat or drink, by which any one is supported, refreshed, or delighted; numerous examples of which may be seen in Schoettgen. The same mode of speaking, too, occasionally occurs in the Classical writers. So Philo, p. 664, δηλοῦντί τροφᾶς ἔχω ἀμύμονος—αἷς ἀναθῶν ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ καταμύμονος. Soph. Elect. 363, Brunck, μοῖα γὰρ ἔστω τοῦμὲ νιν λυπεῖν μόνον βόσκημα, 'be it alone my meat that I may annoy them.' The ἔγω and ὑμεῖς are here, as often, emphatic.

33. οὖν] This, not found in very many of the best MSS., including a few Mus., but no Lamb. copies, and some Versions, is cancelled by almost all the recent Editors.

34. ἵνα ποιῶ] Lachm. and Tisch. ed. 1, read ποιήσω, from five uncial MSS. and six others. But Tisch., 2nd ed., restores the ποιῶ, and with reason, since the other reading is evidently no more than a correction proceeding from με, καὶ τελειώσω αὐτοῦ τὸ ἔργον. ³⁵ Ὁὐχ ὑμεῖς λέγετε, ὅτι ^{q Matt. 9.}

 ἔτι *τετράμηνός ἐστι, καὶ ὁ θερισμός ἐρχεται; ἰδού, λέγω ὑμῖν ^{Lu 10. 2.}
 ἐπάρατε τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς ὑμῶν, καὶ θεάσασθε τὰς χώρας, ὅτι λευκαὶ εἰσι πρὸς θερισμὸν ἤδη. ³⁶ Καὶ ὁ θερίζων μισθὸν λαμβάνει, καὶ συνάγει καρπὸν εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον ἵνα καὶ ὁ σπείρων ὁμοῦ χαίρῃ καὶ ὁ θερίζων. ³⁷ Ἐν γὰρ τούτῳ ὁ λόγος ἐστὶν ὁ

some grammarian who was not aware that the true sense (which is, 'that I may do,' 'be doing or performing') requires the present. The Critic wished probably to make ποιῶ square with τελειώσω in the next clausula; not seeing that there ποιῶ (as having regard to the future completion of the work now carrying on) is as proper there as ποιῶ here.

Here some difference of opinion exists, whether these words, τετράμηνός ἐστι, καὶ ὁ θερισμός ἐρχεται are to be understood literally, or figuratively. According to the former view, the sense will be, 'Are ye not saying it is four months to harvest-time? but the spiritual harvest is already at hand, and must commence forthwith. See (pointing to the Samaritans coming to him) what an Evangelical harvest is approaching!' Since, however, the above sense is somewhat strained, I should prefer the latter view, by which οὐχ ὑμεῖς λέγετε will mean, 'do ye not commonly say (is it not a saying among you), that when your seed is sowing, you expect a harvest in four months hence? and thus the husbandman is supported by the distant hope, though yet in the bud, of reaping a harvest.' [Therefore heed not labour, when reward is at hand.] As to the objections of Doddridge and others, that no example of such a proverb has been adduced, and that the period in question is not four, but six months, they are of no great weight; for it has been proved that in the East scarcely more than four months intervene between the end of seed-time and the beginning of harvest. Not to say that it is of the nature of hope to lessen what lies in the way to the attainment of its object.

Here, then, it should seem, after declaring that it was his meat, his great delight, to accomplish the work of Him who sent him, our Lord sets forth to his disciples the satisfaction experienced by him in anticipating the spiritual harvest just about to be reaped, almost immediately with the sowing of the seed. Then, to induce them to follow his example, he uses three arguments as incentives to diligence: 1. That the harvest they have to reap is near; 2. That the fruits to be gathered are abundant; 3. That the accomplishment of the work has been greatly facilitated by others, meaning the Prophets, the Baptist, and himself.

— λευκαὶ σλαί] By this is meant 'a white approaching to yellow,' such as accompanies maturity in corn. And so we find the Latin writers using the terms albescere and flavesce indifferently of ripe corn. By χώρας we must rather understand cultivated fields; a rare sense, but occurring elsewhere in St. Luke, and occasionally in the Classical writers.

— The construction of ἤδη is disputed. Lachm. conjoins it, as I have myself done, with the preceding context; Tisch., with the following. But internal evidence is in favour of the former construction (adopted by Alf.), which is, indeed, the less obvious one, though called for by the context, for ἤδη cannot but have reference to the foregoing ἔτι. Besides, as Alf. remarks, it "would not agree with the truth of the comparison, for the harvest was not yet come." It was only coming, the field being only a whitening unto the future maturity of harvest-time. So Euthym. and Theophyl., or the Greek Fathers from whom they compiled, must have construed the word; and probably Chrys., whom they closely follow; though he does not touch on this word in his able exegesis, in which he well discusses the reason why our Lord chose to employ this highly metaphorical phraseology. Chrys. assigns two causes for this course: ὥστε ἐμφαντικώτερον γενέσθαι τὸν λόγον, καὶ μᾶλλον ὑπ' ὀφιν ἀγαγεῖν τὰ λεγόμενα, for, adds he, ἡ διάνοια (the intellect) τῆς συντροφῆς (common, ordinary) τῶν πραγμάτων εἰκόνας ἐπιλαβομένη διανίσταται μᾶλλον, καὶ ὥσπερ ἐν γραφῇ (in a picture) τὰ πράγματα ὁρῶσα, κατεχέται μειζύνως. 2. ὥστε καὶ γλυκαίνεισθαι τὴν διήγησιν καὶ μονιμώτερον ἵνα τῶν λεγομένων τὴν μνήμην. οὐ γὰρ οὕτως ἀπόφασις (read οὕτω ἡ ἀπόφ., the representation) χειροῦται καὶ ἐνάγει τὸν ἀκροατὴν ὥς ἡ διὰ τῶν πραγμάτων διήγησις καὶ ἡ ὑπογραφή (the sketch) παίρας, where for παίρας read πειρᾶ. 'testa, puts him to the test, tries his character.' See also Theophyl. and T. Aquinas.

³⁶. ὁ θερίζων] 'He who reaps or gathers in harvest;' and the sense, rather intimated by a blending of the apodosis with the comparison (which is left implied), than expressed, is, that, as in the natural harvest the harvest-man receives his wages for his harvest work from his master, and gathereth fruit for his sustenance,—so shall he, who reaps, or gathers in, this spiritual harvest, receive his reward from the Lord of the harvest, and shall gather fruit unto life eternal, in the souls saved by his ministry. Accordingly, as in the natural harvest both the sower and the reaper rejoice together at the ingathering of the grain, so, in the spiritual, both he who soweth the word of God, and he who reapeth the fruit to the benefit of his soul, will rejoice together in the future harvest of souls—the ingathering of souls unto life eternal;—a striking and beautiful agricultural comparison, like that at Matt. xxi. 1—16, where see note.

³⁷. ἐν τούτῳ—ὁ θς. Another proverbial expression derived from agriculture, like several in the Class. writers, some of which I have adduced in my Rec. Syn. The propriety of the

Luke 4. 34.

Article here before ἀλθ. has been questioned by Beza, Markl., and Lachm.; but without reason; for Br. Middl. and Mr. Green are agreed that ἀλθ. with the Article cannot be the predicate. The genuineness of the Article, here absent from 4 uncial and 15 cursive MSS., is vindicated by overpowering external, confirmed by internal evidence; for its omission arose, as Mr. Green observes, from a desire to justify a rendering like that in E. V., 'Herein is that saying true;' whereas the presence of the Article requires the version, 'For in this case is (i. e. 'has place'; 'is applicable') the true saying.' For a similar mode of adducing a proverb, comp. 2 Pet. ii. 22, συμβίβηκεν τὸ τῆς ἀληθοῦς παροιμία. The application of the proverb is, that as Moses and the Prophets, and finally John the Baptist, prepared the minds of men for receiving the Gospel from Christ, so will the Apostles reap the harvest of converts, for which He had prepared the field.

38. ἄλλοι κοκῶν.] 'Others have laboured, worked out by labour, the spiritual harvest.' Since I see no sufficient reason, on the grounds alleged by Alf., for resisting the interpretation of the ancient and modern Expositors in general, that, by 'those who laboured as sowers to prepare the harvest, which Christ's disciples were to reap,' are meant Christ Himself (see Matt. xiii. 37) as well as his forerunner John the Baptist, not excluding the Prophets, who, as it were, prepared the ground for the spiritual harvest, I cannot think, with Alf., that 'the plural is merely inserted (employed) as the correspondent word to ὁμοίως in the explanation.'

39—42. The truth of the saying at v. 35 is verified by the subsequent events, inasmuch as many of the Samaritans of Sychar made a profession of faith in Jesus as indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world; thus attaining to a point of faith never reached by the Jews, nor, as yet, by the disciples. Thus these Samaritans formed a worthy foundation for the church afterward built up at Sychar, on which see Dr. Robinson, ubi supra.

41. ἐπίστευσαν διὰ τὸν λόγον αὐ.] i. e. 'many more believed [on him] in consequence of hearing him themselves,' as many had already done by mere report of him and the testimony of the woman, ver. 39.

42. ὁ Χριστός] This is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from MSS. B, C, and 4 cursive ones, confirmed by several Fathers. I find it in all the Lamb. and nearly all the Mus. MSS. Internal evidence is rather against it; but the overwhelming weight of external authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, forbid any cancelling.

43—54. The healing of the Ruler's son.

43. The words καὶ ἀπῆλθεν are absent from MSS. B, C, D, and 2 cursives, as also from the Coptic Version, and some MSS. of the Italic, with Origen and Cyril; and as such they are bracketed by Lachm. and Alf., and cancelled by Tisch.; but there exists scarcely sufficient authority for even the former course, inasmuch as the slender amount of external authority (I find the words in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.) is not made up by internal evidence, which is divided; for the words may either have been inserted for the purpose of filling up the sense, or expunged on account of the inelegance of the wording. The latter is by far the more probable, and has taken place elsewhere, e. g. Mark i. 35, καὶ ἀναστὰς ἐξῆλθεν καὶ ἀπῆλθεν εἰς ἱερμον, where MS. B (as here), and 2 cursive MSS., as also some copies of the Italic Version, are without the words. So, too, in Mark vi. 1, καὶ ἐξῆλθεν ἐκεῖθεν, καὶ ἦλθεν εἰς, where in MSS. D, C, Δ, L, the inelegance is removed in another way, by altering ἦλθεν into ἔρχεται, which has been injudiciously adopted by Tisch. This use of ἀπῆλθ. εἰς, where pure Grecism would require ἦλθον εἰς, is of frequent occurrence in the Gospels, and is found twice in the Pauline Epistles; though it was occasionally, as in Matt. xiv. 25 and John iv. 47, altered to ἦλθον by the ancient Critics, whose false correction was in the former passage caught up, with their usual heedlessness, by the recent Editors.

44. αὐτὸς γὰρ ὁ Ἰ.] As this can scarcely be meant to offer a reason why our Lord went to Galilee, some would suppose an omission of certain words to which the γὰρ might be suitable, as, 'passing by Nazareth,' or, 'but not coming to Nazareth, for, &c., as if Nazareth were meant to be distinguished from the rest of Galilee. This is, however, too artificial a mode of removing the difficulty, and is rather cutting than untying the knot. It is better, with Tittman and Kuinoel, προφήτης ἐν τῇ ἰδίᾳ πατρίδι τιμὴν οὐκ ἔχει. ⁴⁵ Ὅτε οὖν ἦλθεν εἰς τὴν Γαλιλαίαν, ἐδέξαντο αὐτὸν οἱ Γαλιλαῖοι, πάντα ἑωρακότες ἃ ἐποίησεν ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ· καὶ αὐτοὶ γὰρ ἦλθον εἰς τὴν ἑορτήν. ⁴⁶ Ἦλθεν οὖν [†] πάλιν [ὁ Ἰησοῦς] εἰς [†] τὴν Κανᾶ τῆς Γαλιλαίας, ὅπου ἐποίησε τὸ ὕδωρ οἶνον. Καὶ ἦν τις βασιλικὸς, οὗ ὁ υἱὸς ἡσθένει, ἐν Καπερναούμ. ⁴⁷ Οὗτος, ἀκούσας ὅτι Ἰησοῦς ἦκει ἐκ τῆς Ἰουδαίας εἰς τὴν Γαλιλαίαν, ἀπῆλθε πρὸς αὐτὸν, καὶ ἡρώτα αὐτὸν ἵνα καταβῇ καὶ ἰάσῃται αὐτοῦ τὸν υἱόν· ἡμελλε γὰρ ἀποθνήσκειν. ⁴⁸ ^u Εἶπεν οὖν ὁ ^u Ἰησοῦς πρὸς αὐτόν· Ἐὰν μὴ σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα ἴδῃτε, οὐ μὴ πιστεύσητε. ⁴⁹ Λέγει πρὸς αὐτὸν ὁ βασιλικὸς· Κύριε, κατέβηθι πρὶν ἀποθανεῖν τὸ παιδίον μου. ⁵⁰ Λέγει αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Πορεύου· ὁ υἱός σου ζῇ. Καὶ ἐπίστευσεν ὁ ἄνθρωπος τῷ λόγῳ ᾧ εἶπεν αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς, καὶ ἐπορεύετο. ⁵¹ Ἦδη δὲ αὐτοῦ καταβαίνοντος, οἱ δούλοι αὐτοῦ ἀπήντησαν αὐτῷ, καὶ ἀπήγγειλαν to take the γὰρ in the sense, although, by which the meaning will be, that he returned to Galilee, though, or notwithstanding, he had himself borne testimony to, and in his own case afforded evidence of, the truth of the saying, that 'a prophet hath no honour in his own country.' But this sense of γὰρ is not fully established; and there is in this something too forced and artificial. Accordingly, I now prefer considering this idiom, with Thol. and Lücke, as affording an example of a not unfrequent use of γὰρ, noticed by Matthie and Winer in their Grammars, and by Poppo and myself on Thucyd. (see the Index to my larger Edition), by which the verse refers, not to the preceding, but to the following, the γὰρ having reference to the subsequent narrative, which it introduces, as in the passages of Thucyd. I have referred to, and also Hdot. i. 24, and Soph. Antig. 393, adduced by Matthie, Kühner, and Hartung on the Particles i. 467, referred to by Alf., who adopts this solution of a confessed difficulty; which has the further advantage of rendering it unnecessary to resort to supposing the precarious use of the Aor. for Pluperf.

^{46.} πάλιν ὁ Ἰησοῦς] The Editors from Matthie downwards have adopted this position for that of text. rec. ὁ πάλιν, from many uncials and a few cursive MSS.; to which, however, I can add nothing at all from any of the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies. But as internal evidence may be urged both for, as well as against, the genuineness of the words is an open question. As to the disputed question about the exact sense of βασιλικός, I still think it most probably means 'a person holding some public office, civil or military, in the king's court;' a use of the word found in Joseph. Bell. vii. 5, 2. Ant. xv. 8, 4; and so in Polyb. iv. 76, 2; and Alf. acknowledges that the usage of Josephus is our surest guide.

^{47.} Ταῦτα αὐτὸν ἀφ' ἧρώτα is absent from B, C, D, L, is bracketed by Lachm., and cancelled by Tisch. and Alf. But internal evidence, as well as external authority (for I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. MSS.) is in favour of the word; which was doubtless removed by certain fastidious Critics, who objected to the tautology. The Pesch. Syr. Translator had it in his copy.

^{48.} εἰ μὴ—πιστεύσητε] This reproof was meant for the bystanders rather than the nobleman, but seems levelled against the Galileans in general. Since, however, miracles are the proper evidence of a Divine mission, some Commentators think our Lord could not mean the words as a reproof. The sense, they say, is: 'Except ye see miracles, it cannot be expected that ye will believe; therefore I will heal the courtier's son.' But that is straining the sense, and very unnecessarily; for why may we not suppose ἴδῃτε to be put emphatically, and the words be meant as a reproof of those who refused belief in the authority of numerous miracles established on the most credible evidence; but demanded to see them with their own eyes? That surely was unreasonable. The proof by miracles could not fairly be expected to be brought to every person.

— The reading πιστεύετε arose either from a gloss or from a false correction. The reading of all the Vulg. versions credetis was, doubtless, only an error of the scribe for credetis. The true sense is: 'ye cannot bring yourselves to believe.' The version of Wakef. 'cannot ye not believe?' is inadmissible, and would require μὴ οὐ, which is to be found in no one MS. or ancient Version.

^{50.} To show that he could do even more than the father hoped for, and could heal the sick, when absent as well as present (and in order thereby effectually to remove the want of faith in the bystanders), Jesus says πορεύου.—ζῇ, i. e. 'is being restored to health.' So ζῇ in 2 Kings xx. 1. Sept. Comp. Artemid. v. 71, ῥάων ἰσμοῖ καὶ ζῆσο; 'shall I get better and recover?' and C. 72, Νοσοῦσα γυνὴ ἰδοὺν ἔρυσθαι τὴν Ἀφροδίτην—εἰ ζῆσεις—καὶ ἰζῆσας. So the Heb. תחי in Josh. v. 8, and often in the Rabbinical writers.

— The καὶ before πιστ. is bracketed by Lachm., and cancelled by Tisch., on the authority of two MSS., B, D. But the omission of the connective particle would here be too harsh.

λέγοντες, "Οτι ὁ παῖς σου ζῇ. 52 Ἐπύθετο οὖν παρ' αὐτῶν τὴν ὥραν, ἐν ᾗ κομψότερον ἔσχε' καὶ εἶπον αὐτῷ "Οτι χθὲς ὥραν ἐβδόμην ἀφήκεν αὐτὸν ὁ πυρετός. 53 Ἐγὼ οὖν ὁ πατήρ ὅτι ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ ἐν ᾗ εἶπεν αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς "Οτι ὁ υἱός σου ζῇ καὶ ἐπίστευσεν αὐτὸς καὶ ἡ οἰκία αὐτοῦ ὅλη. 54 Τοῦτο πάλιν δεύτερον σημεῖον ἐποίησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, ἐλθὼν ἐκ τῆς Ἰουδαίας εἰς τὴν Γαλιλαίαν.

52. κομψότερον ἔσχε] A popular idiom for βελτιώτερον or ρᾶστερον, &c. So the Latin bellè habere.—'Αφήκεν implies the suddenness of the cure. Similar expressions are cited from Hippocrates.

54. τοῦτο πάλιν δεύτερον—ἐλθὼν] Some construe ἐλθὼν with πάλιν, otherwise, they think, the πάλιν will be useless. This, however, is doing violence to the construction, which requires πάλιν to be taken with δεύτερον. Nor is there any thing to stumble at in the pleonasm, for similar ones frequently occur. So πάλιν ἐκ δευτέρου, Matt. xxvi. 42. Acts x. 15, and often in the Class. writers; if, indeed, it be a pleonasm at all. But it should rather seem that there is a blending of two clauses into one, for τοῦτο, πάλιν [σημεῖον ποιῶν] δεύτερον σημ. ἐποίησε, &c. In fact the words were, as Bp. Lonsdale observes, 'added to show in what sense the miracle of healing the nobleman's son was the second miracle that Jesus did; the first, wrought under the same circumstances of his having recently come from Judea into Galilee, being the conversion of water into wine.'

V. 1—9. Healing of a cripple at the Pool of Bethesda, at a feast. What feast this was, Commentators are not agreed. Some think it was that of Purim, in our March, about a month before the Passover. Others suppose the Encenia, or feast of eight days, about the middle of December; others, again, the Feast of Tabernacles. But the most general, and, indeed, the most probable, opinion is, that the Passover is meant. And it has been shown by Bp. Middleton, that, notwithstanding the absence of the Article, the Passover may be, and, on other accounts, probably is meant; and the learned Jackson, of Leic., is decidedly of that opinion. That it must have been the Passover he thinks plain from vii. 2. Mr. Alf., indeed, thinks that the absence of the Article before ἑορτὴ shows that it can hardly have been the Passover. But his opinion on a matter with which he is evidently ill acquainted, and in which the learned Prelate was consummately versed, can be entitled to no attention. However, I grant that the point is one of doubtful disputation, and scarcely determinable. Besides, the argument upon which Mr. Alf. bases his rejection of the general opinion is connected with the question, whether the ἡ presented by 7 or 8 uncial, and a few cursive MSS. is, or is not, genuine? External authority for and against it is nearly equal (in the Lamb. and Mus. MSS. quite so, and the Trin. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17, have the ἡ); but that against it is, perhaps, the stronger, and is confirmed by internal evidence, which is rather against the word, considering that it may have been brought in by certain Correctors, who thought that the Passover was meant, and that thus the Article would be indispensable. The ἡ, however, may have been absorbed by the ἦν; and I could adduce several examples of this from Thucyd. and other Greek writers, where this has happened. Under these circumstances I have now thought it best to admit the ἡ within brackets, and in small character. Tisch. has in his second Ed. admitted it in the larger character (Alf. admits it in neither Ed.). I have been the more induced to adopt the course I have, since that the question, as to which of the feasts this was, has not yet been, nor, perhaps, ever will be, determined with any thing like certainty.

2 ἐπὶ τῇ προβ.] There is here an ellipsis, which some supply by ἀγορᾶ, or χώρα, or πύλη. This last is preferable, as being a very frequent ellipsis in the best writers, from Homer downwards, and is placed beyond doubt by Nehem. iii. 32. xii. 39, who mentions τὴν πύλην τὴν προβατικὴν; whereas there is no evidence of there being any such place as the Sheep-market. This is confirmed by the testimony of Sandys, who tells us that 'the gate in question (no doubt the gate of St. Stephen) was called in times past the Gate of the Valley, and of the Flock; for that the cattle came in at this gate which were to be sacrificed in the Temple.' Hence we may render, 'at the cattle-gate.'

Κολυμβήθρα signifies properly a bathing-pool; but here it is supposed to denote not the pool only, but the buildings which had been erected around it for the accommodation of the bathers.

—Βυθεσδά] The MSS. vary; but there is no reason to doubt the accuracy of the common reading, espec. as it is confirmed by the derivation from the Hebr. בֵּית רַחֲמִים, 'house of mercy.' Mr. Alf. observes, that there is reason to think, from the personal researches of Dr. Robinson, that the spring, which supplies this fountain, is, as Jerome on Isa. viii. 6 long ago said, and the mediæval travellers have confirmed, an intermittent spring. (See Robins. Bibl. Rec. i. 489, 507.) But even if the case were clearly made out, as to the identity of the spring inspected by Dr. Robinson with that which supplied the water to the Pool of Siloam,—which it has not been.—I must protest against the fact being brought to give countenance to the hypothesis of Dr. Mead. The actual site of the pool, and of its accompanying

porticoes, is not, it should seem from the account in Robinson, ascertainable. That the pool should not have been, so we are told, mentioned by Joseph., is no wonder; since he did not, in his Bell. Jud., profess to give a chorography of the Holy City. That the bath had medicinal properties is plain; but whence it derived them is not so certain. The older Commentators refer them to supernatural agency; the more recent ones in general to natural causes, for which there may be thought some confirmation in the fact, ascertained from Theophylact, that such was the common notion. But as to the causes to which he says the people ascribed it,—namely, the effect produced by the washing at this pool of the entrails of the sheep sacrificed at the Temple, or from the blood and washings from the victims being conveyed hither by pipes (which several learned Physiologists think might impart a medicinal property to the water); there is decided evidence against the former notion; and the latter rests on no proof. Hence the most eminent of the later Commentators prefer to account for the effects by supposing that the water was of itself a medicinal one, deriving its sanative properties from some mineral with which it was impregnated. 'This would,' says Dr. Mead, 'from the water being perturbed from the bottom by some natural cause (perhaps subterranean heat, or storms) rise upwards and be mingled with it, and so impart a sanative property to those who bathed in it before the metallic particles had subsided to the bottom. That it should,' continues he, 'have done so, κατὰ καιρὸν, is not strange; since Bartholin has, by many examples, shown that it is usual with many medicinal baths [of which the springs are intermittent] to exert a singular force and sanative power at stated times, and at periodical but uncertain intervals.' The learned Physician, however, does not deign to notice the grave difficulty presented by the words ἀγγελοι κατίβαινον ἐν τῇ κολ. καὶ ἰτάσσας τὸ ὕδωρ, though he, doubtless, with most recent Commentators, referred it to the opinion entertained by the Jews, who, they say, being ignorant of natural philosophy, referred such phenomena to a peculiar Divine operation, and to whose agency they, as usual, called in the intervention of angels. Distrusting, however, it seems, their own solution, with reference to natural causes, those Expositors propose to cancel part of this narration. But I maintain that all, or the greater part of, the words ἐκδεχόμενον—τὸ ὕδωρ must be cancelled. And for that there is only the authority of two MSS., two very inferior Versions, and Nonnus. But Nonnus can here be no authority, since he frequently passes over clauses; and such Versions are of very slight authority; so that even the innovating Lachmann removes the brackets in which Griesbach had included the passage. As to the other varr. lecc., they all plainly originated in a desire to get rid of the difficulty. In short, the words seem to have been cancelled by the early Critics, for the same reason that their brethren of the present day wish to get rid of them. But that is impracticable; since they are plainly alluded to at ver.

7, in the words ὅταν παραχθῇ τὸ ὕδωρ, which cannot be explained without them. The words must therefore be retained, and interpreted in the best manner we are able; in doing which we must reject any such mode of explanation, which, like Kuinoel's, creates more difficulty than it solves. After all, the plain and obvious meaning intended to be expressed is, that God had endued the Pool with a preternatural healing quality, and, in the communication of it, employed one of his ministering spirits; not, however, as we have any reason to think, visibly. Certainly, the circumstances of the narration (as that only the first who entered after the commotion of the water was healed, and that all disorders, not those only which medicinal waters heal, were cured, and that instantaneously and invariably) utterly exclude the notion of any thing short of miraculous agency. And if the circumstance of the angel's going down should be thought (as it is by Doddridge) to 'involve the greatest of all difficulties in the Evangelists' (which, however, is far from being the case), we might (with that Commentator and Bps. Pearce and Mann) suppose, that the sanative property was supernatural, and communicated during a short period, as typical of the 'fountain opened for the purifying of sin by the atonement of the Messiah (the prophecy of Zechariah being thus realized into a type), and that the Evangelist, in thus mentioning the descent of the angel, speaks according to the opinion of the Jews, who ascribed all the operations of God's Providence to the ministry of angels.' Yet even Doddridge admits that they and St. John 'had reason so to do, since it was the Scripture doctrine, that these benevolent angelic spirits had been, and frequently are, the invisible instruments of good to men.' Surely, then, what was right in them cannot but be right in us; espec. since the opinion is, as he admits, based on Scripture; and the common view is the more to be adhered to, as giving no countenance to a most unsound and dangerous principle, on which I have animadverted in my note on the Demoniacs, Matt. iv. 24.

—στοὰς] Meaning porticoes fronting the bath; roofed, but open on the sides, and supported with pillars placed at regular intervals; from which ran side-walls, separating them from each other; the whole forming a pentagon. This, in so genial a climate as that of Judea, would be a sufficient shelter by day; and at night the sick were probably removed.

3. Ἀσθενεῖν is a term applicable to any formed disease, as κατακλιθεῖν is to such chronic affections as confine any one to his bed or room. Ξηρῶν seems to denote those labouring under 'pining sickness,' such as atrophy or consumption.

—τῶν—ξηρῶν] Meaning those afflicted with some such sickness as wears down the body to a skeleton (of which so fine a description is found in Spenser's Faerie Queene, l. i. c. 8), probably denoting that form of consumption called atrophy. The Participle ἰξηραμ. is not employed, though used by the medical writers, as Aretæus and Galen, because, as appears from

τὴν τοῦ ὕδατος κίνησιν. ὁ ἄγγελος γὰρ κατὰ καιρὸν κατέβαινεν ἐν τῇ κολυμβήθρᾳ, καὶ †ἐτάρασσε τὸ ὕδωρ. ὁ οὖν πρῶτος

Mark ix. 18, ἐξηραίνεται, that would denote demoniacal affection. Add, too, that the Adject. is used in Mark iii. 3. Luke vi. 6 and 8, of a limb of the body. Very rarely is it used of a person. The only other example that I have met with is in Hippocr. p. 1219, Ἀ, ἐξηρ (scil. ἡ γυνή) διατίλει.

— ἐκδεχομένων 'waiting for.' A sense rare in the Classical writers, and probably partaking of the usage of common life rather than the language of books.

— τὴν τοῦ ὕδ. κίνησιν] Equiv. to τὴν ταραχὴν τοῦ ὕδ., at the next verse, and a more exact and appropriate term. Thus in Jos. Antt. ix. 11, 3, we have: ἵστατι Νινεὺν κολυμβήθρα ὕδατος κινουμένην, οὕτως ὁ δῆμος ἅπας παρασσομένοις καὶ κλυδωνιζόμενοις ολχίσσεται, where Josephus, though he misconceives the import of the words of the prophet (Nahum ii. 8), recognizes the use here both of κίνησις and ταραχή. And since I cannot find that they are ever elsewhere so used, I am inclined to think that Josephus had here in mind this very κολυμβήθρα of Bethesda, which he probably regarded (as did Dr. Mead, and as most recent Commentators do) as a medicinal bath. Accordingly, if this pool be not, as the Commentators say, mentioned by Josephus, yet it seems to have been known to him.

3, 4. I am still of opinion that there is not authority at all sufficient to warrant the cancelling of the passage ἐκδεχομένων—νοσήματι, as has been done by Tisch. and virtually by Alf. Even Lachm. retains it, though within brackets. The passage is found in every MS. except B, C, D. But in the Lamb. MS. 1178 the words have in the margin the marks of suspicion, as also have a few Mus. MSS., as well as Trin. Col. B, x. 16. As to internal evidence, it is evenly balanced. The words may have been interpolated for the reason above stated; but that they were not, is attested by all the copies, except three or four; and this is confirmed by their being recognized in the Peach. Syr. Version, and plainly alluded to by Tertullian. That Mr. Alf. should have thought fit to double-bracket the words, was inconsistent with his own determination, that the genuineness of the passage is doubtful, for that is treating it as spurious; especially considering, that he admits that there is, what I long ago pointed out, much in the context and the circumstances of the case to evince the genuineness of the passage. In short, even the Critical Reviser of the Lamb. MS. 1178 does not obliterate the words ἐκδεχομένων—κίνησιν, and in the Cod. C they are placed on the opposite margin to that occupied by ἀγγελος γὰρ—νοσήματι. Finally, as to the argument against the authenticity of the words derived from the great variation in the readings, it is not such as can decide any question of this kind: nor is that variation so great as it is represented, nor greater than that of many other passages above all suspicion. Even Alf. grants, that they are only such as continually occur in the undoubted text of the New Test. The only really remarkable reading is ἰκνούτο found in the Alex. MS., also No. 42 (and its equivalent in K). I add Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, which bears a strong affinity to K. But this is, I doubt not, no other than an error of the scribe for ἰδύτο (the letters Δ and Λ, and υ and ου being continually confounded), which was a mere critical emendation of the somewhat homely term κατέβαινεν, just as κατήρχετο found in 2 MSS., was another. The sense of ἰδύτο intended by the Critic is 'dived' or 'plunged down.' It is true that δύεσθαι was in this use almost confined to the Sun and Moon descending into the ocean, on their setting at sea. But it is sometimes used of other bodies going down, e. gr., Apoll. Rhod. Argon. i. 581, αἶα Πελασγῶν Δύετο, and iv. 1524. The other varr. lectt. here found are unimportant. Κυρίον after ἀγγέλου is found also in 3 Lamb. and 4 Mus. MSS.; and ἰταράσσειτο τὸ ὕδωρ in all the Lamb. (except one), with very many others, including several Mus. copies, and was adopted by Bengel and Matth., the latter of whom remarks, 'facile excedit τὸ ob proximum τὸ.' But it was as easy for the τὸ to have been inadvertently joined with ἰταράσσει, espec. in MSS. written in uncials, and without any space between the words, as to have been lost in the τὸ. Besides, the common reading is more appropriate, and suitable to the context, and is confirmed by the Syriac and Vulgate. The argument used in favour of the authenticity of the passage by Stier, and by De Wette, derived from so many different kinds of diseased persons lying at the pool, and that from the connexion of the context (see Alf.), are, in substance, the same with those which I long ago propounded in my Rec. Syn. In short, we are compelled to take, or reject, the whole narrative. As to the Neologian view,—of referring the cause of the healing virtue experienced in the moving of the water to the popular belief,—a view which Mr. Alf., 'if the passage,' he says, 'be genuine,' adopts—even he acknowledges that 'the faithful Christian (O si sic omnia!) believing, as he does, that the holy angels are the ever-acting ministers of God's will, will find no difficulty in receiving the account before us, nor any inconsistency in its forming a part of the Sacred text.' But, then, why virtually expunge the passage by double-bracketing it, and printing it in a smaller character; and, above all, why bring in the Neologian solution, where there is, by his own admission, no such difficulty as to call for it?

4. κατὰ καιρὸν 'at stated periods;' of course, uncertain; otherwise the sick folk would have had no occasion to wait for the κίνησις or ταραχή. The singular is here used generically for the plural, κατὰ καιρούς; of which idiom, as used in καιρός, I have met with no other instance except in the Schol. on Æschyl. Prom. 812, ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ ὁ Νεῖλος ἐπερχόμενος ('going beyond its bed') κατὰ καιρὸν τὰ Αἰγύπτου πείδια καταρῶδα, for that inundation, however periodical, occurs at uncertain intervals.—κατέβαινεν, 'used to descend.' Imperf. of habit; implying continuity of action. Καταίχεται is a stronger term than εἶχεται, and is applied to thoroughly formed, and usually chronical disorders. The disorder was probably paralysis; for not only was such the constant tradition of the primitive ages, but no less than six medical reasons for supposing so are given by Bartholin.

5. As to the ἔχων here, it may either be construed with ἐν τῇ ἀσθενείᾳ, thus regarding ἔχων ἐν τ. ἀσθ. as equiv. to ἀσθενῶς ἔχων, and τρίακ. ὀκτὼ ἔτη as the Accus. of duration; or to take ἔχων of duration, so that the construction may be ἔχων τρίακ. ὀκτ. ἔτ. ἐν τ. ἀσθ. Each construction is liable to objection; and which is preferable, is an open question. Comp. Luke xiii. 11. viii. 43. John xi. 39.

6. γνοὺς, for γν. ἐν αὐτῷ, as often on such occasions as this.

7. βάλῃ] This, for βάλλῃ, is found in the greater part of the best MSS., including all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies, and has been, with reason, adopted by all the Critics and Editors.

— There is, in this use of the term καταβαίνει, something graphic, tending to present the thing in a vivid point of view, as in Polyb. xxx. 20. 4, εἰς ταύτας (meaning the baths) ὅτα τις λαθεῖν (for καταβαίνει) τὴν περὶ τὸν Ἀ.

8. κράββατον] A small mean couch, something like those portable seats used by persons on shipboard, or elsewhere, and with only a skin, rug, or the like, for a covering; see Mark ii. 4. 11.—περιπάτει has reference to the man's former inability to walk, by being bedridden; and the order was no doubt given to evince the reality and completeness of the cure.

9. εὐθέως ἰγίνετο ὑγίης] Thus from suffering under an obstinate and incurable disorder, he was immediately restored to health, without that languor which is always observable in those cured by human art.

10. That by οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι here, and at vv. 15, 16, 18, are meant certain persons in authority among the Jews (as infra vii. 1. 13. ix. 18—22, et al.), and considered by John as the representatives of the people at large, in their opposition to, and final rejection of, Jesus, has been demonstrated by Lampe, and is evident from the whole course of the present narrative, espec. v. 33, as comp. with i. 19, where see Lampe's note, and espec. mine, supra ii. 18.

— οὐκ ἔστι, &c.] This was supposed to be forbidden in Jer. xvii. 21; which passage, however, has reference only to what involves great labour; though the Jewish lawyers interpreted it as forbidding to carry even the lightest weight. Yet the Rabbinical writers recognize some cases in which it was permitted to carry burdens on the Sabbath. And so probably did the Jewish scribes. If, then, it was lawful for the Jurists, in certain cases, to dispense with the observance of the Sabbath, how much more for Christ, the LORD OF THE SABBATH! However, the bearing of burdens of any kind was forbidden not only by the glosses, but the Law itself; and I agree with Alf., that our Lord 'does not here (as at Luke xiii. 15, 19) appeal to the reasonableness of the deed being done on the Sabbath, salvo Sabbato, but takes far loftier ground, namely, as being One greater than the Sabbath.' The true justification is, that the Son of Man is the Lord of the Sabbath.

11. ὁ ποιήσας, &c.] Meaning, that 'he who had power to work so signal a miracle as the immediate removal of incurable disease, especially in so doubtful a point, had a right to interpret the law as he chose, and to expect obedience from him whom he had so greatly benefited.'

13. οὐκ ᾔδει τίς ἐστιν] In ᾔδει there seems to be a significatio prægians for 'he knew not [by not having ascertained] who it was, for Jesus had glided away.'—ἔξινετο, 'had slipped away.' Ἐξίνεω signifies properly to scrim away. Thuc. ii. 90; and then, like the Latin enallare and emergere, has the sense evadere, 'to glide away unobservedly'; as in Eurip. Hipp. 471, εἰς δὲ τὴν τύχην Παισίου, ᾧσιν οὐ πᾶς ἐν κινύσας δοκεῖ, and 825; Pind. Ol. xiii. 162, and Iph. in Taur. 1186, Σὺ δ' εἰς τὸ τῆς Θεοῦ γ' ἔξινεσας. For the sense 'escaped his notice,' assigned by Alf., there is not the slightest authority. Jesus had probably done this, partly to avoid the admiration of the well-disposed, and partly to escape the envy of the evil-minded.

¹⁴. εὐρίσκει] 'lighteth on,' 'meeteth with,' a sense not unfrequent both in the New Test. and the Class. writers.

— μηκέτι ἀμάρτ.] Hence we may infer that the man's long-continued disorder had been brought on by intemperance and vice the most extreme; and it is plain that our Lord intended by so saying to afford him a proof of his omniscience, by showing his knowledge of that fact, perhaps alluding to some crowning commission of profligacy—engrafting thereon a serious admonition no longer to indulge in the commission of presumptuous sin. The expression χεῖρόν τι, as Trench observes, gives us an awful glimpse of the dread severity of God's judgments, especially when exercised on apostates, after such merciful deliverance, who have turned like the dog to his vomit, and whose end is perdition.

¹⁷. ἀπεκρίνατο] This must not be taken, as Grot., Lampe, and Kuin. say, for 'answering in the way of apology, or justification;' since this ἰδίῳ would have to be taken in the sense 'prosecuted,'—a use not found in the New Test. There is every reason to suppose that ἀπὸν simply means 'addressed them;' on which Hellenistic idiom see note on Matt. xi. 25. The address was meant to refute the calumnious representations of the Priests and Pharisees; who just before, and within our Lord's hearing, accused him of presumptuous profanity in dispensing with the observance of the Sabbath in the case of the man healed, and of its breach by himself in so healing. From the abruptness and obscure brevity of this address, it has been supposed that the Evangelist has not recorded the whole of what was then said. But it should rather seem that our Lord comprehended all that was necessary in one brief but pithy declaration—in order to make the greater impression on those whom he addressed; especially as it was customary with the Jews to express things, as much as possible, with apophthegmatical brevity.

Nor, indeed, was this saying so obscure, but that the Jews readily comprehended the most material part of it, i. e. his claiming to be equal with God; from which his right to dispense with the observance of the Sabbath would, on the authority even of their own traditions, be undoubted. Render: 'My Father is working until now (i. e. is continually working): I also work.' There is great force in the Asyndeton, and we must observe that both the ἐγὼ and the καὶ here are emphatic; the latter intimating equality with the Father, as is plain from the verse following, the words of which proceed on the supposition of this claim to equality with God. Moreover, by the καὶ is denoted comparisons, as though there had been written καθὼς followed by οὕτως;—particles which not expressed in a close, might in a free translation have force thus: 'as my Father is at work continually, so I, too, am at work.'—By ἐργάζεσθαι is meant the operation of God, as displayed in the preservation and governance of all parts of his creation; and by ἕως ἄρτι is expressed the perpetuity of that preservation and governance, unremittently exerted for the safety and welfare of his creatures. By this example of God, our Lord intends to rebuke their criminality, and to teach them that he is like unto God, who hath no Sabbath, but doeth his work perpetually. 'As my Father doth not cease to benefit men on the Sabbath, neither am I impeded by any such observance from benefitting them on that day.' In short, the argument is, that as his Father governs and preserves the world as well as on the Sabbath as on other days, so he, as His Son, has an equal right so to do. But this surely implied equality with his Father, and consequently essential DIVINITY. Our Lord, moreover, professes to do the same works which the Father doth; and these not only of benevolence, but of omnipotence. He therefore, in so saying, directly equals himself with the Father. Accordingly we find by the next verse, that the Jews understood these words as claiming equality with God. Comp. x. 30, 33, 36.

— πατέρα ἴδιον &c.] 'his own Father;' so Rom. viii. 32; meaning, that he called God peculiarly his Father; thus making himself equal with God. For they interpreted his words to mean (as they justly might) that being the Son of God, and the Messiah, he could, by his own proper authority, dispense with the observance of the Sabbath. Now this was contrary to their opinion of the power of the Messiah, which they maintained to be only delegated, and in all things subservient, and inferior to that of the Father. Hence they understood him as not claiming to be Messiah in the commonly received sense, but in a peculiar and sublime one, by which he arrogated an authority self-derived. A construction, we may observe, which, so far from attempting to remove, our Lord proceeds to confirm and more fully justify.

19. οὐ δύναται] ‘cannot,’ i. e. from the very nature and necessity of the case (see Chrys. and Bentley, cited by Lampe), nay, by the very cognatio with the Father. See Stier and Tittm., who observe that ἴσος was, from the most ancient times, said of any one equal to another in respect of nature; so the Greek Scholiasts explain ἰδίότης (lit. ‘own-ness’) by συγγένεια. Having stated the extent of his authority, our Lord proceeds to show its source and nature, and to prove to them that what he had said was perfectly true,—namely, that he had power, and that by his own authority, to dispense with the observance of the Sabbath. In this justification, pronounced (as appears from v. 18) some little time after the preceding, our Lord replies by a fuller explanation of what he had before said; in which he goes on to establish his equality with the Father, by claiming the same Divine attributes.

20. ὁ γὰρ Πατ. φ. τ. γ.] The γὰρ here, as often, refers to something left to be supplied in the mind; q. d. ‘[and no wonder it should be so] FOR the Father, loving the Son, sheweth to him all things which he himself doeth,’ i. e. all the purposes of his own secret counsel, whereby he so decreed. The true sense of δείκνυσιν here is what is pointed out by Lampe, notificat, ‘declares,’ unfolds to him his will and purposes.’ And as with God will is deed and work, there is implied in δίδωκεν the communication of the power to carry out the purposes into deed, that of doing what he doeth, agreeably to what is said supra iii. 35, πάντα δίδωκεν ἐν τῇ χειρὶ αὐτοῦ. What these purposes be, appears from the two following verses,—namely, the raising up and giving life to the dead, and the judging of mankind,—the especial attribute of the DEITY. The words ἵνα θαυμάζῃ are deserving of more attention than they have received. The ἵνα is eventual, denoting result, and the sense, ‘so that ye may have cause for wondering amazement, utter astonishment.’ The θαυμ. is emphatical, having reference to something beyond bare wonder, and pointing at its result, either, in the case of some, the wonder which, being without faith and its fruits (see Habak. i. 5), issues in nought but ultimately falling short of salvation. So Acts xiii. 41, ‘Behold, ye despisers, and marvel, and perish!’ others, again, with that fruit, causing them to say, ‘It is the Lord’s doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes;’ thus acknowledging the glory of Christ Jesus,—the former case being, alas! that of the great multitude of those present. True is the observation of Matt. Henry, ‘Many are brought to marvel at Christ’s wondrous works,—whereby he hath the honour of them,—who cannot be brought to believe in his word, whereby they would have the benefit of them.’

21. The portion from ver. 21 to 31 has been variously interpreted. The question in dispute turns on what our Lord meant to be understood by the resurrection of the dead, and judgment, here mentioned; whether, in a figurative sense, the awakening the men of that generation to a spiritual life; or, in a natural one, the resurrection of all men to eternal life; and whether, by judgment, he meant the retribution to succeed this life. Most Expositors are agreed in adopting the second interpretation, which is, indeed, more agreeable to what precedes; but the first is called for by the following context. But here (as in the prophetic declarations of our Lord at Matt. xxiv.) a twofold sense was, I doubt not, that intended; so that under the natural is couched also a figurative and mystical one. Such a sense, Tittman admits, is allowed by the context and the usus loquendi; though the other is, he thinks, required by the series orationis, which borders on philological sophistry. Lampe has, I apprehend, fully proved, in an elaborate discussion, that there is here, as in Matt. xxiv., a twofold sense of ζωοποιεῖ intended. That the word admits of both the natural and the metaphorical sense will appear from my Lex. in v. The latter is, as will appear from Lampe and Tittm., nearly of as frequent occurrence as the former,—namely, ‘to give spiritual life to those dead in trespasses and sins,’ by imparting to them in this life a principle of spirituality, by sanctification, and in the next a felicity eternal. So Stier and Alford admit, that this ζωοποιεῖ ‘lays hold of life in its innermost and deepest sense, and thus finds its illustration in the waking both of the outwardly and the spiritually dead. Quaint and odd language, but seemingly recognizing this twofold sense here of this *quicken*ing in question; which indeed was long ago held by Matthew Henry, whose discussion is worthy of attention.

22. οὐδὲ γὰρ ὁ Πατὴρ, &c.] This comes under that class of passages where οὐδὲ with γὰρ is used where a negative (such as οὐ) has preceded or is implied in the context. So Acts iv. 34, O o 2

11 John 2. ἀλλὰ τὴν κρίσιν πᾶσαν δέδωκε τῷ Τίῳ. ²³ ἵνα πάντες τιμῶσι τὸν Τίον, καθὼς τιμῶσι τὸν Πατέρα. οὐδὲ γὰρ ἐνδεὴς τις ὑπῆρχεν ἐν αὐτοῖς. Rom. viii. 7, οὐκ ὑπ. οὐδὲ γὰρ δύναται. Gal. i. 12, [οὐκ ἔστι] οὐδὲ γὰρ ἰσχύει παραλαβεῖν. And so in the Class. writers. I have touched on the idiom, because by this use of οὐδὲ, γὰρ is, as Alf. says, implied, that as the Father does not himself, by his own proper act, vivify any, but commits all quickening power to the Son, so doth he judgment also. See Bull. Oper. p. 37.

23. ἵνα—τιμῶσι, &c.] Here is denoted the end and purpose of this commitment. Render: 'so that;' q. d. 'This has been done to the end that—with this contemplated result, that &c.:' the sum and substance of the duty and service being the honouring of the Son, even as that of the Father.

24—30. Here there may be, as Alf. supposes, an expansion of the two assertions in vv. 21, 22, the ζωοποιεῖν and the κρίνειν closely bound up, as they are, together. The πιστ. is here considered as the result of the ἀκούων, and the faith so produced by attentive hearing as an enduring faith, and thus attaining the promises of its holders, by not coming into the last dread judgment, but have already, in a manner, passed (by anticipation at least) from death unto life,—from a state in which they would have perished everlastingly, to one in which they have the promise of everlasting life. See the marginal references.

25. Here the tropical and mystical sense far predominates. Thus by νεκροὶ will be meant 'those who are dead in trespasses and sins' (Eph. v. 14), and by ζήσονται, 'they shall be put into the way of obtaining eternal life,'—namely, by hearkening to the preaching of Christ's Gospel, and receiving their Saviour.

26, 27. We have here again ζωοπ. and κρίνειν united, as constituting the two great departments of the Son's working; the former as substantiating the ζήσονται, the latter as paving the way to the august declaration at v. 27, as to the giving power to exercise judgment, where the natural sense alone has place. The expression ἐν ἑαυτῷ as regards Christ, involves the sense 'as forming an essential part of his nature, such as belongs to God alone.' Comp. vi. 51, 57. At

v. 26 it is added, that the Father hath given him power to hold and execute judgment because He is the Son of Man, i. e. because, being the Son of God, He is also the Son of Man: "in which is implied (as Bp. Lonsdale observes) that Christ, in his office of mediator between God and Man, has received authority from the Father to execute judgment upon mankind, because it is agreeable to the Divine benevolence and mercy, that men should be judged by him, who, as the Son of Man, himself partook of their nature, and felt their infirmities. See Heb. ii. 14—18. iv. 14—16." Why the Articles ὁ and τοῦ are not used see Bp. Middleton and Mr. Green; the former of whom thinks them quite dispensable; the latter inadmissible, to which I am inclined to assent, the sense of the passage being, that the Father has committed this judgment of mankind to the Son, as being himself invested with their nature; implying his acquaintance with human infirmity, and consequently his entire fitness to be our Judge.

28, 29. We have here again a transition, in which the moral entirely gives way to the physical resurrection, and the judgment connected with it. Μὴ θαυμάζετε has reference to what was said at vv. 21, 25; yet not in the literal acceptance of those words, as Kuinoel and Tittman imagine (for that would yield a very jejune sense), but the allegorical and mystical; q. d. 'Wonder not at what I have said of this moral renovation, for,' &c., thus introducing an august sequel.

30. Here begins, as Stier shows, the second part of the Discourse, treating of the testimony by which these things were substantiated.

As in v. 19, Christ declares that the Son can do nothing different from what he sees the Father do, so here he says, that, in executing judgment upon mankind, he will not do this of himself alone, but will judge according to the rule of judgment which he shall hear and receive from the Father; and he intimates that his judgment must needs be just, because it will be in perfect agreement with the will of the Father—the just and merciful God, who sent him into the world.

(Bp. Lonsdale.) See more in Tittm., and especially in Lampe and Calvin; and so Alf., who traces the reasoning thus,—“As the Son does nothing of himself—but his working and judging will spring from his entire unity of will and being with the Father; thus his great and last judgment will be just and holy (he being not separate from God, but one with him); hence his witness of himself is true, and holy also.”

—πατρός at the end of the verse has been cancelled by all the recent Editors, whom I have so far followed, as to double-bracket the word, though external authority for expunging it is but slender,—only A, B, D, K, L, Δ, and 6 cursives. I can, however, add about 7 or 8 Lamb. and Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, confirmed by nearly all the ancient Versions, and also by internal evidence for the word. However, it might have been omitted from being written, as often, by abbreviation, but much more probably by being conjoined with the -τος in πέμψαντος, as in one of the Lamb. MSS.

31. Having asserted his claims to be the promised Messiah, our Lord proceeds to adduce the proofs of his Divine mission, as they exist in his actions, miracles, and the character of his doctrines. And first he anticipates the objection, founded on a common maxim of the Jewish law, that ‘no one is a fit witness in his own cause.’

—ἐάν ἐγὼ μαρτυρῶ, &c.] Render: ‘If I should bear witness of myself [only], i. e. if I had no other evidence than mine own testimony, my witness would not be trustworthy;’ ἀληθὴς being for πιστός. Our Lord proceeds to show, in the subsequent verses, that his own witness of himself was confirmed by other testimonies;—that of John the Baptist (v. 33)—that of the works which his Father had given him to finish (v. 36)—that of the Father himself (v. 37)—that of the Scriptures in general (v. 39)—and that of Moses in particular (vv. 45, 46). Thus there is no discrepancy between what is said here and at viii. 14. Comp. viii. 13—18 (quite a kindred passage), and notes.

32. ἄλλος] Some difference of opinion exists as to who is here meant. The ancient and early modern Expositors suppose John the Baptist, whose testimony is mentioned in the next verse; whilst some more recent ones, as Kuinoel and Lampe, understand God the Father; to whose witness our Lord reverts at v. 36. And though who the ἄλλος may be is rather intimated than pointed out here, yet I agree with Alf. that from the coherence of the discourse ἄλλος can be no other than the Father, of whom so much has been before said. And this is confirmed by the parallel passage supra viii. 13—18, where at v. 13, our Lord mentions his Father’s testimony along with his own.

33. ὑμεῖς—ἀληθείᾳ] i. e. ‘You yourselves have heard the witness appealed to by a public mission, and John then bore testimony concerning me. You have therefore human testimony.’ See i. 8, 15, 26. 3 John 3, 6.

34. ἐγὼ δὲ οὐ, &c.] Meaning: ‘I say not this through a desire for the honour which human fame can bestow; for I want—I accept not the testimony of any man. I only appeal to the testimony of John, in order that, believing in me through that testimony, ye may be saved.’

35. ὁ λύχνος ὁ καίόμενος] Render, with Bp. Middl., ‘the burning and shining lamp.’ John might well be so termed, since, as Campb. remarks, ‘he was the single prophet in whom the old Dispensation had its completion, and by whom the new was introduced; therefore, until our Lord’s ministry took place, John may justly be said to have been the light of that generation.’ The expression may, as Bp. Middl. thinks,—and Bengel before him thought,—be used with allusion to some phrase then current, to signify an enlightened teacher; which is confirmed by what Lightfoot says, that ‘a person famous for light or knowledge was called a candle, the candle of the Law, the lamp of light,’ and also by Eccles. xlviii. 1, where it is said of Elias, the forerunner of John the Baptist, that he was προφήτης ὡς πῦρ, καὶ ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ ὡς λαμπράς ἑκαίετο. Nor is the metaphor unknown in the Classical writers. So Pind. Olymp. xi. 96, ὁ μὲν πλοῦτος ἀρεταῖς δαδαιδαλμίνος—ἀπτήρ ἀρίηλος (I conj. ἀρίηλος) δαλαινὸν ἄνδρι φέγγος. The view taken by Campb. and Bp. Middl. is confirmed by the suffrage of Mr. Green, Gram. New Test. D, p. 221, where he brings in this passage under the same category as John iii. 10, ὁ διδάσκ. τ. Ἰσρ., regarding each as an appropriate Title; and he thinks that the passage of Eccles., which I have adduced, would justify a conjecture that a title equiv. to ὁ λύχνος ὁ καίόμενος καὶ φαίνων may have been popularly given to Elijah among the Jews;—in which case our Lord would here, as on another occasion, be asserting the identity of John with the Elijah foretold by Malachi, and expected as the forerunner of the Messiah. Stier and Lücke are of the same opinion. Alf., indeed, rejects this view,—on the ground, that we have no passage in the Old Test. which designates Elijah in such terms. But the objection is of no force, since we can never argue to any great purpose from the absence of any expression from any writer. The epithet φαίνων does not, as Alf. imagines, set forth the derived and transitory nature of John's light, the force being the same as in 2 Pet. i. 19, λαχὺν φάινοντι ἐν αὐτῇ ὥρᾳ τόπῳ.

—ἡθελ. ἀγαλλ.] Render: 'Ye were disposed to rejoice greatly in his light,—but only for a time,' i. e. until he reproved your vices, and called you to deep repentance, as the preparative for God's kingdom; when ye left him, and said, he had a Devil. See Luke vii. 30, 33.

36. Our Lord now suggests the reason why he needs not human testimony (v. 34), even the testimony of John; adducing thereto the infinitely weightier one of the FATHER; appealing to the works which the Father hath given him to accomplish, and adverting to the testimony of the Prophets of the Old Test., who spake of Him. The force of the Article τῆν, may be brought out by rendering, 'The witness which I have is greater,' &c. By τὰ ἔργα are principally meant his miracles; though not to the exclusion of other works suitable to the Messiah. See xiv. 11, 12.

37. οὔτε φωνὴν—ἐωράκατε] The connexion here is obscure and disputable. Lampe, Kuin., and Tittman, are agreed in considering the assertion here as suspended on the words immediately preceding, and thereby involving the sense: 'although ye have not heard his voice,' &c.: q. d. 'Nay, the Father himself, who hath sent me, hath borne testimony of me (namely, in the Scriptures of the Old Test., by its promises and prophecies of a Messiah); although ye have not heard him audibly, nor seen him in visible form declaring this testimony of me;' a mode of unravelling the difficulty inadmissible on two grounds, 1. from the violence of thus introducing a word ad libitum, to help out the meaning; 2. from the feeble and rapid sense thus arising, by which we lose all the point, and weaken the nerve of a passage, the character of which is (as Calvin and Melancthon remark) objurgatory,—that of severe invective against the Jews for wilful blindness in rejecting the plain evidence which existed, that Jesus was the Christ, the promised Messiah. The connexion seems best traced by supposing an omission to be supplied by the mind of the reader, of what had place in the thought of the writer, namely ἀλλὰ. It is, however, a more than Thucydidean short-cut, and the full import requires to be evolved thus: 'But to little purpose is it that I appeal to that high testimony (even the testimony of God through the Prophets of the Old Testament); [for] ye have never heard his voice so as to heed it, nor seen his glory so as to recognize it.' With respect to the strong language employed in ἀκηκόατε and ἐωράκατε, we have only to bear in mind a like mode of speaking in our own language, by which persons similarly affected are said to be deaf and blind. It is, however, not simple dulness and blindness, that is here ascribed to the Jews; but that indisposition to listen or attend to the evidences of truth, which is more plainly asserted of them at v. 40, answering to what St. Paul terms the 'veil upon their hearts.' Comp. also Is. i. 3. Thus it is meant, that they would not recognize this εἶδος as that of the Messiah, would not (to use the words of St. Paul, 2 Cor. iv. 6, which supply the best explanation of this εἶδος) discern 'the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.'

38. καὶ τὸν λόγον, &c.] Render: 'Yea, ye have not his word (meaning the Scriptures) abiding in you;' i. e. 'ye suffer not the declarations therein to sink into your minds, so as to understand their true import, or perceive their fulfilment in me;' as is plainly declared in the next verse.

39. ἐρευνᾶτε τὰς γραφὰς, &c.] It has here been a matter of debate, whether ἐρευνᾶτε should be taken as an Imperative or an Indicative. The former method is adopted by almost all the ancient and a great part of the modern Commentators, including Stier and Alf.; but the latter has been preferred by the most eminent among modern Expositors,—and with some reason; for the Indic. is more agreeable to the context, and (as Lampe, Tittm., and Campb. have shown) is required by the scope of the passage, and the course of argument. Nay, Campb. thinks that the Imper. would destroy the cogency of the argument,—since the clause subjoined, ὅτι ὑμεῖς δοκεῖτε, &c. is rather a reason why they did not, than why they should not, search the Scriptures. As to what has been urged by Whitby and Weststein, in favour of the Imperative,—that the Indicative would require ὑμεῖς to be prefixed, and that the admonition to search the Scriptures was necessary,—the first argument has, in the plain unstudied style of a writer like St. John, little or no force; and the second is quite unfounded. For, not to say that the character of the context is not admonitory, but expostulatory, by a mild upbraiding,—we have, in the ancient Paraphrases and the Rabbinical writers, full proof that the Scriptures were diligently investigated and studied by the Jews—to what purpose, is not the question. Whereas the Indicative is required both by the context and by the verbs following in the same sentence, δοκεῖτε and θίλατε, which are manifestly in the Indicative. And thus an excellent sense arises; according to which our Lord censures not the carelessness, but glances at the unprofitableness, of their Bible study. Ho grants that they searched the Scriptures (and, by implication, commends them for that), but complains that it had not its due effect in bringing them to him as the Christ; q. d. 'Ye indeed search the Scriptures, deeming that in them ye have [revealed to you] the way to attain eternal life,—and yet those are they which bear testimony of me:—nevertheless ye are unwilling to come unto me, that ye might attain salvation.' As to Alford's objections, that the Indic. requires some strain to be put on the words, to extract the sense required; and that ἐπεινῶντα cannot be the Indic., since it would have blame attached to it; the latter remark is purely sophistical: and though the former has some force, yet the Imper. requires a much greater strain, namely, in the sense, 'Go on to search, as ye do:' for thus it must be spoken in the manner of an Appeal, q. d. 'Ye profess to receive and believe the Scriptures: well; let that be the Judge, if so be ye will rest not in the letter, but go on to search the spirit thereof.' Yet how far this is removed from the natural and obvious import, it is unnecessary to say. Moreover the Indicative sense is absolutely required by the connexion of the present with the subsequent words—οὐ θέλετε, as indicated by the punctuation which I have uniformly adopted (in accordance with the Vulg. and Pesch. Syr. Versions), by which the words καὶ ἐκείναι—περὶ ἐμοῦ are parenthetical. Agreeably to this view the words καὶ οὐ θέλετε equally, nay, far better, admit of being regarded as setting forth the inconsistency of such as should think that they have eternal life in the Scriptures, and yet would not come unto Him of whom those Scriptures testify, that they might have life. It only remains to add, that the view propounded by Mr. Alf. is further objectionable, as requiring an emphasis to be laid on the ὕμναι, and an irony recognized in the καί, thus: 'And ye will not come to Me.' Nothing, surely, can be more forced and frigid. And the ironical turn thus supposed is at once unsuited to the solemn character of the passage, and, indeed, altogether foreign to the character of the Divine Speaker.

41, 42. Our Lord here, 1. preoccupies any imputation of vain-glory in adverting to his claims, by apprising them that he does not so speak as needing the sanction of their testimony, but solely to protest against their error, and warn them of its awful consequences; 2. he accounts for their rejection of those claims, by intimating that nothing better can be expected from those who are devoid of the first great principle of religion, the love of God. The connexion, if any really exists, may be best traced, not as Alf., but as Bp. Lonsd. points out, thus ['I complain not of your unwillingness to come unto me, as though I should gain honour by your coming]: for I receive not honour from men; but I speak thus of you, because I know you, that you have not the love of God in you; and that it is the want of this love that hinders you from coming to me.'

43. Here we have a further unfolding of the sentiment at v. 41; and the sense is: 'I need not human glory, because I come unto you, as I am come, with Divine authority: yet [such is your perversity, that] if another should come with only his own name and character merely human, his authority ye will admit.' This was literally the case in the instance of Barchochebas, and other false Christs, predicted of in Matt. xxiv. 23—26, where see notes; and mentioned in Josephus and other writers; of whom a history was written by John à Lent.

44. Here is traced the reason for their unbelief, namely, by their fostering such passions, espec. pride and vain-glory, as stifle the love of God, and consequently the love of truth, for its own sake. Considering the connexion of what is here said with that at v. 40, οὐ θέλετε ἐλθεῖν πρὸς με, expressing a decided indisposition to come unto him in faith, we may here recognize a sort of climax pointing at the cause of their unbelief, as what could scarcely be otherwise, 'How can ye believe while catching at the praise of men, and not seeking after the honour which cometh from God alone?'

45. The ἐγὼ here is emphatic, and alludes to their accusation of Him as breaking the law of God, v. 16. Our Lord means to intimate, that he need not do this, since there was a sufficient accuser, even Moses; who might be said to be the means of their accusation in that respect, by their disobedience to his injunctions as to the Messiah, plainly foretold in his writings both by express predictions and by typical representations.

46. Their pretences for not believing in Jesus were two,—their love to God, and their reverence for the law of Moses. Christ had shown, v. 42, that they could have no true love to God; and in this verse, that they had no real faith in Moses; for if they had, they would have believed on Him.

B, x. 16 and 17; but it would nought avail; since internal evidence is quite adverse, the word being evidently expunged by the ancient Critics, as unnecessary, and overloading the composition. The θεωρῶν, edited by Lachm., Tisch., ed. 1, and Alf., ed. 1, was another alteration from the same class of persons, who thought that the term θεωρεῖν was more suited to express the viewing any thing done as eye-witnesses than ὁρᾶν. Yet the latter term, in this very manner, is used supra, i. 34. iii. 11 and 32. iv. 45. πάντα ἰωρακότες ἃ ποίησεν. The many MSS. (including the Alex.) that have θεωρῶν are really in favour of ὁρῶν. In his second edit. Tisch. has restored ὁρῶν: following whose example, and profiting by my indication, Alf., in his 2nd edit., has done the same. From the words ὁρῶν τὰ σημεῖα it was, Alf. remarks, plain that a circuit in Galilee, and works of healing, are here presupposed. See the parallels of Mark and Luke.

3. τὸ ὄρος] Doubtless the same as that designated by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, as the ἐρημον τόπον, a desert [uncultivated] tract, given up solely to pasturage. Τὸ ὄρος is wrongly explained by Alf. 'the hill country'; for there is no such in the place in question, but only 'the mountain range,' such as is traced in the best maps as skirting the N.E. coast of the lake, and at one point approaching within about three miles of Bethsaida, near which the other Evangelists say this τόπος ἐρημος was situated. Accordingly, the very spot where this illustrious miracle took place may be fixed exactly.

5. For ἀγοράσομεν, most of the uncial, and very many cursive MSS., including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, have -σωμεν, which is adopted by Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., while Matth. and Grieb. retain -σομεν, perhaps rightly, since internal evidence is in favour of -σομεν,—since, from what I have said in my note on Luke iii. 10, it would appear to be a critical alteration for greater facility,—a correction to introduce better Greek; though the matter is, as I have there shown, one of doubtful disputation. If -σομεν be retained, the sense will be, 'whence shall we [obtain the means to] buy?' Comp. Mark viii. 4, πόθεν δύνησεται τι χορτάσαι, whence, however, the Future -σομεν may have been derived; so that the reading may be regarded as uncertain. Why this question was addressed to Philip does not appear; hence we are left to conjecture; and mise,—that Philip was the Provider, as Judas was the Treasurer, of the Apostles, is quite as likely as Alford's,—that he was standing nearest to the Lord at the moment.

7. The αὐτόν is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, L, and about 6 cursives; to which I can add 2 or 3 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16; authority, however, insufficient; since internal evidence is rather in favour of the word, which might be brought in from a marginal Scholium; but was more probably removed by Critics to improve the composition, considering that αὐτοῖς has just preceded; the very reason which occasioned the removal of the τι just after in B, D, and cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., ed. 1, bracketed by Alf., ed. 1, but now restored by both.

9. Ἰστί καὶ δ. ἐν ὁδοῖ] Here ἐν is absent from MSS. B, D, L, a few cursive ones, and some ancient Versions and Fathers, and is cancelled by Tisch. and bracketed by Lachm., and Alf., ed. 1, who has, however, removed the brackets in his 2nd; with reason; for external authority is insufficient, and internal evidence quite in favour of the word, which was doubtless cancelled by the Critical Revisers of the texts of B and D, because of its bad Grecism, who did not perceive that the sense is, 'There is a single lad here who,'—in other words, 'there is one, and one only.' That barley-bread, though almost unused among the Greeks and Romans, was in general use among the lower orders of the Jews, appears from various passages of the Old Test., and some of Josephus.

— ὀψάρια] This term, a derivative form from ὄψων, denoted, like it, originally, as our meal, whatever was taken with bread, as a relish, espec. fish, cooked or dried; thus it is here equiv. to the lichyus of the other Evangelists.

10. ἦν δὲ χόρτος—τόπω] This would be very suitable for the purpose of their accommodation. These incidental and parenthetical circumstances, as Dr. Paley observes, mark an eyewitness. I would compare similar insertions in Joseph. Ant. iv. 8, 1, φρονικὸς φύτον δὲ ἐστὶ τὸ χωρίον. Xenoph. Anab. i. 4, 9, ἐξελαύνει ἐπὶ τῷ Χάλον ποταμῷ, πλήρη λυχύων καὶ πρᾶτων. Æschyl. Pers. 610, and Thucyd. iv. 13.

11. The words τοῖς μαθηταῖς—μαθηταὶ are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from 3 uncial and 4 cursive MSS., I apprehend on very insufficient authority. They may, indeed, have been interpolated from the parallel passage of Matt. But such an interpolation would hardly extend to all the MSS. but seven. More probable is it that in those (or in their archetypes) the words were omitted by the scribes in consequence of the τοῖς—τοῖς, which would easily cause the intermediate words to be lost.

12. συναγάγετε τὰ περισσ. κλ.] The injunction, not recorded by the other Evangelists, was, with reason, thought worthy of mention by St. John, as conveying, from the lips of our Lord himself, the important lesson,—that no part, however small, of the bounties of Providence to man are to be wasted, as these fragments might have been, unless gathered up, for the use, we may suppose, of the poorest of the people assembled, to carry away in their κόφινος, or 'flag-baskets,' used in travelling. And it was undoubtedly to enforce this lesson of benevolence, that our Lord gave the injunction; for even had he not ordered them to gather up the fragments, they would probably have been gathered up, since it was the custom of the country so to do. At the same time a concurrent design of the injunction might be, to evidence the truth and greatness of the miracle.

15. ἀρπάξῃ αὐτὸν, ἵνα, &c.] Ἀρπ. is a highly appropriate term, as appears from Jos. Ant. xix. 2, 1, ἤρπαστο Κλαύδιος ὑπὸ τοῦ στρατιωτικοῦ, and Bell. ii. 11, 1, ἀρπάζεται ὑπὸ τῶν ἐν Ῥώμῃ στρατευμάτων αἰετὴν ἀρχὴν Κλαύδιος; and ii. 11, 2, ἀκὼν ὑπὸ τῶν στρατιωτῶν ἀρπαγίῃ. The motives for this eagerness in the multitude to make Jesus a king are easy to be imagined. The prevailing expectation of the advent of the Messiah, in quality of a temporal prince as well as spiritual teacher, who should deliver them from foreign oppression and restore them to their ancient liberty, working with the conviction in many,—that Jesus was the promised Messiah, set the people upon the measure (which they thought would not be displeasing to him) of forcibly making him accept royalty; a scheme which our Lord wisely frustrated by withdrawing to retirement.

16—21. Jesus walketh on the sea. Matt. xiv. 22—33. Mark vi. 45—52.

16. The article at κατέβη ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν and πέραν τῆς θαλ. has the force of reference, meaning the sea mentioned supra v. 1, θάλ. τῆς Γαλιλαίας τῆς Τιβεριάδος, scil. καλουμένης. Thus it is called τῆς θαλ. τῆς Τιβ. in John xxi. 1, and Τιβερ. without θάλ. at vi. 21. It is called only ἡ θάλ. τῆς Γαλιλαίας by Matt. iv. 18, xv. 29. Mark i. 16. vii. 31. By Luke it is never styled θάλ., but only λίμνη, as v. 1, 2, viii. 22, 33; in the first of which passages he adds αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν καὶ ἐμβάντες εἰς τὸ πλοῖον, ἤρχοντο πέραν τῆς θαλάσσης εἰς Καπερναοῦμ. ¹⁷ Καὶ σκοτία ἦδη ἐγγόνει, καὶ οὐκ ἐληλύθει πρὸς αὐτοὺς ὁ Ἰησοῦς. ¹⁸ ἦ τε θάλασσα, ἀνέμου μεγάλου πνέοντος, διηγείρετο. ¹⁹ Ἐλληλακότες οὖν ὡς σταδίου εἰκοσιπέντε ἢ τριάκοντα, θεωροῦσι τὸν Ἰησοῦν περιπατοῦντα ἐπὶ τῆς θαλάσσης, καὶ ἐγγὺς τοῦ πλοίου γινόμενον καὶ ἐφοβήθησαν. ²⁰ Ὁ δὲ λέγει αὐτοῖς· Ἐγὼ εἰμὶ· μὴ φοβεῖσθε. ²¹ Ἦθελον οὖν λαβεῖν αὐτὸν εἰς τὸ πλοῖον, καὶ εὐθέως τὸ πλοῖον ἐγένετο ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς εἰς ἣν ὑπῆρχον.

Γεννησαρέτ. And so in Numb. xxiv. 11, it is called the sea of Chennoreth, ἡ θάλασσα Χενν-ρέθ. It may, indeed, seem strange that a body of water which is only entitled to the name λίμνη should be called θάλασσα; but another instance of this is adduced by Wets. from Aristot. Meteor. i. 13, ὑπὸ τὸν Καύκασον λίμνη, ἣν κάλουσιν οἱ ἐκεῖ θάλασσαν. So here the appellation was only such as was applied by the Galilæans, and the Hebrew-Greeks; whereas St. Luke applies to it the very term which would have been given by Strabo himself.

— ἤρχοντο] 'they were going,' 'directing their course.' The same idiom occurs at Acts xxviii. 4.

— εἰς Καπ.] Meaning, 'towards, in the direction of, Capernaum,' as the end of their voyage, though they were to stop by the way at Bethsaida, to take up Jesus; see note on Matt. xiv. 22.

18. διηγείρετο] 'was violently agitated.' An appropriate term. So Pollux i. 9, κύμα ἐγείρομενον, ὑποκινούμενον. Comp. Job vi. 18, ἡ θάλασσα διηγείρετο, and Jonah i. 4, 12, ἡ θάλασσα ἐξηγείρετο.

21. ἤθελον οὖν λαβεῖν αὐτόν] An idiomatic use of θέλειν, found in 2 Pet. iii. 5; also in the Classical writers (see Winer, Gr. § 38, 4), by which θέλον λαβεῖν is put, for ἐθελόντως ἔλαβον, 'they willingly received.'

22—59. The multitude go after Jesus to Capernaum, where He discourses to them of the bread of life.

22. After ἐν the words εἰς δ' ἐνέβη οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, B, L, and a few cursives (to which I can make no addition), but on insufficient authority, though internal evidence is against the words, which may have been inserted for explanation;

but that they are quite genuine is attested by all the MSS. but a few, confirmed by the Pesh. Syr. and Vulg. Versions.

Further on, for τὸ πλοῖαριον Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read τὸ πλοῖον, from 5 uncial and about 7 cursive MSS.; to which I can add a few Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, 17; and it may be the true reading; but there needs proof that it is. Thus it would denote the 'skiff,' or 'bark,' in attendance on Jesus.

23. ὅπου ἔφαγον τὸν ἄρτον] Render, 'where they ate the bread, the Lord having given thanks [over it],' equiv. to, 'over which the Lord had given thanks;' for the Article is not pleonastic, but has the reference of renewed mention, as infra xxi. 13, τὸν ἄρτον, 'the loaf,' or 'the bread.' I agree with Stier, that πότε here includes πῶς in its meaning; such an implied sense is not unfrequent in Particles.

25. πότε ὧδε γέγονας;] This use of γίνεσθαι for ἵσθαι is found in the New Test., and occasionally in the Classical writers, though not those of the purest Attic, and almost only with prepositions or adverbs implying motion, and never, I think, except of motion to a place; not, as here, of motion from, i. e. to go thither, not to come hither; which was, I suppose, confined to the common Greek dialect.

26. Our Lord, observing that the multitude which flocked to him were influenced, in the question they put, by idle curiosity, and a desire, not for spiritual improvement, but for worldly advantage, takes occasion, from the natural and earthly bread with which he had supplied them, to advert to their need of spiritual and celestial nutriment; showing how much more anxious they ought to be for the acquisition of the latter than of the former.

Such is the occasion of the Discourse which εκριθη αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς καὶ εἶπεν Ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν ζητεῖτέ

 με, οὐχ ὅτι εἶδετε σημεῖα, ἀλλ' ὅτι ἐφάγετε ἐκ τῶν ἄρτων καὶ

follows; a portion which, as it involves much of difficulty, so it has been variously interpreted. The obscurity which so largely prevails, is chiefly occasioned by the highly figurative cast of the phraseology, and the more than usual intermixture of literal with metaphorical diction, but in no small degree from the extreme brevity of the wording. These difficulties are only to be overcome by close and patient attention, and especially by considering the occasion, design, tenour, and manner of the discourse. Now the occasion was what has just been stated. The design was to dissolve the spell both of low ambition in his disciples, and of sordid carnality in the multitude, and work in their minds a conviction of the spiritual necessity under which they laboured, and to seek to supply it by earnest supplication to the throne of grace; see vv. 35, 37, 51. Our Lord's manner of pursuing this design is (to use the words of Dr. Smith, vol. ii. 126) 'by declaring that his own death must intervene, as the means of procuring for men those blessings which they so needed; that a participation of those benefits, analogous in its effects on the mind to the use of nutriment for corporeal sustenance, was necessary to the desired deliverance from evil, and possession of immortal happiness; and that a preparatory discipline, by a gracious and divine influence, was requisite for the understanding of his doctrine and the enjoyment of his benefits; vv. 53, 55, 57, 44, 45.'

As far as regards the highly figurative cast and obscurity of the discourse, they are well accounted for by Dr. Smith from the circumstance, that 'the declaration, namely, of his bloody death, which is the basis of the discourse, bears on it the character of a prediction, and may therefore be expected to partake of the essential characters of scripture prophecy, which are, 1. the mixture of literal and figurative diction; 2. the envelope of obscurity, which was necessary to guard the public prediction of any future event, and which was to continue till it should be taken off by the event itself; namely, in this case, the cruel death of the Saviour, of which it was our Lord's manner to speak obscurely and darkly to his public and promiscuous auditors; for it was only to his disciples that he foretold it in plain terms.' To the above observations it may be added, that the usual obscurity of predictive matter has in the present case been much increased by the persons addressed being different in different parts of the discourse, though without any distinct intimation being given of any such change. For our Lord sometimes addresses the higher classes, who were, more or less, ill affected to him; at other times the lower classes, who were, upon the whole, well disposed, but exceedingly dull of comprehension, and quite ignorant of His true character as Son of God; see vii. 12. Now this will satisfactorily account for the frequent repetitions of the same sentiment, which might otherwise be thought unnecessary. In such cases either our Lord replies to the objections, or removes the scruples, of the two classes in separate addresses; or, in compassion to the ignorance and dullness of the multitude, condescends to repeat the same thing more than once, in order to impress it more strongly on their minds.

27. Ἐργάζεσθε μὴ—ἀλλὰ, &c.] The true sense is: 'Busy not yourselves about, in going after, so laboriously (as we find, from supra v. 22—26, they had done), for what? not in order to see Jesus, be witnesses to his miracles, and seek his salvation, but to obtain from him what might satisfy your bodily wants,' as our Lord intimates at v. 26. Τὴν ἀπολλυμένην, 'which perisheth in the use.' The term ἀπολλ. is, I apprehend, simply to be understood as used suitably to its antitheton μένουσαν (as in Ps. cii. 26, Sept., αὐτοὶ ἀπολούνται, σὺ δὲ διαμείνεις), our Lord meaning to say that 'the one is as lasting (even ever-lasting) as the other is transient.' The term βρώσιν is employed with a view to a deep spiritual truth, adverting to that heavenly food, a saving knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, which is to the soul what wholesome food is to the body. So Euthym. (after Chrys.) understands it of faith in Christ.—Ἀπολλ. denotes what terminates merely in animal life.—Μένουσας means, by a metaphor familiar to the Jews, 'what has a permanent benefit in the strengthening and refreshing of the soul, and the supply of its spiritual wants;' and of which the effect shall not, as in the other case, be temporary, but everduring, and productive of everlasting life,' i. e. salvation.

—Ἐσφράγισεν] The full sense is: 'hath sealed and doth seal, attest to be the Messiah,' viz. both by solemn declaration at the baptism of Jesus (according to what is recorded), Matt. iii. 17, and xvii. 5, οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ Υἱὸς μου—αὐτοῦ ἀκούετε (where the αὐτοῦ is employed as the ουτοῦ here), and by giving him power from on high. On this 'sealing,' see more in Cyrill. ap. Caten., and especially in Chrys., or Euthym.

28. τί ποιούμεν, ἵνα ἐργαζώμεθα, &c.] The people here, as a little after, v. 30, take up the term ἐργαζ. employed by our Lord, and put this question, how they may so work the works of God (meaning the works that God requires, and which are well-pleasing to him. See Jer. xlviii. 10, compared with 1 Cor. xv. 58) as to obtain that heavenly food. To this the answer at v. 29 is, that faith in him as the Anointed and the sealed of the Father, even God, as fully attested (see on John iii. 33) at his baptism; and since, by his miracles, is the one great work (see James i. 25) which God requires at their hands; meaning that the best way of working the work of God is to believe in him whom God hath sent; thus simply presenting the elements of that doc-

τοῦ Θεοῦ; ²⁹ h Ἀπεκρίθη ὁ Ἰησοῦς καὶ εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ ἔργον τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἵνα πιστεύσητε εἰς ὃν ἀπέστειλεν ἐκεῖνος. ³⁰ i Εἶπον οὖν αὐτῷ· Τί οὖν ποιεῖς σὺ σημεῖον, ἵνα ἴδωμεν καὶ πιστεύσωμέν σοι; τί ἐργάζῃ; ³¹ k Οἱ πατέρες ἡμῶν τὸ μάννα ἔφαγον ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, καθὼς ἐστι γεγραμμένον Ἄρτον ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς φαγεῖν. ³² Εἶπεν οὖν αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν Οὐ Μωϋσῆς δέδωκεν ὑμῖν τὸν ἄρτον ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ· ἀλλ' ὁ Πατήρ μου δίδωσιν ὑμῖν τὸν ἄρτον ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ τὸν ἀληθινόν. ³³ Ὁ γὰρ ἄρτος τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐστὶν ὁ καταβαίνων ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, καὶ ζῶν διδοὺς τῷ κόσμῳ. ³⁴ Εἶπον οὖν πρὸς αὐτόν· Κύριε, πάντοτε δὸς ἡμῖν τὸν ἄρτον τούτου. ³⁵ l εἶπε δὲ αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Ἐγὼ εἰμὶ ὁ ἄρτος trine afterwards so fully carried out by St. Paul, that all eternal life in men proceeds from nothing else but faith in Christ.

³¹ τὸ μάννα] Render: 'the manna.' The recent Commentators here enlarge much in describing the common manna, which, in the East, still bedews the ground by night, and is collected in the morning, and made into a kind of cake. The identity, however, of this with the manna of the Israelites is rather taken for granted than proved. There are indeed so many material diversities between the two (pointed out by Le Clerc, Deyling, in his Obs. S. iii. 7, Dr. Graves, and others), as completely to establish the miraculous nature of the transaction, at least to the satisfaction of those who admit the credibility of the Mosaic account.

³² οὐ Μωϋσῆς δέδωκεν, &c.] The purpose of our Lord seems to be, not so much to deny that Moses fed their fathers with bread in the wilderness, as to represent God as the real giver, and Moses only as the instrument; and still more to state that he only gave them bread to sustain the body, not what might be called the bread, even the true bread from heaven, to feed and sustain the soul, which the Father giveth them in "Him who cometh down from heaven," even Christ. See v. 33. Our Lord, then, means to say, that there is as much difference between the food supplied by Moses and that which his Father would bestow by him (even the bread, the true bread), as between the body and the soul, between temporal and eternal life, earth and heaven. It is probable that our Lord would not have introduced this mention of Moses, but that he knew Moses was in their minds, and a comparison of himself with Moses was there going on;—espec. considering that the manna was commonly, though erroneously, regarded as a miracle of Moses; which error our Lord thought fit to refute. In the clause ἀλλ' ὁ Πατήρ there is a sensus pragmaticus, by a blending of two clauses into one; q. d. 'but my Father gave them that bread from heaven [by Moses], as he is now giving the true bread from heaven to you [by me].'

—ὁ καταβαίνων ἐκ τοῦ οὐρ.] scil. ὁ ἄρτος, 'the bread which cometh down,' not as it is rendered in E. V., 'he which cometh down;' for, as Bp. Lonsdale observes, "it is clear from v. 34 that the Jews did not yet understand Jesus to speak of himself as being the bread which came down from heaven; nor is it till v. 35 that he unfolds this truth to them in the express words, 'I am the bread of life.'"

³⁴ αἶνον] The persons who now speak seem not to be the same as those (supposed to be of the higher class) who had demanded a sign, but some of the common people, who ignorantly supposed that he was speaking of corporeal bread, such as Moses had procured from heaven for their forefathers. In like manner the Samaritan woman said, iv. 15, Κύριε, δός μοι τούτου τὸ ὕδωρ.

³⁵ To render his meaning yet clearer, Christ expressly says, 'I am the bread of life;' adding, that whosoever believeth on him shall never hunger or thirst. He reproves them for their unbelief, and declares that every one whom his Father had given to him would come to him and be received by him; that he had come down from heaven not to do his own will, but the will of Him that sent him; whose will it was that he should lose no one whom the Father had given him, but raise him up at the last day; in short, that every one who should believe in the Son should have eternal life. Thus, as Bp. Turton observes (p. 67 of his Doctrine of the Eucharist), 'the important truths primarily intended to be inculcated were these; that to hear and believe were the great requisites on the part of men; and that spiritual sustenance, even unto life eternal, would be the correspondent gift on the part of God.' And thus, as far at least as the 51st verse, this discourse may be considered as an amplification, by means of a constant allusion to the bread of life, of what Christ had taught on another occasion, John v. 24.

— ἰγὼ εἰμι ὁ ἄρτος, &c.] Similarly it is said, Ecclus. xxiv. 21, οἱ ἐσθιοντές με (scil. τὴν σοφίαν) καὶ οὐ πινόντές με, &c.

³⁶ Ἄλλ' εἶπον· πιστεύετε.] Of this briefly-worded, and therefore obscure, passage, the full meaning may be expressed as follows: 'But as I have already told you [and now tell you again], ye have seen me [and my works] (including miracles) [and known my doctrines], and yet ye believe not on me.'

³⁷ Here we have not only a doctrine propounded, but, by implication, an inference to be deduced from the declaration in the preceding verse. And our Lord proceeds to show that although they did not believe on him, yet his work would not be in vain, for others would come to him and be saved.

— πᾶν δὲ δίδωσί μοι—ἥξει.] The sense of this verse, and its connexion with vv. 36 and 38, are well stated by Bp. Lonsdale as follows: "But, though ye believe not, I shall not want believing disciples; for there are those whom the Father giveth to me; and all such shall come to me, believing me to be the bread of life; and him that [so] cometh unto me from my Father I will by no means reject; for I came, &c. From vv. 44, 45, we learn that they who are thus given by the Father to Christ to be his are peculiar people (comp. v. 39. x. 29. xvii. 2—24. xviii. 9), are such as are drawn to Christ by hearing and learning what the Father teaches." The neut. gender, at πᾶν δ, is put for the mascul., with allusion to believers in Christ, considered as a body forming Christ's holy Catholic Church. It should, however, seem that our Lord first speaks of the number of those given to him collectively, and then individually. And, when taken in conjunction with πᾶν there may be (as some Commentators suppose) an allusion to the calling of the Gentiles; for they, too, according to the ancient promise, Pa. ii. 8, were to be given to Christ. This is confirmed by what is added at the parallel passage, vv. 45, 46, where it is said that the prophecy is καὶ ἰσχυρὰ πάντες διδάκτοί τοῦ Θεοῦ.

In what sense the Father is here said to give men to Christ has been differently understood by those of different religious opinions. Calvinistic

Expositors, as may be imagined, take it to mean being chosen of the Father to eternal salvation by an absolute decree. But to this view see the unanswerable objections of Grotius, Hammond, Whitby, and Mackn.; as also of Chrysostom, who ascribes the dogma to the Manicheans. The term (here and at vv. 39, 65) must surely signify something compatible with the free agency of man. And here our Lord has himself determined its meaning by the expression that is substituted for it in the parallel passage at v. 44, which is explanatory of the present. To give men to Christ is evidently equivalent to draw them to Christ; and how irreconcilable that is with the compulsion implied in the Calvinistic interpretation of giving, is obvious. For ἰλκυῖν (as has been proved by Tittman) like the Heb. וַיִּצָּר denotes 'a power not compulsory, but strongly suasory,' meaning, 'to draw (not drag) any one'; i. e. 'to sway the understanding, or incline the will, by all moral means and fit motives, as propounded in the Revelation of his will in the Holy Scriptures': see John xii. 32. Phil. ii. 13, 14, and the note. However, the above is by no means the whole of what is meant in these words, since both terms undoubtedly point to a most important doctrine—that of the preventing grace of God by his Holy Spirit, indispensably necessary to any one's being given to Christ by God; also the necessity for the co-operating grace of that Spirit after we have been brought to Christ by his preventing grace, proving the truth of what is said in our Xth Article, that 'we have no power to do works pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will'; see Phil. ii. 12, 13. Thus δίδωσι adverts to the thing itself; and ἰλκ. suggests the means by which it is accomplished. At the same time, we know from other parts of Scripture that these means are not irresistible: man may receive this grace of God in vain. And when men are thus lost, it is not for want of will in God, but for want of their own co-operation with Divine grace; ch. xviii. 9.

³⁹, ⁴⁰. It has been truly said, that 'in the declaration found in these verses is contained the key of the following discourse, vv. 44—59,' and that the end of the word of God is the glorification of man's restored and sanctified nature—body, soul, and spirit—in eternity. Without this salvation, restitution would be incomplete: the adoption cannot be consummated without the redemption of the body (Rom. viii. 18—23); and the glorification of the body, soul, and spirit cannot take place but by means of the glorified body of the Second Adam. It is plain from v. 39, that at ἀναστήσω, in v. 40, the ἵνα is to be repeated, though otherwise ἀναστ. might be the fut. indicat. as at v. 44; otherwise ἐγὼ would have been prefixed to ἀναστ., as it is there.—θεωρῶ. here is a much stronger and more significant term than ὁράω at v. 36. The latter denotes the mere seeing, beholding Jesus, hearing him speak as never man spake, and seeing him work miracles such as evidenced him to be the Messiah; the former denotes the so attentively viewing him with the stedfast gaze of faith (comp. Heb. vii. 4, θεωρεῖται δὲ πηλίκος οὗτος!), as to recognize him in that character; in short, the looking unto him in perfect faith (as the Israelites of old were directed to look at the brazen serpent), in 'firm faith, nothing doubting,' whereby alone they could be healed; which is the very requirement here adverted to; and θεωρῶ. in the one case answers to ἐπιβλέπω in the other.

40. We have here a plainer expression of the preceding sentiment, importing that every one who recognizes Jesus as the Son of God, and believes in him as such, shall be both raised from the dead, and blessed with everlasting happiness.

— Here, instead of δι, many MSS., Versions, and Fathers have γάρ, which is edited by Griesb., Scholz., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. I can add the authority of one Lamb. and not a few Mus. copies, with Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. It may be the true reading; but it is more probably a Critical alteration.

41, 42. At this period of the discourse the Jews murmured at Christ's declaration that he was the bread of life which came down from heaven, deeming it irreconcilable with his well-known earthly descent. By οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι are here meant, as often elsewhere in this Gospel (see my note on i. 19. ii. 18, 20), the principal persons among the hearers. Thus the hearers are the same, but the speakers different from those before.

43. Our Lord here forbears to answer their objection, because it was not his present purpose to disclose aught of those mysteries, which the answer must have drawn forth prematurely. Hence at v. 44, he goes on to reply to their cavils by simply repeating 'his former assertion, in even stronger terms,—that no one could come unto him unless he were drawn of the Father, and that every one who believeth on him shall have everlasting life.'

44. οὐδεὶς δύναται ἐλθεῖν—ἐλκύσῃ αὐτόν] By ἐλκ. here must be understood the leading of the individual to believe through a secret influence on him. Now this influence is by most recent Commentators supposed to consist in the force of strong moral inducements on the mind. Yet very far more, I would say, is intended; considering that God not only inclines the understanding to acknowledge the truth of the Gospel by the miraculous evidences of Jesus being the Christ, but inclines the will to embrace and obey the Gospel, not only by the supply of all fit moral motives to obedience, in the rewards and punishments of a future state, but by the secret and powerful influences of the Holy Spirit, to be sought for in earnest prayer and entire reliance on the promise of the Father, that the will shall be influenced and the heart inclined through the prayer of faith.—'Turn thou me, and I shall be turned;' = 'turn me by thy preventing grace, and I shall be effectually turned and renewed in the spirit of my mind!' See Jer. xxxi. 18. Ps lxxxvi. 3; and comp. Phil. ii. 13, ὁ Θεὸς γὰρ ὁ ἐνεργῶν ὑμῖν καὶ τὸ θέλει καὶ τὸ ἐνεργεῖν. It is observable, however, that the doctrine in the passage of the Apostle Paul, is qualified by the words which went before. See my note there. And as there can be no real diversity in Scripture doctrine, no reason is there to suppose the drawing, of which we here read, to be, what the upholders of a system maintain,—that of grace irresistible; which is more than belongs to the idea of drawing; and, indeed, even Augustin did not recognize that doctrine here, any more than in the above passage of Phil. ii. 13, where there is at v. 12 the same qualification. In my note there I have shown that even Augustin and Calvin admit that the doctrine of irresistible grace is not there to be found. In fact, neither passage is, as Calvin says, 'a fit engine wherewith to batter down the doctrine of free will in man.' That St. Augustin did not attempt to do so is clear from his Tractatus on this passage, in which, inter alia, he says, 'Credere non potest, nisi volens.' It is observable that the idea of the Divine influence acting powerfully on the soul of man, is one which may be recognized even in the writings of the heathen philosophers. Thus Plato in his Ion says, 'Ὁ δὲ Θεὸς διὰ πάντων ἔσχατῇ ἡμέρᾳ. ⁴⁵ Ἔστι γεγραμμένον ἐν τοῖς προφήταις· Καὶ ἔσονται πάντες διδασκοὶ [τοῦ] Θεοῦ. Πᾶς [οὖν] ὁ τούτων (i. e. throughout all these persons, prophets, seers, bards, &c.) ἔλκει τὴν ψυχὴν, ὅποιον ἀνβούληται, τῶν ἀνθρώπων.

45. Here, in order more strongly to impress on their minds these truths, our Lord refers to the testimony of Scripture (Is. liv. 13) on the necessity of this teaching from above; intimating that this Scripture is now, in their own case, likely to be fulfilled by their rejection of him as the Christ.

45, 46. The connexion and sense of these two verses is well expressed by Bp. Lonsdale thus: 'And this that I have said, of the impossibility of a man's coming to me with faith, "except the Father draw him," is the fulfilment of what the Prophets foretold, when they described the covenant of the Gospel as one under which "all should be taught of God." Every man, therefore, who now hears the Father's teaching, and is willing to learn of it, is drawn by my Father, and so cometh, as a true believer, unto me. Not, indeed, that any man can see the Father teaching him; for no one hath seen the Father, save He who is come from God, even the Son; he hath indeed seen the Father.' The words of the latter verse are said by way of anticipating a possible objection; q. d. 'not that by this teaching of the Father I mean complete and immediate instruction; that pertaineth to Him alone who came down from heaven, who was sent from the Father, or who hath been with him, and therefore knoweth the Father and his will, as no one can do but he alone; see supra i. 18, and note. But, to advert to an admitted difficulty connected with the former verse, as regards the words ἔστι γεγραμμένον ἐν τοῖς προφήταις, which would seem to mean, not that the sense is found in several parts of the prophets (as Is. liv. 13. Jer. xxxi. 34. Micah iv. 1), as Grot. and Surenus. maintain;—for the words are those specifically of one passage,—namely, that of Is.; and in the others there is only a community by affinity of sense. There can be no doubt that one passage only is here meant; and the use of the plural may be accounted for either (as it is by Beza, Schmid, Lampe, Hoffm., and myself in Gr. Test.) by supposing that by 'the prophets' we are to understand 'the Book of the Prophets' (Acts xv. 15) as distinguished from the Law, and the Hagiography; or, with Erasmus, De Dieu, Drus., Gataker, and others, that this is, as in Acts xiii. 40, a general form of citation, by which under the term many is espec. meant 'one of the many.' It is difficult to award the preference; but I see not why both views may not be admitted; for the Evangelist, while speaking generically of the words as found in the Prophets of Holy Writ (see my note on Matt. ii. 20), may have had an eye espec. on one passage,—that of Isaiah,—though without regular quotation. And the same applies with greater force to Acts xiii. 40; for the words of St. Luke are a direct quotation from Habak. The absence of the τοῦ here from several of the best MSS. (to which I add all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17), is confirmed by the reading in the Sept., and by 1 Cor. ii. 13, λόγοις διδασκοῖς Πνεύματος ἁγίου, where the Genit. is one of efficient cause (as in Matt. xxv. 34, and Soph. El. 343, νοουτήματα κελύε διδασκὰ), and thus stands for διδασκοὶ ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ. However, though the Evangelist had this passage in mind, he probably did not intend more than an application of the words to his present purpose; and accordingly ἔστι γεγραμ. must be taken in a lar sense, though quite sufficient for the present purpose, which is,—to show the necessity of Divine teaching, and that to all, as being offered to all, the sons of God, and consequently true disciples of Christ. Thus in the Sept. we have καὶ πάντας τοὺς υἱοὺς σου διδάσκεις Θεοῦ, where supply ἦσαν from the foregoing verse; just as here υἱοὶ Θεοῦ seems implied in the context. By πάντας in the Sept. and N. T. we must, as Hoffm. remarks, understand all and each, not of the Jews only, but of the Gentiles also, considered as sons of the Spiritual Jerusalem, i. e. the Church of the New Covenant; as plainly appears by comparing what Isaiah says with the words of St. Paul, Gal. iv. 26, 27. Moreover, the words here used have a reference to the Divine teaching by the Holy Spirit sent from the Father (see John xvi. 13, compared with 1 Cor. ii. 13); whereas those in the verse just before, εἰ μὴ ὁ Πατὴρ ἔλκωσιν αὐτόν, refer to the drawing by the same Holy Spirit, whereby the heart is touched and the affections swayed, i. e. strongly, though not irresistibly, influenced, the will consenting to the impulse on the heart. It must, however, be borne in mind, that by the Divine teaching is meant not merely the opening of the eyes of the mind by Divine teaching, but that opening of the heart, to receive and give heed to the Divine truths thus taught,—which has so striking an exemplification in what is recorded at Acts xvi. 14, ἥς (i. e. Lydia) ὁ Κύριος διήνοιξε τὴν καρδίαν. This opening of the heart answers to the turning of the heart spoken of by the prophet, and forms an important link in the great and glorious chain of conversion, between the primary drawing of the Father and that last and happy stage when, the will having previously consented to the Divine drawing, the man cometh unto Christ, and believeth on him to the saving of the soul.

46. οὐχ ὅτι τὸν Πατέρα] This is said by way of explanation, to prevent being misunderstood, and thereby objected to, as if what he had said implied personal communication from the Father to each man; q. d. 'not that by this teaching of the Father I mean complete and immediate instruction from the Father direct; that pertaineth to Him alone who came down from heaven, who was sent from the Father, or who hath been with him, and therefore knoweth the Father and his will, as no one can do but he alone;' see supra i. 18, and note.

47. Here our Lord repeats yet more emphatically his former declaration on the blessed effect of belief in him,—namely, eternal life. The mention of which leads him, in the next verse, to repeat the emphatic declaration, that he is that bread of life. And this again leads him, at vv. 49, 50, to a comparison of its enduring efficacy with the transient effects of the manna, which the Jews had eaten in the wilderness.

48. ἐγὼ—[ζωῆς] ‘I am the bread of life.’ Our Lord here resumes the subject on which he had spoken supra 32—35, and continues his discourse upon it to v. 52.

49. οἱ πατέρες ὑμῶν, &c.] Meaning, ‘Your forefathers ate the manna in the wilderness, and [afterwards] died; that is the bread [of life] which descendeth from heaven, in order that if any one eat thereof, he may not die eternally, but live for ever.’ By ἐξ αὐτοῦ φάγῃ is meant, ‘avail himself of that doctrine,’ by coming unto Jesus in faith. On ἀποθ., as used in the natural and spiritual sense, compare νεκρός similarly employed, Matt. viii. 22, where see note.

51. Here our Lord declares, in literal expressions, what he had in the preceding verse couched in figurative ones, all figure being dropped, and the reality introduced; as he had before called himself the bread of life, as being the Author and Giver of that spiritual nourishment, which preserves the soul unto everlasting life, so here he terms himself ‘the life-giving’ (ζῶν being for ζωοποιῶν) bread, as containing life in itself, as giving his life for the life of the world, ὑπὲρ being for ἀντὶ, ‘instead of,’ = ‘on behalf of,’ i. e. to obtain that life and salvation for it,—namely, by his death and passion; in which it is implied, that there can be no salvation to any one but through the merits of his death. Thus the sense is, ‘which I will give as a propitiatory sacrifice on behalf of the world, so that eternal life may be given to mankind,’—a sense of ὑπὲρ frequent in St. John. See my Lex.

Here it is a much disputed point whether in this eating of Christ’s flesh there is, or is not, a reference to the Eucharist. The former view was maintained by most of the ancients, as it has been by many modern Interpreters, espec. those of the Romish Church; while the latter has been adopted by not a few of the most eminent Expositors, both ancient and modern, as Tertul., Clem. Alex., Origen, Basil, August., Zwingle, Luther, Melancth., Calv., Grotius, Whitby, Wolf, Lampe, Pearce, Newcome, Tittman, and Kuinoel, who maintain that the context will not permit us to take the words of the Eucharist. Yet, though they successfully show that by ‘eating the flesh and drinking the blood’ of Christ must here be meant,—securing to ourselves the benefits of the sacrifice of Christ by a true and lively faith (and I agree with Mr. Alford, that nothing short of Christ’s death can here be meant,—that death whereby he gave his flesh for the life of the world); yet it will not follow that there may not be a reference, at least by anticipative allusion, to the Ordinance of the Lord’s Supper, as some eminent Expositors maintain, and Bp. Turton (against Wiseman) admits. But I pause; and for my own part I am ready to agree with Stier, Olsh., Tholuck, and Alf., that to the Ordinance itself there is here no reference; and I am disposed to think, with them, that the spiritual verity connected with the august idea of the Ordinance,—‘the Lamb slain’—and which underlies it,—is one and the same with that here insisted on.

53. ἐάν μὴ φάγητε, &c.] Our Lord, seeing that those whom he addressed, by taking his words in a literal sense, either mistook or misrepresented his meaning, now repeats with stronger asseveration what he had before said. At the same time he expresses himself so particularly, as to show that, by eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ, he means eating and drinking in a figurative and spiritual manner; where the expressions signify ‘to apply to ourselves the sacrifice of his death, by coming unto him in faith, and thus participating by faith in the benefits procured by that sacrifice.’

55. ἀληθῶς ἐστὶ βρώσις—ἐστὶ πόσις] ‘is truly food and drink,’ as nourishing and reviving the soul, imparting not corporeal, but spiritual life, and that eternal.—For ἀληθῶς, the MSS.

B, C, F, K, L, T, and some 8 cursives (to which I add 4 Lamb. and Mus. copies), with some late Versions, and Origen, have ἀληθῆς, which is adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. most uncritically,—since it is evidently, as Matth. shows, a false correction by those who thought (as the Translators) that it made the sense plainer; unaware that by so doing they paved the way to such an interpretation as that promulgated by Alf., 'my flesh is TRUE meat,' i. e. 'REALLY to be eaten,'—a sense harsh and yet jejune, and opposed to the context. As to the depth of the adjective, for which it is commended by Alf., it exists only in his own imagination. The reading of all the copies except a comparatively very few, is confirmed by the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., Pers., and Æthiop. Versions. The origin of the adjunct is plain, from its being found in the explanations of Euthym. and Apollinarius.

^{56.} ἐν ἐμοὶ—αὐτῷ i. e. 'is made one with me, as I with him;' thus expressing connexion the most intimate, by a spiritual union, which is best evinced on the part of believers by faith, love, and obedience, by which they dwell in him, and he in them, by his Spirit given to sanctify them.

^{57.} καθὼς ἀπέστειλέ με ὁ ζῶν Πατήρ] The sense is, 'as the Father liveth who sent.' The force of the antithesis is in ζῶν, not in ἀπέστειλε, and the full meaning intended is: 'I have life in myself, and have power to give life, because the Father [who dwelleth in me, and I in him] hath life in himself, and hath power to give life.' The kai corresponds to καθὼς, 'and so.'

—καὶ ἐκεῖνος ζήσεται δι' ἐμέ i. e. 'he shall live spiritually and eternally, by virtue of that union which he has with me; even as I live by that union which I have with the living Father, who hath sent me.' Comp. 51.

^{58.} To prevent all further misapprehension of his meaning, our Lord concludes this part of his discourse by inculcating the same truth that he had before done at vv. 35, 48, 51,—namely, that of which he had spoken as 'coming down from heaven,' and 'his flesh which he would give for the life of the world,' were one and the same; and he subjoins the same solemn assurance as at vv. 47, 51.

^{60—65.} Murmuring of some of the disciples on occasion of the above; and Jesus' answer to them, wherein they stumbled in mind; in a discourse not in the synagogue, but in some private place. In this address our Lord condescends to remove the two great stumbling-blocks, which even the well-disposed, notwithstanding his explanations and assurances, still found; namely, 1. that He had said He had come down from heaven, ver. 42; and 2. that He was the bread of life, and should give his flesh for the life of the world. In removing the first of these (ver. 62) our Lord employs a most energetic form of expression, involving a kind of ellipsis, by aposiopesis, suitable to deep emotion, τί ἐρεῖτε being left to be supplied; q. d. (with reference to vv. 41, 42) 'Ye murmured because I said that I was the bread which came down from heaven; ye could not reconcile this with my earthly descent. Will ye still retain your doubts, when ye see me ascending unto heaven where I was before?'

^{60.} σκληρός] Some explain this, 'hard to be understood' (and so Stobæus, ἀπηνής οὗτος ὁ λόγος, kai σκληρός); others, 'harsh and offensive,' which is preferable, but requires to be drawn further out, meaning, what shocks the ear by reason of its daring boldness, bordering on profanity. That this is the true sense appears from the context, both in its antecedents and consequents, as is well remarked by Lampe, who ably brings out what especially made Jesus' auditors revolt at his words, namely, 'because they stumbled at the seemingly presumptuous impiety of both claiming a Divine origin (v. 41) and attributing to himself a Divine work, namely, the giving of food of an infinitely higher kind than that bestowed by Moses on the Israelites (comp. vv. 31, 52), even the bread, the true bread, from heaven; nay, that he was Himself the true bread, the bread of God.' Lampe has, however, and also Stier, who adopts this view, neglected to fortify this sense by examples, though they are not very rare. There is nearly, if not quite the same sense in Jude 15, περὶ σκληρῶν—ὧν ἐλάλησαν, where there is an allusion to the blasphemia before mentioned vv. 9, 10, where Laermann well observes, 'ejus morte enim intelligit homines impíos, qui dicendo et agendo ea quæ Deo propria erant sibi attribuerunt, blasphemούντες.' A still stronger proof is found in the use of the Hebr. רע in Ps. xciv. 4, 'How long shall the wicked utter (pour forth) hard [rather 'harsh'] things,' lit. 'impious speeches?' as the Syr. took it. Nor is this idiom quite unexampled in the Class. writers, e. gr. Plato, p. 230, τῶν περὶ ἑαυτοῦς μεγάλων καὶ σκληρῶν δοξῶν ἀπαλλάττονται. How this sense of σκληρός is in sensu proprio et physico used of whatever (as thunder, Hdut. viii. 12) brings with it sounds which painfully press upon,—shock, the ear. That it should have shocked his auditors is not strange, if we consider that Christ used such language of himself as no prophet had ever done, and took higher ground than even Moses had ever ventured to do; which must have made what he said at once unacceptable to some, and, from its touching on the most mysterious and experimental parts of religion, little intelligible to others.

62. What is here said has reference to the objection, v. 42. On the indirect and hypothetical mode of expression here adopted, Turton has the following able remarks: 'Our Lord, as in the instance before us, generally spoke with great reserve of his death, resurrection, and ascension; and we may here remark that indirect method of expression—the Son of Man—by which he frequently designated himself, when touching upon these subjects. A remarkable proof of the reserve here mentioned is afforded by St. Mark (ix. 9, 10) in connexion with his account of the transfiguration. Here we find even the three favoured disciples completely at a loss when they heard our Lord speaking of the Son of Man rising from the dead. The connexion between the descent from heaven as treated of in the discourse, and the ascent as intimated in v. 62, will be strongly confirmed by the passages adduced in the preceding section (pp. 143, 146) relating to our Lord's coming forth from the Father, and going again to the Father. Moreover, in the gradual development to his disciples of events so declaratory of his divine nature, we see how little the minds of people were prepared for such information, and are enabled to account for the hypothetical and indirect mode of expression adopted by our Lord in the 62nd verse.'

63. This verse refers, as Bp. Turton shows, to the objection at v. 52, seqq., and in it is removed the second stumbling-block above-mentioned.

—τὸ πνεῦμα] By this many understand the Holy Spirit; others, spiritual views, in contradistinction to the carnal ones of the Jews; or (as Bp. Middl. explains) the spiritual sense, as opposed to the literal one, as πνεῦμα is opposed to γράμμα at 2 Cor. iii. 6. The interpretation first mentioned seems excluded by the context and the scope of the passage; the second may be considered the true one, and has been ably maintained by Bp. Middleton, who assigns the following sense: 'But it is the spiritual part of religion which is of avail in opening the understanding; the mere letter is nothing: my words, however, are the spirit and the life of all, which ye have hitherto known only in the literal and carnal sense.'

Upon the whole, then, the general meaning of the passage may be well represented, with Macknight and others, thus: 'Do ye revolt at this declaration, that my flesh is the bread which came down from heaven, and that you must eat my flesh and drink my blood in order to attain salvation? What if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend up into heaven corporeally where he was before? Surely this will convince you that I did really come down from heaven; and I never meant that you should eat my flesh after a corporeal and carnal manner. That would profit you nothing. In so speaking I intended not a literal sense. It is my words taken in a spiritual sense that are the life-giving food of your souls; whereas, in a carnal acceptation, they were unavailing. The life-giving power of my spirit it is that is imparted to my words, by which ye will be quickened and nourished unto life eternal.' So also Turton explains, illustrating the reference to v. 52, thus:—'Objection: 'How can this man give us his flesh to eat?' Observation: 'It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words which I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life. Here, then, 'the spirit, is opposed to 'the flesh.' Life—doubtless eternal life—is communicated by 'the spirit': in that respect 'the flesh' profiteth nothing. These declarations, then, referred, as I think they cannot but be, to the objection recorded in the 52nd verse, prove that whatever images might have been derived from the sustentation of the body, the real meaning was, that the spiritual life could only be given and maintained by the spirit of Christ.'

65. Here our Lord refers to what he had said at vv. 37, 44; and from a comparison of those verses with this, it is clear that by the Father's giving men is meant his drawing them to him by the strong moral motives propounded in his word, and by the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit. See the notes on those verses.

67. μὴ καὶ ὑμεῖς θέλατε ὑπάγειν;] Render: 'do ye too wish to be gone?' Of the words following, πρὸς τίνα ἀπελευσόμεθα, the full sense is: 'to whom should we go [but to Thee]; for

Thou [alone], &c. This is one of those cases treated on by Winer, Gr. § 41, Buttm., § 137, 138, and Matth., Gr. § 498, 6, also Jelf, § 406, 3; in which the future tense expresses, not simply a future action, but a supposed or possible case, such as might, could, or would have happened under certain circumstances. Accordingly, here it is meant to express, 'were we disposed to go away, to whom should or could we go, thou being alone he that hath the words,' &c. See v. 63.

68. Here Peter, with characteristic fervour, answers first, saying what was doubtless at the mouths of all the rest.

69. καὶ ἡμεῖς πεπιστεύκαμεν, &c.] 'we believe and assuredly know that thou art the Christ.' 'Belief (says Calvin) is here put first, because the obedience of faith is the beginning of right understanding. But knowing is subjoined, because it distinguishes faith from erroneous opinion.'

— τοῦ ζώντος] These words, not found in B, C, D, L, and some 6 cursives, to which I can add only 4 Mus., but no Lamb. MSS., the Copt., Sahid., Armen., Pers., Vulgate, and Italic Versions, some Fathers, and Nonnus and Cyril, are cancelled by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. The common reading, however, is not only supported by external evidence of the most decisive kind, but is also equally strong in internal, being far more appropriate, and coinciding with Peter's unequivocal confession of faith, Matt. xvi. 16; from which, however, Alf. says it was introduced here. But the presence of the words in all the copies, but a very few, and that confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version, forbids such an opinion, and renders the authenticity of the words highly probable. Instead of ὁ Υἱὸς, Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit, from 4 MSS., and a few Versions, ὁ ὄχιος. But that reading has been, very properly, rejected by Scholz; since, while external authority for it is infinitely less, internal evidence is altogether on the side of the common reading; the appellation ὄχιος τοῦ Θεοῦ, as used of our Lord, only occurring in the confession of the demoniacs, Mark i. 24. Luke iv. 34. He is, indeed, called ὄχιος πατρὸς Acts iv. 27, but not ὄχιος τοῦ Θεοῦ. Whereas the appellation Χριστός, ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, frequently occurs in the New Test., and especially in this Gospel, as i. 49. xi. 27. See more in Tittman, who proves that the appellations ὁ Χριστός and ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ were not synonymous, but that the former had reference to the office, the latter to the Divine nature of Christ.

70. οὐκ ἐγὼ—ἐξελεξάμην:] The interrogation terminates at ἐξελ., not at ἐστιν, the καὶ

being for καὶ ὅμως; q. d. 'Have I not chosen and appointed twelve of you as my legates [and confidants]; and yet one of you is a false accuser, or rather an adversary,—one disaffected to me.' See Acts xiii. 17. So διαβιβλῆσθαι πρὸς τινά, in the sense of 'being hostile to,' is used in the best Classical writers, as Thucyd. viii. 81, 83, 109, and Plato, p. 67. 'Devilish,' of Alf., is, as he admits, not objectionable. It is, indeed, harsh in the extreme, espec. by representing a Subst. by an Adject. If the interpretation I have last proposed should be thought, as it may, equally baseless with the rest, I would propose to take διάβολος for ὑπουργὸς διαβόλου, a ministering agent of the Devil, his helper,—a use of the word found in Lucian, Alex. c. 5, and Polyb. c. 5, 89, 3, ὑπουργοὶ τῶν οἰκοδόμων. Apoll. Rhod. i. 226, Ἄργος τε θιάς ὑπουργός Ἀθήνης (Minerva); and so Theodor., t. iii. 181, says that the Arians call Christ Θεοῦ ὑπουργόν, intending by that term a sort of 'under-helper,' lower in rank than συνεργόν. Judas will be called such, as being a sort of subaltern devil, to do his master's dirty work, thus being, as one would say, an imp of the devil. So Hooker says, 'Such we deny not to be the imps and limbs of Satan,' i. e. forming members of his body. So we say 'a limb of the Devil.' Judas might truly be called such, at least by anticipation; since in the hellish deed perpetrated by him only a few months afterwards, he must have acted under the immediate instigation and full guidance of the Devil. Thus interpreted, the remarkable expression before us may well be understood as intending that present entertaining of the Devil in his thoughts and future plans, and ready admission of his temptations, which led ere long to his full possession by the Evil one, which stamped him as an actual and complete ὑπουργὸς διαβόλου. The καὶ (and yet) points at the strangeness of the thing. For so small a number, out of a large one, and that chosen by Christ himself, might have been expected to be without any failing member.

VII. From hence to ch. x. 2, we have the narrative in detail of a first journey of our Lord, namely, to Jerusalem, at the Feast of Tabernacles, six months before his death and passion. This the Evangelist has recorded, as especially suited to the purpose of his Gospel, from the evidence it affords of our Lord's anxious endeavours to reclaim the Jews from their pernicious error, and convince them of the true, even august character of him whom they had thus blindly rejected. Accordingly, after briefly adverting to the circumstances which led to and accompanied the journey, including his conversation with his brethren thereon, the Evangelist proceeds to detail various discourses with, and addresses (some shorter and others longer) of our Lord to the Jews, at the festival in question.

1. περιπατεῖ [Versabatur, 'went about.' So Nonnus: ναίων μίμνε. This sense, also occurring at xi. 54, formed on the use of the Heb. ᾤן, 'sojourned up and down,' 'passed his time,' the term often signifies 'to live.'—Οὐκ ᾔθελεν, 'was not disposed, did not choose.'—μετὰ ταῦτα means 'after the events' recorded in chapters v. and vi.; for I consider this verse, with Alf., as merely carrying on the time from chapters v. and vi., and its contents as introductory to the account of Jesus not going up, at first, to the Feast.

2. σκηνοπηγία] This feast (on which see Deut. xvi. 13—17) was so called from the tents, booths or tabernacles, which on that occasion were erected in and about Jerusalem, and was designed to commemorate their dwelling in tents of green boughs and leaves for forty years, in the wilderness, and partly out of thanksgiving for the ingathering of the harvest. Neh. viii. 16—18. It is called by Josephus and Philo the greatest and holiest feast, and was one of the three feasts which every male among the Jews was obliged to attend.

3. οἱ μαθηταί] Supply ἐκεῖ, 'thy disciples there' [as well as here], namely, the disciples whom Jesus had made in the former part of his ministry. That they must have believed that he worked miracles is pretty certain, otherwise they could not take the low view of his being even a Prophet. However, they were undoubtedly actuated by worldly motives in the counsel which they gave him, looking solely to temporal advancement or aggrandizement from his public character; and, accordingly, finding that many disciples in Galilee had lately abandoned him, they were, it seems, vexed at what they thought his want of prudence and tact, in thus failing to push his fortunes at the most important scene of action; and, accordingly, though the language they used was unkind and unbrotherly, there was some honesty of purpose at the bottom, which induced them to counsel him to go to Judea at so public a season as the ensuing Feast, in order to confirm the attachment of his disciples, and endeavour to gather more by working fresh miracles. According to this view of their conduct, there is nothing which can well be thought staggering in their present conduct, though they were, as I have given good reasons to think they actually were, in a note on Matt. xii. 46, brothers of our Lord,—sons of Joseph and Mary.

4. οὐδεὶς γὰρ—παρρησία] The general sense here is pretty clear from the context; but to fix it down to some special and exact sense, and prove the existence thereof in the words,—hic labor, hoc opus est, inasmuch that there is in men such an innate desire of glory, that they constantly aim at publicity for their illustrious deeds. See Philo, p. 856, cited by Loesner. Many Expositors take the καὶ for ἀλλά; thus: 'No one doeth any thing considerable in secret, but is desirous of coming under the view of the public.' This, however, is straining the sense; and for the above signification of καὶ there is no authority. Preferable is the view adopted by the ancient Expositors and several eminent modern ones (as Grot., Lampe, Rosenm., and Kain.), who, regarding the καὶ as, by Hebraism, put for ὅτι, and the αὐτὸς as redundant, suppose an inversion of order, thus: 'For no one, who desires to be famous, does great things in secret. Yet καὶ can never properly be said to be used for ὅτι. And thus to silence a word, as they are obliged to do αὐτὸς, is most unwarrantable; and scarcely less so this arbitrary inverting of the order. Nay, so far from the αὐτὸς being redundant, it rather seems emphatic, and ought to be construed with the καὶ, which may be taken in the usual sense. Render: 'No one doeth any thing great, aught [of consequence] in secret, who himself desireth to be in publicity and notoriety;' meaning, that the man who doeth great things in secret cannot bring himself to desire to be in publicity (lit. is propalato); in which sense the expression occurs infra v. 13, and xi. 54, signif. 'in publicity,' meaning to say, 'that a truly great man seeks not public notoriety,' rejects the 'dicier, Hic est;' but cultivates the principle of action involved in philosophy, the λαθε βίωσον. Such language, involving as it does pungency of sarcasm (as if imputing to Jesus an affectation of humility,—concealing pride and vanity in thus playing the great man in privacy), arose, it should seem, from their extreme vexation at finding their great Brother thus standing in the way of his own advancement, and their aggrandizement.

5. οὐδὲ γὰρ—αὐτῷ] This is closely connected with the preceding, and, since it must mean 'for not even his brothers believed in him,' strongly confirms that they were literally his brothers. But οὐδὲ ἰστίον, does not denote absolute unbelief in his Messiahship, but imperfect belief; see note supra v. 1.

6. ὁ καιρὸς ὁ ἐμὸς] Not meaning 'the time of his passion and death,' as some understand, but the time of his going up to the feast at Jerusalem, and manifesting himself publicly; see

v. 8. Of the words ὁ καιρ.—πᾶριστ. the sense is, 'My time [for going up to the Feast] is not yet at hand.' Of the next words, ὁ καιρὸς—ἔτοιμος, the sense is; 'Any time and manner will be suitable for you to go there: you have nothing to fear.' The reason is intimated in ver. 8, where the natural form of expression (here changed into a gnome generalis) would be, 'I cannot go thus publicly, because I have to encounter the hatred of a world, whose ways and works I have reprov'd; but they have no such reason to hate you.' The reason why our Lord did not go at first was, we may suppose, in order to avoid the concourse of travellers, with which the roads would then be thronged, and who might notify his approach. And his intention being (as is indicated by the words following, ἀλλὰ ὡς ἐν κρυπτῷ) to go as privately as was possible for one so celebrated, he chose to go at a time when there would be fewest persons on the road, and not in a regular caravan; and therefore, it is probable, he set off on the first day of the Feast, and, travelling by the by-roads and short cuts, reached Jerusalem in the evening of the third day; thus not making his appearance till the middle of the Feast, which lasted eight days. But to advert to a matter of criticism:—on maturely considering the disputed reading here I find reason to alter my former decision, and consider οὐκ as probably, though not certainly, the true reading. Though it is found in only a few MSS. (D, K, M, 1733, 389, Scriv. p, and 5 MSS. of Matthæi), yet it is supported by the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., Copt., Arab., Æthiop., and Pers. Versions, and several Fathers (Chrys., Cyrill., Epiph., August., Cypr.). And that it was the reading in several copies in the time of Jerome is certain, since in the Second Book of his Tract. cont. Pelag., he acknowledges that to be the case. And (as observes Grot.) if οὐκ had been, in the time of Porphyry, the reading of the copies generally, he would not surely have accused Christ of falsehood or inconsistency. 'Nam in voce οὐκ (as Mill observes) fuisse nodi solutio; quem ut evaderent alii οὐκ scripserunt, alii οὐκ ἀναβαίνω νῦν, alii rursus eleverunt ταύτην [alii ἰγὼ—ταύτην], quibus omnibus nihil opus.' So also Wetstein. Thus internal evidence, and the authority of almost all the ancient Versions, come in aid of the deficiency in external authority. The reading has been received into the text by Bengel, Griesb. (not Matth.), Tittman, Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. The οὐκ arose either from the fore-mentioned cause, or rather it may have arisen from those who thought πω necessary, though it might be implied, as in the use of οὐκ in Sept. Gen. ii. 5. Ezek. v. 8. Ezra iii. 6. καὶ ὁ οἶκος τοῦ Κυρίου οὐκ ἐθεμελιώθη, 'had not [yet],' 'had not at present its foundations laid.' So in John v. 17, οὐκ ἐληλύθει, for which Lachm. edits, from B, D, L, and a few other MSS., οὐπω, though against the weight of external authority, and of internal evidence; the ancient Critics and the modern being alike unaware of the implied force in question. The same error has been committed at Mark xi. 2, ἐφ' ὃν οὐδεὶς ἀνθρ. κατέβη, where Lachm. introduces οὐπω, from a few uncial and some cursive MSS., which may seem confirmed by Luke xxiii. 53; but the phraseology of Mark and of Luke widely differ; and οὐπω was doubtless derived from Luke. On the other hand οὐκ for οὐπω has been, with some reason, adopted by Fritz., Lach., Tisch., and Alf. at Matt. xv. 17, from B, D, Z, and a few ancient cursive MSS., confirmed by nearly all the ancient Versions, whose testimony is, in such a case, as strong as possible. However, οὐπω may be the true reading, and οὐ have been introduced from the parallel passage of Mark vii. 18; though there some ancient MSS. read, as might be expected, οὐκ, probably from a Scholiast. In Mark iv. 40, for πῶς οὐκ, Lachm. edits οὐκ, from B, D, L, Δ, and 9 cursive MSS.; but, as I have there shown, wrongly. In Mark viii. 21, for πῶς οὐ συνίστα, Lachm. edits πῶς οὐκ, from A, D, M, U, X, and several cursive MSS. Tisch. οὐκ without πῶς, from L, Δ, and 8 others, each, as must now be evident to my readers, wrongly. Yet οὐκ may be thought capable of this sense; and Euthym. positively writes οὐκ εἶπε οὐκ ἀναβαίνω, ἀλλ' οὐκ ἀναβαίνω, τοῦτίστιν, οὐ νῦν ἀναβαίνω, borrowing the remark probably from the very ancient Commentator (of the 3rd century) Ammonius, who, after reading οὐκ ἀναβ., remarks οὐκ εἶπε καθάπαξ οὐκ, ἀλλὰ νῦν, where the words οὐκ ἀναβαίνω have slipped out of the context, and are to be restored from Euthym. It may be true, that the sense is nearly the same, which ever reading be adopted; yet internal evidence is quite in favour of οὐκ, in which I finally acquiesce, though I have retained the πω, but within brackets. Thus the words may be rendered, 'I am not going up,' i. e. 'not at present going up to the Feast.'

in which θοῦς is often used in Thucyd. and other writers; namely, 'the muttering or whispering of private discourse,' denoting secrecy and caution, and implying apprehension rather than resentment. See Calvin.

The δὲ, not found in many MSS., early Editions, and Fathers, has been cancelled by Matthæi, Griesb., and Scholz; perhaps rightly; internal evidence being strongly against it.

¹³ οὐδείς] i. e. of those who thought favourably of him.

— διὰ τὸν φόβον τῶν Ἰ.] 'through their fear of the Jews;' as xix. 38, and Jer. xxxv. 11. The Dative with a preposition would be more Classical Greek. So Thucyd. i. 26, δίαι τῶν Καρχαίων.

— ἀνέβη—ἐδίδασκε] Implying a publicity of teaching, which now occurred for the first time, and which accordingly might well excite the wonder of the Jews. The Gentile philosophers, too, were accustomed to deliver their instructions in the temples, on account of the sanctity of the place, and the number of persons continually resorting thither. So Philostr. Vit. Ap. v. 26, 27, καὶ παρελθὼν εἰς τὸ ἱερόν, ποι. ἔφη, &c.

¹⁵. γράμματα] 'litteras, learning.' Probably meaning that kind of learning which was alone cultivated in Judæa, namely, theological. Thus the dispute whether γράμματα here means divine, or human learning, becomes nugatory; for learning among the Jews implied nothing more than sacred literature, consisting of a competent acquaintance with the Scriptures, and a knowledge of Divinity in general. That γράμματα cannot of itself signify the Scriptures, is manifest; for such a sense, besides being unsuitable, would require the Article and the adjective ἱερά. Whereas γρ. in the sense of learning occurs in Acts xxvi. 24, and Isa. xxix. 12, οὐκ ἐπίσταμαι γράμματα, but Scriptural is here implied. Indeed, a knowledge of the Scriptures was no more than what was expected from the people at large. More was required from the learned, even the power to expound Scripture; and probably our Lord's teaching on this occasion consisted mainly in exposition of Scripture. So Sota, quoted by Lampe, 'Etai quis in Script. et Mischna versatus est, neque tamen sapientibus operam dedit, plebei est.'

— μὴ μεμαθηκώς] Meaning, 'not having become μαθητής under any regular Teacher;'

which they, it seems, thought indispensable to the acquirement of any real knowledge.

¹⁶. ἀπεκρ. ὢν] On again reconsidering the difficult question, as to the authenticity of the ὢν, admitted by all the Editors, from Griesb. downwards, I have been induced to receive it into the text. I have so done, because external authority is strongly in its favour; confirmed also, as that is, by all the Lamb. MSS. except one, nearly all the most ancient Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16 and 17. I have, however, expressed it in smaller character and within brackets, because internal authority is against it; it being more likely to have been inserted than expunged; and the Asyndeton (common in this Gospel, though generally removed by the ancient Critics in various ways) is not more harsh than usual. That Griesb. perceived this, is probable from his removing the word in his last edition. The absence of the word in the Pesh. Syr. and Vulg. Versions casts a great shade over its authenticity.

— ἡ ἐμὴ διδαχὴ—ἀλλὰ τοῦ πέμψαντός με] The general import of these words is plain; while the exact sense is not so clear but that some difference of opinion has arisen. To determine the sense, we must consider the context, the scope, and the literal import of the terms, especially those on which the sentiment hinges, διδαχὴ and οὐκ—ἀλλά. To advert to the scope, the words were intended to refute the notion of those who, regarding Jesus merely as αὐτομαθὴς and αὐτοδιδάκτος, accounted him (as it appears from the Rabbinical writers, the Jews generally did) utterly undeserving of attention—a mere pretender, and no prophet, much less the Messiah. To which our Lord replies, that his teaching is not his own, i. e. that he is not αὐτοδιδάκτος, but θεοδιδάκτος. This should seem to be the primary sense of the term διδαχὴ. Yet, under it is also couched another and a secondary one, serving to introduce the arguments which follow. Thus διδαχὴ is to be taken for what he teaches, his doctrine, or system of religious instruction. In this sense, too, our Lord declares that his doctrine, though not derived from their schools, is not therefore false,—since it was not devised or originated by himself, but came from the Source of all Truth—God (comp. xiv. 10. Gal. i. 1. Παῦλος ἀποστόλος οὐκ ἀνθρώπων, οὐδὲ δι' ἀνθρ., ἀλλὰ διὰ Ἰ. Χρ. καὶ Θεοῦ),—thus intimating that the doctrine he taught them was not of human origin, but a revelation from God, which he was commissioned to teach.

¹⁷. ἴάν τις θέλῃ, &c.] We have in this and the next verse two arguments in proof of the preceding position (namely, that his doctrine is

from God), and preclusive of the contrary objections. 1. internal, and deduced from the nature, qualities, and effects of the doctrine itself (v. 17); the other external,—namely, that, in what he is doing, he has in view, not his own honour, but that of God; as much as to say, 'He who is disposed to obey the will of God when revealed, however contrary it may be to his preconceived views or carnal affections, shall know,' &c. Τὸ θέλημα τοῦ Θεοῦ signifies 'what God would have us to do, both as to belief and practice'; and to do that will is to believe and act accordingly. Now 'the will of God,' says St. Paul, 'is our sanctification.' This conforming of our will implies the abandonment of all those prejudices and carnal affections, which obscure the judgment and enslave the will; otherwise what we wish to be false, we shall not readily believe to be true. A truth this not unknown to the Heathen Philosophers. So Aristot. Eth. vi. 12, lays it down as a maxim, that the mind's eye (τὸ δῦμα τῆς ψυχῆς) is not capable of rightly judging without moral virtue. And Hermes ap. Stob. Eccl. Phys. l. 2, p. 698, says very similarly: ὁ δὲ εὐσεβῶν εἰσεται καὶ ποῦ ἐστὶν ἡ ἀλήθεια, καὶ τίς ἵκλιν. Thus, then, unbelief is more the fault of the heart than the understanding. For (as observes Dr. South in a Sermon on this text) 'the Gospel has then only a free admission to the assent of the understanding, when it brings a passport from a rightly disposed will. If the heart be but well disposed, the natural goodness of any doctrine will be sufficient to vouch for the truth; for the suitability of it will endear it to the will, and thus it will slide into the assent also.' Then shall a man know from experience (γινώσκειται) that it is of God, by finding that this doing the will of God will promote his happiness here, and conduce to his salvation hereafter, when 'persuasion shall pass into knowledge, and knowledge into assurance; and all be at length completed in the beatific vision and full fruition of those joys which are at God's right hand for evermore.'

18. ὁ ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ—ζητεῖ Here our Lord furnishes another and external criterion from which to judge whether this doctrine be of God. 'The false teacher seeks the praise of men; but the true legate of God seeks the glory of God in the salvation of men.'

—ἀδικία] 'falsehood,' or 'imposture.' So in 2 Thess. ii. 10, 12, ἀδικία is similarly opposed to ἀλήθεια. See more in my Lex.

19. οὐ Μωϋσῆς—νόμον] There is thought to be here a change of subject, and the recent Commentators are in general of opinion that the words have reference to certain remarks (not recorded by the Evangelist) on the part of the rulers present, charging Jesus with violating the Sabbath, by healing on that day. But we may well suppose the reference, if such there be, made, not to any accusation then advanced, but to what had been, and still was occasionally brought forward by them. By τὸν νόμον some understand that part of the Law which enjoins the observance of the Sabbath. But it is better, with others (as Euthymius, Beza, Lampe, Calvin, and Tittman), to take it of the Law generally, of which the most important injunctions were violated, either in letter or spirit, by the Pharisees. Of this a signal example is then adduced by our Lord,—namely, that they are plotting his death; q. d. 'You do not even keep the Law of Moses; or why plot against my life, in violation of the sixth commandment?'

20. ἀπεκρίθη—καὶ εἶπε] The rejoinder of the multitude to the answer of our Lord charging them with a design to kill him, is, as Bp. Lond. observes, 'a kind of evasive answer, which is not unfrequently given by persons who have secret designs of evil in their hearts.' As to the imputation at δαιμόνιον ἔχεις, the expression is put, as at John x. 20, for the more Classical one κακοδαιμονίης; and is to be taken, in a popular sense, for 'You are out of your senses; various diseases, and espec. madness, being by the Jews ascribed to the agency of evil spirits. The words τίς σε ζητεῖ ἀποκτείνειν are, with reason, ascribed to the multitude at large, as opposed to the Priests and Pharisees, and espec. the strangers out of the country; who, as they had themselves no designs on his life, and were ignorant of the designs of the Rulers, might therefore naturally feel indignant at what they conceived a false accusation. Our Lord, however, notices not their unmerited reproach, nor removes their mistake, but proceeds to trace the malignity of the principal persons to its true origin,—namely, his healing the paralytic on the Sabbath day;—showing, however, that they had no reason to censure him on that account, and justifying his action on their own principles, and with reference to their own practice. But, to advert to the points of the reply in detail:—Our Lord, at v. 21, practically refutes this charge of madness, by speaking on the matter in question with the words of truth and soberness. He confirms his foregoing assertion by showing why they sought his death, and upon what irrational and unjust grounds they condemned him.

21. ἐν ἔργον ἐποίησα] 'one [illustrious] work I have done,'—namely, the recent miracle at the pool of Bethesda. Θαυμάζειν is here not to be taken in its ordinary sense, but, as at Mark vi. 6, and Gal. i. 6, of 'that kind of wonder which is nearly allied to a feeling of disapprobation.' An idiom also found in the Classical writers; on which see my note on Thucyd. vi. 36.

22. διὰ τοῦτο] This expression is by most Translators construed with the words following. But thus it seems to admit of no suitable sense, and therefore the best Expositors take it with the preceding, and render thereat; and, indeed, θαυμάζουσιν, in the sense here taken, is scarcely ever put absolutely, but is followed by some case. See my Lex. But the question is, whether διὰ τοῦτο really admits of no suitable sense when taken with the following context, which it would by the former construction be deprived of. Render: 'Moses, on this account, gave you the rite of circumcision (see Middl.); not because it is of Moses, but of the Fathers,—the patriarchs before him; being first enjoined by God to Abraham. Thus at οὐχ ὅτι—πατέρων, there is a qualification of the foregoing sense. The full sense of the next clause, καὶ ἐν σαββ. περιτ. ἀνθ. is, 'and accordingly ye circumcise a man-child, though on the Sabbath.' The reason given by the Jews for this was, that circumcision was an affirmative precept, the Sabbath a negative one; and that therefore the former vacated the latter.

23. εἰ περιτομὴν λαμβάνει, &c.] There is here an argumentum à minore ad majus, well traced by Bp. Lonsd. in paraphrase thus:—'If a man on the Sabbath-day receives circumcision, lest the law of Moses respecting circumcision should be broken by its being deferred beyond the eighth day; are ye angry with me because I have done upon a man a work not of the ceremonial law, but of mercy, making him altogether sound on the Sabbath-day?' thus intimating that the cure in question was far less at variance with the spirit of the Sabbatical institution than their own practice with respect to circumcision. Χολάτε; 'are ye angry?' lit. 'full of gall,—bitter anger?'—Ὅλον is by most taken as if it belonged to ὑγίη, and were put adverbially for καθόλου. But the best ancient and modern Expositors are agreed that it should be taken with ἄνθρωπον, 'the whole man,' as opposed to the part which was circumcised. Thus, too, arises a stronger sense, and yet one quite justified by facts; for in a violent paralysis, Hippocrates tells us, Ὅλος ἄνθρωπος νοῦσός ἐστι. And Aretæus says of a virulent chronic disorder, ὅλη τῶ ἀνθρώπῳ ἰνοικεῖ. In short, the general course of argument here pursued by our Lord seems to be, that 'if it be permitted for a man to receive circumcision on the Sabbath, in order that the law of Moses, which enjoins circumcision on the eighth day, be not broken,—surely they have no right to be angry with him who on the Sabbath-day performs a work which is, in one respect, so much better than circumcision, as being not the performance of a painful ceremonial observance on one part of the body, but the accomplishment of a work of mercy to, by making whole, the entire man.'

24. The force of the argument is, 'Do not condemn in me what you approve of in Moses;' if you allow a man to be circumcised on the Sabbath, because Moses ordered it, but do not allow him to be healed, when I do it, you judge κατ' ὄψιν, according to the person, and not according to justice. The sense of the expression κατ' ὄψιν has, indeed, been somewhat disputed. The ancient and most early modern Commentators regard it as equivalent to προσωποληπτικῶς, i.e. 'by partiality, or preference;' a sense sufficiently apt, but destitute of proof. It is better to take it to signify a judging by the outward and first appearance only (so Lysias, cited by Wets.), without examination, and consequently superficially; which, indeed, implies imperfectly, and, as it may happen, unjustly; literally, 'merely a semblance, without reality.'

25—26. Surmises and debates on the part of certain of the people concerning our Lord, which are cut short by the Pharisees sending their officers to apprehend him.

25. τινὲς ἐκ τῶν Ἰεροσ.] By these are, I think, meant a certain class of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, alike from the populace and the higher classes,—the governing body of the city,—namely, what Thucyd. vi. 54, and Aristot. Polit. iv. called the μίσοι πολῖται, and such a class in Jerusalem is recognized by Joseph. Antt. p. 82, ἀπὸ τῶν ἐν μίσῳ πολιτῶν, who might in this peculiar use of ἐν μίσῳ, have had in view Eurip. Suppl. 238—245, where, after mentioning the three classes, he adds ἡ ἐν μίσῳ (sc. μερίς) σώζει πόλιν, 'saves the state.' The class of persons here pointed at were aware of, and disapproved of, the enmity of the other party (consisting of the Rulers and the Pharisees), and were themselves well affected to Jesus. Hence the scope of the words is to suggest a probable reason for the Rulers' non-molestation of Jesus; namely, that they have actually ascertained that he is truly the Christ. Whether they, as Alf. supposes, suspected some change in the purpose of their Rulers towards Jesus by his being permitted to teach freely, I would not say. But from the way in which he puts the thing, he must suppose that they were unfavourable to Jesus; for which supposition there is no foundation.

In the words of v. 26, μήποτε—ὁ Χριστός, is expressed the surmise taken up by the class of persons in question, where the former ἀληθῶς means certain, 'really,' the latter verē, 'truly,' 'the very Christ'; as in the kindred passages, supra iv. 42. vi. 14, ἀληθῶς Χρ. is found. It is true that the 2nd ἀληθῶς is absent from B, D, K, L, T, X, and some 8 cursive MSS.; to which I can add one Lamb. and a few Mss.

copies, with Trin. Coll. B, x. 17, and some copies of the Ital. Vers.; and it is cancelled by almost all the Critical Editors; whose example, however, I cannot yet venture to follow, since the vast preponderance of external authority, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions is not balanced by any decided superiority of internal evidence; since, although it might be introduced from the above adduced passages, it was quite as likely to be removed by Critics, to get rid of a tautology; and that it was, is confirmed by the fact, that not a few MSS. omit the former ἀληθῶς, and a few both. It would seem that these persons were all of opinion that, to remove a tautology, one should be removed, but could not agree which; and that then the scribes, finding an obelus in the margin, and not knowing to which of the two it referred, omitted both. And yet St. John is so fond of the word, that he uses it as many times as all the other writers of the New Test. put together, and yet never once pleonastically. As to what Bp. Pearce and Dr. Campb. say—that the 2nd ἀλ. is unnecessary, I maintain that it is not unnecessary, inasmuch as the two have different references; and, so far from being pleonastic, it really strengthens the sense. I grant, indeed, that this will not, of itself, prove that it is not, what many account it, a mere additamentum introduced into the MSS. by correction; for additamenta, even acknowledged to be such by all,—are often, as might be expected, not without pertinency and suitableness to the context. On the other hand, against the word the Editors ought not to have adduced the authority of Theophyl., since he has it both in the text and in the notes. And the vast superiority of external evidence, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, must, at any rate, place its authenticity on too firm a basis to justify its being cancelled. The true and complete sense expressed in the words is, 'Do the Rulers really know,' 'have they really made out,' lit. 'decided,' that this is the Christ? This force of ἔγν. is very rare in the Class. writers, but not unfrequent in the Sept., being a Hellenistic idiom.

²⁶ ὁ Χριστός. Mr. Alford obelizes the ὁ, on the authority, he alleges, of MS. B. But he was deceived by Muralto, who is not to be credited, for it is not absent from any other MSS. used by the Editors, and I find it in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, also in Trin. Coll. B, x. 15 and 16. At any rate, the ὁ must be genuine, since it is required by propriety of language, the sense being, 'the [expected] Christ.' And, moreover, it derives confirmation both from the next verse, and from a passage of Luke ii. 15, μήποτε αὐτός ἐστιν ὁ Χριστός.

who were inclined to think Jesus was the Messiah. Yet to suppose so sudden a change of persons in the speakers, without any indication thereof from the writer, is at once uncritical and unnecessary; for why may we not here suppose the same persons still speaking, but, as it were, wavering from their former impression that he might be the Christ, and sliding from half-belief to at least scepticism, founded on vain ratiocination? So Theophyl. justly remarks: Διστάζουσι δὲ λέγοντες μήποτε—ὁ Χριστός καὶ (for καίτοι) οὐδὲ ἐπὶ ταύτης τῆς γνώμης μένουσιν. ἀλλὰ συλλογίζονται ὅτι οὐκ ἄρα οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ Χριστός. To advert to the grounds of their scepticism;—there is in the words τοῦτον οἶδαμεν, &c. reference to a notion then prevalent, that the parentage, and consequently birth-place, of the Messiah would be unknown; so that, when he should appear, no one would be able to say whence he had come; for he would appear suddenly, and at once adult, and his immediate parents would be unknown, in the sense of ἀπάτωρ and ἀμήτωρ, though born of a Virgin. And πόθεν here may be taken both of place and person. How these vain notions had arisen, is not clear. They were, however, quite opposed to Scripture, and were therefore only entertained by the Traditionarii, the Pharisees, and others, not by the Scripturarii. At any rate, we see that the Jews of both parties alike regarded their Messiah as by no means a mere man, but of Divine origin.

—καμὲ οἴδατε—εἰμὶ] These words would seem in direct contradiction to what is said infra viii. 14, 19. To remove which discrepancy, various methods have been devised. Several Expositors regard the words as spoken ironically, and consequently to be taken in the contrary sense. Yet that would here involve extreme harshness; unnecessarily, since the same effect (that of reversing the seeming affirmation) may be produced by taking the words (with some eminent Expositors) as an interrogative sentence, having, as often, the force of a negative one, the καὶ signifying thane? as in Mark x. 26. Acts xxiii. 3; q. d. 'Do ye know me? No! otherwise ye would know that I came not of myself,' &c. As, however, this sense of καὶ is not established on any certain proof, and such a meaning cannot be extracted from the words without violence, it is better to retain the declarative sense. And thus the sense will be as follows: 'Ye do, indeed, both know me, and my earthly parentage: and yet I am not come of myself; but he who sent me is a true and faithful Being, whom ye do not know (see viii. 19) as ye ought to know him.'

29. ἔτι παρ' αὐτοῦ—ἀπέστειλεν] Here our Lord asserts his claim to a Divine original (at least by implication), and to a Divine commission. The ὅτι, not found in very many MSS., including nearly all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies, Versions, and early Editions, is cancelled by almost all the Critical Editors. Internal evidence is certainly against it; and the Asymdeton has great force.

30. ἐξήτουν] The persons here meant are not the same who have been just speaking, but those mentioned at vv. 27, 29, the ἀρχόντες. By ἐξήτουν is meant, 'they sought occasion to lay hold on him,' but, for the present, found none. Πιάζειν was an old Doric form for πιάζω (from πιάω), signifying properly to press upon, and thence in a general way to lay hands on, or lay hold of. Thus it is used both of apprehending men, as here and at vv. 32, 44. viii. 20. x. 39. xi. 67. 2 Cor. xi. 32. Reclina. xxiii. 21, and of catching fish, as John xxi. 3, 10. Rev. xix. 20. It occurs only in the Sept. and the later Greek writers.

— ἡ ὥρα αὐτοῦ] Meaning 'the full time' appointed by 'the determinate counsel of God' (Acts ii. 23) for his being 'betrayed to be crucified.'

31. ἐπίστευσαν εἰς αὐτόν] Not, however, with a firm belief, much less a sound and true faith; for it rested on miracles only, without reference to doctrine, and its very profession was made by implication only.

— ὅτι—μῆτι πλείονα σημ. τούτων] Mr. Alf. is right in saying that the two words ὅτι and τούτων, found in all the MSS., except five uncial and some score of cursive MSS., confirmed by the Pesh. Syr. Version, "were more likely to have been purposely omitted, than inserted." Then why did he, by double bracketing the words, in his 1st virtually, and in his 2nd Ed. actually, expunge them? I find ὅτι in all the Lamb. copies, and in Trin. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17, and τούτων in all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies.

33. αὐτοῖς] This word, not found in very many MSS. (including nearly all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), Versions, and early Editions, has been cancelled by almost all the Critical Editors; and with reason; since our Lord is evidently addressing the people at large, who were well disposed to him, not the Pharisees.

— ἔτι μικρὸν χρόνον μεθ' ὑμῶν εἰμι] The sense is, 'Yet, for a little time, I am to be with you;' καὶ ὑπάγω πρὸς τ. π. μ., 'and [then] I am to withdraw to him who sent me.' This use of Present for Future is not unfrequent in the N. T.; e. gr. Matt. xxvi. 2, γίνεται—παρεβήδωται. John xiv. 3, πάνω ἔρχομαι. Matt. xvii. 11, ἔρχεται, 'is to come.' These words evidently allude to the designs of the Pharisees against his life, intimating that it was only from their frustration for the present that his hearers would be enabled a little longer to profit by his instructions.

34. [ζητήσετέ με, &c.] Some Expositors regard what is here said as merely a general mode of expression to denote absence from them; while others recognize a denunciation. The latter view is strongly confirmed by what we read infra viii. 21, and is, on several accounts, to be preferred. Thus the words will be understood as in reality a denunciatory prediction, fulfilled partly at the destruction of Jerusalem and partly ever since. Yet much discussion might have been spared by supposing that as our Lord may here, as often elsewhere, have intended a double sense, according to the class of persons to whom the words might be referred,—the Jews hostile to him or his disciples. See Calvin and Tittman. A remark espec. applicable to the second clause; for though the words may well apply to his being out of the reach of his persecutors, yet, as applied to the people at large, it may denote, as Calvin says, that they would seek him then in another manner, 'nempe ut miseris suis ac perditis in rebus aliquid opis vel solatii inveniant.' This is confirmed by viii. 21, ἐγὼ ὑπάγω, καὶ ζήσεται—ἔλθω. In xiii. 33, the application is different, because addressed to the disciples. This view is adopted by Bp. Lonsd., who, treating of vv. 33 and 34 conjointly, says that 'our Lord here intimates that, in spite of the designs of the Jews (or, 'Jewish Rulers') against his life, he should remain [i. e. continue on earth] with them [his disciples] until the time appointed for his return to his Father in heaven; and that then they (whether his disciples or the Jewish Rulers) would in vain seek him, whether with good or with evil purposes. Comp. viii. 20, 21. xii. 33.' Alf., adopting the first mentioned view, pronounces the meaning to be simply, 'My bodily presence will be withdrawn from you; I shall be personally in a place inaccessible to you.' This, indeed, unlocks the difficulty, but by dispiriting the passage, of which it may emphatically be said, in the expressions of our Lord himself concerning his own words, supra vi. 63, πνεῦμά ἐστι καὶ ζωὴ ἐστίν.

ᾧπου εἰμι ἐγὼ, ὑμεῖς οὐ δύνασθε ἐλθεῖν. ³⁵ Εἶπον οὖν οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς· Ποῦ οὗτος μέλλει πορεύεσθαι, ὅτι ἡμεῖς οὐχ εὐρήσομεν αὐτόν; μὴ εἰς τὴν διασπορὰν τῶν Ἑλλήνων μέλλει πορεύεσθαι, καὶ διδάσκειν τοὺς Ἕλληνας; ³⁶ Τίς ἐστὶν οὗτος ὁ λόγος ὃν εἶπε· Ζητήσεται με, καὶ οὐχ εὐρήσεται· καὶ ᾧπου εἰμι ἐγὼ, ὑμεῖς οὐ δύνασθε ἐλθεῖν;

³⁵. It has been a matter of no little debate what is meant by τὴν διασπορὰν τῶν Ἑλλ. Some Commentators take it to mean 'the place of dispersion,' i. e. the place where the dispersed Jews inhabited; an explanation, they think, required by the context. But though admitted by the context it is not required; and it is so unsupported by the usus loquendi, that it cannot be tolerated. Nor is it necessary to the sense. In fact, διασπορά denotes properly the act of dispersing, and sometimes the effect thereof in the state wherein the persons or things are thereby left. Yet it may also denote, by metonymy, abstract for concrete, the persons so dispersed, as were the Jews dispersed among the Gentiles, which, as the ancients in general and most eminent modern Expositors are agreed, is the sense here. A similar idiom occurs in 2 Macc. i. 27, ἐπισυνάγουσι τὴν διασπορὰν ἡμῶν, ἡλευθέρωσον τοὺς δουλεύοντας ἐν τοῖς Ἴουδαϊσιν. Ps. cxlvi. 2, Sept., τὰς διασπορὰς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ ἐπισυνάξει. This peculiar use of the Genit., with which comp. Matt. i. 11, is found in a passage of Paralip. Jerem. cited by Wetstein, εἰπάτω τοῖς υἱοῖς Ἰσραὴλ—ὁ δὲ Βαρούχ ἀπείπειλεν εἰς τὴν διασπορὰν τῶν Ἰδυνῶν.

³⁷—⁴⁴. Our Lord's discourse to the Jews on the last day of the feast, which occasions further debates among the Jews concerning him. The subject of the discourse was suggested to him by the very solemnity itself. He was in the Temple, standing in a place where he could be seen by every one; and he spoke not only openly but with a loud voice, as if declaring what it was of the utmost consequence should be known by all.

³⁷. τῇ ἐσχάτῃ ἡμ., &c.] On this day, when there was both a Sabbath and a holy Convocation, and accordingly of peculiar solemnity, occurred the ceremony of drawing water from the pool of Siloam, of which see a detailed account in Rec. Synop. This solemnity was not of Divine institution, but had been established by their forefathers in memory of the water so bountifully bestowed on the Israelites in the desert; and, as the Rabbins testify, was meant to be a symbol of the benefits to be some time poured out by the Holy Spirit; see John xvi. 7. Acts ii. 38.

— ἐάν τις διψᾷ] i. e. 'if any one is earnestly desirous of.' All such metaphors as this, from words denoting hunger and thirst, imply need of as well as desire for the things in question. It is probable that the words ἐάν τις διψᾷ—πινέτω were uttered by our Lord when the Priests were bringing the water drawn from the fountain of Siloam (ix. 7) into the Temple. A similar application of a passing occurrence to spiritual instruction occurs supra iv. 10, 13, 14.

³⁸. ὁ πιστεύων, &c.] On the construction of these words some recent Commentators needlessly deviate from the common mode, either by connecting ὁ πιστεύων with πινέτω in the preceding sentence, or by taking ἐμε in the sense of 'ordered.' The common construction is well defended by Kuinoel, who shows that it is required by the explanation of these words at verse 39. There is nothing to stumble at in the Nominative ὁ πιστεύων, which involves an anacoluthon, common both in the Scriptural and Classical writers, which may be resolved into quod attinet ad, 'as to him who,' &c. Nor is there any reason to suppose the words after γραφῇ to be the words of Christ, not of Scripture, because they are not found totidem verbis in Scripture. The best Commentators are, indeed, of opinion that no particular text of Scripture is meant, but that the substance is given of several passages of Scripture, which refer to the effusion of the gifts of the Holy Spirit in the days of the Gospel, under the similitude of water flowing in abundance; e. gr. Isa. xlv. 3. xlv. 1. xlviii. 11. Ezek. xxxvi. 25—27. xlvii. 1—12. Zech. xiv. 8.

— ποταμοὶ—ρέουσιν] Ποτ. is a symbol of abundance; and ρέουσιν alludes to the free communication of the abundant benefits. The metaphor is frequent in the Jewish writings. So Sohar. Chadesch. pp. 40, 4, 'When a man turns to the Lord, he is like a fountain filled with living water, and rivers flow from him to men of all nations and tribes.' Nor is it unexampled in the Classical writers. So Philo, p. 1140, λόγον δὲ συμβολικῶς ποταμὸν εἶναι φάμεν, &c. Philostr. Vit. Ap. iv. 34 (of the Temple of the Muses at Helicon), λόγον τε κρατῆρις ἴσταντο, καὶ ἤρουντο αὐτῶν οἱ διψῶντες. Κοιλία, like the Heb. קֶרֶן or קֶרֶן, often, as here, denotes ψυχὴ, the heart (so Ps. xxxix. 9), meaning the innocent man; as much as to say, that 'the blessings of his piety shall, as water from the centre of a fountain, extend its blessings to others.' By the ποταμοὶ ἢ ζῶντες are meant the spiritual gifts imparted by the Holy Spirit, espec. at the day of Pentecost.

39. τοῦτο δὲ εἶπε—αὐτόν] Here we have, as it were, a key to the allegory of the preceding verse. To advert to the words themselves;—there is no reason to omit, with some Critics, ἁγιον and insert δεομένων, since the latter reading is plainly from the margin, and the former, if not expressed, would be understood; for there is no ground to suppose (with some recent Commentators) that πνεῦμα merely denotes the doctrine of Christ, and the knowledge imparted by him. It is clear that we must understand it, not, indeed, in the personal sense, but as denoting His operation and influence (see Lampe and Tittman), and, from the adjunct, intimating the gifts of the Holy Spirit, by which must be meant (as the occasion and context alike require) those extraordinary and supernatural gifts which were conferred on the Apostles and first converts for the founding of Christianity (see Acts ii. 5); though there may be included those ordinary ones, which were then, and are still, given to every man to profit withal. By ἐδοξάσθη is meant Christ's resurrection, ascension, and final reception to the right hand of God; see xvii. 5. xii. 16, 28. xiii. 31. xiv. 3; and compare Acts ii. 33.

40—53. Here is represented the result of the foregoing circumstances, in the effect produced both on the multitude (vv. 40, 44) and the Sanhedrim itself (vv. 45, 53). By ὁ προφήτης is meant that particular prophet, whoever he should be, whether Elijah, or (as some said) Jeremiah, who, they supposed, would usher in the coming of the Messiah; see Matt. xvi. 14.

40. πολλοὶ οὖν—τὸν λόγον] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit, from a few uncial MSS., ἐκ τοῦ ὄχλου οὖν ἀκούσαντες τῶν λόγων τούτων, a rash and ill-judged procedure. The text as it stands in all the MSS., except a very few, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, is doubtless the true one. Harsh as may be the style of St. John, yet what sound philologist can bring himself to think that the Evangelist would commence a sentence with ἐκ τῶν λόγων οὖν? At any rate, the reading τῶν λόγων τούτων came evidently from the grammarians; though they ought to have known, that the construction with the accus. is frequent in St. John's Gospel. However, not impossible is it that he may have written, ἐκ τοῦ ὄχλου τινὲς, ἀκούσαντες τὸν λόγον (comp. v. 43); and then τινὲς ἀκούσαντες passing into ἀκούσ-τινες, the τινὲς would be lost.

42. ἡ γραφὴ εἶπεν] There is here a reference, by a mode of citation familiar to the Jews, to several passages of Scripture which they explained of the Messiah and his birth, as Is. xi. 1. Jer. xxiii. 5. Micah v. 2. Ps. lxxix. 36.

—ὅπου ἦν Δ.] 'where David resided;' see 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 4. It has been proved by Lampe that the earlier Jews acknowledged that Christ was to be of the family of David; upon whose authority the Talmudists maintain that Christ must be born at Bethlehem. The persons in question here gave unwittingly a decided testimony to the lineage of Jesus, since, as Markland observes, they were quite unaware that Jesus was born there.

43. σχίσμα] 'a dissension.' See my Lex.

46. οὐδέποτε—ὁ ἄνθρωπος] A strong, though probably involuntary, confession of his supernatural power to move the heart.

—ὡς οὗτος ὁ ἄνθρωπος] These words are cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., and double bracketed by Alf. in his 2nd Ed., from 4 uncial MSS. But that is an authority quite insufficient in any case, except one where the words have every appearance of being interpolated; which is not the case here. It is probable that the words in question were lost on account of the repeated ἄνθρωπος, or were removed by the Critical Revisers of MSS. B and L, who, it seems, scrupled at the tautology occasioned by the repetition of the word.

48. τῶν ἀρχόντων] Meaning the Sanhedrim, whose duty it was to take care that no false doctrines should be promulgated, and to hold inquiry concerning those who were making innovations in the Church.

exists. Lampe thinks that as the word is used in the Sept. to denote those who, by transgression of the Law, are doomed to punishment temporal and eternal, it means execrable. Kuinoel takes it to mean excommunicated; but on no sufficient grounds. The former interpretation is preferable; but it would seem to be too strong an expression, and unsuitable to the present feeling of the Rulers, and contumely rather than excommunication seems called for. Hence it would seem that the term ἐπικατ., which is a stronger one than κατάρ., is here used in a peculiar sense, derived from a popular idiom, like that which is found in our word 'wretched,' which means both 'cursed' and 'vile and refuse.' Thus the true sense seems to be, 'As to this rabble, who are ignorant of the Law, they are vile and refuse;' as we should say, 'a parcel of sorry wretches, worthy only of utter contempt.' However, this is not without example in the Class. writers, being found in Plutarch, or whoever he was that wrote the Tract. de Educatione, where he speaks of ἀνθρώπων καὶ κατάρτων. The Scribes and Pharisees, it seems, entertained the same profound contempt for the multitude, which the Heathen Philosophers so liberally indulged in. So Sappho ap. Athen. ix. ὁ δὲ ἄνθρωπος οὐδὲν οὐτ' ἀκούων οὐτ' ὄρων, and Horace, 'Odi profanum vulgus et arceo.'

⁵⁰ εἰς ὧν ἐξ αὐτῶν] Being one of the Sanhedrim, he was authorized to speak; and he speaks as one neither justifying nor condemning Jesus, but only objecting to his being condemned unheard. Here there is usually supposed to be a reference to those passages of the Old Test. which require that every person accused should have a fair and impartial hearing, namely, Exod. xxiii. 1. Lev. xix. 15. Deut. xvii. 8. xix. 15. But it should rather seem (as Dr. A. Clarke supposes), that the reference is to the practice in the Courts of Judicature, founded, we must suppose, on the law of Scripture.

⁵² ἐκ τῆς Γαλ.] i. e. of the Galilean party. — ὅτι προφῆτης, &c.] Commentators are perplexed to reconcile this with the fact, that Galilee had produced, it is said, four, some say six, great Prophets. And most of them resort to the expedient of ascribing this to the ignorance and forgetfulness of the Priests. But ignorance of the common details of Scripture, or the birth-place of its writers, cannot, it would seem, with any probability, be imputed to the Sanhedrim. Perhaps the difficulty may be removed by avail-

ing ourselves of that latitude in which the Preterite admits of being taken, and which sometimes refers to what is customary during a period not very long past. The Prophets of the Old Test. in question had all lived upwards of 500 years before. Now the Pharisees, we may suppose, merely advert to what had been usually the case at a comparatively recent date; namely, since the country had borne the name of Galilee. This sense is well expressed by the gloss, or emendation (for such it is), ἐγγίγεται, a Present with a sense of certain futurity, found in many MSS. and Versions, and in Nonnus (and the sense is expressed in E. V.), which, however, strange to say, has been received into the text by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But even this alteration does not satisfactorily remove, or materially diminish, the difficulty; which is best disposed of by alleging that, with the statements, or representations (likely enough to be perverted by these angry and contumelious feelings—of which we have other instances), we are not concerned, and have nothing to do. There is another reason why the text. rec. should be retained, which is,—that it alone yields a sense suitable to the context; for if we render, as we ought, 'Search and see that out of Galilee has not arisen a prophet.' And we may suppose, with Mr. Green (Gr. New Test. Dial. p. 25), that the Pharisees affirmed that no prophet had hitherto arisen out of Galilee; hinting that none were, accordingly, likely to arise. One may, indeed, wonder that they should forget Jonah (the one of the four, of whom it can with most certainty be pronounced that he was of Galilee). But we may suppose that, as the part of Palestine from which the prophet Jonah arose was not till long after the Captivity called Galilee, they might be justified in their representation.

VIII. 1—11. For a full discussion of the perplexed question as to the authenticity of this paragraph the reader is referred to the Recena. Syn., where he will find an ample statement of all the objections to its genuineness, together with their answers, wherein the evidence is carefully stated, and the decision to be made therefrom suggested. The following is a brief summary of the evidence, external and internal, together with some remarks on the nature of that evidence, and an ἐπίκρισις on the whole question.

EXTERNAL EVIDENCE AGAINST the paragraph.—It is not found in 56 MSS. (in some of which, however, a space is left for it), in 33 Evangelistæ, and several MSS. of the Syr., Copt., Sahidic, Armenian, and Italic Versions; nor is it treated on by Origen, Apollinar., Theod., Mops., Chrys., Basil, Cosmas, Theophyl., Catena, Ter-

πρὸς αὐτόν· καὶ καθίσας ἐδίδασκεν αὐτούς· ³ Ἄγουσι δὲ οἱ

tull., Cypr., and Juvencus; nor is it expressed by Nonnus.

External evidence FOR the paragraph.—It is found in 284 MSS. and 6 Evangelistaria. In 40 others it is found, but obelized. In 15 others it is found with an asterisk; and again in 8 others is placed at the end of the Gospel. Of the remainder of the MSS., not ranged under either head, 13 MSS. have been examined by Scholz on purpose for this paragraph, and 75 (including 13 uncial ones) are found mutilated in this part, by the abstraction of a leaf, or otherwise. And as to its not being contained in Nonnus's Version, that proves nothing; for many other omissions there occur equally long and far less easy to be accounted for. Thus we have a large chasm at vi. 40, and at xi. 55.

Internal evidence AGAINST the paragraph.—This is any thing but decisive; for though the variety of readings in those MSS. which have it is very great, yet it is not considerably greater than that which exists on some other passages, where there was any thing particularly to stumble at in the matter. In short, the arguments against the paragraph from internal evidence resolve themselves into a series of objections (or rather surmises) founded on misconception; many of them such as might be advanced against any passage, even whose authenticity is undisputable. Suffice it here to notice two of the most specious objections; one, that the paragraph is but little noticed by the Fathers and ancient Commentators. Now this, we may imagine, arose partly because there was no occasion to advert to it, or because it could not strengthen their arguments or dissuaves against adultery, and partly because many persons, however causelessly, did stumble at one circumstance of the narration,—wondering why our Lord did not pass a more decided and severe condemnation. Thus the Fathers were apprehensive lest any persons, induced by the seeming impunity of the offence, should be encouraged to the commission of this crime. And, accordingly, Augustin de Conj. Adult. ii. 7, says, that ‘from a mistaken notion that the portion gave countenance to immorality, or from an ill-founded apprehension lest its tendency should be misunderstood by the ignorant and ill-inclined, many removed it from their copies;’ just as they removed vv. 43, 44 of Luke xxii. and some other passages, from similar motives. Hence, too, it was generally passed over in the Homilies and Theological Treatises, and omitted in the Lectionaries. And yet there is nothing in the paragraph, when properly understood, that militates against the character of Christ, or gives the least encouragement to crime. On the contrary, the whole is perfectly consistent with the gentleness and benevolence of our Lord, while, at the same time, the censure itself is sufficient for the purpose. And if it be objected, that he suffered a guilty woman to go unpunished, it should be remembered, 1. that (according to our Lord’s own declarations, John iii. 17. x. 11, 17) he came not to exercise the office of a judge; and 2. that any such exercise of judicial authority would have been at variance with that deference which he ever inculcated, both by precept and example, to the civil magistrate. As a sinner he virtually condemned her, when he bid her ‘go and sin no more.’

In short, all the arguments put together, founded on internal evidence, against the authenticity of this paragraph are inconclusive, and will not counterbalance one that may be adduced FOR it; namely, that, while we can easily imagine why it should have been omitted, no tolerable reason can be assigned why the story should have been fabricated at all, or if so, why fabricated with the present circumstances; and how it could, amidst so many objections, have found its way into five-sixths of the MSS. The fabricated stories found in the apocryphal Gospels are quite of a different character, and almost always founded on the most ætiotic views. And had this paragraph been of that character, it would, I will venture to say, never have been omitted, or removed by any. To advert to another powerful argument, from internal evidence, in favour of its authenticity; the paragraph is not denied, by any competent judges, to bear upon it the stamp and impress of truth, in the profound wisdom of the reply, ‘Let him that is without sin cast a stone at her.’ Inasmuch that the most eminent of the Critics who dispute its authenticity (namely, whether it was recorded by St. John) are constrained to admit the truth of the narration itself, which they think was introduced into the Gospel by Papias, or the disciples of St. John; or else was, at a later period, expressed in the margin of some ancient MS. and from thence found its way into the rest. But nothing can be imagined more improbable than the latter supposition. For there were surely many reasons why such a story should not have been introduced into the Text; but not one reason why it should. And as to the former it is very difficult to imagine how even Papias himself could have been enabled, had he wished it, to foist in an interpolation, especially of this nature; or, if he had wished to interpolate, why he should have chosen this alone of all the many narrations which must then have been preserved by tradition, namely, those πολλὰ ἄλλα, which St. John speaks of at xx. 30, and which he had chosen not to record, on the principle that those he had recorded were sufficient for the purpose of showing that Jesus was the Messiah. Such being the case, how would Papias dare to introduce any more? This argument applies yet more strongly against any disciple of St. John. As to the argument against the authenticity of the passage, from its being absent from so many Evangelistaria, and from its not being touched upon by so many Fathers, is of no force. The fact is easily accounted for from the nature of the contents, and the misunderstanding thereof, which I have pointed out above.

Thus far in my former Edition. On again carefully reconsidering the question, with the aid of such materials for judgment as the lapse of time has supplied, I see little reason to alter my original view, as to the Johannean origin of the passage in question; though I am now ready to acknowledge that I am more aware than heretofore of the complicated difficulties that embarrass the question; which ought not to be evaded, and cannot be got rid of, either by gratuitous hypothesis, or too positive assertions;

and I see reason to qualify some of my representations, as to the points connected with the matter. But to advert to the additional information I have to give as to external evidence. I have found the passage in all the Lamb. MSS., except one (No. 1176), but in another (1175) it is placed at the end of the Gospel. In No. 528 it is marked as probably not genuine. As to the Mus. copies, it is contained in all, except two, though marked as of doubtful genuineness by the mark πτ (παρίστικται) in three others. As to the 'complicated difficulties,' which, Alf. says, embarrass the question, those are not so many, or so formidable, as he represents. As to the 'three independent texts of the passage,' the MS. D is not entitled to be esteemed one, as resting only on a single MS., and that corrupted by the licentious alterations of Critics. At that rate it might be said that there are two independent texts of a great part of the Acts of the Apostles:—one, that of the great body of the MSS.; the other, that of D. As to Alf. d's assertion, that 'the most weighty argument against the passage is found in its entire diversity from the Evangelist's style, not only in the use of many words and phrases not Johannean, but from the whole cast and character of the passage being alien from John's manner;' I deny that it is so, and must again maintain, that this course of argument is very fallacious, leads to nothing but endless logomachies, and can never settle a question of this kind. This I have shown at large in my note on the disputed passage of Mark xiv. 9, which forms a case exactly in point. As to the argument against the passage from the variations of position, even Mr. Alf. admits that its occurrence here, and not at Luke xxi. (where it should seem most in place), is much in favour of its genuineness. As to the argument against its authenticity derived from the great variety of readings (which are, indeed, far greater than in any other part of the New Test.), that is of little force, since none of the various readings are of such a nature as to make any such alteration in the statements of the story, as to render it less credible; and the great body of them are, on various critical grounds, entitled to no attention. Indeed, the text of the Acts of the Apostles might, as regards the MSS. D, F, and G, be impugned on the alleged ground of there being in very many parts Two independent Texts. Indeed in the Apocalypse the various readings are not much fewer in number than here, and yet, generally speaking, they are, as in the former case, not of a character to entitle them to much attention; inasmuch that I do not regard it as at all more difficult to form a pure text of that Book, than of any other of the New Test.,—certainly less than of St. Mark's Gospel. The same applies to all the passages now in question, as will in some measure appear from what I have said on the principal disputed readings. As to the hypothesis which Mr. Alf. is 'almost disposed, as a desperate resource under all the difficulties, to adopt,' it is too gratuitous, and made up 'for the nonce,' to deserve being reported. On the whole, considering all the data for judgment, and the real difficulties,—none to be evaded or dissembled, and some scarcely to be solved,—I am not disinclined to having the true text of the passage (which is, notwithstanding Alf. d's assertion to the contrary, practicable to be formed in the usual way) expressed (by way of slight distinction, and with no view to any other than the absolute truth of the narrative as a real occurrence) in smaller character, but without the double-brackets in which Mr. Alf. now encircles the words.

3. πρὸς αὐτόν] The words are absent from MSS. D, M, U, and 35 others (to which I can add 3 Lamb., 6 Mus., and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16); and they are double bracketed by Alf. Internal evidence is equally balanced. It may have been brought in from v. 2 by the Revisers; or expunged by Critics, to remove a tautology. For ἐν Alf. prefers, and Matthæi and Scholz read, ἐν, from 2 uncial and many cursive MSS.; to which I could add not a few Lamb. and Mus. copies. Internal evidence is nearly equal, but rather in favour of ἐν, of which the other was an alteration suggested by ἐν αὐτοφ. in the next verse—an emendation of style, but a weakening of sense.

4. κατελήφθη ἐπ' αὐτοφώρῳ μοιχ.] Καταλαμβάνσθαι ἐπ' αὐτ. is a phrase properly used of thieves caught in the act of theft, or with the stolen property upon them; but more frequently of those detected in the commission of any other crime, especially such as is committed furtively. 'Επ' αὐτ. may be construed either with κατελ. or with μοιχ.; but the former method is preferable, as being confirmed by several passages of the Classics, Ælian, Hist. An. xi. 3.

5. λιθάζειν] This, for the vulg. λιθοβολεῖσθαι, has been adopted on the authority of a great portion of the best MSS.; and with reason, since internal evidence is greatly in its favour.

6. For κατηγορεῖν αὐτοῦ very many MSS., including 3 Lamb., and not a few Mus. copies, have κατηγορίαν κατ' αὐτοῦ, which was edited by Matth., and is seemingly preferred by Alf.; but without reason; since it is plainly an emendation of style. For bracketing the whole clause, as Alf. does, there is really no authority. For ἔγραψεν, Alf. reads κατέγραψεν, from 5 uncial and many cursive MSS.; to which I can add 3 Lamb. and a few Mus. copies; but scarcely any amount of external authority could over-balance the weight of internal evidence against the reading, it being evidently an alteration to present a plainer sense, the Critic, who made it, supposing that the subsequent εἰς τὴν γῆν called for it. Thus the sense would be, 'scored down, scratched, marks, or characters, on the ground,' a sense of καταγράφω, scrub, scrawl, 'to cut,' 'engrave,' occurring in Pollux ix. 104, γραμμάς καταγράψαι. Hdot. iii. 108. Æl. V. H. x. 3. But however specious the reading may be, it sprang from a Criticus maleferiatu.

— τῷ δακτύλῳ ἔγραφεν] To omit many strange notions which have been propounded as to what Christ here wrote, and why he wrote,—all founded on frivolous conjecture and mere speculation,—the best mode of accounting for the action is (with many eminent Expositors, as Hamm. and Schoëttg.) to suppose that our Lord wrote no words, properly speaking, but that he thus merely intimated his desire to have nothing to do with the matter in question, employing, for this purpose, an action which was frequently resorted to by those who did not choose to answer an improper question, or be engaged in a business they disapproved of. So Ælian, V. H. xiv. 19, makes mention of a philosopher who showed his disinclination to answer a certain question proposed to him, by writing on the wall; so also Diog. Laert. l. ii. p. 96. And many similar instances are adduced from the Rabbinical writers by Schoëttg.

Thus our Lord's action was merely a symbolical one, signifying that he cared not to show any attention to what they were saying, or to answer their insidious question. Or it may have implied contempt or censure, as if they did not deserve that he should take the trouble to repeat what he had so often before inculcated,—that with juridical questions he had nothing to do, thus intimating that they merited no other answer, than what they had themselves suggested by appealing to the Mosaic precept. In many MSS., including most of the Lamb., and many of the Mus. copies, there is added μὴ προσποιούμενος, scil. ἀκούσαι. Yet this, though approved by Camerar., Grotius, and others, and adopted in our authorized Version ('as though he heard them not'), can only be regarded as a very ancient gloss, as indeed plainly appears from Euthymius. The phrase is indeed an elegant one, and occurs in Thucyd. iii. 484, where I have adduced several exx.; but since its use is confined to the purest Gr. writers, or to those who copied their example, it is not likely to come from St. John, but from one of the Critics, who have been unusually busy in obtruding their corrections, or additions, throughout this whole narrative.

7. ἐπέμενον] 'persevered in, continued to.' So Acts xii. 16, ἐπέμεινε κρούων.

— Ὁ ἀναμάρτητος ὑμῶν] The exact meaning here of ἀναμάρτητος has been disputed. Some take it to denote freedom from adultery; others, freedom from any notorious sin, such as adultery; others, again, freedom from sin in general. The sense first mentioned seems alone the true one; namely, freedom from the sin in question, which may, however, very well include fornication, concubinage, and lasciviousness of every kind. To the extreme corruption of morals in his countrymen Josephus bears ample testimony; and that the priests and scribes deeply participated in this corruption there is no reason to doubt; for the Rabbinical writers supply abundant proofs of the immorality of even the most eminent Rabbis.

That ἀμαρτάνειν and ἀμαρτία are in the Greek writers often used of adultery and fornication, is well known. If the word be taken with the extent of signification above laid down (which is fully warranted by Scripture usage), there will be no reason to doubt but that every one of the persons present was more or less guilty. As to the objection urged by Le Clerc and others, that no law demands perfect innocence in its judges, &c., it may be answered, that our Lord is here speaking not juridically, but popularly, and considers the thing in foro conscientie, as in the passages of Cicero and Synesius here cited by Grotius. Thus the reply was well adapted to produce the effect intended, as pointing at a moral maxim founded in justice, and recognized by the philosophers and sages of the Heathens, that he who accuses others ought himself to be free from the vices of which he impeaches them; comp. Rom. ii. 1; and therefore our Lord so speaks as by no means to absolve the accused, but to smite the consciences of the accusers. He neither acquits nor condemns the woman, but tempers his answer with such prudence, as that it shall be neither at variance with justice, nor inconsistent with mercy. It is finely observed by Euthymius, copying Chrys. or some other Father: Ὅρα σοφίας τῆς αὐτοσοφίας κατασοφίζομένην εὐμυχάνειν τὰς μηχανὰς αὐτῶν. ὅρα, πῶς ἅμα καὶ τὸν νόμον ἐτήρησε, καὶ τῆς γυναικὸς ἐφείσατο· ἐπιτήρησε γὰρ τὸν ἀναμάρτητον ἐξ αὐτῶν ἄρξασθαι τοῦ λιθοβολεῖν αὐτήν, εἰδὼς πάντας ἐν ἀμαρτίαις.

— πρῶτος τὸν λίθον ἐπ' αὐτῇ βαλ.] Reader: 'let him first cast the stone at her.' By the stone is meant the fatal stone, which was first cast, in form, by one of the accusers or witnesses, and which served as a signal to the by-standers to commence the stoning. Through ignorance of this point of Jewish antiquities, some ancient Critics expunged the τὸν as useless; while one modern Critic (Alford) has all but adopted that course by bracketing the word in his first edition, and in his second questioning its correctness, though he might have abundantly ascertained that from Bp. Middleton and Mr. Green. One might more than question the correctness of λίθον without the Article, if intended, as we cannot doubt, to designate the first stone thrown by the witnesses. I should not have said thus much, were not the genuineness and propriety of the τὸν of some little consequence; since Bp. Middleton regards the occurrence of the Article as a circumstance rather in favour of the authenticity of the whole passage. And Mr. Green says that thus much may be said, that the Article, if this be its force (which he does not doubt), could not have proceeded from a Jew who had lived while the Mosaic Polity was not yet extinct.

8. καὶ πάλιν—τὴν γῆν] The best reason that has been supposed for the repetition of this symbolical action, the counterpart to the former, is that it was intended to give the priests and scribes an opportunity of withdrawing with less confusion.

9. καὶ ὑπὸ—[ἐλεγχόμενοι] These words, not found in many MSS. (including 1 Lamb. and 5 Mus. copies) and early Editions, may have come, as Matthæi suspects, from the margin; though it is more probable that they are from the Evangelist, as being so much in his manner, such ἐπικρίσεις being frequent in his writings. Besides, the genuineness of the words, and their Johannine origin, are confirmed by a passage in the Book of Wisdom, xvii. 11, which seems to have been in the Evangelist's mind while writing this narrative: Δειδὼν γὰρ ἰδίως πονηρία μαρτυρεῖ καταδικάζουμένη, αἱ δὲ προσεῖληφε τὰ χαλκῆα, συνεχόμενη τῇ συνειδήσει, where, for the corrupt ἰδίως πονηρία and μαρτυρεῖ I would read ἰδίω and μάρτυρι, and for δὲ προσεῖληφε would read τε προεῖλ. My emendations are confirmed partly by the Complut. Polyglott, and partly by Epict. Sent. i. 101, τῷ ἰδίῳ συνιδότι, ἄχθροι ἰσόμεθα,—and Menander, Ὁ συνιστορῶν αὐτῷ τι, κὰν ᾗ θρασύτατος, | ἡ σύνοσις αὐτὸν δειλότατον ποιεῖ, and comp. Rom. ii. 15.

— εἰς καθ' εἰς] See note on Mark xiv. 19. By πρεσβυτέρων is here meant 'the more honourable,' as by ἐσχάτων 'the lowest in degree or station;' see Mark ix. 35. It is not meant that they went out each in seniority, but that they all went out, one after another, of every station and age, from first to last.

— κατελείφθη μόνος—ἐν μέσῳ οὐσα] Namely, of those present, the Apostles and followers of Christ; comp. ver. 3. Instead of the common reading ἰστώσα, very many MSS., including most of the Lamb. and Mus. copies, Versions, and Editions, have οὐσα; which I have, with Matthæi and Scholz, adopted, since internal as well as external evidence is in its favour.

10. καὶ μηδὲνα θεασ.—γυναικός] These words are absent from D, M, S, and about 20 cursive MSS.; to which I can add 2 Lamb. and not a few Mus. copies; and as, indeed, internal evidence is quite against the words, I have bracketed them.

— Γύναι] I have now thought fit to read, with Scholz, γύναι (without ἡ), on very strongly preponderating external authority; to which I can add 3 Lamb. and many Mus. copies, confirmed by internal evidence, from the far greater likelihood that γύναι should (as will appear from my note on John iv. 21) have been used than ἡ γυνή, and that use of the Article is found in the N. T. only in Luke viii. 54, and it is any thing but in the style of the Evangelist.

11. οὐδὲ ἐγὼ σε κατακρίνω] 'neither do, nor will, I pass sentence on thee, or adjudge thee to punishment.' The term κατακρίνω has here a peculiar force, as denoting that emphatic mode of condemning, which consists in carrying the punishment denounced into execution; which in the present case would be by casting the first stone. Comp. Jos. Antt. iii. 1, 4, δεδιέναι δὲ ὑπὲρ αὐτῶν μὴ, δι' αὐτὸν ἐπ' αὐτὸν βάλλουσι λίθων, τοῦ Θεοῦ κατακρίνειν νομισθῶσιν. We are not to take this as a remission of her sins (which, as supreme Lord, he might have pronounced), but simply as a declaration that, since his kingdom was not of this world, so he would not assume the office of temporal magistracy. False, therefore, is the conclusion of some, who hence infer that our Lord did not approve of adultery being punished with death. For, upon the same principle, they might argue that, when our Lord declined to act as judge between the brothers disputing about an inheritance (see Luke xii. 15), he did not approve of inheritances being divided, and did not care that the disputes thence arising should be amicably settled. Lampe. To prevent any mistake of his meaning, our Lord added μηκέτι ἀμάρτανε, where the term ἀμάρτ. is to be confined to the particular sin in question, adultery, according to the use of the word in the best Greek writers. So Aristen. Epist. i. 6, μηδὲ πειραιτέρῳ ἐξαμάρτανε (where, for μηδὲ, read μηδὲν).

12. Now follow, to the end of the Chapter, two more discourses pronounced by our Lord in the Temple on some other occasion; though what that was, and at what time, is not agreed. The views of Expositors as to that matter vary according to their admission or rejection of the disputed portion in the former part of the Chapter. Those who adopt the latter view suppose this first discourse, vv. 12—20, to have been delivered on the great day of the feast, referring it to the same occasion as vii. 37, 38; while those who adopt the former view either think that it was delivered at some other time (though at what time is uncertain) after the feast in question; or take the πάλιν to intimate the resumption of the discourse at ver. 2, which had been interrupted by the occurrence just before narrated. Upon a matter of such doubtful disputation it is impossible to speak decidedly; but really it should seem that there is no reason why we should not, while maintaining the authenticity of viii. 2—11, yet suppose the present discourse to be closely connected with that at vii. 37, 38, of which the narrative was interrupted by various other matter intervening. But, though closely connected in subject, the discourses were separate, and pronounced on two different occasions; the first at the Feast, the second on the day after it; also in two somewhat different places;—the former in the Court of the Temple, the latter in the Treasury, situated in the Women's Court. However, since it was on the same subject, and addressed to the Jews at large, it may be regarded as a continuation of the former. Indeed, this seems to be intimated by the particles καὶ οὖν, which are continuative and resumptive. The scope of the present address is the same; namely, to declare that Jesus is the Christ, though the imagery employed is different. And as in that there is a reference to a festal usage (on which I have treated supra), so there may have been in this, as Alf. thinks, allusion to the two large golden chandeliers set up in the Court of the Women, the light of which was so strong as to illuminate all Jerusalem. See Wets. and Alf. However, I cannot venture to adopt this view.—1. Because the two passages differ materially, since the allusion is manifest; in the other there is no appearance of any, nor a vestige of the form of one. 2. Because, to bring such an allusion in would lower and degrade the augustness of the truth contained in the declaration. The allusion is rather to the SUN, the great natural light of the world, that ruleth the day, and thus pointing at JESUS as the Fountain of all light spiritual to the world,—‘the SUN of Righteousness,’ Mal. iv. 2, where it is added, ‘with healing on his wings,’ thus designating the future Messiah,—as not only the great moral and spiritual Teacher, but the Saviour of the world. There is an allusion to this title of the Saviour supra i. 4, 9, where see notes. Indeed, since we have good reason, from the Rabbinical writers often speaking of God as ‘the Light of the world,’ to suppose that the Jews applied the expression to God; accordingly, by applying this designation to himself, Jesus was claiming Deity as well as Messiahship.

13. ἐν περὶ σεαυτοῦ μαρτ.] Here the Pharisees, we see, do not openly reject this high claim, but put it aside, by such a sort of argument as they thought Jesus could not rebut,—namely, that self commendation has no force, and that no one can bear witness in his own case,—a fundamental canon of the Jewish Teachers; see Mischas Surenhusii, t. iii. p. 63. This principle, indeed, our Lord had on a former occasion, v. 31, recognized; but he showed its inapplicability here, by alleging that his testimony was supported by that of the Father. The very same argument is used here; but, as Alf. says, the other side of it is presented; and thus the reasoning at ἐν binds his testimony to that of the Father, from whom he came, and to whom he was returning. The term οἶδα must not be so interpreted as if it were merely a strong declaration of the existence of the Witness bearing testimony, inasmuch as, when taken in conjunction with the words following, πόθεν ἔρχομαι, καὶ ποῦ ὑπάγω, when compared with what is said at the beginning of this Gospel, contains not only a periphrasis of Divine Mission, but of Divine Origin, as based on the testimony of God himself. The next words, ὑμεῖς δὲ—ὑπάγω, are meant to contrast their obscure notions of his Person and Office; q. d. ‘Ye, however, who judge of me only by my outward appearance, and obscure earthly parentage, know not from whom I am come, and whither I go;’ i. e. ‘Ye ignore my pretensions to a Divine Mission at all.’ Of the next words the sense may be thus expressed in paraphrase: ‘As for myself, my office is not now to pronounce judgment on men,—it is not the object of my mission on earth (comp. iii. 17. xii. 47); but even were I called on to exercise judgment, my judgment would be true and just; for I am not alone; but I, and the Father who sent me, are together’ (comp. 2, 29, καὶ ὁ πέμψας με μετ’ ἐμοῦ ἵσται), i. e. are One. Comp. xiv. 11, ἐγὼ ἐν τῷ Πατρὶ, καὶ ὁ Πατὴρ ἐν ἐμοί. To advert to a few points of philology;—καὶ ἰδὼν δὲ κρίνω is a harsh construction for ἰδὼν δὲ καὶ κρ., found in some copies, but evidently from correction; as also is the omission of δὲ in G, X, and some cursives, with Lamb. 1177, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. As the words stand they should be rendered, ‘If’ (or ‘though’) I even do bear witness of myself, i. e. in my own case, my witness is nevertheless true.’ Thus the fact is granted, but its application to the present case excepted to. After ἐγὼ, in the latter part of the sentence, I have, with R. Stephens and the Latin Vulgate, placed a comma,—as propriety and perspicuity alike require, the kai being not a copula uniting words, but joining two clauses, instead of two verbs, κρίνω and κρίνω.—For ἀληθής the MSS. B, D, L, T, X, and one cursive of the same Family, have ἀληθινός, which is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but on insufficient evidence, the almost total absence of concurrent evidence in cursive MSS. being very unfavourable. Internal evidence is, indeed, divided. ‘ἀληθής’ may have come through the ordinary Revisers, from the marginal Scholia; and ἀληθινός may have come from the Critics, who thought the term more appropriate; and, finding it used in the same phrases infra xix. 35, introduced it here. But even if the sense were ‘genuine,’ as more appropriate, the Evangelist does not split hairs, like our Critics. Besides, ἀληθής is used with μαρτυρία by John, supra v. 32, where two MSS. only have the alteration ἀληθινός, also at xxi. 24, where only one MS. has ἀληθινός; also at 3 John 12, where not a single copy has ἀληθινός. It is also used by St. Paul, Tit. i. 13.

There can now be no doubt of the true origin of ἀληθινός,—nay, at xix. 35, not a few cursives have ἀληθής.

Ver. 18 is explanatory of the briefly expressed words preceding.

19. ποῦ ἵσται ὁ πατὴρ σου;] The question was evidently put, not from ignorance, but in a scoffing spirit; q. d. 'Where is this father of yours, that we may interrogate him? we do not see this other witness.' Accordingly, our Lord answers not the question, but lets them know, that the very asking the question betrays the malignity of their hearts, and shows that they neither truly know, nor care to know, either him or his Father. If they knew him, as a Teacher sent from God, they would know that it is God who beareth witness of him, though not in a visible way, yet 'by signs and wonders and mighty deeds.' Comp. xiv. 7—9.

21—59. Further discourses of our Lord, which lead to an attempt on the part of the Jews to stone him. In this concluding address to the Jews our Lord testifies yet more distinctly to his Divine origin, and to the cause of their unbelief; in opening out which he excites their utmost enmity, issuing in rabid fury. It is indeed a disputed point whether the subsequent discourse was held at the same time, and in the same place, with the preceding, or at some time afterwards. Those Expositors who maintain the latter opinion found it on the nature of the preceding verse, and the use of πάλιν here. The former reason, however, is inconclusive, since the verse may be regarded as, in some measure, parenthetical. And the use of πάλιν will not prove it to have been held at another time; since it may only denote repetition, namely, of the same warning as had been before given, vii. 34. We may, therefore, safely regard this portion as a continuation of the foregoing, addressed, it should seem, at the same time, to the same persons. And thus the extreme severity of the expressions in the subsequent matter may be well accounted for. Seeing that he had hitherto made no impression on them, our Lord first, 21—24, even more seriously, warns them of the awful consequences of their contumacy,

21. ἐγὼ ὑπάγω, καὶ ἄν. &c.] In this affecting address, our Lord apprises his disciples that he is about to leave them, and that they shall seek the Messiah, and desire his coming; but that the Messiah which they expect will not come: and, as they have rejected Him who is the true and only Messiah, there remains no other salvation.

— [ζητήσετέ με] By this strong expression is meant 'shall seek by desiring,' i. e. by implication, miss with regret; to express which sense, the pure Greek writers employ ἐπιζητέω; and ἐπιζητήσεις is so used in Jos. Antt. iv. 8, 3. The general course of thought (somewhat confused, it may be supposed, by the agitated feeling with which the words were spoken) is: 'ye shall greatly miss, and deeply regret, Me when gone, and wish Me again present among you;—at least, ye shall wish it were possible that ye might be with Me, in order that ye might be saved: but your wish will be vain; for where I am going ye cannot come—ye must remain and die in your sins,'—or rather, 'your sinfulness,'—'state of sin,' that not being removed by repentance and faith in the Redeemer, who atoneth for sin.—Ἐν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ ὑμῶν ἀποθ. is a mode of expression, like that at Ezek. iii. 19, xviii. 26, xxxiii. 9, 18, 'shall die in his iniquity.' At v. 24, where the sentiment is repeated by way of impressing it more forcibly; and the plural is used as conveying a somewhat stronger sense, by its being meant to be applied individually (as in 1 Cor. xv. 17, ἑστὶ ἐν ἁμαρτίαις ὑμῶν) meaning that 'they are all and each of them still unrenewed, and abiding in sin unatoned for.' The phrase ἐν ταῖς αἰ. ἀποθ. is like several in the Old Test., as 1 Chron. x. 13, ἀπέθανε Σαοὺλ ἐν ταῖς ἀνομίαις αὐτοῦ.

22. μήτι ἀποκτενεῖ ἑαυτὸν, &c.] This was evidently a wilful perversion of our Lord's meaning; q. d. 'What! will he make away with himself, to get away from this our pretended persecution?' see vii. 20. Thus imputing to him what involved, even according to the opinion of the Jews, great criminality; for we find from Josephus, in his speech against suicide, Bell. iii.

8, 5, that the Pharisees supposed the lowest pit of Hell to be reserved for self-murderers.

23. Ὑμεῖς ἐκ τῶν, &c.] Our Lord deigns not to notice so absurd and malicious an imputation; but glances at the origins of this their malice, in the total dissimilarity between themselves and himself;—the one being of earth, and earthly-minded; the other of heaven, and heavenly-minded: Comp. supra iii. 31; thus intimating, that 'by this base perversion of his words they did but evince the malice of their hearts, and the utter carnality and corruption of their minds; by which they showed how little fitted they were to judge of One so unlike themselves. And hence he will only repeat (v. 24) what he said before (v. 22), that they will, i. e. must die in their sins.'

24. ἐὰν γὰρ μὴ πιστ.—εἰμι] 'For' (i. e. 'such being the case') 'if ye do not believe that I am he,—the Personage predicted by the Patriarchs and Prophets, and long expected by those faithful people of God.' Comp. Mark xiii. 6, and Acts xiii. 25; supra iv. 26, and note.

25. σὺ τίς εἶ;] A question, not of simple ignorance seeking information, but of scornful reproach; q. d. 'Who art thou, that thou speakest so loftily of thyself, and rebukingly to us?' So Aristoph. Av. 961, σὺ δ' εἰ τίς; Philem. σὺ γὰρ τίς εἶσσι (for εἶ); Liban. 798, τίς γὰρ εἰ σὺ; Our Lord, however, was pleased to answer as if the question had been one of simple ignorance.

— τὴν ἀρχὴν ὃ τι καὶ λαλῶ ὑ.] The sense of these words depends upon that which is assigned to τὴν ἀρχὴν, which some take as standing for omnino; q. d. 'I am altogether the person whom I profess myself to be.' But it has been truly observed that in this sense the expression is almost always used with a negation. It is therefore better, with the generality of Commentators, to take the phrase as put for ἀπ' ἀρχῆς. By this some understand the beginning of office; others, the 'beginning' of the present discourse; which latter opinion is greatly preferable. Thus the expression may simply mean dudum, or etiā nunc, as in Gen. xliiii. 18. So Plaut. Capt. iii. 4, 9, 'Quis ille est? Quem dudum dixi a principio tibi.' Thus we may render, 'That which I now speak unto you τὴν ἀρχὴν,' lit. 'presently,' 'just now.' But this is harsh; and the use of the Present λαλῶ, which must not be taken for ἔλεξα, forbids it. To take τὴν ἀρχὴν, with Stier and Alf., for generally, traced up to its first principle, essentially, is much harsher; besides, that the existence of such a sense has to be proved. I see not why we should not take it, with Euthym., and many eminent modern Expositors, as put for ὅλως, 'altogether,' 'entirely.'

26. πολλὰ ἔχω, &c.] These words are, from brevity, somewhat obscure. The difficulty is centred in ἀλλ' ὁ πέμψας με ἀληθὴς, &c., which some think meant to prove the justice of his accusations. But it is better, with others, to regard them as intimating the ground of his claims to be from on High, and the justice of that censure which their refusal to acknowledge them involved; q. d. 'I could say much more in reference to you, and in condemnation of your unbelief; but, as I speak not of myself alone, I forbear to do it; and shall only say, 'He who sent me is true'; and, accordingly, as I am sent from the great Father of truth, so what I openly aver is from him, and therefore cannot but be true, and the refusal to receive it highly criminal.' The next words, καὶ γὰρ—τὸν κόσμον, seem suspended on the words, left to be understood at the preceding ἀλλά, as supra vii. 28; q. d. 'but I forbear, and content myself to speak unto the world solely those things which I have heard of him, and am commissioned to say.'

27. οὐκ ἔγνωσαν—ἔλεγον] Meaning, that 'they cared not to know that he spake unto them of (i. e. meant) his Father in heaven, God;' and that from their unwillingness to believe, that the ὁ πέμψας με was the same with ὁ Πατήρ μου, even though he had said ἐγὼ ἐκ τῶν ἄνω εἰμι: this, in fact, they would not know or recognize. So that it is not the ignorance of unbelief (for which Alf. says there is no accounting), but the obstinate perversity of unbelief, which is here to be brought in, and to which St. Paul in his Epistles often adverts.

28. The οὖν here is not, as Alf. says, continuative, but resumptive, taking up what was said at v. 26, of which the matter is parenthetical; an idiom which occurs in almost all the writers of the New Test., including St. John, and also in the Class. writers. See Matthæi's, Kühner's, and Winer's Grammars. Its force may best be expressed by 'so, then,' 'thereupon.'

28. ὅταν ἰψώσηται, &c.] These words could not, of course, be understood by the hearers; but they were, we may suppose, expressed thus obscurely, partly from the reserve which our Lord, in his wisdom, thought fit then to maintain on that subject, and partly in order that what was now enigmatical, being afterwards explained by the event, there might arise that confirmation of faith which results from the fulfilment of pro-

phesy. The same remark applies to our Lord's words to Peter, respecting John, xxi. 22, ἐὰν αὐτὸν θέλω μένειν ἕως ἔρχομαι. See also iii. 14. Here there is an obscure allusion (though rendered plain by the event) to the circumstances attending the crucifixion, and to the events subsequent to it,—namely, the resurrection and ascension of Christ, and his exaltation to the right hand of God in glory, the coming of the Holy Ghost, and the working of miracles in the name of Jesus;—circumstances which would so demonstrate him to be the CHRIST, that they would all have abundant evidence to see, and many would in consequence believe, that he was indeed what he professed to be—the Messiah; they would know it either to their destruction and eternal condemnation, or to their salvation. On ὠνῶσ. see on supra iii. 14, and Matt. viii. 20.

²⁹. This verse is closely connected with (though not in construction) the preceding one; the sense being: 'who, having sent me, leaves me not alone, but succours and supports me, because I perform his will in all things;' meaning espec. with respect to the work of redemption.

³². γνώσεσθε τὴν ἀλήθειαν, &c.] 'shall know,' in opposition to mere holding the truth; and the full sense is, 'Ye shall experimentally find the truth, and prove the blessed effects of my word, and know of a truth that I came from God.' See v. 28. vii. 17.

— καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια, meaning, 'the truth as it is in Jesus,' Gospel truth. Ἐλευθ. ὑμᾶς, 'will free you from the bondage to sin and Satan,' and place you in 'the glorious liberty of the children of God.' See Rom. viii. 2, 15. Similar sentiments are adduced both from the Rabbinical writers, and the Classical ones; of which the most apposite is the following:—Arrian, Epict. iv. 7, εἰς ἐμὴ οὐδεὶς ἐξουσίαν ἔχει· ἡλευθέρωμαι γὰρ ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἔγνων αὐτοῦ τὰς ἐντολάς, οὐκίτι οὐδεὶς δουλαγωγῆσαι με δύναται where, however, we need not, as in the other passages cited, suppose an allusion to the Stoical dogma, that the wise man is alone free, and that every fool is a slave; for it may be noticed, that Arrian had, like the other later Philosophers, been much indebted to the truths of Revelation in the New Testament. Of this the passage in question affords a remarkable example, as containing allusion to four passages of Scripture,—namely, 1 Cor. vii. 37. 1 Cor. vii. 22, ἀπελευθερώσῃ Κυρίου ἐστίν. 2 John i. 1, and Ps. cxix. 125. 2 Pet. ii. 19. 1 Cor. ix. 27.

— οὐδενὶ δεδουλ.] As the Hebrews had been in slavery not only under the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Babylonians, but were then subjected to the Romans (so Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 8, τὴν ἐλευθερίαν ἀποβάλλομεν, καὶ ὑπήκοοι Ῥωμαίων κατίστημεν), many regard this as a false assertion, uttered in the heat of disputation; while others would take the words with such a restriction of sense as to be reconcilable to the truth of history,—nay, of plain facts. This they endeavour to effect by supposing the words to be meant of themselves, and of that generation only. And assuredly the Jews, even after they became subject to the Roman empire, were left in the enjoyment of no inconsiderable portion of liberty, political as well as religious. But this cannot be admitted, because, as Alf. observes, πώποτε connects with σπέρμα. Ἀβρ. ἱσ., and generalizes the assertion. The assertion, if false, cannot be accounted for as arising from the heat of disputation, for there had been none. The words, Alf. maintains, arise from the οἱ ἀληθῶς μαθηταί. So that, he thinks, we must suppose some technical meaning attached to δεδουλευκάμεν, in which it may have been correct. But the term is of a kind that is not susceptible of a technical meaning. The best way of removing the difficulty is, to suppose the words spoken hastily, under the influence of vasation, and therefore incorrectly; also that the term δούλ. is used in the strongest sense that the word admits, 'we were never in slavery.' And that, I apprehend, may be shown to be not altogether contrary to the truth of history; certainly as regards the Egyptians and Assyrians, and, in some measure, the Babylonians, as respects the Jews, at least those left in Palestine.

34. Our Lord now shows that he meant, not political, but moral and spiritual liberty; here inculcating a truth frequent in the New Test. (see Rom. vi. 17. 2 Pet. ii. 19), i. e. that the habitual commission of sin (for such is the import of the expression ὁ ποιῶν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν) is a sort of slavery; a truth, indeed, acknowledged by the heathen sages (see many examples in Wets.), at least so far as regards the mere moral sentiment.

35. ὁ δὲ δούλος—αἰῶνα] Here we have, in continuation of the comparison, an illustration drawn from what is usual in common life; q. d. 'The Slave has no claim to remain continually in the same family; but may, at the pleasure of his owner, be sold unto another. Not so the son; he cannot be alienated from the family: thus intimating that, though of the seed of Abraham, yet of that seed there might be two classes,—that of the son, and that of the slave; and also that, in like manner, as in the case of the son and the slave, the Jews would not be privileged to remain in the family of his Father, unless he, the Son, should release them from spiritual bondage, and admit them to the privileges of sons. There is an allusion to the case of Hagar and Ishmael, and of Isaac. Observe that to the above twofold objection of the Jews, our Lord replies (vv. 35, 36) in an inverse order. And, first, to the confident assumption, 'we have never been in slavery to any one,' he answers, not by reminding them, as he could have done, of the servitude of their nation, at least, to Babylon; but by representing them as being under a servitude far worse than that to any earthly tyrant,—even a servitude to sin. Then, to their claim to be the seed of Abraham he replies, by showing that, even admitting them to be such (though, in a certain sense, he argues, v. 39, they deserved not the title, because in works so utterly unlike Abraham), they are, notwithstanding, only in the condition and relation of slaves, who have no claim to permanent abiding in the house; and, in order to be truly free, and to enjoy 'the liberty of the sons of God,' must be made free by the Son of God, 'who abideth for ever,' and, consequently, is abundantly sufficient 'to save to the uttermost those who come unto God by him.'

36. This verse sets forth another view, engrafted on the former; the comparison being the same, but the application different. The inference here introduced by οὖν is founded on the abiding of the Son for ever in glory at the right hand of God; whence it is inferred, that liberation and redemption can come from him alone, of whom Isaac was the type—the seed according to promise.' See Lampe and Calv., who also ably point out the full force of the expression ὄντως ἐλεύθεροι, and show how alone this true freedom can be attained,—namely, by being born again of Christ's Spirit, and after his image; thus attaining the adoption through election. Eph. i. 5. So Calv. in loc. well remarks: 'Quod natura proprium habet, nobis adoptione communicat, dum fide inserimur in ejus corpus, ac efficiamur ejus membra. Christi ergo beneficium est libertas nostra, sed eam fide consequimur: quæ etiam facit ut nos Christus Spiritu suo regeneret.' Comp. Gal. iv. 21—ult., which is the best comment on this verse.

37. οἶδα] The word must, as Calvin observes, be here taken in the sense of concession. Our Lord admits their assertion, but makes use of it to show the inconsistency between their boasted claims of ancestry and their present disposition and conduct, and to evince that they must indeed be degenerate descendants of Abraham, who, in a spirit so totally unlike that of their illustrious progenitor, plot the death of Him to whom both the Patriarchs and Prophets bore witness.

—ὅτι ὁ λόγος ὁ ἐμὸς οὐ χωρεῖ ἐν ὑμῖν.] Here is suggested the reason for that rejection of his doctrine, which made them plot against his person. On the exact import, however, of οὐ χωρεῖ, some difference of opinion exists. The sense 'has place,' adopted by many ancient and modern Expositors, is destitute of authority, and not sufficiently definite or significant. The true interpretation seems to be, 'does not effect entrance, by reception, among you': a sense occurring also in Wisd. vii. 23, and Joseph. Antt. vi. 3, 1; but not, I think, in the Class. writers: since it seems to be an Hellenistic phrase. The interpretation of Lücke and Alf., 'does not work in you,' 'spread, go forward, in you,' cannot be sustained; and if it could, it would be here unsuitable. The true nature of the metaphor is well pointed out by Enthym. thus: Ὁ λόγος μου, ὁ διδασκαλικός, ὑψηλὸς ὢν, οὐ χωρεῖ ἐν ὑμῖν, τοῖς ἰχνουσι μου ἐστινωμένοις ὑπὸ φαυλότητος, 'so straitened as to leave no room to hold my gospel.'

38. The scope of this verse is, to draw a contrast between the conduct pursued by him, and that by them; as serving to account for their rejection of him: q. d. 'No wonder there should be such an opposition between us, inasmuch as when I speak I speak about what I have learned from my Father (see supra iii. 32, and note); and ye do what ye have learned from your father, who is always opposed to Mine.

— ὃ ἐωράκατε—ὃ ἐωράκατε] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit from 5 uncial and 11 cursive MSS. (to which I can add nothing) ὃ—ὃ, a specious reading, but proceeding, I suspect, from misconception on the part of the Critics, who supposed a plural here called for,—which is not the case, since the singular may be used generically. The reading ἠκούσατε, instead of the second ἠωρ., found in B. C. K. L. X, and a few cursives (to which I add 5 Mus. copies), and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16 and 17, and adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., is entitled to attention, as seeming the more suitable term, but not to adoption, except on far stronger evidence. Besides, the quarter from which it comes gives reason for suspecting it to be a mere alteration; nay, if adopted, it would leave ἠωρ. difficult to be accounted for. In such a case, surely external authority ought to decide, and that is quite in favour of ἠωρ.

39. ὁ πατὴρ ἡμῶν, &c.] The Jews, not knowing that by their father, Jesus had meant the Devil, and not quite understanding the other words of Jesus, ὃ ἐωράκατε παρὰ τῷ πατρὶ ὑμῶν; and regarding what was said as disrespectful to Abraham, take refuge in their former allegation, simply repeating that 'Abraham is their father, in whom they trust.' To which our Lord replies, that they are not Abraham's sons in the true and spiritual sense,—namely, those who walk in his footsteps, and do his works.

— εἰ τέκνα—ἐποιεῖτε δὲ] Here Griesb., for ἦτε, reads ἔστε, and expunges the av. But, as Mr. Green, Gr. p. 48, remarks, 'a further step is necessary for the sense, namely, for ἐποιεῖτε to read ποιεῖτε.' The three alterations in question must, Mr. Green truly remarks, stand or fall together. But for ἔστε there is the authority of only MSS. B. D. L. and Orig.; for ποιεῖτε, only that of Origen. Under these circumstances it is better to take no step at all towards alteration, but leave as it is the reading of nearly all the MSS., supported by all the Versions. Lachm. reads ἔστε, and retains δὲ; while Tisch. retains ἦτε, and expunges δὲ. The former emendation is quite indefensible; the latter, not capable of being defended, unless we should suppose St. John (as Mr. Green says) 'to have committed a solecism into which neither himself on any other occasion, nor the other Scriptural writers on any occasion have fallen.' But, to turn from words to things;—these is here a parallel drawn between the conduct pursued by himself, and that by them, as serving to account for their rejection of him. He faithfully delivers the doctrine which he hath learnt from and with his Father, even God; they do the works which they have learnt from their father, even the Devil, as is more plainly signified further on. How fully this language was justified by facts, will sufficiently appear from the account given by Josephus of the Jews of his age. See Bell. v. 10.

40. νῦν δέ] 'but as things actually are.' A sense of the particle frequent in Scripture; as infra ix. 41. xviii. 36, and in the Class. writers, as Thucyd. iii. 43.

41. ὑμεῖς ποιεῖτε τὰ ἔργα τ. π. ὑ.] q. d. 'Aye, ye do the works of your Father;' i. e. whom ye show to be such, by your resemblance to him in character. Our Lord repeats the charge, and yet repeats it as if unwilling to name Satan as their father. That he leaves to be inferred.

— πορνείαν] The best Commentators are agreed that the word here, as often, signifies idolatry; which was considered by the Jews as a sort of spiritual adultery; since so close was the connexion of the people of Israel with God, that it was compared to the conjugal union. Compare Judg. ii. 17. 1 Chron. v. 25. 1a. i. 21. Hos. i. 2. iv. 12. Their meaning, therefore, is: 'If thou art now speaking of our natural Father, know that we recognize no other Father than God. To him we are dear and beloved, like children; him only do we worship.' This argument our Lord rebuts, by again adverting to the spiritual sense of Father.

42. εἰ ὁ Θεός—ἐμέ] 'If ye were the genuine children of God, in spirit, word, or work, and really loved and served him, so as to deserve the name of children, ye would love me, who am the Son of God (consequently bearing the character of God) attested to be such, inasmuch as ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐξῆλθον καὶ ἤκω. The full sense of which is: 'I proceeded forth from God, and am come into the world [as his Legate].' The former of these terms (ἐξῆλθον) has reference to the nature of Jesus as the eternal Son of God; the latter, his character as Legate and Mediator. Comp. ch. vi. 46. vii. 29. xiii. 3. xvi. 27, 28. xvii. 7.

that was not the sole purpose of the words: the address is in character,—upbraiding, and ex-postulatory; q. d. ‘How is it that [as ye say] ye do not understand my speech? even because ye cannot (or, are not disposed to) hearken and give heed to my words.’ Δύνασθαι is here (as often) used of moral inability, arising from any one’s being indisposed to do a thing. So Gen. xxxvii. 4, οὐκ ἠδύνατο λαλεῖν αὐτῷ οὐδὲν ἱερηνικόν, and Jerem. vi. 16 (of the Jews), ‘they cannot hear.’ The reason of this indisposition to hearken to the truth will appear from 1 Cor. ii. 14. The expression λαλεῖν, meaning loquela, as distinguished from λόγος, doctrine, has reference to the peculiarity of our Lord’s manner of speaking, and its remoteness from the λαλεῖν κόσμου. Upon the whole, this seems said in reply to the objections of some wholly sensual and unspiritual persons to our Lord’s discourses, that they did not comprehend his manner of speaking, knew not what to make of the character of the phrasedology in which he expressed himself; as probably bearing a near resemblance to the writings of St. John, which have a peculiar idiom, not to be found in any other writers, which idiom seems to have been formed on that of his model, our Lord. The use here of λαλ. (not found in the Classical writers) is formed on that of the word as used in Matt. xxvi. 73. Mark xiv. 70, there denoting dialect, or a peculiar and provincial mode of pronouncing some words, and the peculiar use of others. To our Lord’s peculiar character of speech, as well as manner of speaking, the persons in question probably applied the term λαλεῖν. Thus, that they should not understand his speech, as we find it represented in St. John, is not surprising, considering that, in any case, spiritual discourse is to the ignorant and unspiritual like another dialect of the same language, and, at any rate, to be understood, requires to be spiritually discerned; which is what is implied in the words following, where λόγον denotes the materia, i. e. the doctrine contained in the λαλεῖν. In οὐ δύνασθε, &c., our Lord means to say, that ‘they cannot understand the former, because they will not hearken to the latter.’ Of course, οὐ δύνασθε is to be understood, as in the passages above cited, of the moral inability arising from total indisposition to receive the truth, and a perverse opposition to it on their part. See note on Luke xviii. 34. A great heathen writer well describes this indisposition of the carnal and corrupt mind to hearken to wholesome precept and follow good example, as follows: πολλοὶ δὲ ἀλόγιστοι (unheedingful) τῶν ταῦτα (lessons of good) λεγόντων, αἰροῦνται (choose) διὰ τὴν αὐτῶν κακίαν ἀπολίσθαι, μᾶλλον ἢ ἐτέρων ἀρετῇ (benevolencia) σώζεσθαι. No other than this was the case with the Jews of that age, who, after having despised instruction, refused the good and chosen the evil, came in the end to a fearful destruction, making good the words of the prophet: ‘Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish!’

44. ὑμεῖς ἐκ πατρὸς, &c.] Our Lord now speaks more plainly, pointing to their true Father, and indicating two of the principal characteristics in which their similarity to their Diabolical father consists,—namely, man-slaying and lying. This verse is throughout one of the strongest attestations to be found in Scripture to the personality of the Devil; for it is impossible to suppose here an accommodation to Jewish views, or a metaphorical form of speech in so solemn and direct an assertion as this. The words καὶ τὰς ἐπιθυμίας—ποιεῖν may best be rendered, ‘and the behests (wishes) of your father it is your will and wish to perform’ (showing how voluntary is the service); for there seems an intended correspondence between ἐπιθυμίας and θέλειτε—such a correspondence as may be recognized in a striking passage of Sir Philip Sidney’s Arcadia (cited in Johns. Dict.), “Her tender youth had lived under her parents’ behests, without framing, out of her own will, the forechusing of any thing.” Ἀπ’ ἀρχῆς denotes here, as often, ‘from the beginning of the world.’ (Compare i. 1, and 1 John iii. 8.) In ἀνθρωποκτόνος there is not a reference (as some imagine) to the murder of Abel, committed at the instigation of Satan; neither, however, must the proper sense of the word (with others) be explained away. It may be taken in its proper acceptation, and be referred to the seduction of our first parents; which might be called ἀνθρωποκτονία, as ‘bringing death into the world, and all our woe;’ the thing being brought about by Satan’s machinations. Thus a Rabbinical writer cited by Schoettgen speaks of ‘the children of the old Serpent, who killed Adam and all his posterity.’ The same is also ascribed to the Devil, Wisd. ii. 24, and in Irenæus, ii. 8, and other Fathers.

The words καὶ ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ οὐχ ἔσθηκε contain a strong affirmation, by a negation of the contrary. And as to stand in any action is to steadfastly practise it, so the sense here is: ‘he has perpetually fallen away from the truth.’ The full sense is, ‘he has never stood, nor ever does stand (the latter sense being called for by the ἔστιν following); such is his habitual course, that of falling away from the rule of right action and duty prescribed by God;’ there is no principle of duty in him. The Article is not used at οὐκ ἔστιν ἀλήθεια ἐν αὐτῷ, because there by truth is meant subjective truth, truthfulness.

—ὅταν λαλή τὸ ψεῦδος, &c.] The sense of these words mainly depends upon that assigned to the αὐτοῦ; which some ancient and a few modern Translators render, according to the more usual signification of the word, ipse, his. Yet this produces so odd a sense (‘for he is a liar, and so is his father’) that almost all Expositors of any eminence from Erasmus to Tittman, take αὐτοῦ as a neuter, rendering it ejus, it; and they refer it either to the remote antecedent ψεῦδος, or consider that word as inherent in the verbal ψεύστης. Upon the whole, there is no reason to depart from the common rendering; for though it may seem to involve something uncouth and obscure, yet that is no more than may occasionally be observed in all ancient writers. Moreover, the sense thus arising is both apposite and natural, and such as suggests matter for serious reflection. And, after all, there is here little that can be called irregular. This use of αὐτοῦ in the neuter, though rare, is not unexampled, being found at Eph. ii. 10, ἡ αὐτοῖς περιπατ., for neither is αὐτοῖς confined to the masculine, but, like the Genit. here, is sometimes a neuter. Nor is the use of the Article here to be called anomalous. It might, indeed, have been dispensed with; but it is not without its force, as suggesting the sense, 'and the originator of it by the deception of our first parents,' Gen. iii. 5. So in Soph. Œd. Tyr. 868, Jupiter is called πατὴρ νόμων, and Plato, Menex. C. 10, has πατήρας τῇ ἐλευθερίᾳ, 'authors, or originators of the truth.' Instances, too, are abundant of nouns being left to be supplied from a verb preceding; and thus there is no great harshness in a noun being left to be supplied from a verbal, if we consider its true nature, especially as the sense of the verb itself has just preceded.

Finally, the above method of exposition is supported by the suffrage of the earliest antiquity; being adopted by the Pesch. Syriac Translator in the middle of the second century, who renders by ܣܕܐ with the feminine affix, which therefore cannot be referred to the Devil, and must belong to the preceding feminine noun ܠܐܕܡ, a lie. Τὸ ψεῦδος should be rendered so as to express the force of the Article, 'what is false,' as often in Aristot. and Plato, as opposed to τὸ ἀληθές. And so also at Eph. iv. 25. 2 Thess. ii. 11. Rom. i. 25. The very phrase λαλεῖν τὸ ψεῦδος occurs at Ps. v. 6.

These words, then, are meant to show how it is, that nought but falsehood comes from him,—namely, that is natural to him; ἐκ τῶν ἰδίων being (as the Pesch. Syr. Translator also takes it) for ἐκ τοῦ ἰδίου, and that for ἐξ ἰδιώματος, 'from natural disposition,' i. e. the evil disposition belonging to him, implied in the preceding context; probably a popular form of expression, since it is not found in the Classical writers. Remarkably similar to what is here said of the Devil, is what Porphyry de Abstin. ii. § 42, says of demons, τὸ ψεῦδος (lying) τοῦτοίσις οὐκ αἰσίου.

45. Here ἐγὼ is, as often, emphatic, corresponding to αὐτός, and the δὲ is antithetic, with reference to a μὲν before, not expressed, but to be supplied after ὑμῖν at v. 44, being hypoparaphrastic and illustrative. Render: 'But as for me, it is because I speak the truth, that ye believe not what I say.' Inasmuch that, as Christ declares on a similar occasion (v. 43), 'if another should come in his own name only (without that Divine authority which he possesses), him they would receive.' Thus, then, it is meant that they can no more believe the truth, than the Devil can speak it; both actions being respectively contrary to their nature. Thus there is intimated an indirect contrast between the Scribes and Pharisees, who might well be called 'liars,'—like their father (the author of lying),—and Himself, 'the true' and truth-declaring, to whom, as such, they stood necessarily and naturally opposed; and hence they were utterly indisposed to believe on and receive him as the Christ, and to come to him for salvation.

46. τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν—ἁμαρτίας;] The scope of this address is to convince them of the credibility of what he asserts, by another and a more familiar kind of argument, in which our Lord traces unbelief to its true source. In τίς ἐξ ὑμῶν the interrogation, as Calvin remarks, has the force of confident appeal.

ἁμαρτία is here by many of the best Commentators taken to mean, not sin, according to the common acceptation of the word, but error, or falsehood, in doctrine; as opposed to the truth spoken of in the next clause. Of this signification examples occur in Æschyl. Agam. 489, φρενῶν ἁμαρτία. Thucyd. i. 32, δοξῆς ἁμαρτία, and 78, ἐν ἁμαρτία θύτας. However, on further consideration, I now see reason to doubt whether that view of the sense be well founded. The force of the argument would thus be, that 'so far from convicting him of falsehood, they cannot even attribute to him error unintentional.' Yet thus the argument would be any thing but forcible, and in accordance with the context; a tautology would be brought in; and the sense assigned to ἁμαρτία is one found neither in the New Test. nor in the Sept. Lampe would unite both senses,—vice in action, and falsehood in words or doctrine, and attempts to establish this from Ps. lix. 13. He might more appositely have adduced 1 Pet. ii. 22 (of Christ), ὅς ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ ἐποίησεν, οὐδὲ εὐρίθη δόλος ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτοῦ. The sense 'sin' must, however, have been chiefly intended; though that of verbal ἁμαρτία, 'falsehood,' 'the sin of the mouth,' Ps. lix. 13, ought not to be excluded, and is confirmed by Euthym.; for it is probable that there is here an allusion to the charge which the chief-priests were (as is clear from Matt. xxvii. 63) in the habit of advancing against Jesus, of being a deceiver, πλάνας. And how strong and comprehensive a term of reproach is πλάνας is certain from its use in the 122nd Epistle of Phalaris: τὸν πλάνον—πονηρὸν εὐρεθῆναι, for there the person would seem to be designated as a liar and rogue.—Ἐλτίγχει must be rendered, not 'convinceth,' but convinceth; as supra v. 9. And so in a similar passage of Aristoph. Plut. 574, we have καὶ σὺν εἰλίγχει μ' οὐκ ὀύνασαι περὶ τοῦτον. Our Lord appeals to his hearers whether they can make out any such charge against him, of error or falsehood in doctrine, as to warrant disregard of his pretensions; which may remind one of a similar appeal of Moses to the Israelites. Numb. xvi. Now such an appeal of course involves the force of a strong negation. Thus, at the words following, the hearers are supposed to have answered, 'No one!' On which answer the inference is founded,—q. d. 'But if, by your admission, it is granted that I do and speak the truth, why do ye not yield credence to me?' At v. 47, the argument is followed up, and, in the words there is implied the answer to the preceding question, διατί, &c., q. d. 'Why do —?' because ye are not sons of God: q. d. 'If ye were really, as ye boast, sons of God, ye would hearken to the words of God [from me, whom he hath sent]. The very reason why ye hearken not to them is, that ye are not of God; i. e. sons of God. See 1 John iii. 10. iv. 4, 6. v. 18, 19.

48. Not being able to answer these arguments, the Jews, meaning here, as usual, οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς, are fain to have recourse to reviling.

— Σαμαρείτης εἰ—καὶ δαιμόνιον ἔχεις;] Of these two expressions the latter has been explained at vii. 20. The former appears from the Rabbinical writers to have been a term of bitter reproach, nearly equiv. to calling any one a heathen, or a heretic; and the Samaritans were accounted both.

49. To the first head of the charge, as manifestly false, our Lord vouchsafed no reply; and as to the second, after putting a mild, but solemn negative, he practically evinces its falsehood, by a simple appeal to his whole life and doctrine, which were evidently not those of one having a devil. This is especially shown by the allegation, 'I honour my Father;' a manifest proof that he is not possessed with a devil, since the devil not only honours not God himself, but incites others to trample on God's honour. In the next words, καὶ ὑμεῖς ἀτιμάζετε με, there is a tacit contrast between them and himself by a skilful turn of expression very similar to some in the Orations of Thucyd. The dense brevity here (almost Thucydidean) requires to be drawn forth in a paraphrase thus:—'Far from acting the part of one possessed with a devil, I honour God, who is my Father; while ye, on the other hand, dishonour me; and, in so doing, dishonour my Father, and your God.'

50. ἰγὼ δὲ οὐ ζητῶ] In these words our Lord answers, by anticipation, the charge of vain-glorious boasting, by showing that it is not so; and consequently the δὲ, 'but' (not 'and,' as in E. V.), is very forcible, and the sense may be thus expressed:—"But (= 'and yet') though I speak of your dishonouring me, it is not I who seek mine own honour; but there is One who seeketh it (for me), and judgeth between me and you, who refuse to honour me." The ἰγὼ is, as very often in this Gospel, emphatic; I have rendered accordingly.

εἰ δὲ ἀλήθειαν λέγω, διατί ὑμεῖς οὐ πιστεύετε μοι; 47 ¹ Ὁ ὢν ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ τὰ ῥήματα τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀκούει· διὰ τοῦτο ὑμεῖς οὐκ ἀκούετε, ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἐστέ. 48 ^m Ἀπεκρίθησαν οὖν οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι καὶ εἶπον αὐτῷ· Οὐ καλῶς λέγομεν ἡμεῖς, ὅτι Σαμαρείτης εἰ σὺ, καὶ δαιμόνιον ἔχεις; 49 Ἀπεκρίθη Ἰησοῦς· Ἐγὼ δαιμόνιον οὐκ ἔχω· ἀλλὰ τιμῶ τὸν Πατέρα μου, καὶ ὑμεῖς ἀτιμάζετε με. 50 ⁿ Ἐγὼ δὲ οὐ ζητῶ τὴν δόξαν μου· ἔστιν ὁ ζητῶν καὶ κρῖνων. 51 ^o Ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν· ἐάν τις τὸν λόγον τὸν ἐμὸν τηρήσῃ, θάνατον οὐ μὴ θεωρήσῃ εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. 52 Εἶπον οὖν αὐτῷ οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι· Νῦν ἐγνώκαμεν ὅτι δαιμόνιον ἔχεις. Ἀβραὰμ ἀπέθανε, καὶ οἱ προφῆται· καὶ σὺ λέγεις· Ἐάν τις τὸν λόγον μου τηρήσῃ, οὐ μὴ *γεύσῃται θανάτου εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα. 53 ^p Μὴ σὺ μεῖζων εἶ τοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν Ἀβραὰμ, ὅστις ἀπέθανε; καὶ οἱ προφῆται ἀπέθανον· τίνα σεαυτὸν [σὺ] ποιεῖς; 54 ^q Ἀπ-

51. There is here, as Lampe remarks, a further carrying on of the discourse, arising out of the κρινω at the end of the last verse, and forming a novum testamen gratiæ, in which our Lord adverts to the happy lot of those who accept his covenant of grace, and observe its requisitions; i. e. that they shall 'never,' lit. 'by no means ever,' θεωρεῖν θάνατον, which, like ἰδεῖν θάνατον at Luke ii. 26, signifies, 'to experience death;' meaning death spiritual and eternal, 'the second death' spoken of in Rev. ii. 11, and in St. Paul's Epistles. Yet, though it has been proved that the phrasis as well as the doctrine was not unknown to the Jews, the hearers misunderstand or pervert our Lord's words, interpreting them of death temporal, and endeavour thereby to fasten on him the charge of being possessed with a demon; or, if speaking soberly, as this claim to confer immortality on others implied the possession of it himself, the Jews justly interpreted this as virtually an arrogation of superiority over Abraham and the Prophets.

52. Γινώσκται for text. rec. γινώσκειται, which I have, with all the Critical Editors, adopted from many MSS., I find in almost all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies, also in Trin. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17.

53. καὶ οἱ προφῆται, &c.] Abraham, indeed, was also a Prophet; and so he is called by Jehovah, Gen. xx. 7. But that appellation was, it should seem, merged in the, to them, more endearing term of Father; he being called Father of the faithful.

— ἀπέθανον] q. d. 'Even the most eminent and most faithful servants of God were not exempt from death.' The Jews only stumbled at these pretensions because they refused to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah; for they did not deny that the MESSIAH was to be far superior to all the Patriarchs, Prophets, and even angels. See Lampe.

— σὺ ποιεῖς] Griesb. Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. expunge σὺ, on the authority of A, B, C, D, G, K, L, and many cursive MSS., to which I can add four Lamb. and several Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. However I still think (with Matthæi) that it ought to be retained, though in brackets. External authority for the word is much superior; and I find it in the most ancient and pure in text of the Lamb. MSS. confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers.,—not to say that internal evidence is quite in its favour, considering that it was more likely to be omitted than inserted. It was, probably, omitted (whether carelessly or not) by those who did not perceive its force, nor consider that by removing it they took away not a little from the spirit of the expression in a context marked by spirit and force, since σύ here (like σύ γε according to frequent use) has the same import as our thou in our elder writers. Σὺ is elsewhere so used in John iv. 19, θεωρῶ δὲ πρόφ. εἰ σύ (where from ignorance of this sarcastic force of σύ the framer of the text of the MS. D expunged the pronoun); also vi. 30, τί οὐν ποιεῖς σύ σημεῖον; viii. 25, σύ τις εἶ; xii. 34, πῶς σὺ λέγεις;

54, 55. The argument here is obscure and uncertain; but it probably is, as Mr. Alford supposes, this: 'The same God, who is the God of Abraham, is my Father; he it is who honours (glorifies) me; and it is his word that I keep.' The term δοξ. points to the foregoing power of delivering from death, though it refers also to the δόξαν generally at v. 50.

For ὁμῶν 9 uncial, and many cursive MSS. (to which I can add all the Lamb. copies except one, and nearly all the more ancient Mus. copies) read ἡμῶν, which is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; and Alf. pronounces the text. rec. 'an alteration from oratio directa.' I, on the contrary, regard the ἡμῶν as a blunder of the scribes; who, even the best of them, so perpetually confound the two, that in most cases the true reading cannot be determined except by the test of suitability to the context; and that here admits ἡμῶν, but rather calls for ὁμῶν, which is found in the great body of the MSS., including B, D, E, F, H, X, Δ, confirmed by nearly all the Versions. Besides, though Alf. edits ἡμῶν, and translates accordingly, yet in his Exposition he follows the reading ὁμῶν, which is, indeed, called for by the force of the argument, and by the true punctuation, which I have adopted, after R. Stephens, in his O mirificam; and I am now of opinion that the καὶ is best rendered 'although,' as in Heb. iii. 9, ἰδοὺ-μασάν με, καὶ εἶδον τὰ ἔργα μου, 'although they saw my works.' So here, 'although ye know him not (the pronoun being emphatic) ye who habitually call him your God, as peculiarly the God of Israel.' The λέγετε, too, is emphatic, intimating that they cannot really know and worship God, if they refuse to acknowledge him whom he hath sent. After all, the reading ἡμῶν may have been an emendation of Critics, who stumbled at the construction, which is unclassical; so that the ὅτι seems to call for ἡμῶν, though the context and course of reasoning require ὁμῶν.

55. ὁμοῖος ὁμῶν] Lachm. edits ὁμῖν, from

MSS. A, D, and 4 cursives; authority quite insufficient; especially since internal evidence is in favour of ὁμῶν, inasmuch as ὁμῖν is evidently a correction of ancient Critics, who thought the construction with the Genit. solæcistic; which, however, is not the case; for, although not pure Attic Greek, it is good ordinary Greek, and is found not only in Ælian, N. An. viii. 1. Theophr. Hist. Pl. ix. 11, but also in Xen. Anab. iv. 1. 17, and Hdot. iii. 37; though in all the passages one or other of the Editors would alter the Genit. into Dat.; not being aware that the idiom probably originated in the language of common life (like our vulgar idiom 'the like of you'), from an early period, and thus came to be used by the Father of History. It occurs in the Sept. at Isa. xiii. 4, and occasionally elsewhere, but only in the MSS. not in the text; which is partly the case in the New Test. Thus at John ix. 9, it is found in a few MSS., including Lamb. 1777; at Mark xii. 30, in some copies; at Rev. ix. 19, in many of the most ancient and best MSS., and it is, as I have there shown, probably the true reading.

56. Ἐβραὰμ ὁ πατὴρ, &c.] Our Lord now contrasts their feelings towards God with those of Abraham, of whom they so boast; and that by way of adverting to his exalted nature, and consequently infinite superiority to Abraham.

— ἠγαλλιάσατο ἵνα ἴδῃ] The version 'rejoiced to see' is not sufficiently significant to express the full sense of the term ἠγαλλ., which is pregnant with meaning; which may best be drawn forth by rendering 'greatly rejoiced [in the prospect] that he should see my day—the time of my appearing on earth in the flesh;—seeing it by anticipation, and realizing it by faith.' The next words are explanatory of the foregoing, and may be rendered, 'Yea, he did see it, and rejoiced [therein],' namely, as most recent Commentators explain, in the seat of the righteous dead, the Paradisiacal state of bliss (see Luke xvi. 23, and notes). For, they observe, the Jews and the ancients in general, supposed departed spirits to take an interest in what concerned their posterity. And they refer to Is. xxix. 22, sq. Phil. Jud. ii. 10, and several passages from ancient writers. After all, however, the meaning may rather be (as the older Commentators interpret), that he mentally saw it—partly by the eye of faith, so strong as to be compared to sight (see Heb. xi. 13. 1 Pet. i. 10, 12), and partly by a revelation of the advent of the future Saviour (supposed to be made to him on being commanded to offer up his son Isaac), either during his lifetime, or after death and in Paradise, at the period of the actual advent of the Saviour on earth. Thus, as Calv. says, 'desiderii et visionis tempora inter se diversa faciunt.' This view is most ably maintained by Maldonati, and favoured by Lampe. For my own part, I cannot better express my judgment

⁵⁷ πεντήκοντα ἔτη, &c. The number fifty seems to be here used, not (as Grotius supposes) from its being a round number, but because among the ancients fifty was considered as the age when any one was past his vigour, and beginning to grow old. Thus, then, it is meant, that he was still young (not even πρεσβύτης, much less γέρον); how, then, should he have seen Abraham?

⁵⁸ πρὶν Ἀβραὰμ—ἐγὼ εἰμι Render: 'before Abraham existed, I am' (the Present being here used to denote continued existence); equiv. to 'before Abraham was born I AM.' In so expressing himself our Lord evidently expresses his own Divine and never-ceasing existence, inasmuch as in the same language God speaks of himself in Exod. iii. 14. 1a. xliiii., and elsewhere; see Ps. xxxix. 2. xc. 2. Jer. i. 5, and comp. supr. i. 18; infr. xiv. 9. xv. 27. In fact, all Expositors, except the Socinians, are agreed that the use of the Pres., εἰμι, expresses, as in Col. i. 17, essential existence. These words, then, showing, as even the Neologian Lücke admits, the pre-existence of Christ long before his birth in this world, plainly set forth his supreme majesty, and, by the assumption which they involve, of the name and attribute of Jehovah, his DIVINITY. And so it is evident the Jews understood Jesus; otherwise they would not have attempted to stone him for blasphemy. That stoning was a punishment inflicted for blasphemy among the Greeks as well as the Jews, is shown by several examples adduced by Lampe.

⁵⁹ ἐκρύβη, και ἐξῆλθ. Most recent Commentators suppose here an hendiadys, or refer it to the rule by which, of two verbs in connexion, one is to be rendered as an adverb, as supra 56, εἶδε και ἐχάρη. It is not, however, necessary to resort to that principle here. Jesus hid himself, it should seem, for the moment, and soon afterwards went out of the Temple. We need not, with the older Commentators, suppose this concealment miraculously effected, by vanishing from the sight of the multitude; we must not (as Alf.) suppose it done by being encircled by his disciples. Not only is nothing said to that effect, but the words following rather discountenance such a view; see note on Luke iv. 30. However, the words διελθὼν—οὕτως have been rejected by many Editors, and are cancelled by Griesb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But there is scarcely evidence sufficient to warrant their being expunged; for they are only omitted in

MSS. B, D (both tampered with by Critics, and here and there corrupted from the Ital. Version), three recent and inferior Versions, and two or three Fathers. But, as the words are not at all essential to the sense of the passage, the testimony of Fathers cannot have any weight. All the most ancient Versions have them; and the Fathers adduced against them have them in other citations. They are, moreover, expressed in the metrical Version of Nonnus. However, since internal evidence is quite against their genuineness, inasmuch as the words were far more likely to have been introduced (probably from a marginal Scholium, suggested by Luke iv. 30) than removed; especially since the reading of C, L, X, and a few cursives, which add ἐκρυβέτο, was evidently formed on such a Scholium, which was noted down for the purpose of clearing up the understanding of the thing by suggesting the how, i. e. in what way our Lord was enabled to conceal himself, and then make his escape out of the Temple. It would seem that ἐκρυβέτο was the original reading of the Scholium, afterwards altered to παρήγεν, as a more definite term, and, when the clause was received into the text, seemingly called for by the παράγων of the next verse.

IX.—ult. X. 21. Christ imparts sight to one born blind; and the circumstances thence resulting. Our Lord's discourse concerning the true and the false Shepherds.

2. τίς ἡμ., οὗτος, ἢ οἱ γον. α. From this question of Christ's disciples, as well as from the words of the Jews infra v. 34, it appears that when a person was born with any bodily defect, or inherent malady, the Jews regarded it as the punishment of the sins of his parents; while, however, it would seem, that some supposed it might be for his own sins committed in a former state of existence. Accordingly, some eminent Expositors think that there is here a reference to the doctrine of the προϋπαρξίς, or pre-existence of souls; others, of the μετεμψύχωσις, or μετεμψύχωσις, transmigration of souls into other bodies, by which what a soul had sinned in one body might be punished in another. Others, as Lightfoot, Lampe, and Tittman, deny any such reference; maintaining that it cannot be proved that the Jews in the age of Christ held any such doctrine. But granting that the affirmative cannot be fully proved, yet neither can the negative. And indeed Joseph. Ant. xviii. 1, 3, and Bell. ii. 8, 14. iii. 8, 3, positively affirm, that the Pharisees (whose tenets were generally received by the people, and well known by the Apostles) did hold the Pythagorean doctrine of the metempsychosis. Though, it must be confessed, the Pharisees confined it to the souls of the good alone. Moreover, the language is not that of positive belief seeking for confirmation, but of doubt seeking for information. And the common people may have held a metempsychosis both of good and of bad souls. Be that as it may, their question as to what caused this natural blindness rested on the common notion (prevalent also among the Heathen), that all dangerous diseases, or grievous calamities, must have been produced by the intervention of some heinous sin, which they were meant to punish.

 Now, in applying this even to the case of any disease which befel a person in the course of his life, they would sometimes feel perplexity; since it might be referred either to his own sin, or the sin of his parents; for the Jews likewise held, that the sin of parents, when not suffered for by themselves, was visited upon their children in the form of disease or calamity: see Ecclus. xi.
 28. But how to apply this to the case of any bodily defect or infirmity, or any disease born with a person, occasioned no little perplexity.
 And accordingly for a solution of this difficulty the disciples apply. Our Lord, however, without adverting at all either to the general truth, or particular falsity of these opinions, informs his disciples, that the case, about which they inquired, had nothing to do with either of the causes they mentioned; but, as when asked (Luke xiii. 23), 'are there few that shall be saved?' while declining a question of mere curiosity, He fixes their attention on a matter of far greater moment,—namely the truth, that while God permits diseases to afflict men, for his own wise purposes; in this instance he had, in the miracle worked by his Messiah, permitted the bodily defect in its subject to be worked by his Messiah; one of whose characteristic works (see Ia. xxxv. 5), it was prophesied, would be 'giving sight to the blind.'

4. ἐμὲ δεῖ ἐργάζεσθαι, &c.] Meaning, that 'such works as these must be done by him now, while there is yet time and opportunity; for the night is coming.' Thus intimating that his continuance with men would be short, and that he should not long either convince them by his miracles, or enlighten them by his doctrines.
 The words may also have been intended to inculcate the important lesson, that we all have a work to do, even the work of Him who sent us into the world; that we have our day, or time, to do it in; and that as that day is at the best short, and we know not how short (as it is said by Antiphan. ap. Stob. tom. i. 96, τὸ

ζῆν ἔοικε φρονεῖν ἐφημέρι· τό τε μήκος τοῦ βίου, ἡμέρα μίση), so it behoves us to use all diligence, lest the night that must close our day, or opportunity, should find us with our work undone.

5. By φῶς τοῦ κόσμου is meant one who both enlightens and blesses mankind,—light being a metaphor to denote both knowledge and happiness; see Euth. viii. 16. Ps. xcvi. 11. cxii. 4.
 John i. 5. The sentiment was doubtless suggested by the case of the blind man about to be restored to sight.

6. ἔπτυσσε—τοῦ τυφλοῦ] It has been thought strange that clay should be here used, since that would seem more likely to injure than benefit the eye. Yet such was sometimes employed, among the ancients, as a sort of salve for certain disorders of that organ. So Serenus Sammon.
 xiii. 225 (cited by Wetstein), 'Si tumor insolitus tipho se tollat inani, Turgentibus oculis vili circumline ceno.' The spittle was used simply to make the earth fit for the use in question; and the intent of the action was to suggest the idea of collyrium, eye-salve, or ointment. So Hor. Sat.
 i. 3, 25, 'oculis male lippus inunctis,' and comp.
 Rev. iii. 18.

The action itself could, of course, contribute nothing to the cure,—but is to be considered as a symbolical one, such as the spitting in the eye, Mark viii. 23. See also vii. 33, and note. In imitation of this the early Christians used, by a similar symbolical action, to anoint the eyes of the catechumens with clay.

7. νίψαι 'wash thyself,' probably the eyes only; for νίπτεσθαι denotes 'to wash a part only of the body,' while λούειν means 'to wash or bathe
 the whole body.' Comp. infra xiii. 10. Cotovicus, Itiner. Hieros. p. 292, attests that the fountain of Siloam is much revered by both Christians and Turks, who use the water to wash the eyes in certain disorders of that organ. On κολυμβήθρα see note supra v. 2. This order (like that of Elijah to Naaman, 2 Kings v. 10, to wash seven times in Jordan,) was doubtless given to try his faith.

The words ὃ ἐρμηνεύεται, ἀπεσταλμένος are by Wassenburgh and Kuinoel considered as a gloss. But there is every reason to think that they are genuine; for such etymological interpretations of names were then very usual; as might be shown by many examples, both from the Scriptural and the Classical writers, especially Thucydides; though such passages have usually proved traps into which ignorant, or rash and unwary Critics have fallen.

8. προσαίτης] On reconsidering the debated question of the reading here, I have, in deference to the united judgment of almost all the Critical Editors, adopted it; though the state of the evidence (by the want of the confirmation of cursive MSS.; for I find it in no Lamb., and in very few Mus. copies, and in only one of the two Triu. Coll. MSS.); and by internal evidence being not altogether against τυφλ. that the reading may yet be considered an open question. The Evangelist might, indeed, have written τυφλὸς καὶ προσαιτῆς, which is actually found in a few MSS. and Latin Versions; but it was not necessary; for the latter circumstance comes out in the subsequent narration. The Critics who formed the text of those MSS. were, I suspect, induced to concoct the reading τυφλὸς καὶ προσαιτῆς, because πρῶτος τυφλὸς was as common a phrase in Greek as cæcus rogator in Latin; the blind being almost always beggars.

11. ἀνέβλεψα] 'I received sight,' as infra xv. 18, which, however, is, strictly speaking, a term inapplicable to one born blind; yet examples of this idiom do occur in the Classical writers, from whom Lücke adduces two from Aristotle and Pausan. neither of them, however, pure Attic writers. It does not, I believe, occur, as might be expected, in the Sept.

13. τοὺς Φαρ.] Meaning the Sanhedrim, the far greater part of whom were Pharisees. That these were the rulers, is plain from vv. 23 and 34.

16. πῶς δύναται ἀπὸ ἁμαρτ.] By ἁμαρτ. is here, as at v. 25, simply meant a sinner by being an impostor. See 2 Thes. ii. 3. The argument is, that an impostor would not be endowed by God with the power of working miracles; or that if (as the Jewish doctors admitted) any one were so endowed, he was plainly commissioned from on high, and could therefore dispense with any ritual observances.

17. λέγουσι τῷ τυφλῷ] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. insert οὖν between λέγουσιν and τῷ, from 5 uncial and 7 other MSS. to which I can add 8 Mus., but no Lamb. copies. But internal evidence is against the word, espec. in a writer like St. John, who so perpetually leaves out connective particles; as the Critics who have admitted οὖν here must have been well aware, since they have themselves swept away, on MS. authority, a very large number of Particles, which they thought had been obtruded by the Revisers of the text. The fact that the Pesch. Syr. Translator had not the word in his copy ought to be thought sufficient, in conjunction with the vast preponderance of external evidence, to decide the question against the word.

— σὺ τί λέγεις—ὃ τι ἡγοῖς, &c.] There is no occasion to break up, as some do, the sentence into two interrogations: 'What sayest thou of him?—that he hath opened thine eyes?' For though specious reasons may be adduced in favour of this method, yet thus the second question would be futile, because it had before been put; and the man had manifestly recovered his sight. It is better, with all the ancient, and most modern Expositors, to assign the sense: 'What sayest thou (i. e. what opinion hast thou) of him, in that (quatenus) he hath opened thine eyes; or, 'as to his opening thine eyes?' Moreover, ὃ τι is for καθότι, 'inasmuch as;' as Luke i. 7, καθότι ἡ Ἐλ. ἦν στήριμα, &c.

— προφήτης] Not meaning, 'the Prophet foretold by Moses' (as some understand); for that would require the Article; but 'a prophet,' θεῖος ἀνὴρ, as Euthym. explains. It is plain from vv. 31, 36, that the man considered Jesus only as a prophet, or, rather, a man of God, θεοσεβής; certainly not as the Son of God.

18. [Ἰουδαῖοι.] i. e. the Φαρισαῖοι; before mentioned. — Ἐφώνησαν, 'had summoned,' καὶ ἠρώτη., 'and had asked.'

19. οὗτός ἐστιν—ἡγενηθή:] Lampe, Markl., Kuin., and Tittm., think that two questions are here blended into one, i. e. 'Is this your son? Do ye say he was born blind?' Such would, indeed, be the more regular manner of expression; but the present is the more simple, natural, and characteristic of the persons; for, in their haste to proceed from interrogation to imputation of fraud, they blurt out the latter (which is implied in λίγεται), together with the former. In their answer, the parents pass over the imputation, and consider the words as comprehending two questions, to which they reply, which, together with πῶς—βλίσκει, makes the interrogation threefold; which is, Mr. Alf. assures us, in strict legal formality.

21. ἡλικίαν ἔχει.] Meaning, 'He is of an age sufficient to enable him to give testimony. He is come to years of discretion.' Of this idiom examples have been adduced from Xen. and Isæus.

22. συνετέθειντο] 'de communis consilio decreverant,' as in Acts xxiii. 20. On this use of the Pluperf. Pass. in the Deponent sense, see Buttm. Gr. p. 234.

— ἀποσυνάγωγος γένηται] 'should be excommunicated.' See my Lex. in v.

24. δὸς δόξαν τῷ Θεῷ.] This does not signify,—what it might seem to import,—'Give the praise of thy cure to God [and not to this man].' For the absence of the Article will scarcely permit such a sense; and what is more, the words are a form of expression, often employed in the Old Test., in the way of adjuration, seriously to admonish any one to speak the truth (see Josh. vii. 18, 19. 1 Sam. vi. 5. Jer. xii. 16): 'a lie being (as Lampe observes) a denial of the omniscience, holiness, truth, and justice of God. Consequently he who wilfully conceals the truth, or declares a falsehood, insults all those attributes of the Deity.' Thus the form was used when a confession of crime was to be wrung from any one. The sense, then, is: 'Confess the truth, as in God's presence: hast thou been really blind from thy birth, and has thy sight been imparted by this man?' They hoped thus to detect some fraud or collusion; but, being disappointed, they resolved to excommunicate the man immediately.

25. εἰ ἁμαρτωλός—οἶδα.] The Commentators are not agreed as to the scope and character of these words, in which some recognize dissimulation, others sarcasm; neither of which views seems well founded. It is better (with Brug., Camer., Grot., and Whitby) to take these words to mean, that 'he has no knowledge of what they allege;' q. d. 'That Jesus is a sinner, I know not; al being put for ἔτι. But as the authority for this signification of al is precarious, we must retain the usual sense whether, and take οὐκ οἶδα in a popular sense to denote, 'I give no opinion: I have nothing to do with that.' This view is confirmed by the words following, ἐν οἶδα, which do not imply knowledge of nothing besides, but of one thing especially. So Aristoph. Av. 1176, τίς τῶν θεῶν; Ag. οὐκ ἴσμεν· ὅτι δ' εἶχε πτερά, τοῦτ' ἴσμεν. Arist. Pax 227, οὐκ οἶδα· πλὴν ἐν, ὅτι, which words are in like manner an answer to a question.

26. 27. The Sanhedrim now repeat the same question before proposed. A crafty device, by which they hoped to detect some discrepancy in his testimony, which might stamp falsehood on the whole; or they hoped that some additional circumstances would transpire, from which they might plausibly reason that the blindness was not real,—or, at least, not from his birth. The man, however, now perceives their aim; and, no longer able to suppress his indignation, impatiently exclaims, εἶπον, &c.

27. οὐκ ἠκούσατε] 'attended not to what I said.' The next words are ironical.

28. ἐλοιδόρησαν καὶ εἶπον] put for ἰλοιδ. εἰπόντες; for they thought it abuse enough to call him the disciple of an impostor.

29. οὐκ οἶδ.—εἰστί] A popular expression, importing, 'We know not his Divine mission, whether his doctrine and miracles proceed from Divine origin, or from demoniacal agency.' (See viii. 27, note.)

30. ἐν τούτῳ] scil. μέναι, 'in this circumstance.' Supposing the γὰρ to be here (as it is usually regarded) simply indicative, we may render it, with Wakef. and others, truly, or indeed; equiv. to 'Tis passing strange.' But the inferential force of the Particle must not be merged in, but combined with, the other; q. d. 'Why this, truly, is strange.' Other instances of this combination of the two senses occur in the New Test. at Acts xvi. 37, οὐ γὰρ· ἀλλὰ, &c. 1 Pet. iv. 15, and sometimes in the Class. writers; e. g. Eurip. Med. 1370, Οἷδ' οὐκ ἐν' ἐστὶ· τούτῳ γὰρ σε δέξεται, 'Why truly, this will sting thee!' The general sense may be thus expressed, 'Why, truly, this is strange, that you (ὅμοις, emphatic), who undertake (according to your office) to distinguish true from false prophets, should not be able to discern with wisdom power as comes, who gives sight to those born blind.'

31. οἶδαμεν] equiv. to 'it is well known.' I would, in each of the two cases of ἀκούει occurring here, understand it of hearkening to their prayers for aid, or countenance; thus forming a gnome generalis, not unfrequent in Scripture; e. gr. Ps. lxxvi. 18. Is. i. 13, and sometimes in the Classical writers, e. gr. Hom. Il. i. 218, Ὅς κε θεοῖς ἐπιπειθήνται μάλα τ' ἔκλυον αὐτοῦ. Here, however, the context shows the meaning of the term to be especially applied to the case of professing prophets asking aid and confirmation of their claims from God. So Schoëttg., after Chrys. and

Euthym., expresses the sense thus: 'To false prophets God does not hearken, so as to work miracles through them, but hearkens only to the really pious.' What, then, was here meant to be inferred is, that the miracle just wrought proved him who wrought it to be a true prophet.

32. ἐκ τοῦ αἰῶνος] 'from the beginning of the world.' See note on Luke i. 70. Τίς, scil. ἀνθρώπος, 'any mere man.' Though communication of sight, in some cases, to those born blind, has of late been effected by the improvements of modern surgical art, yet that does not affect the present case; for the operation in question demands the intervention of the most consummate skill and labour, and it would be equally a miracle to restore such persons to sight without those means.

34. ἐν ἁμαρτίαις σὺ ἐγεννήθης ὅλος!] 'utterly,' 'entirely.' This may, as some think, be said on the same principle which prompted the question of the disciples, v. 2, and if so, they, as Trench observes (Mir. p. 305, note), forgot that the two charges,—one, that he had never been born blind; and so was an impostor;—the other, that he bore the mark of God's anger in a blindness that reached back to his very birth,—will not agree together. They might forget this in their rage against Jesus (of this there are other instances of similar slips of memory); yet it may rather be, as the best Expositors, ancient and modern, consider it, an hyperbolic mode of expression, arising out of a burst of rage, like the Latin scelus peccatis; and the Greek κακὸς καὶ ἐκ κακῶν. Perhaps, however, it was both the one and the other; being, probably, a blending of two phrases, ὅλος ἁμαρτωλὸς εἰς and ἐν ἁμαρτίαις ἐγεννήθης, thus forming one of the most opprobrious speeches imaginable, and likely to have come from the persons in question; for when men are quite destitute of arguments, they endeavour to supply their place by bitter reviling. By ἐξέβαλον ἔξω must be principally meant 'excommunicated him'; but the excommunication may have been accompanied by a thrusting him out of the apartment in the Temple, where they sat in the exercise of their office.

ἐξέβαλον αὐτὸν ἔξω· καὶ εὐρὼν αὐτὸν εἶπεν αὐτῷ· Σὺ πιστεύεις εἰς τὸν Τῖον τοῦ Θεοῦ; ³⁶ Ἀπεκρίθη ἐκείνος καὶ εἶπε· καὶ τίς ἐστὶ, Κύριε, ἵνα πιστεύσω εἰς αὐτόν; ³⁷ εἶπε δὲ αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰη- ^{u ch. 4. 22.} σοὺς· Καὶ ἑώρακας αὐτόν, καὶ ὁ λαλῶν μετὰ σοῦ ἐκείνός ἐστιν.
³⁸ Ὁ δὲ ἔφη· Πιστεύω, Κύριε· καὶ προσεκύνησεν αὐτῷ. ³⁹ ^{v ch. 2. 19. & 12. 47.} Καὶ εἶπεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Εἰς κρίμα ἐγὼ εἰς τὸν κόσμον τοῦτον ἦλθον

35. πιστεύεις.—Θαοῦ] Almost all Commentators regard these words as only importing, 'Dost thou believe in the coming of the Messiah?' as all pious Jews did. But the mode of address seems to be pointed at the then state of the man's mind; who, though at the time the miracle was worked upon him, and even when brought before the Sanhedrim, seems to have regarded Jesus as only a prophet; yet, on reflection, and consideration of the wonderful works Jesus had done, had probably begun to think that he must be more than a prophet, nay, to wish to be his disciple. Indeed his answer seems to comprehend two things: 1st, 'Yes, Sir, I have that belief'; and, 2ndly, 'Canst thou tell me who that Personage is, that I may believe in him?' The words seem to express a sort of expectation that the extraordinary Person, whom he was addressing, could tell him who and where the Messiah was, or perhaps might himself be that Personage. In this view, the words of his answer may be regarded as a delicate way of saying, 'Art thou that Personage?' That the true character of this viſit τοῦ Θεοῦ surpassed the man's present comprehension, as Alf. supposes; and that, accordingly, he asks for further information, is more than can be proved.

36. καὶ] This I have, with Griesb., Matthæi, Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., introduced into the text, on the authority of many of the best MSS., including all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies, and the two Trin. Coll. copies. The omission (of which other instances occur infra xiv. 22) appears to have arisen from the καὶ in the verse just below.

37. καὶ ἰσῶ.—ἰσῶν] The full sense is, 'Thou hast both seen Him (now), and the Person who is speaking with thee is He.'

38. πιστεύω, K.] Render: 'I do believe, Lord; and he rendered worship to him.' See on Matt. ii. 2.

39. καὶ εἶπεν ὁ Ἰ.—Εἰς κρίμα, &c.] If these words were spoken at the time, they were spoken for the sake of the bystanders. But we have no sufficient reason to think that there were any bystanders; for so short a conversation, though terminating in the rendering adoration, would not be likely to attract many bystanders, and few, indeed, to whom so deep a spiritual lesson would not have been uttered in vau. Inasmuch that I am inclined to think, with Mr. Alford, that some interval took place between the time when that conversation occurred and that when the words of this verse were uttered, but not a long one. We may suppose that our Lord took an early occasion, from the miracle being soon buzzed about every where, that was wrought on the blind man (which may have become the topic of discourse in his presence) to speak of spiritual sight, and the absence of it; and also of the effect which his coming into the world would have in removing or in confirming unbelief.

VOL. I.

However, the sense of the words has been variously laid down. Now that will mainly depend on the sense to be ascribed to κρίμα, which some understand to denote the judging of the characters of men, and pointing out their duties. But that dis-spiritualizes the passage, and deprives it of its pointed gravity. It is better, with Chrysa., of the ancient, and several modern Expositors, to suppose κρίμα as put for εἰς διακρίσιν καὶ διαχωρισμὸν, for distinction and separation, and consequently discrimination,—i. e. 'that men's real characters may be put to the proof' as to their use or abuse of their opportunities. So it is elsewhere said of Christ (Luke ii. 35), that he 'came for the falling and rising up of many in Israel, that the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed.' This sense, indeed, is quite agreeable to the primitive signification of κρίνειν, which is to υπονοῦν, and, in a general way, to separate, divide, as an army into ranks. So Xenoph. Mem. iii. 1, 9, κρίνειν τοὺς ἀγαθοὺς καὶ τοὺς κακοὺς. See also Hom. II. β. 362. But there needs some proof that the κρίμα had ever the force of κρίσις = διακρίσις. Hence it is better to retain the usual sense, 'judgment,' as the result of discrimination, by the being put to trial.' Thus our Lord's meaning will be, that 'for judgment [as the effect of judging and trial] is He come into this world; the effect or consequence of his coming being, that, while some are thereby made to see (i. e. know),—who were blind (i. e. ignorant) before,—others there are who, thinking they see already, while in effect they are but blind, will be left as they were.'

In the next words the ἴνα is not causal, but eventual, by marking result, the general meaning being, 'Thus will I make some to see (as this man whose eyes I have opened), I am the means of making others blind (comp. 2 Cor. ii. 16);' thus the effect or consequence of Christ's coming into the world will be, that those who are blind through simple ignorance, will see (namely, by the light of the Gospel, and the illumination of the Holy Spirit); and those who have the use of sight (i. e. have knowledge), but are blinded by passion and prejudice, will not see what is before their eyes, but be left judicially to their own blindness. By the οἱ βλέποντες are meant the οἱ δοκῶντες βλέπειν, those who were thought to have, and thought they had, a knowledge of God's word. Thus our Lord means to say that if this blindness were merely that pertaining to the head, if they were simply ignorant, they would not be exposed to this heavy condemnation; but since they profess to be wise, their unbelief becomes inexcusable. But the ground of their guilt is, that they are at heart wilfully blind, and, with every means of coming to the truth, they remain closed to conviction; and therefore their sin, of unbelief, must rest upon them, be unexpiated, and thus sink them to perdition.

X. 1 seqq. Some Commentators and Harmonists think that the discourse in vv. 1—22 was delivered at another time, and after an interval of two months, i. e. at the Feast of the Dedication, mentioned at v. 22, since Christ there carries on the metaphor of the Sheep. But that is inconclusive; it is so closely connected in subject with the preceding, that it must have followed immediately after it; otherwise, indeed, the parable would be very abruptly brought in, and without any preface, usual to John, prefixed; whereas, taken in connexion with the foregoing, it is very apposite. The introductory ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν cannot be meant as a preface, but is solely employed to introduce some further remark or admonition; see John v. 24, 25. vi. 26, 32. viii. 34, &c. Besides, v. 21 having a reference to the recent case of the blind man, binds the present portion to the immediately preceding. And, indeed, the imputation lately cast upon our Lord, ix. 24, of being an impostor, would induce him to take the first opportunity of retorting the charge on his calumniators, and showing that he sought nothing but the benefit of the people; that he was the true Shepherd, the Messiah; and that they who called themselves the shepherds of the people, and excommunicated those who acknowledged the Messiah, were the false teachers and impostors: that he himself, so far from seeking, as an impostor would, his own interest, sought nothing but the benefit of the people, and would lay down his life for them. In short, that there is a close connexion with the preceding is admitted (though Alf. thinks it doubtful) by all the best Expositors, ancient and modern (see espec. T. Aquin., Calv., Lampe, who says it was spoken eodem halitu; Tittm., Kuin., Thol., Stier); but it is only as to how the connexion arises, that they differ. That the Pharisees are glanced at in what is said, cannot be doubted: but though that is the truth, it is not the whole truth. The most correct sense seems that of Cyrill., Theoph., and Euthym. (approved by Maldonat and Lampe)—that our Lord, in what he says, answers not only to their words, but to their secret thoughts. These, says Lampe, 'directe ferit argumentum Parabolarum'; and, I would add, when ushered in by so solemnly impressive and weighty a form as—'Ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν', they were much more forcible. Besides, the scope and purpose of the address are manifest from the plain facts opened out in the preceding Chapter, where the audacity of the Pharisees rose so far as to pronounce Jesus not even a true Prophet, but an impostor. In order to evince the falsity of this charge, our Lord sets before the Pharisees a lively representation of the true and of the false Shepherd; and in doing this he employs, as often, very figurative phraseology, as highly suitable to the nature of a Parable, and better adapted to match the figurative language in the foregoing part of the Discourse and elsewhere, where he calls himself 'the living Water,' 'the Light of the world,' &c. So here, borrowing his imagery from pastoral life (whether suggested by the proximity of a sheepfold, and the view of a flock of sheep going to the fold, or not, is uncertain), he says of himself, in the explanation of the Parable (7—11), 'I am the good Shepherd.' There was the greater suitability in this, because the Messiah had been predicted by the Old Test. prophets under the image of 'a Shepherd.' See Jer. xxxiii. 1—4. Ezek. xxxiv. 23. xxxvii. 21. Zech. xiii. 7. Hence, that the hearers understood the force of this figurative allusion is plain, since at the close of the first part of his address they ask him whether he were actually the Messiah. But in the Parable itself our Lord simply places before them a representation of the good and of the evil Shepherd. In doing this, however, he describes the false shepherd first, because, as Maldonat observes, 'facilius cognoscimus quis sit sit, quam quis sit bonus pastor.' He does speak of the evil shepherd, because, being represented as a pretended shepherd, but really a κλέπτης καὶ λῃστής, he is, in point of fact, no shepherd;—a keen retort on the Pharisees, who had styled him an impostor. In carrying out his main purpose—the spiritual edification of his hearers, and of the Church in every age—he shows that those alone are worthy of the name of Shepherds, who, having learnt of him, should preach his doctrine. In this, and other of his Discourses recorded by St. John, our Lord was pleased to employ expressions highly figurative, in order partly to show the nature of his person and office, and partly for reasons which will appear from my note on Paraboli cal instruction at Matt. xiii. 3. Here it will be proper to be more than usually attentive to the precaution there suggested, as to the application of Parables; namely, not to press too much on particular terms or circumstances, such being but ornamental, and forming, as it were, the drapery to the figures in the pictures. Thus here by the sheepfold is evidently meant Christ's kingdom on earth; by the door and the porter, Christ himself; by the thieves and robbers, the chief priests and Pharisees; by the fold, the visible Church of God; by the sheep, those really such (not the goats, Matt. xxv. 32), the faithful disciples of Christ; by the voice, probably the word of the Gospel, sounded forth by the spiritual pastor, conf. Ps. lxxxix. 15, 'Blessed are the people that know the joyful sound.' As to the other terms, the corresponding ones are either very slight, or none at all.

But to advert to the scope of the present portion (vv. 1—21);—most of the ancient and earlier modern Commentators supposed the subject of it to be the entering upon ecclesiastical offices without being authorized by a commission from those who have such commission regularly transmitted εἰς τὴν αὐλὴν τῶν προβάτων, ἀλλὰ ἀναβαίνων ἀλλαχόθεν, ἐκεῖνος κλέπτῃς ἐστὶ καὶ ληστὴς· ² ὁ δὲ εἰσερχόμενος διὰ τῆς θύρας ποιμὴν ἐστὶ τῶν προβάτων. ³ Τοῦτ' ὁ θυρωρὸς ἀνοίγει καὶ τὰ πρόβατα τῆς φωνῆς αὐτοῦ ἀκούει καὶ τὰ ἴδια πρόβατα καλεῖ κατ' ὄνομα, καὶ ἐξάγει αὐτά. ⁴ Καὶ ὅταν τὰ ἴδια πρόβατα ἐκβάλῃ, ἔμπροσθεν αὐτῶν πορεύεται καὶ τὰ πρόβατα αὐτῷ ἀκολουθεῖ, ὅτι οἶδασι τὴν φωνὴν αὐτοῦ. ⁵ Ἀλλοτρίῳ δὲ οὐ μὴ † ἀκολουθήσωσιν, ἀλλὰ φεύξονται ἀπ' αὐτοῦ· ὅτι οὐκ οἶδασι τῶν ἀλλοτρίων τὴν φωνήν. ⁶ Ταύτην τὴν παροιμίαν εἶπεν αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· ἐκεῖνοι δὲ οὐκ ἔγνωσαν τίνα ἦν, ἃ ἐλάλει αὐτοῖς.

down from the Apostles, and derived consequently from Christ himself. But that such a sense can be deduced from the present passage, neither the nature of the context, nor the import of the words will, I think, permit us to suppose. The purpose here in view is undoubtedly (according to the opinion of the most eminent of the more recent Commentators) that which has been above detailed. Accordingly, although its particular application here is to spiritual Pastors, yet it has reference to the taught—the true 'sheep,' who promptly hear the joyful sound of the Gospel.

1. αὐλὴν] The word means a hovel, open at the sides, formed by strong hurdles, and close wickerwork. By αὐλὴ τῶν προβάτων is here designated the Jewish people, the Church of God and Christ, who needed the food of spiritual instruction; see Ezek. xxxiv. 11. Jerem. xxiii. 4, sq. To enter in by the door was a proverbial expression, to denote making a regular ingress. So Arrian in Epict. ii. 11, ἀρχὴ φιλοσοφίας παρά γε τοῖς ὧς δαί, καὶ κατὰ τὴν θύραν, ἀπομνησθε αὐτῆς, συναίσθησις τῆς αὐτοῦ σωτηρίας. Christ is called the door, since by him ('the way, the truth, and the life') we have 'an entrance ministered unto us into the everlasting kingdom' (2 Pet. i. 11). Κλέπτῃς καὶ ληστὴς properly differ, as our thief (or pilferer) and robber (or highwayman), the one referring to private stealing, the other to public and violent robbery. Here, however, they have little or no difference, but, being united, exert a force greater than either would have separately.

3. ὁ θυρωρὸς] i. e. one of the under-shepherds in attendance at the door of the αὐλῆς. The Jewish sheepfolds were built strong and substantial, guarded both within and without, being surrounded by a wall to prevent admission, except by the regular entrance, and provided with a door, kept by a porter, and secured by bars and bolts.

—τῆς φωνῆς αὐ. ἀκούει] i. e. 'attend to, obey his orders.' Φωνὴ denotes either those inarticulate sounds, as whistling, &c., or certain words, such as were addressed to the animals, on which see Aristot. Hist. An. vi. 19. The calling them by their names is illustrated by what Wolf and Wetstein adduce, who prove that ancient names were given not only to horses, oxen, dogs, &c., but also to sheep, and even goats. So Longua, Past. iv. p. 136, τοὺς τράγους ἐκάλεσαν ὀνόματι, and cxlviii, ἐκάλεσεν τινὰς αὐτῶν ὀνόμασι; which two passages confirm the text.

rec. καλεῖ, for which φωνῇ is edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., from A, D, L, X, and 4 cursives (to which I can add nothing); very insufficient authority, espec. since internal evidence is in favour of φωνῇ, which is a term characteristic of the Evangelist, whereas the other is a mere critical alteration. This is confirmed by Hesych., who explains φωνῇ not only by λέγει, but by λαλεῖ, which cannot be right, since such a use is unprecedented. I am surprised that the Editors did not see that Hesych. must have written καλεῖ, probably with reference to this passage, or to that of Mark x. 49.

4. ἔμπροσθεν αὐτῶν πορεύεται] Contrary to the custom which prevails in the West, the Eastern shepherds precede their flocks, and lead them by peculiar sounds of the voice; see Ps. xxiii. 2. lxxvii. 20. lxxx. 1. The custom (no doubt introduced by the Moors) still continues in Spain.

5. For ἀκολουθήσωσιν, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read -σουσιν, from A, B, D, E, F, C, Δ, and some 5 cursives; to which I can add 3 Lamb. and 5 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 17; but external evidence is rather in favour of the text. rec., since the Subjunct. Aor. is the ordinary Greek usage, and the Fut. Indic. the pure Classical. I doubt not that -σουσιν was a critical alteration, to introduce a better Greek form, and one more suitable to the φεύξονται just after.

6. παροιμίαν] Not put for παραβολήν; for I agree with Mr. Alford, that this is not properly a parable, but a parabolic allegory.

7. What is here said is, as Gresswell observes, not an explanation, but a continuation and an enlargement of the former topic, though with this difference, that the former is allegory throughout, the latter is not. Indeed, amidst a profusion of figurative images Christ has distinctly appropriated to their true sense only the personal character of the shepherd and owner of the flock, and the personal character of those opposed to him, whether as robbers or hired attendants on the sheep. Θύρα denotes not only door, but access; also, as here, the medium thereof,—he who gives it. To which purpose Wetstein appositely cites a passage of Ignat. ad Philadelph. § 9, αὐτὸς ὡς θύρα τοῦ Πατρὸς, δι' ἣς εἰσέρχονται Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Ἰσαὰκ καὶ Ἰακώβ καὶ οἱ προφῆται, see Eph. ii. 18. Taken in conjunction with what precedes, and what follows at v. 9, the primary import of the words a ch. 14. 6.

Heb. 10. 19,

ὅτι *ἐγὼ εἰμι ἡ θύρα τῶν προβάτων. ⁸ Πάντες, ὅσοι [πρὸ ἐμοῦ] ἦλθον, κλέπται εἰσὶ καὶ λησταί· ἀλλ' οὐκ ἤκουσαν αὐτῶν

must be, that Christ is the only way through which believers can enter into the Church of God (see ver. 9. xiv. 6. Eph. ii. 18. Heb. x. 19, 20); though it may include, in an under sense, that as a man must observe and pass through the door, in order to his making a regular and unsuspected entrance into a sheepfold, so any real pastor must maintain a proper regard to Christ, in order to his being a true teacher in the Church.

8. πρὸ ἐμοῦ] These words are absent from very many MSS. (to which I add 8 Lamb. and 12 Mus. copies), Versions, Fathers, and early Editions, and are cancelled by Matthæi; but wrongly; for it is one of the most certain of Critical canons, that an omission of words, which have occasioned perplexity to Commentators, is always to be regarded as suspicious. And there are reasons which make this Canon stronger in the Scriptures than in the Classical writers. The omission might, in the present case, be purposely made, to save the honour of Moses and the Prophets, especially as the Manichæans denied their Divine legation. Internal evidence, therefore, is so strong in favour of these words, as to balance even a superiority of external, which, however, does not exist. Besides, the words are almost necessary to make any tolerable sense. They must, then, be regarded as genuine; and the only question is, what is their true import? Many ancient and modern Commentators take πρὸ for ἀντί, and suppose an ellipsis of ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ Πατρὸς μου; understanding it of false Christs, as Theudas, and Judas of Galilee. A view also maintained by those who take πρὸ in the usual sense before. Of these two interpretations, however, the former supposes a sense by no means authorized by use, and introduces an inadmissible ellipsis; nay, involves an anachronism; for, as the best Expositors are agreed, it cannot be proved that there were any false Christs previous to that time. And if even one such could be found, it would not justify the πάντες ὅσοι. One thing is plain, that our Lord could not have meant to include Moses and the Prophets, of whom he every where speaks in terms of the highest reverence. The best solution of this difficulty is supposed to be that of Bengel, Rosenm., Campb., and Kuin., who think that ἦλθον is to be taken of time recently past, and up to the present; i. e. 'Now our Lord (say they) throughout this discourse considers himself, viz. as the supreme spiritual Shepherd, through whose instruction and grace the under shepherds must be admitted into his fold, the Church.' 'In this view (says Campbell) the words are directed chiefly against the Scribes and Pharisees, considered as teachers, whose doctrine was far from breathing the same spirit with his, and whose chief object was not, like that of the good Shepherd, to feed and protect the flock, but like that of the robber, or of the wolf, to devour them.' Yet in this there is something not a little harsh; 1. in arbitrarily taking ἦλθον as a kind of Proterite-present; 2. in understanding ἦλθον to mean 'have come, as teachers'; for (not to mention that this is inconsistent with the πρὸ ἐμοῦ) our Lord is here not representing himself as the Shepherd, a teacher, but as the good Shepherd; which, as is shown at ver. 11, must principally involve the idea of governing. But how, then, will the parallel hold good between the Messiah and the Scribes and Pharisees? In order to remove this difficulty, many have understood ὅσοι πρὸ ἐμοῦ of false Christs. This however (as we have seen) is at variance with facts. After full and repeated consideration of the words, I am persuaded that the only way to arrive at the truth is to suppose the parallel to be perfect, and to keep in view the leading ideas in ποίμην ὁ καλός. In short, by ὅσοι πρὸ ἐμοῦ ἦλθον are, I conceive, meant those who before Christ had come in the character of supreme Shepherd of the people, and promising access to salvation, as Mediator of the Mosaic covenant. So Gal. iii. 19, the Law is said to have been διαταγὴ δι' ἀγγέλου ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου. And at Heb. viii. 6. ix. 15. xii. 24, the Mediator of the new and better covenant is tacitly compared with that of the old and imperfect one. Now that this Mediator under the old covenant could be no other than the High Priest is plain, and is proved by the parallel drawn by St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, between Christ and the Mediator of the first covenant, the High Priest; first, between Moses, the original Mediator, and Christ, ch. iii.; and then between the successive Mediators, the High Priests for the time being, ch. iv. 15, οὐ γὰρ ἔχουσιν ἀρχιερεῖς μὴ θανάτων, &c. ἀλλὰ, &c. Again, ch. v. 1, it is said, πᾶς γὰρ ἀρχιερεὺς ἐξ ἀνθρώπων λαμβανόμενος, which is exemplified by Aaron, the first High Priest. So also at ch. vii. Paul continues the parallel between these mediators, the High Priests who die, and him who is a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. See also at vv. 23, 26, 27, 28. At ch. viii. and ix. he proceeds in the parallel, instituting a most minute comparison. Thus it is evident that the expression in question, ὅσοι πρὸ ἐμοῦ ἦλθον may very well mean those who before Christ had sustained the office of temporary mediators between God and man, but who were now disannulled by the disannulling of the old covenant, and the coming of a new and better Mediator, the Lord of the Temple himself. But how, it may be asked, does this character of κλέπται καὶ λ. correspond to the High Priests? I answer, 1. it has been admitted by almost every Commentator that πάντες may very well be taken to denote πολλοί. 2. It is almost universally agreed, that by κλέπται καὶ λησται we are only to understand rapacious persons, chiefly intent on gain. And that most of the High Priests under the second Temple at least were such, the History of Josephus will abundantly testify; nay, it is clear that almost all of them for the last 60 or 70 years had been such; persons who bought their office, and then made as much of it as they could, for the short time they were allowed to hold it. The traits of their characters, as delineated by Josephus, exactly correspond to those adverted to in the present comparison, vv. 10, 12, 13, namely, avarice and extortion, united with the utmost timidity, and neglect of protecting those under their governance. That our Lord meant chiefly the High Priests of a recent period, is plain from the use of the present tense, εἰσι. Now that the sheep should not listen to their spiritual admonitions might be expected; and that they did not is attested by what we find in Josephus. If these be not the persons our Lord had in view, I should be ready to say, with Bp. Lonsd., that 'it does not seem possible to determine to what persons Christ here refers.'

It is evident that vv. 7 and 9 should be read in connexion with each other; as also should vv. 8 and 10; the latter expanding, and fixing, the sense of the former.

9. ἡ θύρα] Meaning, 'the [only] Mediator, through whom access is given to the Father,' see Rom. v. 2. Eph. ii. 18, compared with Heb. ix. 15.—ἐάν τις εἰσέλθῃ—εὐρήσει. Commentators are not agreed whether these words are to be referred to shepherds (i. e. spiritual pastors), or to the sheep, their flock. Some suppose the former; some the latter; and Erasmus. and Tittm. both. So, too, Stier, iv. 494; rightly, I am now of opinion. The expression εἰσαλ. καὶ ἐξελ. is a form of pastoral imagery, adapted to the context, expressive of undisturbed enjoyment of blessings. Comp. Ps. xxiii. 1, 2.

10. ὁ κλέπτης] Meaning, 'the false teacher,' i. e. 'the false teachers;' for this is (as appears from ver. 1) put in the singular, as being taken for a class of persons; on which see Middl., Gr. Art. The terms θύσῃ and ἀπολέσῃ are graphis (signifying respectively 'butcher and destroy'), and describe what was often done by the roving bands of marauders who then infested Judæa, and who used sometimes to destroy such cattle as they could not carry off: see note on Acts xx. 29. Thus the full sense is, that 'as the sheep-stealer enters into the fold only to steal, or to kill and destroy; so the false teachers enter in only for the purpose of their own selfish gain.' The next words mark the contrast; meaning that 'the intent of the true Teacher, the good Shepherd, is to preserve life, and to impart it superabundantly; lit. 'over and above' what is necessary to preserve life: an allusion to the case of sheep, which, in order to thrive, must have not merely sufficient, but exuberant pasture; see Lucret. ii. 317, seqq. Thus is intimated the infinite richness of that life eternal, unto which believers attain through Christ; see 1 Cor. ii. 9. 2 Pet. i. 11. 2 Cor. iv. 15. 1 Tim. i. 14.

11. The foregoing representation paves the way by a change of imagery,—from the door of the fold to what was represented thereby,—for the announcement of Himself as, not a good shepherd, but the Good Shepherd,—the Pattern of all the rest, 'the Great Shepherd of the Sheep,' Heb. xiii. 20; 'the Shepherd of men's souls,' 1 Pet. ii. 25; foretold under that character in the prophecies of the Old Test.; see Isa. xl. 11. Ezek. xxxiv. 11—16. xxxv. 24. Zech. xiii. 7. Micah v. 4. The next words strongly point, by the repetition of the appellation, at that particular quality of a good shepherd (the owner of the sheep) which especially characterizes the Shepherd of souls,—to be ready to hazard, or, if necessary, to lay down his life for the sheep. The full sense is required, as applied to the Saviour. Our Lord, indeed, here only intimates what at ver. 15 and 17 he plainly expresses. Accordingly, the full meaning is, that 'As the good shepherd hazards, or even lays down, his life for his flock (see Sil. Ital. iii. fin.), so does the Messiah, represented by the Prophets under that character, lay down his life for his spiritual flock, the human race; words strongly inculcating the great doctrine of the Atonement.

12. ὁ μισθωτὸς δὲ, &c.] This is intended to illustrate the character of the good shepherd by contrast with the bad, who is called a hireling, not because all such hirelings are unfaithful, but that they are generally, more or less, such; and the imagery is changed, in order to represent (perhaps with some allusion to the Jewish Rulers) the mercenary, self-seeking character of the class of persons designated under the figure of the hireling, namely, the false teachers.

— The words οὐκ εἰσὶ τὰ πρόβατα show that the shepherd is supposed to be likewise the owner of the sheep; such as in Hom. Odyss. iv. 87, is called indifferently ἄναξ, 'dominus,' 'possessor,' and ποιμὴν.

14. Our Lord, as Bp. Lonsd. observes, 'applies what he had said of the shepherd and his sheep at vv. 3—5, to the relation between himself and his people; the closeness of which he points out by comparing the knowledge which he and his people have of each other, even to that knowledge which his Father has of him, and he has of his Father; and as the one is complete and perfect, so is the other intimate and close—both inseparably connected by the bonds of perfect love.'

15. καθὼς γινώσκει—Πατέρα] These words are closely connected with the preceding verse (from which they are unnaturally disjoined by the division of verses), being an illustration by similitude of what was there said; q. d. 'I both know my sheep, and am known of them, even as the Father knoweth me, and I know the Father.' On the deep doctrine involved in this reciprocity of knowledge between the Father and the Son, see Smith's Scrip. Test., l. iii. § 4, and on the evidence to the Divinity of Christ in this whole context, see l. ii. ch. 4, § 23, as headed, 'Jehovah the Saviour and Shepherd.' The last clause of this verse—καὶ τὴν ψυχὴν μου—προβάτων,—properly connect with the first clause of v. 14, ἔχω—καὶ δε, and, taken together, they declare distinctly what was only intimated supra v. 11; where see note. By τῶν προβ. are meant those designated as such in the Parable; meaning, his faithful disciples,—those who really follow his steps as 'the Shepherd of their souls'; for those the Lord hath, strictly and properly, laid down his life.

—With the grievous errors of those who seek to subvert the grand doctrine of the Atonement by manifest sophistry I need not trouble my readers; and I will only remark, how edifying it is to contrast the dogmas of modern heresiarchs on this vitally important subject,—namely, the vicarious death of Christ, with the uncontaminated orthodoxy of a venerable Apostolic Father. 'Ἐν ἀγάπῃ προσελάβετο ἡμᾶς ὁ Διεσπότης, διὰ τὴν ἀγάπην, ἣν ἔσχεν πρὸς ἡμᾶς, τὸ αἷμα αὐτοῦ ἰδῶκεν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ὁ Χριστὸς ὁ Κύριος ἡμῶν, ἐν θελήματι Θεοῦ, καὶ τὴν σάρκα ὑπὲρ τῆς σαρκὸς ἡμῶν, καὶ τὴν ψυχὴν ὑπὲρ τῶν ψυχῶν ἡμῶν. Clemens Rom. l Epist. ad Corinth. § 49.

16. By the ἄλλα πρόβατα οὐκ ἐκ τ. αὐλῆς ταύτης are clearly to be understood the Gentiles, whose admission into the Church of Christ is here spoken of, as, by anticipation, already his sheep. By 'this fold' is plainly meant the Jewish people, who, it is said, must be brought, as necessary in order to accomplish the Divine purposes concerning them, and to the fulfilment of the prophecies of the Old Test. thereon; and our Lord so speaks, because it was his purpose to call them; and he foreknew that they would OBEY his call;—a foreknowledge evidently superhuman. The words καὶ τῆς φωνῆς μου, which are predictive ('they will hear'), point at the means of their being brought,—namely, by Christ calling them through the medium of his Apostles, by their preaching the Gospel. The expression τῆς αὐλῆς ταύτης does not necessarily involve the existence of another fold, containing the Gentiles, espec. since the Gentiles were not yet called, much less folded; and when they should be brought, it would be unto the one, not fold, but flock, ποίμνη, under the εἰς ποιμὴν spoken of in Heb. xiii. 20.

17. διὰ τοῦτο—με ἀγαπᾷ, ὅτι] This is strongly stated, on the eternal ground of the love of the Father for the Son, 'because he laid down his life;' not, however, that there was not another adverted to supra iii. 35; see the able notes of Lampe and Calv. Accordingly, Matt. Henry says, that 'as the Son of God, he was beloved of his Father from all eternity; but as God-man, he was therefore beloved of the Father, because he undertook to die for the sheep.' What an instance of God's love to Man, that he loved his Son the more for loving us! In fact, Christ's death was the purchase of his Father's love both to him and to us.

—ἵνα πάλιν λάβω αὐτήν] meaning, 'in order that I may take it again, resume it, by accomplishing the purpose for which I came into the world;' i. e. not only by dying, but also by rising from the dead. 'This resuming it was,' as Matt. Henry says, 'the effect of his Father's love, and the first step to his exaltation; and the purpose of his laying down his life was, that he might thus evince himself to be the Son of God with power by his resurrection.' Rom. i. 4. See Calv.

18. οὐδεὶς αἶρει—λαβὼν αὐτήν] The full sense is, 'No one [not even the Father] taketh it from me against my will,—compelleth me to die for my flock. I have, of my own will, undertaken to lay down my life for it, and do so lay it down.' The next words are meant to evince this voluntary laying down, inasmuch as our Lord had power in himself as well to lay down his life, as power to take it up; on account of which voluntary obedience to his Father's commandments (see v. 17) his Father loved him. The next words are explanatory of ἐξουσίαν ἔχω, a phrase importing full power, from participation in the Godhead, showing that this arose from the express ἐντολή, 'appointment,' 'ordinance,' of the Father, into which, as the counsel of his will, Christ resolves the whole matter, as resulting from his mediatorial office.

On the irrefragable proof supplied by this passage to the Divinity of Christ, see Dr. Whitby, Abp. Magee, Dr. P. Smith, and Mr. Greenwell. The point of our Lord's argument is, as Dr. Smith observes, the spontaneity of the act, which he performs in obedience to his Father's will, and for which the Father loveth him. The ἐντολή, commission, of the Father refers, not only to the resuming of life, but to the whole transaction, the laying down and receiving again; and this is a repetition of the fundamental doctrine of Christianity, that 'all things are of the Father, and through the Son; and ἐμαντοῦ ἐξουσίαν ἔχω θεῖναι αὐτήν, καὶ ἐξουσίαν ἔχω πάλιν λαβεῖν αὐτήν. ταυτην τὴν ἐντολὴν ἔλαβον παρὰ τοῦ Πατρός μου. ¹⁹ Ἰσχίωμα οὖν πάλιν ἐγένετο ἐν τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις διὰ τοὺς λόγους τούτους. ²⁰ ἔλεγον δὲ πολλοὶ ἐξ αὐτῶν Ἰδαιμόνιον ἔχει καὶ μαίνεται τί αὐτοῦ ἀκούετε; ²¹ ἄλλοι ἔλεγον Ταῦτα τὰ ῥήματα οὐκ ἔστι δαιμονιζόμενον ²² μὴ δαιμόνιον δύναται τυφλῶν ὀφθαλμοὺς ἀνοίγειν; ²³ καὶ περιεπάτει ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ ἐν τῇ στοᾷ [τοῦ] Σολομῶνος. ²⁴ Ἐκύκλωσαν οὖν αὐτὸν οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, καὶ

God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, and sent him into the world, that the world through him might be saved.' Dr. Smith ably refutes the Unitarian gloss by which ἐξουσία is supposed to imply a delegated authority; showing its inconsistency, both with the rest of Scripture (see Luke xii. 5. Rom. ix. 21, and Acts i. 7), and especially from the context here.

^{21.} μὴ δαιμόνιον—ἀνοίγειν] Meaning to say, 'can we suppose that a demon (as inhabiting the dæmoniac) would be willing, even if able, to open the eyes of the blind?' For, though demons were believed to have the power of working miracles, yet never for any good to man, since they were supposed to be utterly hostile to the human race; and no wonder, considering that they were servants of the great enemy of man.

^{22.} τὰ ἑγκαίνια] The word answers in the Sept. to the Heb. תְּחִלָּה, handselling, or initiation; and in the New Test. denotes the encanement, or festival of eight days, occurring in the month Kisleu, instituted by Judas Maccabæus in commemoration of the purifying of the Temple from Heathen pollution, and the renewal of the Temple worship, after three years' desuetude and profanation. Unlike all other festivals,—which were kept only at Jerusalem,—this was celebrated throughout the whole of Judæa. And as lights were kept burning in every house throughout each night of the festival, it is called by Josephus, Antt. xii. 7, 7, φῶτα.

—χειμῶν] Meaning, as the best Commentators are agreed, 'stormy wintry weather,' as in Matt. xvi. 3. Acts xxvii. 20. Ezra x. 9. And so hiems in Latin. This suggests a reason for his walking in Solomon's Portico. Whence this Portico had its name, is a disputed point. The opinion of the older Commentators was, that it was so called, as being a portion of the Temple of Solomon, which had been left undestroyed by the Chaldeans, and was therefore allowed to remain, though in a dilapidated state. And they suppose the Portico to be that which Joseph. Antt. xx. 9, 7, calls ἡ ἀνατολικὴ στοᾷ, and which he there expressly says was ἔργον Σολομῶνος τοῦ βασιλέως πρώτου διαμαμένου (I conjecture βασιλ. τοῦ πρώτου δαιμ., as in Bell. v. 4, 1) τὸ σύμπαν ἱερὸν. And the Historian has before related that this Portico had not been restored by Herod, which favours the supposition in question; for thus it might more easily preserve the name of its builder; since the Southern Portico, which was the greatest, was called the Royal Portico, as having been especially adorned by the kings, and particularly Herod. Indeed, it can hardly be imagined why this of all the Porticoes, should be called Solomon's, unless from its having been in a great measure the building left by Solomon. It should seem, then, to have been built by Solomon, and afterwards restored, from a dilapidated state, by Zorobabel. Far more probable is this than the supposition of many Commentators from Grotius downwards, and most recent ones, that it was called Solomon's Portico, as occupying the place of the Portico built by Solomon on the Eastern side of the hill, and of which mention is made in Jos. Bell. v. 5, 1; from which passage it appears that this was the only side on which a Portico was then erected; the others, he says, being left without; κατὰ γὰρ τὰ λοιπὰ μέρη γυμνοὶ ὁ ναὸς ἦν. There were afterwards porticoes erected all round the Temple. Porticoes were common in the Heathen temples likewise, being erected for the accommodation of the priests and the worshippers in general, both for walking in inclement weather, and for the purpose of teachers communicating oral instruction, while walking, to their followers (so Cebes, cited by Weiststein: ἐνυγχάζουσιν περιπατοῦντες ἐν τῷ τοῦ Κρόνου ἱερῷ); from which circumstance, indeed, two principal sects of Philosophers, namely, the Stoics and the Peripatetics, derived their names.

^{24—32.} On the scope and character of this important portion, see Smith's Scrip. Test. i. iii. 3, 3, who gives the following summary of the substance of the doctrine therein:—'We have here, 1. the avowal of his official subordination to the Father, in having been designated, commissioned, sent, and endowed with a peculiar property in his people, and in exercising miraculous powers by the authority of the Father. 2. The assertion of his own power to confer the blessings of salvation; namely, holy character, immortal happiness, deliverance from moral danger, and security against all possible hostility. Let it be observed that, in the evident nature of the case, and according to the uniform tenour of Scripture, the bestowment of such gifts implies the attribute of All-sufficiency in the Donor. 3. This assurance of security is repeated, with a confirmatory declaration, that the Omnipotence of the Almighty Father is pledged to the same object. 4. These two assurances are consolidated into the proposition, I and my Father ARE ONE.'

²⁴. τὴν ψυχὴν ἡμ. αἰρεῖς;] for ἀναρτᾶς. The full sense being, ‘keepest us in suspense between hope and fear, belief and disbelief.’ This figurative sense to ‘hold our minds in suspense,’ arises from the same metaphor as that in αἰεῖν, as used in Thucyd. vii. 77, where see my notes; and so Philostr. V. Ap. ii. 4, καὶ πάντῃ αἰρεῖ ὁ λόγος ὃν εἰρηκα: for in the sense to raise aloft may be implied, from the very nature of the thing, the previous sinking of any thing; and thus will arise an apt image of mental vacillation, which may be illustrated by a parallel use of μεταωριζέσθαι at Luke xii. 29.

— παρρησίᾳ] On this expression see note supra vii. 4.—Ὁ Χριστός. This our Lord had by implication claimed to be, by having applied to himself the predictions of the Prophets respecting the Great Shepherd.

²⁵. τὰ ἔργα—ἐμοῦ] The sense is: ‘[Nay,] the works (i. e. the miracles) which I do by the authority of my Father, these bear witness of me [that I am sent by Him].’ This authority from God, however, our Lord had, not as a mere legate, but as being partaker of the Divine nature and attributes. See v. 17, sq.

²⁶. οὐ γὰρ ἴστα, &c.] This suggests the cause of their unbelief,—namely, that they are not of his flock, will not suffer themselves to be brought into it, being unwilling to cultivate the proper dispositions for it. With the words καθὼς εἶπον ὑμῖν Commentators are somewhat perplexed, since Christ had no where before told them that they were not his sheep. To remove this difficulty, it seems, some ancient Critics cancelled the clause; for to no other cause can we well ascribe the omission of it in several ancient, but altered, MSS. and some Versions. Nor is it easy to believe (what some modern Critics aver, in deference to whom Lachm. brackets the words) that the words were foisted in by the scribes; nay, it is incredible that such a clause, by no means necessary to the sense, should have crept into nearly all the MSS. As to Versions, they are not good authority for omissions, and especially of what is perplexing. There can be no doubt that the clause is genuine; and though we find nothing of this kind said in our Lord’s preceding discourses, yet may it not have reference to something said by Christ, but not recorded by St. John? This is preferable to supposing, with some, that it was indirectly expressed; i. e. implied in our Lord’s words. However, as there is plainly a reference to the preceding discourse of the good Shepherd (for our Lord now proceeds to resume the allegory), and since, though our Lord does not there use these words, but does, in fact, say (v. 3) that ‘his sheep hear his voice,’ so it is probable, though not certain, that καθὼς, &c., belong to those words, and should therefore be joined with the following verse, as they have been, on the authority of some MSS., Versions, and Euthymius, by many Expositors, including Bp. Lonsd., who, taking verses 26 and 27 in connexion, lays down the conjoint sense thus: ‘But ye believe not, because ye are not of the number of those rightly-disposed persons, whom I have just now described to you as “my sheep,” and of whom I said unto you that they “hear my voice; and I know them, and they follow me.”’ However, the connexion is, after all, an open question.

²⁷—²⁹. These verses introduce a further description of the sheep, presenting in v. 27, as Calvin says, an argumentum e contrariis, to prove that they are not of his sheep, because they do not hearken to his word in the Gospel. Then it is added, to those who do, that he recognizes them as his sheep, inasmuch as they follow him in faith and obedience. Then at v. 28 is added the result, that he bestows on them life everlasting,—a declaration strengthened by the solemn declaration, οὐ μὴ ἀπολ. εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, ‘they shall by no means ever (at any time) come to perdition.’ Comp. John viii. 51. The words following, καὶ οὐχ ἀρπάσει—μου are confirmatory, and further elucidatory, of the promise. In the next verse is suggested the reason why no being, not even the devil, can snatch these faithful disciples out of his hands,—namely, that the Father hath delivered them to him, in order to be preserved and redeemed; that omnipotent Being in whom are the issues of life and death, both temporal and spiritual. The whole passage bears strong attestation to the Divinity of Christ, but gives, as Whitby shows, when properly understood, no countenance to the doctrine (refuted by Heb. xii. 15), that the elect can never fall away from grace and perish; having, in truth, no relation to personal election, or final perseverance.

³⁰. ἐγὼ καὶ ὁ Πατὴρ ἓν ἐσμεν] Some ancient and many modern Commentators, as Erasmus, Bucer, Pearce, Rosenm., Kuin., and Wets., understand this expression ἓν ἐσμεν, of consent of will, purpose, counsel, and works. A view which they support from John xvii. 21—23;

31 ἡ Εβράστασαν οὖν πάλιν λίθους οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, ἵνα λιθάσωσιν αὐτόν. ^{ch. 8. 58.} 32 Ἀπεκρίθη αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Πολλὰ καλὰ ἔργα ἔδειξα ὑμῖν ἐκ τοῦ Πατρὸς μου· διὰ ποῖον αὐτῶν ἔργον λιθάζετε με ; 33 Ἀπεκρίθησαν αὐτῷ οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, λέγοντες· Περὶ καλοῦ ἔργου οὐ λιθάζομέν σε, ἀλλὰ περὶ βλασφημίας, καὶ ὅτι σὺ ἄνθρωπος ὢν ποιεῖς σεαυτὸν Θεόν. ^{u ver. 30. ch. 5. 17, 18.} 34 Ἀπεκρίθη αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Οὐκ ἔστι γεγραμμένον ἐν τῷ νόμῳ ὑμῶν, Ἐγὼ εἶπα, θεοὶ ἐστε ; ^{u Ps. 82. 6. Mark 1. 34. Luke 4. 18.} ὅτι εἶπον· Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ εἰμι ; 37 Εἰ οὐ ποιῶ τὰ ἔργα τοῦ

and Wets. confirms it from Eur. Or. 1191, ἢν τι Μενέλιος σὶ δρῶ, | ἢ τόνδε καμὶ· πᾶν γὰρ ἓν φίλον τόδε, q. d. 'one body and one soul, we being one and the same.' But though the usus loquendi permits this sense of the formula, yet the context at large forbids it, though that immediately preceding may seem to countenance it. Besides, so sudden and discursive are the transitions in this discourse of our Lord, that any such argument as the one in question is precarious. Far more attention is due to the view taken by many ancient interpreters (espec. the orthodox Fathers), and adopted by Lampe, by whom the expression is taken of physical unity,—namely, of essence and nature, including moral unity. While some, as Calv. and others down to Tittm., take the words as referring to union of energy and power,—a view which Tittm. studies to show is supported by the context; and his course of argument goes to trace a union of attributes. It would decidedly seem that the safest mode of interpretation is that of the ancients and of Lampe, who elaborately interprets it to mean, 'One in essence primarily,' and so, by implication, 'One in energy, power,' &c. (See his able note); q. d. 'No one can snatch them out of my hand: no one can snatch them out of my Father's hand. I and my Father are ONE.' Whichever interpretation be adopted, the words can import no less than a claim to equality with the Father, and consequently they prove the DEITY of our Lord; exactly as the passage at viii. 58, which, and the present, the Jews evidently so understood; a construction which, had it been false, Jesus would have been bound to correct and disavow.

31. Ἐβράστασαν] 'took up.' An idiom thought to be Hellenistic; but that it is not really such appears from its being used by the pure Attic writer Antiphanes ap. Stob., where a Sovereign says of his diadem, 'If you knew to what perils and troubles it exposes the wearer, οὐκ ἂν ἐνὶ κοπρίᾳ κείμενον αὐτὸ ἐβράστασας.' However, it may have been one of the idioms of common life, such as are frequent in writers like Antiphanes and others of the Comic Drama. On stoning, as the punishment inflicted for blasphemy, see Lev. xxiv. 14—16.

32. πολλὰ καλὰ ἔργα ἔδειξα ὑμῖν] This is said with reference not only to the wonderful miracles which Christ wrought, but to his whole course of action in promulgating the Gospel of grace. Ἐδειξα may, indeed, seem to relate most to the former; but it has often in the Classical writers simply the sense of adere, præstare, 'to perform.' So Plato, Hipp. 512, πολλὰ καὶ καλὰ ἔργα σοφίας ἀπαδείξατο (where, for ἀπαδ., I conjecture ἱπαδ.). Themist. O. 13, ἔργον καλὸν ἐπιδείκνυσθαι.—By ἐκ τοῦ Πατρὸς μου is meant, 'in virtue of the power vested in me by my Father.'

—λιθάζετε] lit. 'are ye stoning,' 'going to stone?' This use of the Present, of what is just about to commence, and is in preparation, often occurs.

34. οὐκ ἔστι γεγραμμένον, &c.] In repelling the above charge, our Lord was pleased not fully to explain the nature of that union which he had claimed with the Deity, and the grounds on which he had called God his Father, and himself the Son of God; but he contented himself with using a sort of argument quite in the Jewish style (and therefore adapted to make an impression on his hearers), reasoning with them on the ground of what they themselves admitted,—namely, that he was a Prophet sent from God,—and showing that, even on that supposition, he had a right to the title which they refused him; alluding to Psalm lxxxii. 6, where judges and magistrates are called Elohim, sons of the most high God.

35. πρὸς οὓς ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ ἔγ.] Meaning, 'to whom was delivered the command mentioned just before,' namely, to plead the cause of the destitute, &c.—Καὶ οὐ δύναται λυθῆναι ἡ γρ. Meaning, 'And the Scriptures cannot be taken exception to, or contradicted.'

36. The argument is one a minore ad majus, q. d. 'If they could in any sense, however remote, be styled gods, and even that only officially, how much more properly He whom the Father hath consecrated as τὸν Ἅγιον τοῦ Θεοῦ!' They were only so styled gods; He, by being consecrated, (ἡγιασμένος ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ), and sealed as the ὁ Χριστὸς (supra vi. 27, and note) is both Υἱὸς Θεοῦ, and, as has before been shown, essentially GOD. That the Jews so interpreted our Lord's words as to apply to Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, so used by him, the same sense as One equal with God, and essentially GOD, is manifest. See more in the able notes of Calv., and Maldonat, and especially of Lampe, who concludes a masterly course of argument in the following words:—'Evidenter itaque hæc argumentatio infert summam Servatoris nostri Deitatem. Qui enim super omnes Deos dictissus se effert, eoque ut Deus typicus considerat, quorum ipse erat antitypus, ille se ἀληθινὸν Θεὸν esse declarat.' In loc. vol. ii. p. 724.

37. 'Diluto blasphemie crimine reddit Salvator ad rem ipsam, et se Deum esse probat' (L. Brug.).

'Ne exciperent Judæi, frustra ab eo jactari sanctificationem, et quicquid inde pendeat, iterum inculcat sua miracula, in quibus satis luculentum ediderat specimen suæ Divinitatis' (Lampe, in loc.). Our Lord here reverts to the testimony of his works, as supra 32, in proof of his Divinity, and especially to their character as evidencing that Divinity. The full sense included in the words εἰ οὐ ποιῶ—μοι may be thus expressed,—'If my works do not bear the character of the Father, believe me not when I avow myself his Son; but if they do, however ye may discredit my claim to be such, believe the testimony of the works to the character of the worker.' The concluding expression, γνῶτε, a very strong one, means, 'that so ye may ascertain and fully know (from previous examination) the truth of what I said,—that I and my Father are one.' Such is the real sense of this peculiar Johannine mode of expression to denote entire conjunction, implying a conjunction of one and the same Divine energy. See more in Lampe, and especially in Bp. Bull. Judic. Eccl. Cath. p. 42.

39. In ἐξῆλθ. ἐκ τῆς χειρὸς αὐτῶν there is a pregnancy of expression, meaning, 'He got out of their hands, and went forth and made his escape;' as on a former occasion, viii. 59, when they tried to apprehend him; and, as on that occasion, so on this, we might suppose that the escape was effected by the aid of his disciples; but, it should rather seem to have been brought about by the exercise of some miraculous mode of withdrawing himself.

40. πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδ. Meaning Bethany, or Bethabara, on the other side of the Jordan. See note on i. 28.

—ἔμεινεν ἐκεῖ 'abode,' i. e. 'made some stay there;' which, however, does not preclude the supposition of some (as Lampe, Kuin., and Tittm.), that he took, during the four months of his sojourn there, some journeys up and down Peræa, where he would be safe from the plots of the Pharisees; but returned in time to receive the message of Mary and Martha respecting the sickness of Lazarus. It may, indeed, be asked why he did not go into the heart of Peræa at once? The reason is, what occurred to Euthym., 'that our Lord chose to withdraw to a place where John had first baptized, in order that the Peræans, who resorted to Bethany to see him, might be reminded of the miracle worked at his baptism, and the unequivocal testimony of John to his Messiahship, and thus be led to believe in him.' The result is related at v. 41, as involved in the reasoning of the persons who resorted to him. 'This John,' they said to themselves, 'worked, indeed, no miracle; yet all that he said of Jesus has been verified by facts—all that he said of the infinite superiority of Jesus to himself, has been proved by the works as well as by the words of Jesus to have been truly spoken.' Consequently, what proved John to be a true prophet, proved Jesus to be what he declared himself to be—the MESSIAH.

Ver. 42 presents the result thereof, — that 'many believed in him.'

XI. The raising of Lazarus after four days' burial.

—The Evangelist now proceeds to narrate the closing scenes of our Lord's life; what is related in this Chapter having taken place only a few days before the Passover on which he suffered death. The raising of Lazarus, being the work of all that Christ had hitherto done, the most stupendous, was studiously recorded by the Evangelist, as illustrating the majesty of our Lord, and indeed the truth of the Christian religion; inasmuch that Spinoza confessed, that, if he could persuade himself that Lazarus was really recalled to life, he would destroy his whole system. No wonder, therefore, that infidels, such as Woolston, and semi-infidels, such as Bardet and Paulus, and their too numerous successors in Germany, should have used every endeavour to destroy the credibility of the miracle. Their cavils, however, have been triumphantly refuted by Lardner, Schoëtig, and others, whom see in Horne's Introd.

The genuineness of the present portion rests on the strongest evidence, not only external, but internal. For 'whether (as Tittman observes) we consider the thing itself, or the manner in which it was done, and the effects which resulted from it; or finally, the simplicity and beauty of the narration, we cannot entertain a doubt as to its entire genuineness.' It may, indeed, seem strange that the other Evangelists did not mention so signal a miracle; for which various reasons have been imagined, the most probable of which is, that, when they wrote, Lazarus was still living; and thus whoever recorded it might have brought Lazarus, not to say his family, into danger, through the persevering persecution of the Jews. See xii. 10, 11. It was, moreover, so well known in Judæa as not to need being recorded. But John wrote for Christians out of Palestine, in Asia Minor, where it might be little known, and therefore require being recorded, espec. by one, of all others the fittest to do so, κάμης Μαρίας καὶ Μάρθας τῆς ἀδελφῆς αὐτῆς. ² Ἦν δὲ ^{b ch. 12. 8.} ^{Matt. 30. 7.} ^{Mark 14. 3.} Μαρία ἡ ἀλείψασα τὸν Κύριον μύρω, καὶ ἐκμάζασα τοὺς πόδας αὐτοῦ ταῖς θριξίν αὐτῆς, ἧς ὁ ἀδελφὸς Λάζαρος ἡσθένει. ³ Ἀπέστειλαν οὖν αἱ ἀδελφαὶ πρὸς αὐτὸν, λέγουσαι· Κύριε, ἵδε, ὃν φιλεῖς, ἀσθενεῖ. ⁴ Ἀκούσας δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἶπεν· Αὕτη ἡ ἀσθενεία οὐκ ἔστι πρὸς θάνατον, ἀλλ' ὑπὲρ τῆς δόξης τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἵνα δοξασθῇ ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ δι' αὐτῆς. ⁵ Ἠγάπα δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς τὴν Μάρθαν καὶ τὴν ἀδελφὴν αὐτῆς, καὶ τὸν Λάζαρον. ⁶ Ὡς οὖν ἤκουσεν ὅτι ἀσθενεῖ, τότε μὲν ἔμεινεν ἐν ᾧ ἦν τότῳ δύο ἡμέρας· ⁷ ἔπειτα μετὰ τοῦτο λέγει τοῖς μαθηταῖς· Ἀγωμεν εἰς τὴν Ἰουδαίαν πάλιν. ⁸ Λέγουσιν αὐτῷ οἱ μαθηταί· Ραββί, as having been an eye-witness of the august scene. Mr. Alf., however, with his usual autocratic dogmatism, pronounces the above solution of the difficulty, approved by the most able Expositors ancient and modern, "quite beside the purpose," and he cuts the knot by an hypothesis of his own, which he doubtless imagines quite 'to the purpose' (but what purpose? and what a purpose!)—namely, that it is to be accounted for "from the fragmentary nature of the three first Gospels." "Sibi habeat!"

1. ἦν δὲ τῇ· Can Mr. Alf. be really serious in pronouncing the δὲ to be here used, as a reason why our Lord's retirement was broken in upon? Nothing whatever has been said about our Lord's retirement; and, if there had, δὲ cannot note a reason why. It is here, as often, transitive, making a transition to something else, and that not necessarily opposed to the foregoing, but simply continuative, as in Matt. i. 18, τοῦ δὲ Ἰ. Χ. γέννησις οὕτως ἦν: iii. 1, ἐν δὲ ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκ. παραγίνεται, where most of the uncials and many cursives have not the δὲ, which has been removed by Critics ignorant of its force, which, indeed, is not easily expressed in a Version.

—ἀσθενῶν] The word is used not only of indisposition, but of dangerous sickness, whether acute or chronic; as Acts ix. 37. Matt. x. 8. Luke iv. 40. vii. 10. Xen. Anab. i. 1, 1. The earnest message sent by the two sisters to implore our Lord's aid, shows that Lazarus was in imminent danger.

—ἀπὸ Βηθ.] The ἀπὸ here seems used simply to denote 'descent from,' namely, to distinguish this Lazarus from others of that name, which was a common one; while the ἐκ denotes 'residence at,' as applied both to Lazarus and the two sisters. In fact, the latter clause of the verse was chiefly used to distinguish this Bethany from that beyond Jordan, mentioned in the last Chapter.

2. ἡ ἀλείψασα] Said, by anticipation, for 'who [afterwards] anointed.' A figure not unfrequent, where the action (as in the present case) is narrated a little further on, and is one well known. There may be, however, a reference to the fact as being well known wherever the Gospel was preached.

4. οὐκ ἔστι πρὸς θάνατον.] Meaning, 'will not terminate in death, properly so called, i. e. 'ultimate privation of life,' 'will not be fatal.' Such is the best interpretation of this dubious mode of expression; which it is better to consider as a popular form of speaking, than to understand by death the decretory death, by which all must return to dust.—ἀλλ' ὑπὲρ, &c., 'but is meant for the manifestation of the glory of God;' namely, by the Son being thereby glorified. See ix. 3. The most eminent Commentators are agreed in considering the words of this verse as addressed to the messengers, but intended as an answer to the sisters. That our Lord himself knew and foresaw all that was to happen in the matter, from first to last, and also its inevitable result in his own destruction, cannot be doubted: hence he was fully warranted in giving this predictive assurance in the answer which announced his compliance with their request; and it was employed in order to comfort the sisters under their great anxiety for their brother; and therefore it would be likely to be said to the messenger, and not, as Alf. seems inclined to think, to the disciples. Indeed, it must have been addressed to the messengers, since it was spoken in answer to the message from the sisters delivered by the messengers, ἵδε, ὃν φιλεῖς, ἀσθενεῖ.

5. ἡγάπα δὲ—Λάζαρον] The Evangelist, as Bullinger observes, begins thus with reference to the words of the sisters to our Lord, ἵδε, ὃν φιλεῖς, ἀσθ., and the words are, as Lampe remarks, meant to show that the sisters had not without reason urged this forcible plea, but used it with the more confidence, since they themselves had also a part in Jesus' love.

6. ὥς οὖν ἤκουσεν] The οὖν does not, as Alf. says, connect with v. 4, but has the continuative force, 'whereupon.' The reason he assigns why it should not be referred to v. 7, would be good if applied to Class. Greek writers, but not to the Evangelist, whose use, or abstinence from use, of the Particles, is often peculiar to himself. This idiom (on which see Matthiz's Gr. p. 1274) is chiefly employed where the οὖν is joined with a Particle of time (so Matt. xxi. 40), ὅταν οὖν ἔλθῃ ὁ Κύριος; but also with words implying time, as ὥς ἤκουσας here.

—ἔμεινεν—δύο ἡμέρας] So that he did not come to Bethany till Lazarus had been dead four days, when corruption must have commenced, and consequently his actual death be placed beyond doubt. Our Lord stayed there two days, not from any want of affection for his friend, but as waiting till Lazarus should be actually dead and buried; that it might not be said he had raised him when not yet dead, but only in a fainting-fit, or trance.

 ch. 10. 20, 21. ἡμεῖς, ὅτι ἵνα ἀποθάνωμεν μετ' αὐτοῦ.

8. οὐν ἐξ.—ὑπάγεις] Render: 'it was but now that the Jews were seeking to stone thee: and art thou setting off thither?' The words are, by the blending of interrogation with exclamation, strongly dissuasive, probably through apprehension for their own safety as well as their Master's.

9, 10. Our Lord prefaces his direct and particular answer to their inquiry by a general remark, couched under the form of a gnome generalis, probably formed on an adagial moral maxim, general in its character, but introduced with a view to its special application by the persons addressed, as in Virgil, Ecl. ii. 18; the meaning being that, 'though a man goes about without stumbling during the whole of the day (or time of the sun above the horizon), yet he cannot do so in the night, because the light of the world is withdrawn'; q. d. 'There is a certain and stated time for labour; the day is that time. Now is my day! Now my business must be done, while alone it can be done at all. And as the traveller is in no danger of stumbling while guided by the light of the sun, so the powers of darkness will not prevail against me until my day has closed.' Our Lord means to intimate that thus it is with him,—in other words, that thus he, as long as the day of his ministry continues, shall go on without hindrance from the Jews; but, when the power of darkness shall prevail against him, then will his ministerial course be similarly arrested.

9. Τὸ φῶς τοῦ κόσμου is usually regarded as periphrasis for τὸν ἥλιον. But the expression may rather be said to denote the light which is shed abroad in the world, for τὸ φῶς τὸ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ.—Ὅτι τὸ φῶς οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν αὐτῷ seems to be a popular expression for τὸ φῶς οὐκ ἔστιν αὐτῷ, 'he is destitute of the light'; as xii. 35. Besides this external sense, however, there is conveyed a more particular and interior sense, as applied to spiritual light from the Fountain of light, without which a man must grope, since there will be otherwise no light in him.

11. κεκοίμηται.—ἐξυπνίσω αὐτόν] In saying only he must go, our Lord expresses himself first figuratively, and then in plain terms. In κεκοίμηται there is an euphemism to denote death, common to all languages (so נָפַח in Hebrew, 'to lie down to sleep'), but which was espec. employed by the sacred writers to denote the death of the righteous; a deep truth, not unknown, however, to the wisest Heathens. Thus a great Greek dramatist says, ἱερὸν ὕπνον κοιμάται· θνήσκειν μὴ λίγῃ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς. The disciples, however (partly misled by their wishes), misunderstood our Lord by saying εἰ κεκοίμηται, σωθ., 'if he has gone to sleep, he will recover'; a sort of popular adage founded on experience. Thus the Rabbins mention sleep among the six good symptoms in sickness; and many passages are adduced by Wetst. from the Classical writers, lauding its beneficial effects. See Eur. Orest. 210. The disciples may have intended to hint, that, as Lazarus was likely to recover, there was no occasion for their Lord to hazard himself in Judaea.

14. Δάζαρος ἀπέθανε] Our Lord now says plainly, 'Lazarus is dead.' The knowledge of this circumstance can be ascribed to nothing but Omniscience.

15. χαίρω δι' ὑμᾶς—ἐκεῖ] The words ἵνα πιστεύσῃτε are not, as many Commentators suppose, parenthetical; but there is a transposition in the construction, for καὶ χαίρω, ὅτι οὐκ ἦμην ἐκεῖ, δι' ὑμᾶς, ἵνα πιστεύσῃτε. The full meaning intended, but part of it only intimated by implication, is, 'I rejoice, on your account, that I was not there to recover him from his sickness [or to restore him to life immediately after death], in order that, when ye shall see him raised to life, after having been four days in the grave, ye may indeed believe in me.' Alf. remarks, that ἵνα is to be taken as the grand end of the miracle; but I find nothing to countenance this novelty of exegesis. It may be questioned whether ἵνα here does really denote 'end' or 'intention' at all,—it would seem simply causal (as oft. in the New Test.), simply denoting 'cause' or 'result,' 'so as that,' in which sense it is taken by all the ancient Translators, from the Pesch. Syr. downwards. The very position of the words ἵνα πιστ., which are semi-parenthetical, calls for this. They are, in fact, explanatory of δι' ὑμᾶς, lit. 'because of you' (Rom. ii. 24), 'on your account; so as that ye may believe in my Messiahship.' The ἀλλὰ just after is hortative; 'but, no more; let us go.'

16. ὁ λεγόμενος Δίδυμος] Most Commentators

17 Ἐλθὼν οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, εὗρεν αὐτὸν τέσσαρας ἡμέρας ἤδη ἔχοντα ἐν τῷ μνημείῳ. 18 Ἦν δὲ ἡ Βηθανία ἐγγὺς τῶν Ἱεροσολύμων, ὡς ἀπὸ σταδίων δεκαπέντε. 19 καὶ πολλοὶ ἐκ τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἐληλύθεισαν πρὸς τὰς περὶ Μάρθαν καὶ Μαρίαν, ἵνα παραμυθῶνται αὐτὰς περὶ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτῶν. 20 Ἡ οὖν Μάρθα, ὡς ἤκουσεν ὅτι [ὁ] Ἰησοῦς ἔρχεται, ὑπήντησεν αὐτῷ· Μαρία δὲ ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ ἐκαθέζετο. 21 Εἶπεν οὖν ἡ Μάρθα πρὸς τὸν Ἰησοῦν Κύριε, ἐἰς ἃς ὥδε, ὁ ἀδελφός μου οὐκ ἂν ἐτεθνήκει. ^{v. 22. ch. 4. 47. 48.} 22 Ἀλλὰ καὶ νῦν, οἶδα ὅτι, ὅσα ἂν αἰτήσῃ τὸν Θεὸν, δώσει σοι ὁ Θεός. 23 Λέγει αὐτῇ ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Ἀναστήσεται ὁ ἀδελφός σου.

take this as an interpretation of Θωμᾶς, i. e. ^{ΘΩΜΑ}. But some think it expresses a surname, as Σίμων ὁ λεγόμενος Πέτρος. This may seem called for by λῆγ., which, however, may be regarded as put for ἐρμηνευόμενος, and then the former interpretation, which seems the more natural, may have place.

—ἀγωμεν—αὐτοῦ] Some would take these words interrogatively; but that is doing violence to the construction. The only question is, whether αὐτοῦ is to be referred to Lazarus or to Jesus. Most modern Commentators adopt the former method, though it does not yield so natural a sense as the latter; which is supported by the ancient and some eminent modern Interpreters, as Calvin, Maldonat, Lampe, Tittman, and Kuinoel. Thomas, keenly alive to the danger which both Jesus and themselves would incur by going into Judæa, exclaims, with characteristic but well-meant bluntness,—"Since our Master will expose himself to such peril, let us, too, go with him, if it be only to share his fate!"

17. ἔλθων] 'having arrived;' not, however, at Bethany itself, but at the vicinity; whither Martha, hearing, it seems, of his approach, or expecting him on that day, had gone to meet him; and had met with him, it seems, not far from the burying-ground, which was always outside of a city or town. Ἐχεν, when used, as here, of time past, signifies agere, transigere; an idiom frequent in the Class. writers. The four days (observes Lampe) seem to be reckoned from the burial of Lazarus; though at ver. 39 the reckoning is made from his death. The interval, however, between death and burial among the Jews was very short, generally only a few hours. The fourth day was probably only begun, not completed.

18. ἀπὸ σταδίων δ.] Sub. γενομένη, expressed in Appian, p. 593, 'it being at about fifteen stadia off.' The use of ἀπὸ prefixed to a noun of measure, denoting distance off, is a later Greek idiom, occurring also infra xxi. 8, also in Luke xxiv. 13, and Rev. xiv. 20; also in Jos. Ant. v. 1, 4. Diod. Sic. i. 51, and Plut. Philop. 4, ἢ ἄργος—ἀπὸ σταδίων τῆς πόλεως.

19. Ἰουδαίων] Chiefly, we may suppose, the Jerusalemites from the vicinity. The best Commentators are agreed that πρὸς τὰς περὶ Μ. καὶ Μ. is simply for πρὸς Μάρθαν καὶ Μ. The idiom is common in the Class. writers; but it does not always mean the person only, but sometimes includes his relations or near friends. And as at Acts xiii. 13, ὁ περὶ τὸν Παῦλον denotes

'Paul and his companions,' so here it may mean Martha and Mary with their female relations; though this would seem excluded by the added words περὶ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτῶν, which can only apply to Martha and Mary. However, the αὐτῶν is absent from B, D, L, and one cursive (to which I can add nothing), and is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but internal as well as external evidence is quite in favour of the word, which seems to have been removed by some hypocritical persons. These visits of condolence were usual among the Jews, and continued for seven days after the three days of weeping which succeeded the day of death. The number of persons going thither became the means of making the miracle generally known, and thereby establishing its reality.

20. ὡς ἤκουσεν] 'as soon as she had heard;' probably from some travellers on horseback, who had passed Jesus on the road.

—ἐν τῷ οἴ. ἐκαθίζετο] Render, 'was sitting,' i. e. 'continued sitting,' a posture of profound grief, 'in the house' with her visitors, being, as appears from vv. 28, 29, unaware of the approach of Jesus.

21, 22. From what Martha here says, it would seem, that she had all along, during the four days since the death of her brother, had a persuasion that Jesus could, and a faint expectation that he would, raise her brother from the dead; though even when Jesus, at v. 23, uses an expression, ἀναστήσεται, which might suggest it, she dares not entertain the idea; but answers as she does, not laying hold of the gleam of hope; much less does she prefer a petition for so great a boon.—To advert to a matter of Philology; I have pointed off the phrase οἶδα ὅτι, because thus the necessity for a not a little harsh transposition is done away. The idiom involved in this punctuation falls under the rule in Matthew's Gr. Gr. § 624, α., of phrases inserted in propositions, such as αὐτὸς οἶδ', οἶδ' ὅτι, &c.

23. ἀναστήσεται ὁ ἀδ. σ.] Alf. thinks that these words contain no allusion to the immediate raising of Lazarus; and he doubts whether ἀναστήσεται in this absolute sense [rather, construction] could be used of recalling to life. But there is no reason to doubt that it could be so used, but only whether it is so used here. However, there is plainly an allusion to such a use, which shows the former view to be unfounded. The truth is, that our Lord was pleased (as many ancient Fathers, and some modern Expositors, as Maldonat, L. Brug., and Lampe are agreed) to use an ambiguity of expression, so as to admit of being understood either way, 'partim (as L. Brug. says) ut Marthæ animum paulatim ad miraculi fidem exerceret, partim modestiæ causâ.' 'Hæc erat (says Maldonat.) consuetudo Christi, sua, sensim et modestè, miracula insinuare, non expressis venditare verbis.' See supra v. 11. In this view, too, Lampe agrees. However, the mistake of Martha in understanding this ambiguous expression was guided for good, by giving occasion to our Lord to declare to Martha another truth, as well as that in which she had just avowed her faith,—namely, that 'through Him alone could the dead rise, whether to life on earth, or to life eternal in heaven.'

25. ἰγὼ εἰμι ἡ ἀνάστασις, &c.] Here our Lord (by a common figure of the effect for the efficient, as 1 Cor. i. 30) professes that He is the Author of the resurrection of the dead and the Giver of eternal life; thus, perhaps, intimating that as he shall at some time raise all the dead, so he can even now bring back Lazarus to life. However, the chief intent of the saying must have been, as Stier says, 'to awaken in Martha a complete faith that he could raise her brother from the dead in the highest sense.' 'This,' continues Stier, 'our Lord does by announcing Himself as the Resurrection; and, more than that, the Life itself; so that "he who believeth on him, though he have died, shall live; and he that liveth and believeth in him (i. e. so liveth as to believe in him and live unto him) shall never die!" Physical death shall be overlooked in comparison with what is really and alone death—everlasting.' Of all the Commentators, however, Maldonat. has best pointed out the full sense of the passage, and set forth its true scope. His whole annotation is worth perusal, though the limits of this work allow me only to extract a small portion, that which regards the words ὁ πιστεύων—ζήσεται: 'Quæstio erat de vita corporis Lazari restituenda: ipse verò loquitur de vita animi, ea enim vita vivunt qui in illum credunt. Cæterum non solum bene accommodatque, sed plus etiam respondet, quàm rogabatur. Rogabatur ut corpori vitam daret; respondet, non solum corpori, sed etiam animo se vitam dare posse. Sumptâ enim occasione à vitâ corporis, altius mulieris fidem attollit, ut non solum corporis, quæ non magni sit pretii, sed etiam animi vitam petat, quæ sola expeti digna sit; eam se non minus quàm corporis dare posse, et multo magis esse necessariam.' I agree with Calvin, Lampe, and others, in supposing ζῶν here used emphatically, and meant of spiritual life, the life St. Paul speaks of, Gal. ii. 20, even that in which the saints live, ἐν πίστει τῇ τοῦ Υἱοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ. Thus the expression stands for πᾶς ὁ διὰ (or μετὰ) τῆς πίστεως εἰς ἐμὴ ζῶν. In the words following, ἐγὼ πεπίστευκα—ἐρχόμενος, forming the answer of Martha to the question of Jesus, πιστεύεις τοῦτο; Chrys., Theophyl., and Euthym., with some modern Commentators, recognize no suitable reply, and are of opinion that Martha did not fully comprehend the meaning of the question; and that 'her profession of faith, though embracing the great central point of the truth in the last verse, does not enter fully into it.' See Alford. But the ample and able discussions in Maldonat. overrule any such objection. He is disposed to agree with Augustin and Bede that Martha did sufficiently comprehend our Lord's meaning, and answered properly enough; since, by answering quod majus est, she also answered quod minus est, q. d. 'When I have believed that thou art the Son of God, I have also believed that thou art the resurrection and the life.' This, however, is too subtle a turn to suit the plain and simple character of the individual; and hence I am inclined to adopt the view in which Maldonat. finally acquiesces, that Martha's answer properly corresponds to our Lord's expression, καὶ ὁ πιστεύων εἰς ἐμὴ, taken in conjunction with πιστεύεις;—which expression she seems to have taken as indirectly glancing at her want of full faith in Christ; to remove which imputation she not only replies by ναί, Κύριε, 'Yes, I do believe, Lord (or, rather, 'I have believed, and do still believe'); but, to make her confession as full and complete as possible, she employs both the titles which in Scripture designate the Messiah; by the latter of which two designations was intended to be conveyed something far higher than the former (which is rather an appellation of office than of nature), namely, One united in the Godhead, and in whom are centred all the essential attributes of God. And Martha might well comprehend that, when professing her belief in Jesus as the Son of God, she virtually professed her belief in him as the Resurrection and the Life.

28. λάβρα] In thus calling her sister apart, it appears she had our Lord's directions, though the Evangelist has not recorded the circumstance.

—ὁ διδάσκαλος] This use of the address, 'the master,' or teacher, instead of the name of the instructor, was very frequent among the Jews to their Rabbins. See Schoettg. on John xiii. 13.

29. ἰγέρταται ταχέϊ] Not only out of respect to her exalted Teacher, but from her faith being strengthened by the alacrity of her sister.

31. ἵνα κλαύσῃ ἐκεῖ] According to the custom among both Jews and Gentiles, to repair to the cemeteries, to weep at the tombs of their relatives.

32. αὐτοῦ εἰς τοὺς π.] This, for the text. rec. ἐπὶ τοὺς πόδας αὐτοῦ, is found in many of the best MSS., including almost all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies, and is received by almost every Critical Editor.

33. ἐνεβριμήσατο τῷ πνεύματι] On carefully reconsidering the force of this peculiar expression, I must confess that I do not find the sense which has been assigned by many eminent Commentators (who understand it of the perturbation of sorrow) sufficiently sustained by proof; and I would now understand it, with the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Translators, further supported by Hesych. and Suidas, and especially by Cyril (as cited by Abresch on the Gloss. of Suidas), and, of modern Expositors by Maldonat. (with his usual ability), Markl., and others, as to be understood of indignatio, a feeling nearly allied to a sort of rebuking and holding in check, or repressing the feeling of sorrow. This interpretation is confirmed by Euthym., who explains it by ἐπετίμησε τῷ πᾶθι, ἀναχαιτίζων αὐτὸ δριμύτητι, καὶ αὐστηρὸν ἐνέβληκε τῇ συγχύσει, and as also Theophyl. and Caten. Oxon.; profiting by which elucidation, Bengel well says, 'Ita Jesus austeriori affectu lacrymas hic cohibuit, et mox v. 38, abruptit.' Of ἐμβριμ. in the original sense, 'to rebuke,' exx. occur both in the Sept. and in the later Class. writers, as Liban., Lucian, and others, adduced by Steph. Thes. Ed. Paris, in v. As to the force of ἐτάραξεν (Hellenistic Greek for Class. ἐτάραχθη) ἑαυτόν, it is strange that Meyer and Alf. should adopt the harsh, and yet jejune sense, 'he shuddered.' This they endeavour to establish on the authority of Euthym., who thus explains ἐτάραξεν ἑαυτόν by διέσεισε, συμβάλει γὰρ τινάσσειναι τὰ ἀνώτερα μέρη τῶν οὐτῶς ἐμβριμωμένων. I wonder that they should not have seen that διέσεισε is a blunder of the Scribes for διασεισθῆ (very often used in the Passives by the later Greek writers, as Plut., Libanius, Heliodorus, and Athenæus) which is to be taken in a figurative sense for 'he was agitated in mind and body'; as in Hesiod. viii. 1, διέσεισθη ὥσπερ οἱ κάστοχοι. It is true that the words following in Euthym. may seem to require the sense adopted by Meyer; but they bear the mark of being merely a marginal Scholium, proceeding from some stupid monk, espec. as I cannot find the least trace of them in Theophyl. or the Catenists. Of διασεισθῆ in the sense I assign, an example occurs in Phrynichus.

35. Ἰδάκρυσεν ὁ Ἰ.] This is the shortest verse in the New Testament, but one of the most consolatory, as proving by this action (not unworthy the dignity of our exalted Redeemer) that we have indeed a High Priest who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities (Heb. iv. 15), so as to feel with us, and also for us. To suppose, with Strigel, Heumann, and others, that Jesus wept, only to show sympathy in the grief of the sisters, or with human sorrow (and, by implication, not really feeling it himself), is all but making our merciful Saviour a mere Stoical Philosopher. Whereas, as Calv. remarks, 'ad ferream Stoicorum duritiem respuendam unum Christi EXEMPLUM hoc sufficere nobis debet.' See more in his able note; and also the note of Lampe, the substance of whose annotation is as follows:—'Three instances of our Saviour's weeping are recorded in the Gospel narrative;—when he shed tears at the sight of Jerusalem, being affected with compassion on its account, Luke xix. 41;—in the garden of Gethsemane, Heb. v. 7;—and on the present occasion. The true cause of those tears was doubtless the deep and genuine sympathy which he felt with human infirmity; such as he himself experienced in the case before us.'

38. We are not to infer from the expression ἐκείντο, that the entrance was from above,—since the researches of antiquaries show that it was, in the case of Jewish tombs, at the side.

De Dieu and Lampe have fully evinced this position, espec. by a reference to the elaborate work of Nicolai de Sepulchris Hebræorum, cap. xxxi., where see the plates representing the tombs. Hence it follows (as De Dieu and Lampe are agreed) that the ἐπὶ in composition ought not to be rendered 'super' (or 'upon,' as in E. V.), but 'ad,' 'at,' and expressed in the Syr. Vers. by ἔν; and so ἐπὶ, supra iv. Hence we may see the suitability of the Hebrew term, to denote the stone which closed up the entrance (thus serving for a door, though much stronger, and more secure), namely, הגל, 'the roller.' It was doubtless made exactly to fit the orifice; and vestiges of this custom are found in Sir Gardner Wilkinson's work on Egypt, or Dr. Layard's on Nineveh. These hewn stones, fitted to the orifice, led, at length, to the stone doors, moving on hinges, of which many traces remain in Egypt, and in the ruins of Babylon and Nineveh.

39. τεθνηκὼς] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit, from 7 uncial and 9 other MSS., τεταλευτηκὼς, to which I can only add 3 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. But the external authority is wholly insufficient; espec. since against it may be alleged internal evidence, as existing in its being little likely that the Evangelist would have used so exclusively Attic a term as τελευτ., of which, too, this Perf. and Pluperf. occur only, I believe, elsewhere in Xen. and Plato, the latter of whom employs the Particip. (as here) at pp. 75, 142, 958. The reading may be supposed to have been a mere emendation of style introduced by the Alexandrian Critics.

— τεταρταίος γὰρ ἔστι] 'he has been four days dead;' or rather, as appears from v. 17, 'buried;' for the Jews generally buried their dead on the day of death; see Acts v. 6. 10. The fourth day is espec. specified, because it was, as we learn from the Rabbinical writers, termed 'the day of the beating of the breasts,' since it was the general opinion that on that day, if ever, all the marks of corruption appeared; hence there would in that case be no hope of revival. Of this idiom in Greek, by which what properly belongs to the person is applied to the thing, many examples are adduced by Raphael and Wetstein, the most opposite of which is Polyb. iii. 52, 3, ἡ δὲ τὰ τ. ἄν. Hdor. ii. 89, with γλυμνασθαι.

40. οὐκ εἶπόν σοι, ὅτι ἐὰν πιστεύσῃς, — Θεοῦ] 'Did I not say to thee,' &c. Here our Lord overrules the objection, however arising from a sense of decorum, and gently reproves a manner of speaking too much savouring of unbelief, by reminding Martha of what he had already said, v. 4, 25, 26, on the duty of a simple faith in him, as the condition of beholding the glory of God in what was to follow; and of the expectation he had held out to her that a work would be wrought in behalf of her departed brother, such as no natural causes could prevent being effected.

41. οὗ ἦν — κείμενος] The words are cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. from 5 uncial MSS. and 3 others, to which I add 1 Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. And, indeed, internal evidence is against their authenticity, as also the circumstance of their having no place in the Pesch. Syr. and Italic Versions. It may be supposed that the words οὗ ἦν were first interpolated from a scholium; and then ὁ τεθνηκὼς κείμενος subjoined by some Reviser who had in his copy τεθνηκὼς at v. 39.

— Πάτερ, εὐχαριστῶ, &c.] The full sense of this address (from high-wrought pathos extremely brief, and consequently involving some obscurity) is only to be expressed in a paraphrase:—'Father, I thank thee, that thou hast heard me, in that for which I have prayed (I say not this as though I had doubted as to thine hearing me); for I knew, and do know, that thou hearest me always; but I now thus address thee for the sake of the multitude present—that they [hearing me thus address thee, and seeing that thou hast granted my desire] may believe that Thou hast sent me.' In ἡκούσας there is, from the force of the Aorist, 'what has been, and is now.'—περιεστῶτα means 'standing around.'

43. δέυρο] A Particle of exclamation, involving an ellipsis of some verb in the Imperative, as ἔλθε (so Acts vii. 3, δέυρο εἰς τὴν γῆν), which has a highly authoritative effect, suggesting (as Tittman observes) 'Full, et fāt; Jubeat, et adent.'

44. δεδεμένος — κειρίαις] It is not necessary to suppose (as many have done) that the whole body was involved in the bandages; for that would imply a second miracle; and as the exertion of miraculous agency is not to be called in without sufficient cause, we may imagine that the sheet (σινδῶν) in which the body was wrapped was so tightly brought together by the κειρίαι (or 'bandages' whereby the aromatics, for preserving the body from corruption, were kept in their place), but that Lazarus was

45 Πολλοὶ οὖν ἐκ τῶν Ἰουδαίων, οἱ ἐλθόντες πρὸς τὴν Μαρίαν καὶ θεασάμενοι ἃ ἐποίησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, ἐπίστευσαν εἰς αὐτόν.

46 Τινὲς δὲ ἐξ αὐτῶν ἀπήλθον πρὸς τοὺς Φαρισαίους, καὶ εἶπον αὐτοῖς ἃ ἐποίησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς.

47 Ὁ συνήγαγον οὖν οἱ Ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ οἱ Φαρισαῖοι συνέδριον, καὶ ἔλεγον· Τί ποιοῦμεν; ὅτι οὗτος ὁ ἄνθρωπος πολλὰ σημεῖα ποιεῖ. 48 Ἐὰν ἀφώμεν αὐτὸν οὕτω, πάντες πιστεύουσιν εἰς αὐτόν καὶ ἐλεύσονται οἱ Ῥωμαῖοι καὶ ἀρούσω ἡμῶν καὶ τὸν τόπον καὶ τὸ ἔθνος.

49 Εἰς δὲ τις ἐξ αὐτῶν, Καϊάφας, ἀρχιερεὺς ὢν τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ ἐκείνου, εἶπεν αὐτοῖς· Ὁ Τρεῖς οὐκ οἶδατε οὐδὲν· 50 οὐδὲ διαλογίζεσθε, ὅτι συμφέρει enabled to creep forth. This, of course, proceeds upon the supposition of most Commentators, that the body had been embalmed. But if (as, from the shortness of the period, is far more probable) such was not the case, the difficulty is much lessened; and we have thus only to suppose that the body was wrapped in a winding-sheet, girt about with two belts, one at the hands, the other at the feet.

— σουδαρίῳ] 'kerchief;' which probably did not cover the face, but only encircled it (as we find in the case of the Egyptian mummies), and was tied under the chin. For though in a Rabbinical writer, cited by Wets., it is said, 'Non tamen propterea vocati sunt sancti, donec terræ essent conditi, sudario velatis ipsorum facieb'us,' yet the original Hebrew corresponding to the Greek ὄψις often denotes 'part of the face,' espec. 'the forehead;' and ὄψις answers to the Hebr. פָּנִים in Jer. iii. 3. Λύσατε αὐτόν is an expression of common life for 'Loosen his bandages;' and ὑπάγειν means merely 'to depart,' 'to go where he will.'

45—57. The results from the miracle. Meeting of the Sanhedrim, issuing in a decision to, in some way, put Jesus to death,—who, aware of their determination, retires to the country about Ephraim.

47. Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and others, by leaving out the mark of interrogation, point τί ποιοῦμεν, ὅτι ποιεῖ; But the usual punctuation, retained by Griesb. and Alf., is far more suitable, since otherwise the force and pertinency of the words is weakened. The sense has been by Maldonati most ably shown to be (agreeably to the explanation which I have long offered), 'What are we about?' equiv. to 'What are we to do?' In the E. V. 'What do we, seeing this man doeth many miracles?' there is something forced and frigid. The Syr. and Pers. Verses. confirm the punctuation ποιοῦμεν; And, though the Vulg. may seem to defend the other, yet little doubt is there that the earliest punctuation was facimus? which, I find, has place in the Complut. Polyglott, 1517; though Gratz, who professes to reprint it, has 'quid facimus?' Hence we can scarcely doubt that the phrase in Greek, τί ποιοῦμεν; and its corresponding one in Latin, 'quid agimus?' were ordinary forms of address to a deliberative body, containing at once a tacit sarcasm on their former inactivity, and an incentive to be now up and doing. Comp. Lucian, Pisc. 10, τί ποιοῦμεν, ὦ Πυθαγ.; ἰοικα γάρ, &c.

— σημεῖα] They admitted, it seems, Christ's miracles, but yet refused to believe in him; probably on some such pretence as that elsewhere mentioned, that they were effected by the agency of the Devil; so classing them with the wonders performed by the Magicians in Egypt, Exod. vii. viii., or those adverted to in Matt. xxiv. 24.

48. τόπον] Not the Temple (for that would require τοῦτον τὸν τόπον), but the city of Jerusalem, the destruction of which would involve that of the country. Perhaps, however, there is an Hendiad., lit. 'our place of habitation, and our nation,' i. e. 'our habitation and existence as a nation.' 'Whether this fear was really felt, or only made a covert for their enmity,' Alf. thinks, 'does not appear.' But, pace Viri egregii, it does appear; or else all the Expositors, ancient and modern, have discussed the topic to little purpose.—See espec. Chrys., Euthym., and Theoph.; and, of the modern, Calv., Grot., Lampe, Whitby, and others, down to Rosenm., Kuin., Tittm.; see espec. the able notes of Maldonat. and Light-foot.

49. ὑμῖς οὐκ οἶδατε οὐδὲν] These words, and the counsel afterwards given, correspond so little to the foregoing ones, that many recent Commentators are of opinion that something, which immediately preceded them in the deliberations, has been omitted by the Evangelist. This, however, is a principle always precarious, and here unnecessary. May we not consider the words of the Evangelist, τί ποιοῦμεν—ἔθνος, as containing two opinions pronounced by two different parties of the Sanhedrim; τί ποιοῦμεν—ποιεῖ by those who were inclined to think well of Jesus, and ἰδὼν ἀφώμεν—ἔθνος by those who troubled not themselves about the truth or the falsehood of Jesus's pretensions, but, viewing the thing solely in a political point of view, were alive to the danger of letting him go on, and thought he must be put down at any rate, but scrupled at the means? Against these the rebuke of Caiaphas seems to be directed; q. d. 'Ye are foolish and raw!' (for such is the meaning of οὐκ οἶδατε οὐδὲν)—namely, in state policy, by seeing what is expedient to be done, and yet scrupling at the means to bring it about.

50. συμφέρει—ἀποδύηται] This is said with allusion to a maxim of state policy, founded on ἡμῖν, ἵνα εἰς ἄνθρωπος ἀποθάνῃ ὑπὲρ τοῦ λαοῦ, καὶ μὴ ὅλον τὸ ἔθνος ἀπόλῃται. ⁵¹ τοῦτο δὲ ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ οὐκ εἶπεν ἄλλα, ἀρχιερεῖς ὃν τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ ἐκείνου, *προεφήτευσεν ὅτι ἐμελλεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀποθνήσκειν ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἔθνους· ⁵² *καὶ οὐχ ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἔθνους μόνον, ἀλλ' ἵνα καὶ τὰ τέκνα τοῦ Θεοῦ τὰ διεσκορπισμένα συναγάγῃ εἰς ἓν. ⁵³ Ἀπ' ἐκείνης οὖν τῆς ἡμέρας συνεβουλεύσαντο, ἵνα ἀποκτείνωσιν αὐτόν. ⁵⁴ Ἰησοῦς οὖν οὐκ ἔτι παρρησίᾳ περιεπάτει ἐν τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις· ἀλλὰ ἀπήλθεν ἐκείθεν εἰς τὴν χώραν ἐγγὺς τῆς ἐρήμου, εἰς *Ἐφραῖμ λεγομένην πόλιν, κακεῖ διέτριβε μετὰ τῶν μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ. ⁵⁵ Ἦν δὲ ἐγγὺς τὸ πᾶσχα τῶν Ἰουδαίων καὶ ἀνέβησαν πολλοὶ εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα expediency only, that the safety of the whole nation is to be preferred to that of one individual. Of this I have adduced many examples in my Recens. Synopt., of which the most opposite is Xenoph., p. 193, πολλὴ κριττον καὶ δικαιοτέρον ἴσθιν, ἵνα ὑπὲρ πάντων, ἢ πολλοὶ ὑπὲρ ἑνὸς ἀπολίσθαι. Virg. Æn. v. 815, 'unum pro cunctis dabitur caput.' See Heyne.

51. προφῆταις] On the exact sense of this term in the present passage some difference of opinion exists. To the ordinary signification, and that generally assigned, prophesied, it has been objected, that the words of Caiaphas contain nothing of prediction, but merely a political counsel. Hence most recent Interpreters take it to mean only that, 'under Divine Providence he uttered a most important truth, which was made good in the death of Christ for the sins of the world.' Thus the Evangelist is supposed to have accommodated the counsel of Caiaphas to the purpose of impressing on the minds of his readers the great doctrine of the Atonement. Yet this view of the sense, besides being too artificial to be probable, is quite at variance with, and contradicted by, the antithesis between ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ εἶπε and προεφῆταις, and also what is implied in the words ἀρχιερεῖς ὃν τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ ἐκείνου, both indicating that the words were not uttered proprio motu, but as being prophetic, from an impulse from on High. Comp. Soph. El. 343, πάντα γὰρ σοὶ τὰμὰ νοουετήματα | κείνη διδασκὰ, κούδιν ἐκ σαυτῆς λέγει. Accordingly, something far more than mere 'direction, under God's Providence,' is required; and the notion that Caiaphas unwittingly uttered a prediction afterwards fulfilled, as it involves the idea of a quasi-prophecy (all but an absurdity) cannot be admitted. Accordingly, we must take προφῆταις without any of the foregoing quasi senses, and understand it in the full sense which I have pointed out, 'spoke as he did under the influence of Divine inspiration;' meaning, as Alf. expresses it, that 'it pleased God to make him as High Priest [and by virtue of his office] the special, though involuntary, organ of the Holy Spirit; and thus to utter by him a prophecy [rather, what was virtually a prophecy] of the death of Christ, and its effects.'

52. καὶ οὐχ ὑπὲρ—εἰς ἓν] These words are meant to explain and mark the extent of the foregoing assertion. And here there is an ellipsis of some words, to be supplied from the preceding clause; q. d. [He was, indeed, about to die for the nation] and not for the nation only, &c. —Τέκνα τοῦ Θεοῦ. So called by anticipation, in order to show God's gracious designs that they should be τασσόμενοι εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον (Act. xiii. 48), the children of God by adoption; as supra x. 16, ἄλλα πρόβατα, where see note.—Συναγάγῃ εἰς ἓν, scil. σῶμα, into one universal Church, united in one holy communion, under one common Head. So Heraclid. c. 19, τοῖς σποράδην οἰκονοῦντας εἰς ἓν συνάγειν. In this view Euthym. well remarks, that our Lord's especial calling was συναγαγεῖν τὰ διεσπῶτα, καὶ καταλλάξαι τὰ ἐκτετακωμένα.

54. παρρ. περιεπάτει ἐν τ. Ἰ.] An Hellenistic mode of expression to denote, 'did not go about openly, or publicly, but ἐν κρυπτῷ.' So supra vii. 4, comp. with Wisd. v. 1, τότε στήσεται ἐν παρρησίᾳ ὁ δίκαιος.

—εἰς τὴν χώραν—Ἐφραῖμ] By the ἱρῆμ. here mentioned is, I apprehend, to be understood that 'desert,' which Eusebius tells us was 8 miles N. of Jerusalem; though Jerome makes it 20; which Dr. Robinson agrees with me in 'thinking more probable.' My opinion now is, that though Eusebius' account of the distance must be wrong; yet it is only by an error of the scribes, for I doubt not that for η should be read ιη, 18, which I believe to be somewhat more correct than Jerome's estimate. Robinson would fix it at the modern Taiybeh, 7 miles N. of Bethel, a small town, which seems from Jos. Bell. iv. 9, 9, to have been in the vicinity of this Ephraim, the same with the γινεφ, Ephron, mentioned in 2 Chron. xiii. 19. I quite agree with Dr. R. as to the site he fixes, which is very nearly that which I long ago pointed out, as in the s. w. part of the valley between Mount Ephraim and the opposite mountain range of Bethaven, the one it should seem here mean by ἱρῆμ. and which formed, we may suppose, the w. part of the table land of Bethaven; though the πόλις, or town (called πολύχμιον by Jos. Bell. v. 8), was not on the rise, but in the lowland valley between the two mountain ranges. That is certain from a Rabbinical writer cited by Wetst., who calls it by the name Ephraim is valle. At any rate Arrow-smith is quite wide of the mark in fixing it, seemingly at random, and without availing himself of the light within his reach, where he does. Mr. Alford studiously puts out that light, by pronouncing that 'the situation of Ephraim is unknown!' which may be true, as far as it is evidently unknown to him.

55. ἵνα ἀγνίσωσιν ἑαυτούς] Namely, from such ceremonial defilements as they might have contracted; in order to participation in the Paschal feast. See Numb. ix. 10. 2 Chron. xxx. 17. Acts xxi. 24—26. This purification was effected by sacrifices, sprinkling of water, fasting, prayer, and other observances, which lasted from one to six days. See Lightf. and Lampe. This, and the other prescribed rites, brought a great concourse of people together at Jerusalem, before the Festival. Indeed, all who went had to undergo the rites in question. So a Rabbinical writer, cited by Wetstein, says, 'Teneatur unusquisque ad purificandum se ad festum.' And Jos. Antt. iv. 3, 12, ἀθίμωτον ἡγείτο—μὴ προηγουμένους εἰσαγαγεῖν τὸ πλῆθος. The rites are described by Jos. Antt. viii. 3, and Bell. v. 2.

56. τί δοκεῖ—ἐορτὴν] These words are by most Expositors supposed to mean, 'What think ye, that he should not have come to the feast?' But the feast was not yet arrived; and therefore that he should not have come was not surprising. Indeed, from what is said in the next verses, they had little reason to expect him at all. Moreover, the words τί δοκεῖ ὑμῖν rather indicate a mutual discussion of what was doubtful and uncertain, namely, whether his coming would or would not be. I have, therefore, followed the Pesch. Syr., Chrysost., Euthym., Lampe, Pearce, Kuin., Tittm., and Campb., in placing a mark of interrogation after ὑμῖν; thus making a double interrogation, and of course taking ἔλθῃ in a future sense, for ἐλεύσεται. The idiom is, indeed, rather unfrequent, and the phraseology unusual; but this use of the interrogation with a double negation is intended to represent some one as proposing a question, and himself answering it in the negative. Thus we may render, 'What think ye? that he will not come to the feast?' equiv. to 'Is it your opinion [as it certainly is mine] that he will not come?' They were warranted in supposing so, since (as we find from the next verse) strict inquiries were made after him, and orders given for his apprehension.

XII. 1—11. The anointing of our Lord at Bethany. Comp. Matt. xxvi. 6—13. Mark xiv. 3—9, where see note.

1. πρὸ ἑξ ἡμερῶν τοῦ πάσχα] A transposition as in 2 Cor. xii. 2, for ἑξ ἡμέρας πρὸ τ. π. Joseph. Antt. xv. 4, πρὸ ἡμέρας μίας τῆς ἑορτῆς. Bell. ii. 8, 9. Philo, p. 434. The idiom occurs in the Sept. and in the later Greek writers. See more in Grew. vol. iii. Diss. 1, where he fully defines the force of the expression. 'Ὅπου ἦν Λάζ. ὁ τεθ.' is rightly rendered by Markland, 'where Lazarus was; he who had been dead and raised to life again.'

— ὁ τεθνηκώς] On this expression see note, supra ix. 17, and Matt. xxvi. 6. The words are, indeed, cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., and bracketed by Alf., from 2 uncial MSS., and the Syr. Vers. But that authority is quite insufficient, espec. since internal evidence is very much in favour of the words. I suspect that the Reviser of the MS. B removed the words because the rules of good composition would rather require their absence. And certain it is that the early Translators in such a case often took the liberty of passing over words which seemed not necessary.

2. ἐποίησαν δ.] For the Impersonal, 'a supper was made.' The entertainment, however, was, as we find from Matt. xxvi. 6, not in the house of Martha, but in that of a person of the name of Simon (surnamed the Leper), probably a near relative of Mary; who, it would seem, acted as hostess on the occasion, serving the guests at table; for such is the import of the term διηκόνει here, and at Luke x. 40. See my Lex. n v.

— ἀνακειμ.] This, with σὺν following, instead of συνανακ., is found in almost all the best MSS., and has been received by almost every Editor from Wetst. to Scholz. Lazarus's presence is mentioned, to show that since his resurrection he had continued to possess the regular functions of life.

3. καὶ ἐξέμαξε ταῖς θριξίν] This has been thought to intimate that Mary had washed Jesus's feet before anointing them. If so, there is a remarkable transposition in the construction. But as the unguent used was liquid, the wiping would be as suitable to that as to washing; see more in Rec. Syn., in the notes on Matt. xxvi. 6—11. On πιστικῆς see note on Mark xvi. 3.

— ἡ δὲ οἰκία—μύρου] A figurative mode of expressing the extreme fragrance of the unguent. So Plutarch i. 676, cited by Wetstein, ὡδὼδαι δὲ θεσπέσιον οἶον ἀπὸ ἀρωμάτων καὶ μύρων οἰκοι.

α Matt. 10. 4. ⁴ Δέγει οὖν εἰς ἐκ τῶν μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ, Ἰούδας Σίμωνος Ἰσκαριώτης, ὁ μέλλων αὐτὸν παραδιδόναι· ⁵ Διὰ τοῦτο τὸ μῦρον α ch. 12. 20. οὐκ ἐπράθη τριακοσίων δηναρίων, καὶ ἐδόθη πτωχοῖς; ⁶ Εἶπε δὲ τοῦτο, οὐχ ὅτι περὶ τῶν πτωχῶν ἔμελεν αὐτῷ· ἀλλ' ὅτι κλέπτῃς ἦν, καὶ τὸ γλασσοκόμον εἶχε, καὶ τὰ βαλλόμενα ἐβά-σταζεν. ⁷ Εἶπεν οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Ἄφες αὐτήν· εἰς τὴν ἡμέραν

6. τὸ γλασσοκόμον] This word originally denoted 'the box in which pipers deposited the γλασσιδαί, what we call reeds, of their wind-instruments.' Thence it came to denote any 'box or casket for holding money or other valuables.' And such is the sense here and in 2 Chron. xxiv. 8, and Plut. p. 1060, cited by Wetstein.—Βαλλόμενα is for ἐμβαλλόμενα, 'what was put therein,' as contributions towards a common fund for the support of Christ and his Apostles, of which Judas was the treasurer. According to the common rendering of the passage, the sense proceeds very awkwardly; nor is this to be remedied by that διὰ τὸ ἀπὸ μηχανῆς, a transposition, which the Critics call to their aid.

—καὶ τὰ βαλλ. ἰβάσταζεν] It is plain that the sense commonly assigned to ἰβάσταζεν above cannot be tolerated. Almost all the best Commentators, ancient and modern, are agreed that it must signify surripuit, intervertit, 'purloined,' 'embezzled' (like ferre for auferre in Latin); of which sense they adduce several examples, the most apposite of which is Diog. Laert. iv. 59, ὡς μηδέποτε αὐτὸν περιαιρηθεὶν καὶ τι βασταχθεῖν. I add Joseph. Antt. xii. 5, 4, where σὺλῆν and βαστ. are joined as synonymous. At Antt. ix. 4, 5, it is said of some who went to plunder the camp of the Syrians, ὠρμήσαντες εἰς μίαν σκηνήν, ἰβάστασαν (carried off) ἰσθῆτα καὶ πολλὸν χρυσόν. Indeed, as at xx. 15, the word signifies to carry off by stealth, so it may here very well mean simply to steal; a sense required by the κλέπτῃς just before; for thus we learn only Judas took exception at the ointment being so employed, and why he is called a thief. Thus far in my former Editions: nor am I now disposed to alter my opinion, notwithstanding that Mr. Alf. pronounces, as usual, ex cathedra, that the word never signifies 'to steal,' or 'to purloin;' and that in the passages of Josephus adduced in proof, it only signifies to carry away, the stealing being otherwise expressed or implied. But those passages are not the only ones that can be alleged, for, besides that of Diog. Laert., I can produce another from that writer, just after; also Jos. Antt. i. 19, 9; and a passage in Suidas, who explains βασταχθεῖν by κλαπτεῖν. And auferre, 'to carry off,' is frequent in the later Latin writers; and it is used, not for carrying off for one's use, but in the sense of 'to steal,' or 'to purloin.' That such must be the sense in the above passage of Jos. is plain, from the circumstance that the historian wrote Antt. i. 19, 9, with a view to what is said in Gen. xxi. 30, ἰνατί ἐκλεψας τοῦ θεοῦ μοσές; And so in the Hebr. גנב; though Whiston, by an ignorance usual to him, renders, 'carrying home,'—not aware, it seems, of the force of βαστασας, any more than of οἰκοὶ φάρισσαι, which means 'to appropriate to his own use.' Besides, if, in all those passages adduced, embezzle- ment were only implied, it were enough to authorize us to say that the sense 'to purloin' is, at least, denoted, though that is not the strict signification of the word. The same may be said of hundreds of other words, which often denote that which they do not primarily and literally signify, and then that is their sense. Such is the case in all languages, including our own; and the very verb 'to purloin,' which lit. signifies 'auferre,' 'to carry off,' 'to remove,' but by implication 'to embezzle.' When Mr. Alf. says, after his German authors, that such a sense would not apply here, that is mere matter of opinion. And when I consider that the word was so taken by the ancient, and by all the most eminent modern Expositors up to a very late period, and that they were chiefly induced to adopt the above sense of ἰβάσταζεν—'to purloin,' because they thought it did apply, it would seem more likely that some three German second-rate Philologists should be mistaken, than that all the others, including Toup, and other first-rate Critics, should be wrong in a matter wherein they were intimately conversant.

7. εἰς τὴν ἡμ.—τατήρηκεν αὐτό] Six uncial and seven cursive MSS. (I can add only B, x. 16) with some Versions, Latin Fathers, and Nonnus, have ἡμ—τηρήσῃ, which was approved by Mill and Bengel, and has been edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but without reason. It could not, as De Wette imagines, have arisen from a marginal gloss, since it is a more difficult reading, though not to be rejected on that account, but because—turn it as we may—it yields a very strained, and yet insipid sense; inasmuch that even the consummate ingenuity of a Maldonat., and the philological skill of a Mill, could extract nothing that can approve itself to any judicious Critic, as indeed Wolf and Whitby have abundantly shown. Besides, as external evidence, confirmed by the Peach. Syr. Vers., is quite in favour of the text rec., so, but still more, is internal; for though one of the two readings must have been a critical alteration of the other, yet there is no good reason why the Critics should have altered ἀφ' αὐτὴν ἡμ—τηρήσῃ αὐτό into the text rec., whereas the recens was very likely. The learned and clever Semler has here an able note, in which he shows that the reading of B, L, K, was made up for a critical purpose, and how it arose; in short, that the reading arose from Critics, who were offended at the homely construction, and misunderstood the true sense. The same view was taken long before Semler [so it is with all Critics, who might say, in the words of an ancient Classical writer, somewhere quoted by Porson, 'Perant qui nos ante nostra dixerunt!'], by the less acute, but far more judicious Grotius, who briefly points at the origin of the reading thus: "Qui hoc loquendi genus non intellexerunt, mutarunt lectionem ut caset, in diem τοῦ ἐνταφιασμοῦ μου τετήρηκεν αὐτό. ⁸ τούς πτωχοὺς γὰρ ^{f Deut. 16. 11. Matt. 26. 11. Mark 14. 7.} παντοτε ἔχετε μεθ' ἑαυτῶν, ἐμέ δὲ οὐ πάντοτε ἔχετε.

sepulcrum meum servet illud. At Syriaca recte, 'Neque novum est perperam intellecta perperam mutari.' Nothing more true than this remark, which is fully verified by a large portion of the emendations obtruded on both Classical and Scriptural writers by slashing, but ignorant Critics. In the present instance, the Critics in question were too dull to understand the words (as they ought to be understood) as being prophetic, however obscure, of that day which was now, in a manner, come. This view is confirmed by Chrys. and Euthym., who say that the woman spoke ὡσανεὶ προφητεύουσα πλησιάζοντά μου θάνατον, and they regard the words of Mark xiv. 8, ὅτι προέλαβε μυρίαι τὸ σῶμα εἰς τὸν ἐνταφιασμόν, and espec. Matt. xxiv. 12, βαλοῦσα γὰρ—πρὸς τὸ ἐνταφιάσαι με ἐποίησεν, as a plainer mode of expressing the same sense. As to ἀφ' ἧς αὐτῆς here, it is confirmed by the ἀφ' ἧς αὐτῆς in Mark xiv. 6; and the τί αὐτῇ κόπους παρέχεται; is an expansion of the same idea. Thus it comes to pass that, on the whole, the verdict here pronounced by a Critic "qui in Scripturarum Sacr. vitis tam cernit acutum" (Alford), "a correction from misunderstanding," is very true, but, unfortunately, the verdict is pronounced, Hibernice, on the wrong party.

⁹ Ἐγὼ οὖν ὄχλ.] The οὖν here, as often in this Gospel (on which idiom I have lately treated) is resumptive from v. 1, and continuative, as carrying on the narrative public (as opposed to the intermediate private one), and should be rendered, not 'therefore,' but 'now.' 'Now a great multitude (very many) of the Jews,' &c. Mr. Alford bids us remember, that the Jews are 'not the people, but the Rulers.' But I am not sure that it may not be better here to forget than to remember the idiom, since there could not be so many Rulers as to form an ὄχλος πολὺς. Hence it is better to refer the terms to both classes—the Rulers and the ruled—and not of Jerusalem only, but of the country around

Bethany,—nay, indeed, from all parts, who were pouring to the feast at Jerusalem.

¹⁰ Ἐβουλεύσαντο—ἵνα—ἀποκτ.] Alf. renders, not 'came to a resolution,' the general interpretation, but 'were in the mind,' 'had an intention.' But that is too weak a sense to suit the context,—or, indeed, the introductory Particle ἵνα, which will not admit of being taken for ἔτι, and calls for that of 'took counsel,' in Ἐβουλεύσ. implying the choice of means how to carry counsel into effect.

^{12—19} Our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem, on which see note on Matt. xxi. 11—17. Mark xi. 1—10. Luke xix. 29—44.

¹³ ἔλαβον τὰ βάτα τῶν φοινίκων] I would now defer to the authority of those learned men (Jablonski and others) who maintain that βατον comes from the Coptic BAI, 'a twig, or branch of the palm tree'; espec. since it is confirmed by Porphy. de Abet. iv. 7, where he says of the Egyptian priests, Κοίτη δ' αὐτοῖς ἐκ τῶν σταδίων τοῦ φοίνικος, ὡς καλοῦσι βαῖς (read βαίδας) ἐπέπλεκτο, and by a Grammarian ap. Ducange, Gloss. p. 166, τὸν κλάδον τῶν φοινίκων Ἐσραῖοι (meaning, not the Egyptians, as Jablonski supposes, but the Hellenistic Jews), βαῖα προσ-αγορεύουσι. It might be regarded as Hebrew-Greek, since it is found elsewhere only in Cant. vii. 9. Test. xii. Patr. p. 668. 1 Macc. xiii. 51, καὶ εἰσῆλθον εἰς τὴν τῶν (the Tower) μετὰ αἰνέσεως ('thanksgiving,' as in Heb. xiii. 15, where see my note) καὶ βατῶν, which confirms the suggestion of Lücke, that the palm branches were employed by the people, in the present case, as being usual at such festivities.

—εἰς ὑπάντ. αὐτῶν] This is a case of a verbal noun followed by the case of its verb; an idiom which, though rare, is occasionally found in the best writers, especially Thucyd. The MSS. here fluctuate between ὑπάντ., ἀπάντ., and συνάντ. But our recent Editors have here rightly retained ὑν. Yet Lachm. and Tisch. have not rightly introduced it at Matt. viii. 34, from only MS. B, and 2 cursives. Alf. has avoided this error here; but he has fallen into it with his fellows at Matt. xxv. 1, where he introduces ὑπάντ.

ζον Ὁσσανά· εὐλογημένος ὁ ἐρχόμενος ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου ὁ βασιλεὺς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ! ¹⁴ Εὐρὼν δὲ ὁ Ἰησοῦς ὀνάνιον, ἐκάθισεν ἐπ' αὐτὸ, καθὼς ἐστι γεγραμμένον ¹⁵ Μὴ φοβοῦ, θύγατερ Σιών· ἰδοὺ, ὁ βασιλεὺς σου ἔρχεται καθήμενος ἐπὶ πῶλον ὄνου. ¹⁶ Ταῦτα δὲ οὐκ ἔγνωσαν οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ τὸ πρῶτον· ἀλλ' ὅτε ἔδοξάσθη ὁ Ἰησοῦς, τότε ἐμνήσθησαν ὅτι ταῦτα ἦν ἐπ' αὐτῷ γεγραμμένα, καὶ ταῦτα ἐποίησαν αὐτῷ. ¹⁷ Ἐμαρτύρει οὖν ὁ ὄχλος ὁ ὢν μετ' αὐτοῦ, ὅτι τὸν Λάζαρον ἐφώνησεν ἐκ τοῦ μνημείου καὶ ἤγειρεν αὐτὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν. ¹⁸ Διὰ τοῦτο καὶ ὑπήντησεν αὐτῷ ὁ ὄχλος, ὅτι from only B, C, and I cursive; not bearing in mind that in a case like this, where the terms are of nearly equal propriety, external authority has peculiar and paramount force.

14—16. I quite agree with Alford that the Evangelist supposes his readers already acquainted with the circumstances of the triumphal entry, and therefore relates it thus compendiously. But does not this also suppose his knowledge of those other Gospels, which relate it in detail and circumstantially? Yet what then becomes of Mr. Alford's hypothesis, that 'not one of the Gospels had ever been seen by John when he wrote his own?' I am quite aware he will say, that 'the Evangelist had his knowledge of these circumstances from those traditions handed down in oral teaching, and forming a cycle of narratives and discourses, from which those Gospels were derived' (such are his own words); but, Credat Judæus Apella! As to εὐρὼν, Alf. rightly remarks that it involves no discrepancy with the other Evangelists, but is a compendious term, implying those details. But a more improper mode of expression can hardly be imagined than that of our Common Version, 'when he had found a young ass,' as if he had been seeking for the animal. It would be a more compact and correct rendering to say, 'having lighted on,' or 'met with,' just as the animal was brought to him (ἄγαγον in the other Gospels); only this must not be thought to imply chance; since, from what is circumstantially related in those Gospels, it appears that, from a prearranged disposition of Divine Providence, similar to that recorded in Matt. xxvi. 18; Mark xiv. 13—16, the thing took place in a manner wholly distinct from the casual, and rising to the supernatural. There is the same fault in rendering εὐρὼν, supra ix. 35; though there the sense 'having lighted on,' or 'met with' (so often occurring elsewhere), has not the profound sense I have just indicated. In short, what is said of this Participle applies to many others in the New Test., which, by being so clumsily rendered in our Common Version, lose not a little of the close neatness of the original in many cases, and in some others of their significancy; e. gr. Acts x. 31, ἀνοίξας δὲ—τὸ στόμα αὐτοῦ, where, by rendering, 'then Peter opened his mouth, and said,' our Translators make the action primary instead of secondary, though the Participle was used to keep it subordinate. So, also, in the case of γινώσκει, Matt. xii. 15, where, by rendering, 'when Jesus knew it,' or 'had known it,' they make it convey the idea not of our Lord's being by the force of Omniscience fully cognizant of the thing, but of his having become acquainted with it by the information of others. The same remark applies to Matt. xvi. 8, and a multitude of other passages, of which those adduced here are only a slight sample.

15. μὴ φοβοῦ, θύγ. Σ.] This quotation (from Zech. ix. 9) differs both from the Hebrew and the Sept., and also from the citation in Matt. xxi. 5. The true mode of reconciling the discrepancy I have pointed out, at the parallel passage of Matthew.

16. οὐκ ἔγνωσαν—τὸ πρῶτον] 'did not understand at first,' i. e. at the time when this event—Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem—took place, that it was virtually a fulfilment of the prophecy of Zechariah to that effect—ἀλλ' ὅτε ἔδοξάσθη, 'but when he had been glorified,' namely, by his resurrection, ascension, and elevation to the right hand of God (see supra vii. 39, and note), then the Holy Spirit, poured forth from on high abundantly, made them remember well the prophecy, and the fulfilment of it, by the doing of those things, at the triumphal entry, unto him. Such is the general sense. As to the construction, the first αὐτῷ is emphatical, 'him,' as the very person; and the full sense of καὶ (repeat ὅτι) ταῦτα ἐποίησαν αὐτῷ is, 'and that the people had done those things unto him [in fulfilment of prophecy].' The last words being implied in the preceding. However, the ἐπὶ αὐτῷ seems to mean, not 'unto,' but 'concerning,' 'with reference to,' as in Rev. x. 11, προφητεύουσι ἐπὶ αὐτοῖς. Barnab. Epist. ὁ προφητεύων ἐπ' αὐτῷ, and perhaps in Æschyl. Eum. 343, γιγνομίνοισι λῆχη ἐπ' αὐτῷ ἐκράσθη, 'was accomplished,' said antipatively.

17. ὅτι] Many MSS., including almost all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies, Versions, and early Editions, have ὅτι, which was edited by Matthæi, who remarks that ὅτι was introduced into the text by Beza. Be it so; but it is supported by quite as strong external authority as ὅτι; and internal evidence is in its favour; for with ὅτι would be required ἐφώνοι, not ἐφώνησιν. Moreover, the context requires this sense. By ὁ ὢν μετ' αὐτοῦ must be meant, 'who were with him [on the occasion in question].' Thus there is a blending of two clauses into one. The sentence, fully expressed, would run thus, 'The people who had been with him when he raised Lazarus from the dead bore witness (now), as they had done (before), that he really had raised Lazarus.'

* ἤκουσαν τοῦτο αὐτὸν πεποιηκέναι τὸ σημεῖον. ¹⁹ Οἱ οὖν Φαρισαῖοι εἶπον πρὸς ἑαυτοὺς· Θεωρεῖτε ὅτι οὐκ ὠφελεῖτε οὐδέν; ἴδε, ὁ κόσμος ὅπισω αὐτοῦ ἀπήλθεν.

18. ἤκουσαν] This reading, for ἤκουσε, is found in most of the best MSS., including 3 Lamb., several Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, with some early Editions, and is received by almost all Editors. There is a transposition of τοῦτο.

19. θεωρεῖτε—οὐδέν:] The best Commentators are agreed that these words must be taken interrogatively; q. d. 'See that ye' [or, 'see ye not'], 'are profiting nothing'; which although a very rare expression, yet is found occurring also at Matt. xxvii. 24, and Jos. Antt. xix. 34. The words ὁ κόσμος—ἀπῆλθεν are a popular form of speaking, frequent in the Rabbinical writers, denoting that a leader or teacher has very numerous followers, entirely devoted to him.

20. Ἕλληνες] It is a much debated question who are here the persons to be understood. Some suppose them to have been foreign Jews living out of Palestine, and speaking the Greek language. And certainly there were many Jews dispersed all over Egypt, Asia Minor, &c., where Greek was the vernacular tongue, and was spoken by the sojourning Jews. Yet that is no reason why they should be called Ἕλληνες; nor can it be proved that they were ever so called. They would thus be called Ἑλληνισταί; as at Acts vi. 1. ix. 29. xi. 20. It is therefore better to suppose (with others) that by Ἕλληνες are to be understood Gentiles; for, 1. wherever in the New Test. Ἕλληνες are mentioned, they are always persons not Jews; 2. because the thing recorded is agreeable to the custom of those times; since the Gentiles worshipped not only the gods of their own country, but of any foreign nation into which they might come; nay, they made journeys, for the purpose of worship, to the most celebrated foreign temples; see the many passages of Josephus, Philo, and Suetonius, which I have cited in my Recens. Synop. Nay, many Gentiles were in that age diligent in their search after true religion, and, in order thereto, frequented the Jewish synagogues, though they made no external profession of the Jewish religion, nor were circumcised. Such are in Acts xvii. 4 called οἱ Ἕλληνες σεβόμενοι. And though σεβόμενοι be not here added, yet it may well be understood. However, as it cannot be proved that the Gentiles, in the strict sense, ever attended at the Temple of Jerusalem, espec. at the celebration of the Passover, these persons may, with most probability, be supposed Gentile Proselytes to Judaism. See note on Acts xi. 20.

21. ἰδεῖν] 'to have an interview with.' An idiom common to most languages. There were many reasons why such persons should desire an introduction to so celebrated a Person. Their motives, however, in seeking it can only be matter of conjecture. Probably they were in a great degree worldly. Hence the language of warning, employed by our Lord, as to the consequences of professing his religion.

23. In this reply of our Lord (spoken, I agree with Bp. Lonsd., to Andrew and Philip only, not to the above-mentioned Greeks, though probably in their presence, and with some reference to them as also the other bystanders, as appears from the mention of the people, vv. 29, 34), we may observe that what is there said is adapted for warning, admonition, and instruction,—to all those addressed. Our Lord's object in this Discourse, 23—36, seems to have been to correct the wrong notions as to the glories of his kingdom, which his late triumphant entry into Jerusalem had probably led those Greeks, as well as many others, to entertain. Accordingly our Lord gives them to understand, that the time is near at hand in which the Son of Man should be glorified. That glory, however, could only be attained by his death, the effect of which, he intimates,—by an illustration derived from grain sown in the earth (see 1 Cor. xv. 36),—would bring an abundant harvest both of Jewish and Gentile converts. Further, to effectually repress all worldly or interested motives in becoming his disciples, he (at vv. 25, 26) apprises them, that as, before his exaltation, He was himself to 'suffer many things,' so were his disciples to expect suffering and persecution; though they might assure themselves that a glorious reward hereafter would be the result of their patient endurance unto the end.

—ἐλθὺν ἡ ὥρα ἵνα, &c.] 'The time has come, that' (ἵνα, eventual, or for ὅτε). Most recent Commentators are of opinion that our Lord takes occasion, from this circumstance, to pre-signify to the two disciples the future spread of the Gospel, when it should be preached not merely to a few religiously-inclined foreigners, but to all the nations of the earth in their own countries. But though that view may seem to be supported by the context, I would rather, with Lampe and Tittman, suppose that the glory of Christ here spoken of consists in the testimony given to him by God, by his resurrection from the dead, ascension to heaven, and sitting at the right hand of the Father; a glory which would be eminently displayed, when it became generally known on earth that he died to save men,—had, moreover, returned from death to life,—had ascended to heaven, and was head over all, Lord in heaven and earth; and finally, when he should be acknowledged by Jews and Gentiles as the supreme Saviour of all men. See Phil. ii. 8.

24. ἐὰν μὴ ὁ κόκκος—φέρει] This is an illustration of the effect produced by his death; though the comparison is unaccompanied with application. The sense is: 'As a grain of corn except it fall to the earth and die (i. e. putrify), remains alone (i. e. continues a bare grain, having no increase), but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit, so it must be with me; for as it must die to yield increase, so must I undergo temporal death, in order to be glorified, and produce a great spiritual harvest of believers from all nations.' Comp. Isa. liiii. 10—12; and see 1 Cor. xv. 36—38, 42—44, and the notes.

25, 26. These two verses are closely connected together, and their scope is well pointed out by Lampe, p. 864, thus: 'Via, quam discipulis tenenda erat, ut huius gloriæ capitis sui consortes evaderent, vv. 25, 26, ita explicatur, ut partim describitur, partim hortatio ad illam inflectendam addatur. Describitur v. 25, in quo per oppositionem edocetur, quænam vera via non sit, et quænam sit.' And further on, p. 866, 'Cum autem hac via et præiudiciis discipulorum plene esset contraria et multum molestæ in se contineret, tempestive Servator exhortatoriam addit hortationem v. 26, in qua occurrit officii certi, tum præscriptio, tum inculcatio.' See also Bucer, and Muscul., and espec. Calv., who remarks, 'Doctrinæ exhortationem Christus annectit. Nam si mori nos oportet ut fructum feramus, patienter ferendum est ut Deus nos mortificet.' And L. Brug. shows why the two verses are so conceived as to be sententiæ generales, i. e. 'No in Jesu solo verum putaretur ut mors sit salutis gloriæque radix.' Thus, adds he, at the next verse, 'Ostendit generalia hæc effata non ad se tantum, sed ad suos pertinere.' To express the thing more familiarly, our Lord, in these verses, in order to fortify the courage of the disciples against impending trials, promises an abundant recompence to those who should cordially embrace his Gospel, and should make their adherence appear, as well by their faithfulness in suffering for him, v. 25, as in serving him, v. 26. As to the former, there is subjoined, (1) the fatal consequences of the neglect of the admonition, and (2) the recompence attending its fulfilment. As to the latter, the work to be done is first pointed out, and shown to be a 'reasonable service;' and then the recompence promised for the service. Accordingly, to wean them from the world, and apprise them what they have to gain, or lose, by the course they may undertake, he lets them know (what is reasonable in itself to be required), that those of his disciples who desire communion in his glory must not decline participation in his tribulations; q. d. 'He who so loveth his life as to prefer to the loss of it the loss of the advantages of my kingdom, shall not enjoy the felicity destined for those faithful followers, who encounter all perils for mine and the Gospel's sake.' Comp. Matt. x. 39, xvi. 25, and note, and Luke xvii. 33. The purpose of the adverbial phrase of time, ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ τούτῳ, and the corresponding expression, εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, is to impart greater point to the impressive declaration itself; and the former has reference to such circumstances and occasions in this life as put to the utmost test our faith in Christ,—namely, in time of persecution to the death in the cause of the Gospel. For here is implied the particular, expressed in the parallel passage of Matt. xvi. 25 and sq., 'for the Gospel's sake.' At the last clause of v. 26, καὶ ἐάν τις—τιμήσει αὐτὸν ὁ Πατήρ, there is (as Aretius points out) suggested a nova remuneratio, ostendens causam originalem,—that they shall be honoured by his Father; and that by conferring an honour, the highest, such as comes from God himself, such as it becomes the Great God to give, though infinitely beyond the deserts of his poor mean servants to receive. Thus the general sense is, 'If any one would dedicate himself to my service, let him follow my footsteps, and be disposed to suffer all things for my name's sake; and (for his encouragement) let him be assured, that where I am, there will he be also, as partaker of my glory. Moreover, whosoever shall serve me faithfully, him will my Father reward gloriously.'

27. Having thus intimated to his followers his own approaching sufferings, that they 'might follow his steps' (1 Pet. ii. 21), our Lord now, under a painful apprehension of his approaching passion, yields for a moment to the feelings of his human nature, and, shrinking at the prospect of what he must shortly undergo, is ready to entreat that he may be spared from the trial, or, in other words,—uttered privately in the garden of Gethsemane (recorded by all the other Evangelists),—'that this cup may pass from him;' where see notes. He, however, here, as on that occasion, immediately checks a desire so natural to human weakness, and promptly submits himself to his Father's will.

—νῦν ἡ ψυχὴ, &c.] If the common punctuation and interpretation be here adopted, we must suppose that, in the struggle of contending emotions, our Lord first utters, and then retracts, a prayer. Yet this view is unnecessary; for we may, with many of the best Commentators, ancient and modern, place a mark of interrogation after ταύτης, thus supposing two questions, as follows: 'What shall I say? [Shall I say] Father, deliver me from this hour? But for ρακται· καὶ τί εἶπω; Πάτερ, σῶσόν με ἐκ τῆς ὥρας ταύτης! ἀλλὰ διὰ τοῦτο ἦλθον εἰς τὴν ὥραν ταύτην. ²⁸ Πάτερ, δόξασόν σου τὸ ὄνομα. Ἦλθεν οὖν φωνὴ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ· Καὶ ἐδόξασα, καὶ πάλιν δοξάσω! ²⁹ Ὁ οὖν ὄχλος, ὁ ἐστὼς καὶ ἀκούσας, ἔλεγε βροντὴν γεγονέναι. ἄλλοι ἔλεγον· Ἄγγελος αὐτῷ λελάληκεν. ³⁰ Ἀπεκρίθη ὁ Ἰησοῦς καὶ εἶπεν· Οὐ δι' ἐμὲ αὕτη ἡ φωνὴ γέγονεν, ἀλλὰ δι' ὑμᾶς. ¹ Νῦν κρίσις ἐστὶ τοῦ κόσμου ¹ 1^a ch. 12. 11.

this cause came I to this hour,' i. e. to meet this hour, or time of suffering. Comp. Mark xiv. 35. Thus, it seems, when about involuntarily to utter a petition, He is checked by a reflection on the end for which He came into the world; and the natural emotions of fear soon subside into a prayer for the furtherance of his Father's glory, in any way that may seem good to him. Thus far in my former Editions. On mature consideration I see reason to change my view. Of the ancient Commentators adverted to by me, who place a mark of interrogation after ταύτης, I cannot adduce any more than Leontius and Theophyl.; while of modern Commentators, both earlier and recent, almost all adopt it; and, among these Commentators, Grot., Zeger, Dodd., Campb., Tittm., and Tholuck have maintained it with their usual ability, though with less than their usual success. With a due regard, then, to the reverent caution, to consult what belongs to the high and solemn character of the present portion, we may best regard the prayer in question as not a precatory suggestion,—which, as Lampe shows, would be unworthy of the august Speaker,—but an actual and real prayer, like that uttered at Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 39), and similar to several of the prophetic Messianic prayers found in the Book of Psalms, as Ps. lix. l. xl. 13. xxv. 17. vi. 3. Besides, the prayer is not recalled in the next words, since, as Lampe shows, it is not a simple assertion, but a transition, a minori ad majus, 'ita ut indicet Jesus, quamvis legitime its oret, non tamen in eo se subsistere, quoniam certo persuasus erat, quod propterea, ut liberaretur, in hanc horam venerit, quare nihil amplius opus esse, quam ut in voluntate Patris acquiescat, se ei permittat, et tantum desideret, ut Pater nomen suum glorificare velit.'

²⁸ δόξασόν σου τὸ ὄνομα] Bucer and Calvin remark, that 'in this brief ejaculation (where, from perturbation, there is a reticentia) our Lord testifies that he prefers his Father to all other things; thus intimating that his wish is, that the will of God may be accomplished at whatever cost to himself of trials or sufferings (comp. xiii. 31 seq. xvii. 11), even to the sacrifice of life itself; in all which it is implied that the glorification of the Son can alone take place by his death, as being necessary to the glorification of the Father, by the carrying out of his plans of mercy in the redemption of man.'

— ἦλθεν οὖν φωνὴ ἐκ τ. οὐρ.] Many recent Commentators understand by φωνή, here and at Matt. iii. 3, 17, simply thunder. They maintain that no words were uttered at all; and that the Evangelist did not suppose that there were any; but that he only meant to use the words which God, if he had expressed his will and intention by human voice, would have used. But this is an unjustifiable licence of interpretation. Nay, that a voice was heard in plain words, from heaven, we are not permitted to doubt, because of the exactly similar circumstances which took place not only in the case of Moses and the children of Israel (Exod. xix. 19), and also in that of Samuel (see 1 Sam. iii. 4, seqq.), but likewise in that of our Lord himself at his baptism, and in his transfiguration on Mount Tabor; which places the thing beyond dispute. That, moreover, is plain; for, 1. the words themselves, which were heard, are expressly mentioned; 2. in the following passage, not only are some said to have thought that an angel spoke with Jesus, but our Lord himself says, οὐ δι' ἐμὲ αὕτη ἡ φωνὴ γέγονεν, ἀλλὰ δι' ὑμᾶς. Just as St. Peter relates, that he and the rest who were with our Lord on Mount Tabor heard a voice from heaven, which said, 'This is my beloved Son.' That in this instance, as in the others adverted to, plain intelligible words were uttered, and heard by all, though variously interpreted, the express specification of the terms clearly shows. See Dr. Henderson's Lectures on Divine Inspiration, p. 91, and my note on Matt. xiii. 17. Of καὶ πάλιν the full sense is, 'yet again.'

³⁰ δι' ἐμὲ] 'for my sake; as though I needed the testimony from on high for my own satisfaction, as if I had any doubts about my course, or for the strengthening of my courage.'

— δι' ὑμᾶς] 'for your satisfaction' (meaning both the disciples and the assembled multitude),—namely, 'that ye may thus believe that "the Father hath sent me," and acts with me.' Compare supra xi. 42; and see on Matt. iii. 17. xvii. 5.

— νῦν κρίσις ἐστὶ, &c.] By the expression τοῦ κόσμου τοῦ, Tittm. and others would understand the genius seculi, a spirit of unbelief and wickedness (see Eph. ii. 2, and comp. Acts xxvii. 18 with Col. i. 13), and by ὁ ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, in a general way, the influence which unbelief and iniquity exerted over the minds of men, by impeding the progress of true religion and happiness. This view of the sense, however, is rather ingenious than solid; and I see no reason to abandon the usual interpretation, by which κρίσις τοῦ κόσμου is explained to mean the punishment soon to overtake the Jews for rejecting Christ; and ὁ ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου as understood to denote Satan, an appellation often given to him by the Rabbinical writers. The full sense, then, may be thus expressed: 'Now is [nigh at hand] the condemnation and punishment of the unbelieving world; now will the Prince of this world be deposed from his rule.' Meaning, that 'now is the Prince of this world, who had obtained his principedom by sin and death, about to be deposed from his rule, by the abolition of idolatry and superstition, and the introduction of true religion.' That the two clauses are very closely connected in sense, the latter explaining the former, is certain from a similar passage at xvi. 11, compared with v. 8, where our Lord says that the Paraclete, at his coming, ἐλγέξει τὸν κόσμον πρὸς κρίσιν, meaning (as it is just after explained) ὅτι ὁ ἀρχὼν τοῦ κόσμου τούτου κίεῖται, 'is to be condemned,' and consequently deposed.

³². The connexion between this and the next verse does not spring, as has been thought, from any implied contrast between the ejection of the prince of this world, and the exaltation of Christ, but is best traced by supposing a connexion of sequence, namely, that here our Lord intimates the means by which the great consummation just adverted to would be accomplished,—namely, by his crucifixion, resurrection, ascension, exaltation to glory, and the commencement of his office as Advocate with the Father; the first work of which would be the sending of the Holy Spirit, and thenceforward the mission of those who in every age should preach the Gospel. By these, and by his revealed Word in the New Test., our Lord means to say, he would draw all men to him, i. e. would offer such moral inducements and spiritual aids to men, as would suffice to bring the understanding to assent to the truths of his religion, and to incline, not constrain the will to obey its moral requisitions.

— ἐὰν ὑψωθῶ] 'when,' for ὅτ' ἂν, as at xiv. 3; 1 John iii. 2, and sometimes in the Sept., as Prov. iii. 24. xiv. 13, answering to Heb. ἄρα. The Lexicographers adduce no example from the Greek Classical writers, and the use is one of the rarest occurrence. I have noted only one example in Plato, Com., Ζεὺς κακὸν, frag. iv. 3, καὶ (for καὶ ἐὰν) καλλιερῆται, 'and when ye obtain favourable omens in sacrifice.' By πάντας is intimated the universality intended in the blessings of redemption, meaning all nations. See an excellent Sermon on this text, preached before the London Missionary Society, by the Rev. Angell James, in which the doctrine of the Cross, as implied in the terms ὑψωθῶ and ἐλκ. πρὸς ἑμ., is considered as the great means of converting the world which lieth in sin. 'Here (observes he) our Lord intimates the nature of his approaching death, predicts the consequences which would thence result, and intimates the means and the manner of men's conversion,—that they would be attracted to him by an exhibition of his death,—for the sins of the whole world.'

— ἐλκύσω πρὸς ἑμαυτόν] A drawing to be effected by the operation of the Holy Spirit sent from the Father at the intercession of the Son. See infra xiv. 16, and supra vi. 44, where I have treated on the force of the term ἐλκ. In the latter of those two passages, as referring to the period before Christ's glorification, the drawing is that of the Father drawing men to the Son; in the former, that of the Son drawing all men to himself. ³⁴—πρὸς ἑμαυτόν alludes to the place whither he is going, heaven. Thus at xiv. 2, 3, our Lord says 'he is going to prepare a place for them; and having prepared it, he will return and receive them to himself.'

— ὑψωθῆναι τὸν Υἱὸν τ. ἀνθ.] The speakers take for granted that Jesus is, what he claims to be, the Messiah. There is, however, no reason to suppose, with most Commentators, that by ὑψωθῆναι the people understood him to speak of crucifixion. It should seem that not even the Apostles comprehended the import of what was said; which was only meant as a dark prediction to be understood after the event, for the confirmation of their faith. The multitude, as appears from what follows, understood the expression ὑψωθῆναι ἐκ τῆς γῆς only of removal from earth to heaven, whether by death or otherwise, is uncertain. That the expression 'being lifted up from the world,' was a frequent periphrasis (by euphemism) to denote death, is plain from the numerous examples adduced by Schoëttgen from the Rabbinical writers.

— τίς ἐστὼ ἀνθρώπου.] This is not well rendered by our English Translators, 'Who is that Son of Man?' since τίς is here for ποῖος (like quis for qualis in Latin), as in Mark i. 27. vi. 2. Luke i. 66. John vii. 36, and often. Render: 'What sort of Son of Man is that to be?' To this question our Lord (v. 35) only replies indirectly, and by allegory,—hinting at their erroneous opinions concerning the Messiah, by adverting to the opportunity, which they now have, for obtaining light to dissipate the clouds of error under which they labour—an opportunity which they must use while they have it, lest they be overtaken by that moral darkness, through the absence of spiritual light, which would disable them from directing their course aright.

χρόνον τὸ φῶς † μεθ' ὑμῶν ἐστί. περιπατεῖτε ἕως τὸ φῶς ἔχετε, ἵνα μὴ σκοτία ὑμᾶς καταλάβῃ· καὶ ὁ περιπατῶν ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ οὐκ οἶδε ποῦ ὑπάγει. ³⁶ Ἔως τὸ φῶς ἔχετε, πιστεύετε εἰς τὸ φῶς, ἵνα υἱοὶ φωτὸς γένησθε. Ταῦτα ἐλάλησεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, καὶ ἀπελθὼν ἐκρύβη ἀπ' αὐτῶν.

³⁷ Τοσαῦτα δὲ αὐτοῦ σημεῖα πεποιηκός ἐμπροσθεν αὐτῶν, οὐκ ἐπίστευον εἰς αὐτόν. ³⁸ ἵνα ὁ λόγος Ἡσαίου τοῦ προφήτου πληρωθῇ, ὃν εἶπε· Κύριε, τίς ἐπίστευσεν τῇ ἀκοῇ ἡμῶν; καὶ ὁ βραχίον Κυρίου τίνι ἀπεκαλύφθη; ³⁹ Διὰ τοῦτο οὐκ ἠδύναντο πιστεῦειν, ὅτι πάλιν εἶπεν Ἡσαίας. ⁴⁰ Τετί-

meaning himself (as also at vii. 33. viii. 12. ix. 4. 5); by the latter (not to be taken absolutely, but with ἐν τῷ φῶτι in the same clause) representing active exertion evinced in their lives, in making use of any opportunity granted them by the Providence of God—which, in the present instance, would be that particular opportunity which his presence with them, still continued to them—held out; thus suggesting the availing themselves of it while it lasted. In short Jesus means to say, "Use the light of truth while ye yet have it, lest by its non-use ye be involved in the darkness of error." As to the phraseology, the full sense of the briefly worded semi-clause ἵνα μὴ—καταλάβῃ is this, 'in order that darkness may not overtake or surprise you' [before ye have duly used the light, and profited by the light]. Comp. supra xi. 10. The same kind of particular implied, which is unfrequent, I find in Arrian, E. A. i. 5, 17, ἀπὸ γὰρ αὐτῶ ὅτι κινδυνεύουσιν (read κινδυνεύουσιν) — εἰ μὴ αὐτοὺς καταλήψεται. 'should surprise them before they accomplished their purpose.' The words ὁ περιπατῶν—ὑπάγει have the air of a proverbial saying, and are brought in (as Calvin observes) by way of exciting a wholesome fear, by a warning admonition, as to the miserable condition of the children of darkness, who, destitute of the light of life, cannot move a step without danger of slipping or falling, and consequently 'toto vitæ cursu errant.' The καὶ, which introduces this clause, should not be rendered for, but simply, as in the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg. Versions, and our common Version, and; its purpose being merely to introduce a semi-parenthetic clause. Thus we may render: 'And, mark! he who walketh in the darkness knoweth not whether he is going [and hence cannot but wander to no purpose].' Thus they are enjoined, 1) to walk, ad. lucē, &c., by the light; 2) to believe in the light (i. e. in Jesus, as the light of the world), in order that they may [thus, for in no other way can they] be children of the light; and, having become such, they must, through the Spirit, still continue such, by walking, living, and acting by that light, which will thus grow brighter and brighter; until, having guided their steps through this dark vale of mortality, it shall bring them to those blissful mansions where there is light without darkness, and life for evermore.

—For μεθ' ὑμῶν almost all Editors, from Griesb. to Tisch. and Alf., read ἐν ὑμῖν, from B, D, K, L, M, X, and a few cursives; to which I can only add 1 Lamb. and 3 Mus. copies; and internal evidence does not make up for the deficiency in external authority, since it draws two ways;—but μεθ' ὑμῶν could not have been a gloss; nor, indeed, could ἐν ὑμῖν, though one might imagine the reason for a critical alteration either way. However, in a case like this, where internal evidence is equally balanced, and strong external authority exists for the text. rec., confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers., there is evidently no case for change. There is still greater reason for not adopting, with Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. (just after), ὡς, twice, for ἕως, from 6 uncial, and a very few cursive MSS., since internal evidence is rather in favour of ἕως. In the latter case Alf. pronounces ἕως 'a conformation to the preceding;' but that is only removing, not doing away with, the difficulty. In the former passage Alf. supposes that the ε arose from the ε preceding: it might; but it is quite as likely that the second ε was absorbed in the first. So that internal evidence draws two ways; in which case external authority must decide; and that is clearly in favour of ἕως, which I find in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, except about four.

⁴⁰. With reference to the passage of Is. vi. 9, 10, here alleged, it is remarkable that both St. Paul (Acts xxviii. 27) and Christ himself (Matt. xiii. 15) adduce it, not as St. John here does, to show that God had closed the eyes of the Jews, but that they themselves had closed their own eyes. This, it must be confessed, involves one of the many points on which we must be content to “see through a glass darkly,” though sure we may be that the inability denoted by οὐκ ἠδύναντο is such as is quite consistent with the freedom of the human will. Both Chrys. and August. are agreed, that we may understand οὐκ ἠδύν. to denote a moral, not a natural inability, thus supposing that they could not, because they would not, and in this view we may compare what is said, v. 40. οὐ θέλεις, &c.

41. That the passage of Isaiah (vi. 1, 2) here alluded to in the words εἶδε τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ, is (as the Evangelist indicates) to be understood of Christ, no well instructed and unprejudiced Bible-student can doubt. And thus is afforded a remarkable Scripture testimony to the Divinity of our Lord; for the Evangelist here declares it was CHRIST whose glory Isaiah then saw, and of whom he spake when he said, “Mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts,” who is there described as worshipped by the Seraphim. Hence Christ, in his Divine nature, was worshipped by the angels as Lord of Hosts before he was made flesh and dwelt among men.

42. ὅμως μέντοι] An accumulation of synonyms, to strengthen the sense, as in Herodot. i. 189, ὅμως μέντοι τὴν θειεὴν πᾶσαν αὐτοῦ ταύτῃ διέτριψαν ἐργαζόμενοι. On ἀποσυνάγ. γίνονται, see note at ix. 22.

44—50. This forms the second part of the Evangelist's epicrisis,—namely, that containing the doctrines of Jesus, of which this is a brief summary, and in our Lord's own words; proving how repeatedly Jesus had declared his exalted character and office, and warned them of the awful consequences of rejecting him. Compare supra i. 5, 9. iii. 18. v. 45. vi. 63. viii. 12, 28. ix. 5.

(44. ἐκράξε] The Aorists ἐκράξε and εἶπε (of which the former denotes public, the latter private teaching) are to be taken as Pluperfects.

45. ὁ θεωρῶν ἐμὲ, &c.] Thus declaring, by a mode of expression denoting the intimate union of nature, essence, with counsel and will, between the Father and the Son (see xiv. 9, and note), that ‘he who beholds Christ the Son, may be said to behold God the Father.’ Comp. infra xiv. 9. So Christ is styled ‘the image of the invisible God,’ Col. i. 15; and ‘the express image of his person,’ Heb. i. 3.

47. μὴ πιστεύσῃ] Lachm. and Tisch. read μὴ φυλάξῃ, from not a few ancient MSS., confirmed by the Syr. and some other Versions; to which may be added internal evidence, as existing in the circumstance of this being the more difficult reading, though intended to convey the same sense; though of that sense no other example has been adduced; and for that reason I have thought fit, with Griesb. and Scholz, to retain πιστεύσῃ. If φυλάξῃ be regarded, as it may be, as the true reading, it will be advisable to affix a stronger sense than what is inherent in πιστ.,—namely, to keep firm hold of one's belief.

— οὐ κρίνω αὐτόν] The words are commonly taken to mean, ‘I do not here on earth act as judge over him, since I came to be a Saviour, not a Judge.’ See iii. 17. v. 45. viii. 15, and notes. Kuinoel and Tittman, however, take κρίνειν here in the sense of condemns and punish; q. d. ‘I am not the cause of his condemnation, or that of men in general, having come not to destroy, but to save; and therefore the whole blame must rest with those who prefer darkness to light.’ On this verse comp. iii. 16—19, and 2 Pet. iii. 9.

48. ὁ λόγος] By this and the τὰ ῥήματα are meant that part of Christ's teaching which respected his person and office. See iii. 17, and note.—λαλεῖν here refers to oral instruction, as opposed to injunction. It is meant that the unbeliever's inattention and wilful neglect of both will bring down on him condemnation and condign punishment.

XIII. Having finished the work of public teaching, our Lord devoted the short remainder of his life to the private instruction of his disciples. These he in chap. xiii., xiv., xv., xvi., apprises of his approaching trials; and he endeavours to console them by kind assurances, evincing his love both to them and the whole human race.

1. πρὸ τῆς ἑορτῆς τ. π.] See note on Matt. xxvi. 2.

— εἰδὼς ὁ Ἰησοῦς ὅτι, &c.] Of his approaching death he was well aware, having frequently conversed with his disciples upon it, and predicted its most minute circumstances.

— ἵνα μεταβῇ, &c.] Christ's departure from the world is termed μετάβασις, to intimate that he had not descended to earth as a mere man, but as the Son of God, who had come from, and would return to, God. So we have in Isocrat. Paneg. μεταστάτος δὲ Ἡρακλείου εἰς θεοῦς. Apollod. 2. τὸν Ἡρακλῆα—ἐξ ἀνθρώπων εἰς θεοῦς μετανίστασθαι. Liban. Ep. 371, ὁ Ζεὺς δι' ἐκείνου, ὁ σὸς προστάτης, καὶ παρ' οὗ κατίβης, καὶ πρὸς αὐτὸν ἄπαι.

— ἀγαπήσας τοὺς ἰδίους] By τοὺς ἰδ. most Commentators understand his disciples. But if we consider the circumstances of the case, and that the great proof of his love was in the institution of the Eucharist, which was intended for the benefit of his own of every age, it cannot but mean those given to him by his Father. See xvii. 11, and note.

— ἡγάπησεν] This expression, Tittman observes, is to be taken, like many others, declaratively. By the tokens of love evinced by Jesus to his disciples, are to be understood the symbolical actions a little after narrated.

2. δείπνου γενομένου] The exact sense of this expression has been disputed. Most Interpreters render, 'supper being ended;' others, 'while supper was preparing.' But the first rendering expresses too much (as is clear from v. 26), and the other, as is plain from v. 4, 12, too little; being moreover contrary to the usage of the language. It is best, with Kuin. and Tittm., to take γενομένου for γενομένου (as did the Arabic and Persian Translators) in the sense 'while supper was about,' 'during supper time.' And, indeed, γενομένου is found in some ancient MSS. and Nonnus. Besides, though washing regularly preceded the meal, yet, as we learn from the Rabbinical writers, there were on the Paschal evening two washings.

— βεβληκότος εἰς τὴν καρδίαν Ἰ. Σ.] An expression, like other similar ones in Scripture, used of suggesting any thought to the mind, and also found in the Classical writers; from whom examples are adduced by Wetstein. Many recent Commentators, indeed, regard this as merely a mode of expression to point at the enormity of the crime meditated. But that view, besides proceeding on an unsound principle, is utterly inconsistent with the character of the words, which evidently convey the idea of a real Being, possessed of an actual power over the minds of men. Here, we may observe, the two circumstances of Judas's temptation to betray his Master, and the condescension of that Master, are mentioned together, in order the more strongly to represent the baseness of the betrayer.

3. εἰδὼς ὁ Ἰησοῦς, &c.] q. d. 'Though he knew that God had given all power into his hands, yet he vouchsafed to set his disciples the following example of humility.'

This expression ἀπὸ Θεοῦ ἐξῆλθε, taken in conjunction with πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν ὑπάγει, can import no less than that 'he was of celestial origin, and dwelt in heaven before he came on earth' (see iii. 13. vi. 62. xvii. 5, and i. 1); and the latter (πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν ὑπάγει) must mean, that 'he would return to the Father, again to reign with Him by equal right.' In short, the clause plainly declares the dignity of Christ's person—that as he had 'come from God (by origination from the Father),' and had the governance of the whole universe committed into his hands, so 'he was going again to God,' to resume the glory which he had with the Father from all eternity. See supra iii. 13. viii. 42, and notes.

4. τίθησι] 'lays aside;' for ἀποτίθησι. A use occasionally found in the later writers, as Arrian and Diod. Sic., and answering to that of ponere in Latin. By ἱμάτια is meant either the upper garment only, the pallium (plural for singular, as in the corresponding Hebrew term), or rather, as it should seem, the pallium and stola, 'the mantle and tunic.' Αἰνῶνιον is a Hellenistic word (from whence the Latin linctum) nearly synonymous with σινδών, and meaning a towel; though σάβανον was the more usual term. To be thus girded was considered by the ancients in the same light as, with us, a person's wearing an apron,—namely, as indicating the exercise of some servile or handicraft occupation.

5. διεξωσμένος] For this the more classical term would have been περιζῶν, which is especially used of domestics, who, previous to entering upon culinary operations, gird themselves with an apron or towel. See a passage of Alexis p. Athen. ap. 170.

8. ἴδαν μὴ νίψω σε, &c.] This must not be supposed to mean (as Kuin. and others understand) 'unless thou sufferest me to wash thee.' The expression was probably worded as it is, in order to make the thing appear a privilege to be conferred. As to the sense of the words following, ἔχεις μέρος μετ' ἐμοῦ, the phrase ἔχειν μέρος μετὰ τινος properly imports no more than fellowship with any one, by community of sentiment, as in friendship. And such, Tittman thinks, is the sense here intended. But considering the frequent practice of our Lord, to pass from sensible and temporal objects to things spiritual and eternal (as Luke x. 42), we may rather, with Lampe, suppose that our Lord meant thus to intimate to Peter, that if he were not thus cleansed by him (with allusion to the mystical washing away of sin by the blood, and cleansing from sin by the Spirit, of Christ; see 1 John i. 7. Rev. i. 5. Heb. x. 22), he could not have part in the communication of the benefits of his blood, as typified in the ordinance which he was about to institute. See 1 Cor. x. 16.

9. μὴ τοὺς πόδας—κεφαλὴν] From the brief and prompt earnestness of Peter's answer, retracting his refusal to suffer Jesus to wash his feet, it is plain, that he both thought that an exclusion from some great benefit would result from his not having this washing; nay he may have understood that another besides the external washing was probably intended, namely, the Spiritual washing; and our Lord's words may have awakened in him, as Bengel, Stier, and Alf. suppose, a feeling (like that recorded of him at Luke v. 8) of his own want of cleansing, as being an ἀμαρτωλός, but that is very uncertain.

10. ὁ λελουμένος, &c.] In order to determine the exact sense of this variously interpreted passage, we must first ascertain the nature of the allusion; which some suppose to be to the Jewish custom of washing the hands and face before meals (see Matt. xv. 2); others, to the two kinds of washing, in performance of religious rites, in use among the Jews; 1. by the immersion of the whole body, at the consecration of priests, and the baptism of proselytes; 2. by the purificatory ablutions in daily use among the Jews. Thus they suppose the meaning to be, that 'the true Christian needs not that total change, which is indispensable to the unconverted sinner; though he will need continual acts of repentance and faith, to cleanse himself from lesser impurities.' Of these two views, however, the latter is too far-fetched and artificial; and the former is quite excluded by the term λούεσθαι being used, not νίπτεσθαι; the former denoting the washing of the whole body, as in a bath; the latter the washing only of a part; see Acts ix. 37, compared with Hom. II. Ω, 582. The best Expositors are nearly agreed, that the allusion is to the use of the bath previously to going to an entertainment. After having undergone this ablution, a guest needed no further purification, on arriving at his host's house, than to have his feet washed, inasmuch as they might have been soiled in walking. Thus the meaning intended to be conveyed will be (in the words of Bp. Lonsd.) 'He, who has been thoroughly cleansed in heart by faith in Christ, need not be again cleansed, but only to have those defilements washed away, which he may have contracted in his course through the world. This seems confirmed by the words following, "And ye are clean,"—thoroughly cleansed by my doctrine (see xv. 3), "but not all [of you]."' The words ἢ τοὺς πόδας νίψασθαι, 'except to wash his feet,' are an important exception, which seems meant to intimate that one thing yet remains, which, like the washing of the feet, will, when done, complete the whole; namely, that they should receive a lesson to be taught them by the action he is about to perform. This foot-washing, it is to be observed, was intended to convey not only a lesson of humility, condescension, and consideration, but to set forth their need of the spiritual washing by the blood of Christ from daily pollution, liable to be contracted even after regeneration. The strong expression οὐχὶ πάντες, 'by no means all [of you],' was meant, by its pungency, to smite the conscience of the betrayer present.

At ver. 11 the Evangelist (as supra vi. 64, 70, seqq.), by the words ἔδει γὰρ τὸν παραδιδόντα (who 'was betraying,' 'about to betray him'), points at our Lord's knowledge of the hearts of men; and espec. by using the term ἔδει, 'had known all along,' he intimated his perfect knowledge of the man,—not only of his general faithlessness, nay dishonesty, but of the peculiar act of baseness which he was about to commit.

12—17. Here our Lord shows the chief intent of the action he had been performing, admonishing them to practise the duties it was meant to suggest.

12. γινώσκετε τί πεποίηκα ὑμῖν; ['Know ye the intent of what I have just now done to you?'

13. φωνεῖτέ με, ὁ διδάσκ.] ὁ διδ. here is the Nominat. for the Vocat., as in Mark v. 41, and often elsewhere; and there seems an ellipsis of λέγοντες. How frequent was this mode of address, by which the name of the person was merged in that of his office, is proved by the citations adduced from the Rabbinical writers by Schoettgen; which indeed show that the proper name of the Rabbins was almost always dropped.

14. εἰ οὖν ἔγω, &c.] An argumentum à majori ad minus. These words are not to be taken, nor were they understood, in the literal sense; see 1 Tim. v. 10, 'If she have washed the saints' feet.' The pedilavium was a primitive custom. By washing one another's feet Christ did not mean that they should do this literally, but that they should behave towards each other with the same spirit as that characterized by this symbol of humility and condescension, having a mind weaned from pride, ambition, and vain-glory, and ever ready to show mutual forbearance, condescension, and kindness.

— ἄλλ. νίπτειν τοὺς πόδας] Meaning, to act towards one another, if not to the letter, yet in the same spirit of humility, meekness, and kind consideration for each other's failings. See Phil. ii. 5—8.

15. καθὼς ὑμεῖς ποιήτε] Not literally, but in the same spirit of humility and Christian charity; our Lord here inculcating that by action which he had before done by precept. See Luke xii. 24—27.

16. The saying here is a proverbial one, often used by our Lord, but here in a different sense from that in which it is used at xv. 20. Matt. x. 24. Luke vi. 40, and accommodated to the purpose immediately in view; q. d. 'Since the servant is not greater than his master, nor he who is sent (ἀπόστολος for ὁ ἀπεισταλμένος, as in Hdol. i. 21. v. 35) greater than he who sent him; thus ye, who are sent forth by me, on my service, must not think it beneath you to practise such acts of condescension as I have done to you, for an example to others.'

17. εἰ ταῦτα—αὐτά] The εἰ must not, with Kuin. and others, be rendered, as in some other passages, scilicet, since; for it may be doubted whether they did really know the truths they had been told; and as that signif. of the word is not to be resorted to unnecessarily, and where it materially alters the sense, so here it is better to retain the ordinary one, and suppose that our Lord here glances at that self-opinion; q. d. 'Ye may say that ye know all this very well. If, then, ye do know these things,—understand the lessons that I have taught you,—happy are ye if ye practise them.'

Similar sentiments may be seen in Matt. vii. 21. Mark iii. 35. Luke vi. 46. And several such occur in the Greek writers; e. g. Hesiod. Op. et D. 62, εὐδαίμων τε καὶ δλβιος δε τάδε πάντα Εἰδὼς ἐργάζεται. Knowledge and practice are indeed (as Lampe observes) inseparably connected; knowledge being the rule of practice, and practice the end of knowledge.

18. Our Lord now again adverts to the treachery of Judas,—applying to him what was originally said by the Psalmist with reference to Abithophel's treachery towards himself,—and he introduces the mention of it, by darkly alluding to the betrayer, as supra 10 and 11, οὗχι πάντες καθ.; and in doing this he resorts to a brevity of expression which requires, in order to represent the full meaning, to be unfolded thus:—'In speaking of the knowledge and practice of these lessons which I am teaching you, I mean not to say that all of you will be so happy as to practise them.' Thus our Lord opens out his disclosure. The introductory ἐγὼ οἶδα does not need the γάρ introduced in several ancient MSS., and which weakens the force of the declaration, as will be seen by advertg to the scope of the added words, ἀλλ' ἵνα—πληρωθῇ, as I have explained them infra. In the words taken conjointly, our Lord anticipates either an objection against the selection of Judas as an Apostle,—knowing, as he must have done, that he would thus appoint a betrayer; or else a surmise that the treachery was unforeseen and unexpected, or perhaps both; and he intimates, that what was thus done was done by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, and in accordance with the prediction of Scripture (Ps. xli. 9). The ἔγω has considerable force (as often in this Gospel, though generally its force has not been perceived by Expositors); and the scope of the emphasis, opened out at the next verse, is, in other words, 'I for my part know, and well discern, what you can only surmise.' Thus our Lord means to say that he knows full well the characters and dispositions of those whom he has chosen [as his Apostles], though it was necessary that, in one of those so chosen, the Scripture should be fulfilled; thus intimating what, supra, vi. 70, is expressed by 'Have I not chosen you twelve, and one of you is a betrayer?' The words of the Psalmist, ὁ τρώγων—πτέρναν αὐτοῦ, are not taken from the Hebrew, but are an independent Version, not so literal as that of the Sept. is, but conveying the sense more correctly, and which is confirmed by the Arabic Versions and the Greek of Symm., συνεσθίων (I would read ὁ συν., which conjecture is confirmed by the Sept.) μοι ἄρτον ἐμὸν, meaning 'the food put on my table,' which is the very sense intended by τὸν ἄρτον ἐμὸν here, the Art. being, as often, put for the Pron. Poss. Τρώγ. μετ' ἐμοῦ is a not unfaithful version of the Hebrew, since in the original עָנַן אֶת־לֶחֶם, 'he who eateth my bread,' i. e. the bread on my table, there is implied communion of eating, viz. with me. And the Septuagint Translators, who did not see this in the present passage of the Psalms, saw it at Proverbs xxiii. 6, 'Thou must not eat עַל שֵׁן עַל עַל,' lit. 'the bread of one evil in eye (i. e. grudging),' where they render συνδίδωναι ἀνδρὶ βασκάνω, 'eat not bread with one who grudges what you eat.' As regards the nature of the metaphor in עָנַן אֶת־לֶחֶם, this has been variously explained. I am of opinion that it may be derived from the custom of animals which suddenly and treacherously kick at their masters or keepers (comp. Jer. ix. 4): or rather, from that of wrestlers,—a view confirmed by a passage of Obad. v. 7, written by the Prophet with an evident reference to this of the Psalmist: 'The men of thy peace (meaning 'those at amity with thee') have deceived thee and prevailed over thee; those who eat thy bread lay snares under thee,' i. e. 'to supplant,' 'trip thee up.' I suspect that the Sept. Translator here, by the use of πτερνισμὸν, only intended to offer a free version, meaning to express merely the sense, 'my familiar mess-mate hath been guilty of great treachery, or guile, against me.'

The expression ἵνα—πληρωθῇ must, however, not be left unattended to, because it involves the application of the saying made by Christ; and in explaining it I must reprobate the view of those Expositors who maintain that the forty-first Psalm is solely conversant with the fortunes of David, and that its tenth verse is only applied by Christ, by a sort of accommodation, to the betrayer Judas, on account of the similitude between the two cases, of Ahithophel and of Judas. But thus, as Hoffm. remarks (who ably handles the quotation) there would be in the Psalm no prophetic declaration, nor, consequently, in the deed of Judas any fulfilment, which yet the words of Christ intimate. He then proceeds to canvass the opposite view of those who, as the Latin Fathers generally, and some modern Expositors, as Bellarm., Cocceius, and Lampe, would understand the Psalm solely and literally of Christ; and, after showing that such a course requires a considerable violence to be applied to several passages thereof, and much straining of the sense in others, he, with Calv., Grot., and Surenhus., acts on the maxim, 'in medio tutissimius ibis,' by supposing that the Psalm treats proximè ac literaliter of David, but remotè ac mysticè of CHRIST, 'ita quidem ut ex intentione Spiritus prophetici fata Davidis, tanquam typi, adumbrent fata Messie, tanquam antitypi.' He is also of opinion, that though the literal sense of the Psalms exactly squares with the character of David's treacherous friend, yet that Christ therefore applied what is there said of Ahithophel to Judas the betrayer of Himself, in order that he might tacitly intimate, that the end and exit of Judas would be like that of Ahithophel, i. e. suicide, by hanging himself.

19. ἀπ' ἄρτι λέγω—πιστεύσατε, &c.] Meaning, 'I tell you this now (lit. 'from now onward'), before it has taken place, that, when it shall have come to pass, ye may be confirmed in your faith, that I am he whom I professed to be, the CHRIST; that being implied, though, as viii. 24, not expressed. This use of ἀπ' ἄρτι with reference to the Fut., as immediately connected with the Pres., occurs infra xiv. 7, and Rev. xiv. 13, οἱ ἐν Κυρίῳ ἀποθνήσκοντες, where see note.—Πιστ. is taken as at ii. 11. Our Lord's purpose was not only to confirm their faith, but to prepare them for the perfidy soon to be disclosed; since his words allude to only one traitor, as indeed he soon afterwards intimates in express terms. The transposition here adopted by Tisch. and Alf. from only two MSS., B and L, is of too little authority to warrant reception, and hence was rightly rejected by Lachm. It arose, probably, from the carelessness of the scribe of the Archetype from which those two copies sprung. On attentively reconsidering this somewhat difficult matter, I am persuaded that the connexion is best traced to the verses immediately preceding; and I am still of opinion that—as Euthym., of the ancients, and several modern Expositors suppose—the purpose of our Lord's words was, to comfort and support his hearers under the tribulations they should endure in the exercise of their apostolic office, by the remembrance, that as they sustained the character of representatives of their Lord, they should not be troubled at having to suffer, as he had, from the treachery of their fellow-labourers in the ingratitude of those whom they taught; q. d. (as suggests Bp. Lonsd.) that their office and mission (its dignity, as an ambassadorship for Christ, 2 Cor. v. 20) would still be the same, though one had proved himself (to their mortification and grief) a traitor.

21—30. Announcement of Judas' treachery: our Lord's departure from that upper room. See Matt. xxvi. 21—25. Mark xiv. 18—21. Luke xxii. 21—23, and notes.

21. ἐμαρτύρησε καὶ εἶπεν] For ἐμαρτ. εἶπεν. Μαρτυρεῖν denotes open and solemn declaration, in contradistinction to the indirect allusion at ver. 18.

22. ἔβλεπον εἰς ἀλλ.] This phrase well depicts their anxiety, as the term ἀπορούμενοι does their perplexity what to think (see Gen. xlii. 1, and comp. Hom. 11. Q, 480); the full sense is, 'being at a loss to know of what person he is speaking, and, consequently, not knowing whom to suspect.' See Pesch. Syr. Vers., which has happily seized the sense.

23. ἦν δὲ ἀνακείμενος—ἐν τῷ κόλπῳ] for ἐπὶ τὸ στήθος, the expression used at ver. 25. It is well observed by Lücke, that 'since the Captivity the Jews lay at table, in the Persian manner, on beds or couches, each on his left side, with his face to the table, his left elbow resting on a pillow, and supporting his head. Thus the second guest to the right hand lay with his head near the breast of the first, and so on.' Comp. xix. 26. xxi. 7, 20.

24. νεύει] 'nutu significat.' See on Luke i. 22.

25. ἐπιπαισάν] lit. 'sitting at meat at the bosom'; see note supra 23; which is nearly equivalent to 'upon,' 'close to the bosom'; and this is confirmed by the fact. Thus there might be, as Euthym. says, no change of posture, but only a turning of the head, the better to direct the voice to the ear. And, accordingly, what was said might well escape, as it did, the notice of the rest of the persons at table. That the question was put in a low voice, and answered in the same manner, is plain from vv. 28, 29. Comp. Hom. Od. viii. 70, and see Matt. xxvi. 21.

26. ψωμίον] This is not well rendered sup. As derived from ψάω it may well signify (like the Hebr. נָחַץ from נָחַץ, 'to break') 'a bit, or piece, of any thing,' i. e. 'food.' And here, probably, it denotes 'a piece of the paschal lamb dipped in the sauce.' Such portions were usually distributed by the master of the family. There is no real discrepancy in the statements of the Evangelists. Jesus, it seems, was thus engaged, when John putting the above question to him, he either helped Judas first, or, in serving out the portions, had come to him in his turn. Judas, then (perhaps sitting near Jesus, and having heard John's interrogation, or, with the suspicion natural to guilt, supposing that they were speaking of him), after receiving the portion, asks in a low voice, 'Is it I, master?' To whom Jesus answers, οὐ εἶπας, 'It is thou' (see Matt. xxvi. 25). Then in a loud voice he adds, ὁ ποιεῖς, ποιήσον τάχον, 'what thou art about to do, do very quickly.' Here the Present ποιεῖς is for the Future sense, the Imperat. being, as Chrysa. remarks, permissio, though with the force of indignant reproof. The manner of speaking is itself proverbial, as appears from the many examples adduced by Wetst. and others, of which the most apposite is Eurip. Iph. Aul. 817, δρά γ' εἰτι δρᾶσαι.

31. ὅτε [οὖν] ἐξῆλθε] The MSS., Versions, and Editions, vary as to the reading, and still more the position of these words, which are in some copies connected with what precedes, in others with what follows. The Ed. Princ. and R. Stephens, 1, 2, join them with the following, placing a period after νύξ: the Erasmusian and Stephens's 3rd Edition connect them with the preceding. But the old position was recalled by Beza and the Elzevir Editor, and was thus introduced into the testus receptus. Of later Editors, Wetstein, Matthæi, Knapp, and Vater, join them with the preceding; Griesb., Tittm., and Scholz, with the following. The determination of this question mainly depends upon the decision of another—whether the οὖν should be adopted or rejected. It is found in most of the MSS. (many of them very ancient), in several of the later Versions, and some Fathers; but is wanting in very many MSS. (some equally ancient), and the earlier and principal Versions; and is rejected by Wetstein, Matthæi, Griesbach, and Scholz. The point, however, admits not of any certain determination. It might have been thrown out by those who, joining the words with the preceding, thought the οὖν worse than useless; or it might have been inserted by those who, connecting the words with what follows, thought that a particle of continuation was wanting. And this seems more probable, and better accounts for the variation of opinion as to the construction of the words. But as to whether ὅρα—ἰδεῖν should be taken with the preceding, or the following, is a matter on which it is difficult to pronounce positively. We may, however, agree rather with those who adopt the latter course, by which a better sense is gained; for it could scarcely be the intention of the Evangelist to make an insignificant circumstance so prominent. And if the other mode of position be adopted, there will be great harshness in the next verse beginning so abruptly.

— On the departure of Judas, our Lord proceeded to deliver those most interesting last discourses with his disciples, by which he intended to infix in their minds truths which, ignorant as they were, and labouring under heavy affliction, they were not able, at that time, fully to comprehend, but which they would afterwards understand; and by which, even now, they would be fortified against their impending trials. In fact, 'these were (to use the words of Olshausen) the last moments which the Lord spent in the midst of his own disciples before his passion, and words full of heavenly meaning flowed during them from his holy lips,—all that his heart, glowing with love, had yet to say to his own, was compressed into this short space of time. At first the conversation with the disciples takes more the form of usual dialogue: reclining at the table, they mournfully reply to, and question him. But when (ch. xiv. 31) they had risen from the supper the discourse of Christ took a higher form: surrounding their Master, the disciples listened to the words of life, and seldom spoke (only ch. xvi. 17, 29). Finally, in the sublime prayer of the great High Priest, the whole soul of Christ flowed forth in earnest intercession for his own to his heavenly Father.'

31. οὖν ἰδοὺ δόξα] We have here the Prophetic Preterite, used of what is shortly to come to pass, and certainly will take place; see John

xi. 23. xv. 6. xvi. 33, and notes. The sense is, 'Now is the time come, when the Son of Man shall be glorified by my completion of the work which God gave me to do on earth; and when God shall be glorified in me, by my obedience unto death.'

32. καὶ εὐθὺς δοξάσει αὐτόν] This is said per epanorthosin, q. d. 'nay, he will, speedily and without delay, glorify me in my own person; and that, by admitting me to a full participation of glory with Himself' (comp. xiv. 3), thus intimating that the time was close at hand when God would thus glorify him, after his near impending death, resurrection, and ascension. See Lampe. The purpose of this subjoined assurance is (as Calvin says) to minister consolation from the shortness of the time before the event should take place and in which they would themselves, in some sense, participate. See infra xvii. 24. The disputed question whether ἐν ἑαυτῷ should be referred to God or to Christ, is ably determined by Lampe as follows: 'If it be referred to God, God glorifies Christ in himself because by himself, by his own divine glory (see Rom. vi. 4), his perfections all shining in the Son; because he will himself be glorified by the glorification of the Son; because he glorifies his Son with himself, giving him a communion and equality of glory, &c. If to the Son, he is glorified in himself, because the glory, though given by the Father, is his own, and because by the glorification, he possesses an eternal fountain, from which the glory of all the elect to the end of the world will be derived.'

33. τεκνία] This appellation was employed in ancient times by masters to their servants, and generally by superiors to inferiors; especially by teachers to their pupils. See note supra vii. 33. The diminutive form is expressive of affection, and may, in several passages of 1 John, be rendered 'Dear children.'

— οὐ δύνασθε ἰλθεῖν] i. e. 'not now,' but (as is added further on, at xiv. 3) 'hereafter.'

34. Christ now subjoins an exhortation to mutual love; q. d. 'I am about to be absent from you in the body: show, then, by mutual love one towards another, that you have not been taught of me in vain. Be this your constant care and endeavour.' (Calvin.)

— ἐντολὴν καὶνὴν, &c.] It has been not a little disputed in what sense the precept here enjoined of Love was called καὶνὴν, 'a new commandment;' since even the Mosaic law contained a positive injunction to the same effect, Lev. xix. 18; and our Lord himself had frequently enjoined this duty of loving each other. To avoid the above difficulty, various senses in which this might be called a new commandment have been here supposed intended, all of doubtful authority, and indeed unnecessary, since it is plain from 1 John ii. 7, 8, that the word may be taken in its ordinary acceptance; for the injunction here given to the Apostles was, though not absolutely new, yet new to them, if we consider the sentiments, opinions, and practice of their age. In their contests for pre-eminence, their selfish preference for themselves, and their worldly, proud, and envious spirit, they had forgotten the precept of mutual love. Hence our Lord had before enjoined on them the virtues of humility and charity by an affecting symbolical action; and now he enforces one of the most important of these duties by a positive injunction, which might be called new, if we consider the standard to which the duty was raised—namely, καθὼς ἠγάπησα ὑμᾶς, see 1 John iii. 16. It was also new, as being enforced by new motives, to be performed in a new manner, and made a peculiar characteristic of the Christian religion, as is intimated in the words ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκονται πάντες ὅτι, &c., which was so true of the primitive Christians, that the Heathens used to say, ‘See how these Christians love one another!’ Mr. Alf., indeed, maintains, that the difference from the one under the law, Lev. xix. 18, is such as to constitute this the new commandment of the new covenant, the first fruit of the Spirit under the new dispensation, Gal. v. 22. See 1 John ii. 7, 8. That sense, however, would require τὴν ἐνταλὴν ταύτην τὴν καινὴν: and the other sense is sufficient for the occasion. We have only to suppose a commandment raised to so high a degree, by the circumstances under which the injunction was made, as to form, in a manner, a new commandment, and entitle it in popular language to be so called.

³⁷ Κύρ., διατί οὐ δύναμαι—ἄρτι;] lit. ‘by what hindrance can I not follow thee just now at the present?’ It is not clear whether Peter quite understood Christ’s meaning; if he did not, the subjoined words are a form of speaking, testifying only attachment even unto death. See note supra x. 11 (to which I add Theocr. Id. xxvii. 61, αὐτὸν δυνάμεν καὶ τὰν ψυχὰν ἐπιβάλλειν), as if his devoted attachment gave him a claim to follow his Master every where. But if this denial be, as there is no doubt it is, the same as that recorded in Luke xxii. 33, Peter must have understood his Master, and meant to assure him that he was ready to follow him as far, at least, as unto death, which was all he could do. Peter however spake, though not insincerely, yet inconsiderately, and what was well intended, savoured of pride and rashness (by venturing on his own strength), and was said in signal ignorance of himself, as the event proved. Accordingly, our Lord (at ver. 38) returning an answer to Peter’s question, ‘why?’ ‘how so?’ quietly annihilates his empty boast, and stops his mouth by a plain fact, predicted for his utter confusion; thus showing his vain confidence, his utter inconstancy, and his gross ignorance of himself, even in reference to the trial of his constancy, and that on the very point of occurrence. The reproof is made the more severe by the manner, in the employment at the first clause of an interrogation, involving a strong negation, followed up in the second by a very strong affirmation, in flat contradiction of Peter’s assurance.

XIV. The forlorn prospect, which our Lord’s prediction of his speedy departure had opened on his disciples, the total annihilation of their long-formed hopes, and the troubles, which they had anticipated, being now announced as close upon them;—all these had filled their minds with dismay. Hence, after replying to Peter’s inquiry, our Lord proceeds to suggest various motives of consolation under the trials they would be called upon to sustain; addressing them at once in the language of consolation, exhortation, promise (namely, of support through the Holy Spirit), and valuediction, interspersed with various intimations highly instructive, and some of them prophetic. The whole scene would form a very fit subject for a noble picture, and would task the utmost powers of a great painter. Peter would occupy the foreground, in the posture of humble, mortified silence, while the other Apostles would be represented as all deeply dispirited, but exhibiting it in various manners, yet all in utter dismay at the sad tidings they had heard.

1. μὴ ταρассίσθω ὑμῖν ἡ καρδία, &c.] The full sense is, 'Be not troubled in mind at what I have said of my departure; only trust in God (as a very present help in trouble), and believe in me.' The first πιστεύετε admits, indeed, of being taken either in the Indicative or in the Imperative, see note supra ver. 39. The former mood is adopted in the Vulg. and preferred by the earlier modern Expositors, and some modern ones, as Olsh.; the latter by many ancient Fathers, the Pesch. Syr. Version, and almost all the modern Commentators from Whitby and Lampe to Tittman, Lücke, Thol., and Stier. But to suppose the verb used in the same clause, of the same sentence, first in the Indic. and then in the Imper., involves great harshness, and the sense thus arising is, as Alf. observes, 'inconsistent with the whole tenor of the discourse, which presupposes some want of belief in God, in its full and true sense, as begetting trust in him.' Hence we are bound to suppose the Imper. to be meant in both; aspec. as it is both suitable to the context and good in itself, being agreeable to the analogy of Scripture; which teaches us, that a steadfast faith in God, and in the One Mediator between God and man, forms the best support under all the trials to which men may be exposed. On the proof hence to be deduced of the Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, see Smith's Scrip. Test. vol. iii. 179.

2. ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ—αἰών] This assurance seems meant to wean them from secular ambition, and console them under present affliction, by a representation of the ample felicity he is going to prepare for them. In the μοναὶ πολλαὶ some suppose an allusion to the numerous chambers in the House of his Father on earth, the Temple; and others to the custom of Eastern monarchs, of assigning to their courtiers habitations within the precincts of their vast palaces; others, again, supposing that by πολλαὶ is implied degrees of dignity, think we may hence infer that there are various degrees of reward in heaven, proportioned to men's progress in faith and holiness. But although this view is strongly supported by ancient authority in the Greek Fathers, from Papias, Clem. Alex., Chrys., and Basil, downwards, and some Latins, as Tertullian, yet I cannot regard the doctrine as distinctly revealed, at least here; and the foregoing supposed allusion is quite visionary, and too insecure a basis for erecting such a superstructure. Hence I continue to think that no more is here to be sought than such a general sense as is suitable to the context. And since one thing is certain,—namely, that by οἰκία must be meant heaven, see Ps. xxxiii. 13, seqq., and Isa. liii. 15, we may well suppose that all which is really meant here is, that 'heaven is a most ample place, containing room enough for them all,—and, indeed, for all his faithful disciples of every age; thus directing their hopes and views to those heavenly mansions whither he is going before them,—as one preceding another to some distant country, to prepare for his reception; so that, removed from the miseries of this sinful world, they may be introduced to an eternity of bliss,—so that, where he is, there may they be also.

—εἰ δὲ μὴ, εἶπον ἂν ὑμῖν] Meaning, 'if it had not been so—if you could not have followed me thither—I would have told you so, and not deceived you with vain hopes.' By this, as Tittman observes, our Lord meant to re-assert, by implication, what he had just said, that 'in the house of his Father were many habitations,' whither Peter, and all the disciples who believed in him, should follow him; q. d. 'Such a hope I should not hold out, unless I were prepared to realize it.' Then, for the confirmation of this hope, he subjoins πορεύομαι ἐτοιμάσαι τόπον ὑμῖν,—words which contain (as Tittman observes) a sentence of particular application, in confirmation of the foregoing general one: 'Nay, I go [am going] to prepare a place for you there.' For although heaven was, from the first, destined to be the seat of the blessed, it was not yet prepared; and that preparation had to be made by CHRIST; but how? namely, by his death (intimated by πορεύομαι), ascension, and sitting at the right hand of God, exercising the office of Mediator and Intercessor, through whom the Spirit of life would be imparted. See more in the able note of Lampe, who rightly makes the Death and Ascension of Christ the means of preparation on earth, and the other as the results thereof in heaven. How the death of Christ was a means of the preparation needs no comment. As to the Ascension, Lampe well remarks, 'Per ascensionem suam thronum Patris occupavit, in quo sedet, et pro suis intercedit, quo pacto omnem condemnationem tollit. Rom. viii. 34. Heb. vii. 25. ix. 26. Ex eodem throno sceptrum Spiritus sui emittit, quo electos regit et ad adendam ritè atque θεοκρατῶς celestem hereditatem preparat.' Vol. iii. p. 107. Calvin also, ably, but less fully, treats on this important topic of sound theology; and, after first remarking, 'Significat Christus hunc sui decessus finem esse, ut locum sui pareat. Summa est, quod non privatim sibi cælum conscenderit Dei Filius, ut illic seorsum habitet, sed potius ut communis sit piorum omnium hereditas; atque ut conjunctum sit membris caput;' then subjoins, 'Filius autem, qui unicus est heres cæli possessionem nostro nomine adiit, ut per ipsum nobis accessus pateat.' It is plain that the preparation was for all future believers to the end of the world; whereby we are warranted to say in our Liturgical Service, 'Thou didst open the kingdom of heaven to all believers.'

3. ἐὰν πορευθῶ καὶ ἐτοιμάσω] The best Commentators are agreed that the sense is, as at John xii. 32, 'When I shall have gone, and shall have prepared a place; and that πάλιν ἔρχομαι is for πάλιν ἐλεύσεται. They differ, however, on whether this coming of our Lord is to be understood of the day of judgment (see vv. 18, 28. xii. 26. Acts i. 11. 1 Thesa. iv. 17), or of the day of each man's death. The former view is maintained by most ancient and earlier moderns;

 to grant (what has never been fully proved) that at death the righteous are immediately received up into heaven, yet the maintainers of that doctrine do not assert that Christ comes to fetch them.
 The common interpretation, then, is greatly preferable; and it is placed beyond doubt by 1 Thess.
 iv. 16, sq. where the language of the Apostle is the best comment on that of his Lord. The purpose of both passages is the same, namely, the consolation of the persons addressed. This verse is in close connexion with the preceding, and the καὶ may be rendered 'imo,' 'yea;' and the sense of the words so introduced is, 'Yea, the place whither I am going ye know (from what I have just said, 'my Father's house'); and the way thither ye know.' By 'know' here is 'to have the means of knowing,' so that they might have known, and, indeed, did partly know. By τὴν ὁδὸν seems to have been meant 'the way' by which they might themselves arrive at it, namely, by him who was going to prepare a place for them in it. Since, however, the Apostles did not fully comprehend his meaning, our Lord (v. 6) makes it clearer, expressing it, too, for greater impression, by a boldness of metaphor, which requires careful exegesis. Some eminent Expositors take it to mean, 'I am the true—the only true, way to that eternal life, which those have, who dwell in my Father's house.' But though this conveys a true declaration, yet some of the emphasis of the words is lost, and the intensiveness of the sense is diminished. From the able exegesis of Calv., Lampe, Bengel, and others, and by reference to the kindred passage of Heb. x. 20, the following would seem the true doctrine to be deduced from the passage.—Jesus Christ is our way to the Father and to heaven, in his person, as God manifest in the flesh; in his office, as our Mediator with God, introducing us to the Holiest by 'a new and living way;' in his sacrifice, as our great High Priest for ever; who, by his perfect obedience and atoning sacrifice, hath made propitiation for the sins of the whole world; in his intercession, as our Advocate with the Father, who hath given us access with confidence to the throne of grace; lastly, he is our way, as being our great Moral Teacher and Perfect Exemplar, 'leaving us an example that we should follow his steps,' and preceding us in a way open to all, plain and even secure; pleasant, and terminating in everlasting bliss. He is the truth, both in his essence and attributes, as being one with the Father (who 'is truth'); he is the fountain of all truth, the complement of all truth (being the substance of all the types and figures of the Old Testament), having all the characters of truth. As such, he is our great Prophet, the great Shepherd of the sheep, pointing out by his word, what 'is truth,' and the way which leadeth unto everlasting life. Finally, he is the life, as being (what he elsewhere testifies of himself)

 'the resurrection and the life;' through whom alone any one cometh unto the Father in acceptance and salvation, and through whose life-giving Spirit the dead in trespasses and sins are so quickened as to believe in him as the truth, and to come unto him as the way, and thus to finally experience him as the life.

7—10. In these verses it is affirmed that he, who hath seen and heard Christ, hath, in some way and in a certain sense, seen and heard the Father; implying an essential union of Father and Son. So intimate is this union, that Christ says, εἰ ἠγνώκετέ με, καὶ τὸν Πατέρα μου ἠγνώκετε ἄν, meaning, that if they had rightly and fully known their Lord in his proper character as Mediator and Redeemer, they would have proportionately known his Father also. Since he is so in the Father, and the Father in him (see vv. 10, 11. supra x. 30, 38), that, to see and know him, is to see and know the Father (see supra viii. 19, and note). Thus our Lord here, as in so many other passages in this Chapter and the two following ones, declares his oneness, not only in attributes, but also in being and nature, with the Father. In the next clause, καὶ ἀπ' ἄρτι γινώσκετε—αὐτόν, our Lord adds, for their comfort, the assurance that (lit.) 'from now on' they are, as it were, knowing him and seeing him, i. e. are on the point thereof, according to the true force of ἀπ' ἄρτι pointed out supra xiii.
 19. Thus the sense is this, 'Ye will a short time hence know, and, as it were, see him;'
 meaning, after Christ's death, his glorification, and the sending of the Holy Ghost, to guide them into all truth. Another example of ἰσάρακα. Present, occurs supra ix. 37.

8. δεῖξον ἡμῖν τὸν Πατέρα] i. e. in some visible and sensible manner, by dream, or otherwise.
 A request, it should seem, founded on Philip's erroneously taking the expression of our Lord, ἰσάρακα, in a literal sense.

9. οὐκ ἔγνωκάς με] meaning, 'hast thou not known who I am, and what is my true character?'

1 ver. 20.

Φίλιππε; ὁ ἑώρακὼς ἐμὲ ἑώρακε τὸν Πατέρα· καὶ πῶς σὺ λέγεις· Δείξον ἡμῖν τὸν Πατέρα; ¹⁰ Οὐ πιστεύεις ὅτι ἐγὼ ἐν τῷ Πατρὶ, καὶ ὁ Πατὴρ ἐν ἐμοί [ἐστι]; Τὰ ῥήματα δὲ ἐγὼ λαλῶ ὑμῖν, ἀπ' ἑμαντοῦ οὐ λαλῶ· ὁ δὲ Πατὴρ ὁ ἐν ἐμοί μένων, αὐτὸς ποιεῖ τὰ ἔργα. ¹¹ Πιστεύετε μοι ὅτι ἐγὼ ἐν τῷ Πατρὶ, καὶ ὁ Πατὴρ ἐν ἐμοί· εἰ δὲ μὴ, διὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτὰ πιστεύετε μοι. ¹² Ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν ὁ πιστεύων εἰς ἐμὲ, τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ ἐγὼ ποιῶ· κάκεινος ποιήσει, καὶ μείζονα τούτων ποιήσει, ὅτι ἐγὼ

— ὁ ἑώρακὼς ἐμὲ, &c.] 'He who hath seen me hath [in effect] seen the Father; Christ being the [moral] image of the invisible God' (Col. i. 15), reflecting him in his nature, as 'God manifest in the flesh,' and revealing him in his office, as sent of God and coming from God. See i. 18.

10. Here our Lord means to ask whether Philip did not yet believe the essential union and mutual indwelling of the Father and the Son, and of the Godhead in his human nature. He had frequently spoken to them on this subject; and his words were not 'of himself' alone, as apart and distinct from the Father; and therefore they ought to have been more regarded, especially as the Father, dwelling in and working by him, had borne witness to him by so many stupendous miracles.

— τὰ ῥήματα—οὐ λαλῶ] These words, and the following, ὁ δὲ Πατὴρ—τὰ ἔργα, are an illustration of the community just mentioned, as applied both to words and to works. In the latter clause there is an irregularity, which may, however, be adjusted by supplying (what, though not expressed, is evidently referred to in the introductory δὲ) the words τὰ ἔργα δὲ ποιῶ, ἀπ' ἑμαντοῦ οὐ ποιῶ, to correspond to τὰ ῥήματα—λαλῶ.

11—24. Mr. Alf. truly remarks, that 'out of the foregoing αὐτὸς ποιεῖ τὰ ἔργα [Render: 'it is he who is the doer of the works'], our Lord now unfolds the great promise of the Paraclete.' But if αὐτὸς be, as it evidently is, so emphatic, why did Mr. Alf., after Tisch. (an unsafe guide), destroy the emphasis by changing the place of αὐτὸς, and putting it last in the sentence (a position which the pronoun never has when emphatic, and scarcely ever when not so), solely on the authority of L, X, and one cursive? This course he justifies thus:—'The text I have adopted seems to have been the original one; then αὐτὸς, having been mistaken for αὐτοῦ [it never is], was replaced, and then transposed, to prevent mistake.' But all this is so purely gratuitous and improbable, as to deserve no attention. The Reviser who transposed it was ill employed in so thus misrepresenting the sense, which could then only be, 'He doeth the works himself, and not by deputy' (!). However, I suspect that the word was transposed solely through the carelessness of the scribes, who, after first omitting (as several others, I find, did) the word, then brought it in afterwards,—a case perpetually occurring.

11. πιστεύετε, &c.] Here Christ not only repeats the foregoing assertion, but enjoins them to repose faith in it; telling them (as a popular proof of his conjunction with the Father) that his works (i. e. his miracles) argue community of mind, energy, and power; q. d. 'Believe me [on my own word, when I declare] that; but if not [on my own word, at least] for the very works themselves that I do, believe me.'

12. ὁ πιστεύων εἰς ἐμὲ, &c.] A promise which, though conveyed under a general form, has only a particular application, namely,—to the persons here addressed,—the Apostles in particular,—not believers in general. By τὰ ἔργα δὲ ἐγὼ ποιῶ, as Tittman shows at large, is meant that part of Christ's work which he at xvii. 4 calls the work committed to him by the Father, namely, in promulgating the Father's plan of salvation through the Son, in confirming it by miracles, in collecting a community of those who should embrace the plan of salvation, &c. By the greater works here mentioned we are to understand not greater per se; for, as far as regards the miracles worked by the Apostles, none could be more illustrious than those performed by our Lord, but only in a certain degree, partly as regarded their office and ministry, in respect of spiritual works by the Holy Spirit (comp. Acts ii.) (which is alone the subject of these words), and partly in respect to the extensive effects of those miracles and their results, shown in that large extension of the Gospel, and that general conversion of souls to the faith, which the Apostles were enabled to effect by the miraculous powers entrusted to them.

— ὅτι ἐγὼ πρὸς τὸν Π. μου εἰμι.] These words would seem to have so little bearing on the preceding one, that most recent commentators connect them closely with the following, καὶ ὁ τὶ ἐν αὐτῷ, rendering: 'Because I go to my Father, whatsoever,' &c. This, however, is overlooking the καὶ; and in rendering become, the sense arising is unsuitable. The real meaning intended seems to be, 'Yea, greater things than these shall he do, for I am going to my Father; and accordingly whatsoever ye ask the Father in my name and cause,' i. e. for the purpose in question (as is implied by the expression ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι μου), the great and holy cause of the Gospel,—that work which Christ is about to commit to his Apostles. This is confirmed by facts; for after our Lord's death, resurrection, ascension, and glorification, he sent the Holy Spirit both to 'guide them into all truth,' and to enable them to work all miracles necessary to its confirmation. See infra xvi. 7. The next words τοῦτο ποιῶ are very important, as indicating the cause of the effects in question; for (as Calv., Lampe, Whitby, and Dr. P. Smith, show) since Christ both here and, more emphatically, in the next verse, declares that he himself will do whatsoever his disciples shall ask, i. e. of the Father, the same Apostle, ὑπερεντυγχάνει ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, by which is meant 'the doing that for us which we could not do for ourselves; the very character of a spiritual Advocate and Helper.

17. τὸ Πνεῦμα τῆς ἀλ.] meaning the Spirit 'who is Truth' (1 John v. 6), who can alone impart it,—the Comforter, the Holy Spirit, so called here, and infra xv. 26. xvi. 13, because, as we find from those passages, and infra 26, he would guide them into all truth,—the truth of God (xvi. 13). By ὁ κόσμος is meant οἱ ψυχικοί = ὁ ψυχ. ἄνθρωπος, 1 Cor. ii. 14, 'those who live and act under the sensual affections of mere human nature,' 'worldly,' 'profane,' who cannot receive, admit (much less be guided by) this heavenly Instructor in his teaching, because they have no perception, much less knowledge of heavenly truth,—and accordingly, in point of fact, they do not receive, as Paul there says, τὰ τοῦ Πνεύματος τοῦ Θεοῦ. Such seems the general sense of οὐ θεωρεῖ οὐδὲ γιν., which lit. means, 'discerns not, so as to recognize,—has, in point of fact, no knowledge of.' As to μένει, I cannot agree with De Wette and Alf., that it is Future in signification; since the full sense of the clause seems to be, 'for he abideth (sojourneth) with you [even now], and shall dwell in you [hereafter], i. e. more fully and thoroughly. Similar instances of words being left understood to limit, in some such way as the context and subject-matter may suggest, a general assertion, are of no rare occurrence. How far, and in what sense, the Spirit might be said to be even now abiding with them, is ably pointed out by Lampe, and sufficiently for a popular purpose by Matt. Henry.

18—21. There is here the third benefit of Christ's return to his disciples, first promised generally at v. 18, and then partly explained at vv. 19—21. (Lampe.) Of course this is another Promise for their further consolation under present sorrow,—that they will have his aid, who is a 'very present help' under every trial. In determining, however, the exact import of this Promise much depends on the sense ascribed to the forcible term ὀρφανούς. The impropriety of the Common Version comfortless has been admitted, and Newcome renders destitute, Wakef. orphans, as in the margin of our Bibles. The latter, as being more definite in sense, is preferable. But the Greek term is really not a Subst. but an Adject., as in Lucian, De Morte Per. 96, ὀρφανὸς ἡμᾶς κατέλειπον, and in many of the best Classical writers, from Homer and Hesiod downwards, like the Latin orphanus, and hence I should prefer to render orphan. And, though this use in English is very rare, yet it is not unprecedented. Thus, in Shakspeare's Merry Wives of Windsor, Act v. sc. 5, we have addressed to the fairies, "You moonshine revellers—you orphan heirs of fixed destiny;" for so I would read with the first folio edition, which the later Editors, unaware of this adjectival use, altered to 'orphan-heirs.' The best rendering, however, may be 'bereaved,' as applied to children deprived of their parents; an idea here very suitable, since, among the Jews, disciples were regarded as the spiritual children of their teachers; and, accordingly, a little before, xiii. 33, our Lord calls his disciples τακνία, and at xxi. 5, παιδιά.

But, to consider the import of the whole passage (which has been variously understood); some take these words in a physical sense, of Christ's reappearance and society with them, after his resurrection; others, in a figurative one, of Christ's invisible and spiritual presence. It may be best to unite both views, which is supported by facts. 'For (as Tittman observes) Christ did return literally to his disciples, after his resurrection, in a visible manner, and metaphorically, in an invisible manner, after his ascension to heaven; after which (as he promised, in departing to heaven, see Matt. xxviii. 20,) he was ever, virtually, present with them, though not in the flesh, by the gracious aid of his omnipotent power in the discharge of their Evangelical functions.' By ἔρχομαι is meant, "'I am coming," "about to come to you;" thus showing you that I am still alive.'

19 καὶ [and] [then]. Θεωρεῖ, is 'to see, will see.' So, just after, θεωρεῖτε. Ζῶ, for ἀναζῶ, and ζήσεσθε for ἀναζ., as supra v. 25, and Luke xxiv. 5. The two terms may be taken either in a metaphorical sense, of the spiritual life, or in the ordinary one of the natural. Nay, both senses may have been intended; q. d. 'because I live for ever (as ye will then be assured), ye, too, shall live for ever, my resurrection being the sure pledge of yours.'

20. ἐν ἡ. τῇ ἡμ.] i. e. 'when the promise of the sending of the Paraclete shall be fulfilled.'

— γινώσθε ὑμῖς—καὶ ἐν ὑμῖν] q. d. 'then shall ye know that there is a union indissoluble, not only between me and my Father (see supra v. 7), but also between me and you.' This union (spoken of supra v. 10, 19. vi. 51. x. 30, and infra xv. 1—7. xvii. 21—23, 26) is that which St. Paul often mentions as subsisting between Christ as the Head, and believers as the members of Christ's Body, the CHURCH.

21. ὁ ἔχων—ἀγαπᾷ με] This is a repetition of the sentiment at v. 15, and is meant to limit the declaration in the foregoing verses to

²². Κύριε, καὶ τί γέγονεν, &c.] I have here before τί γέγονεν inserted καὶ, on the authority of many of the best MSS. (including nearly all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17), some Versions and Fathers, and the Ed. Princ. It has been received by almost every Editor from Wetst. downwards.
A similar construction is found at ix. 36, καὶ τίς ἐστὶ, Κύριε, &c., where many inferior MSS.
(with the received text) in like manner are without the καὶ. Also 2 Cor. ii. 2, καὶ τίς ἐστὶ, &c. This forms one branch of that generic con- struction, by which καὶ is used with particles of interrogation, when it has always an intensive force. Τί γέγονεν ὅτι is an idiom corresponding to the Hebr. מַה עָשָׂה, which denotes, not (as it would seem to do) the manner, but the cause, as when we say, 'how is this?' or 'how so?' So Eurip. Tr. 889 (cited by Kypke), τί δ' ἔστιν, αὐχὰς ὡς ἱκαίσις θεῶν;

This question of Judas doubtless originated in misapprehension of our Lord's words (as if he spoke of his resurrection only), arising from those false notions which the Apostles entertained of the Messiah's kingdom, and which they retained until they were enlightened by the Holy Spirit.
Indeed, Judas's chief difficulty seems to have been to conceive how this revelation of himself to the disciples only could consist with setting up his kingdom. To this question our Lord (ver.
23) answers not directly (because they would not have comprehended him), but only repeats the promise in stronger terms by declaring that 'this manifestation would be made to them not only by himself, but by the Father also; and not by temporary visitation, but by continual abode with them;' thus intimating a reason for the distinction that he would make between his disciples and the world; or, rather, turning their attention to what it especially behoved them to know and believe (comp. Luke xiii. 23, 24),—namely, that those only who truly loved him, evincing it practically by keeping his commandments, would be the special objects of his Father's love.

²³. ἐλευσόμεθα καὶ μονὴν π. αὐ. π.] The Commentators adduce examples of the phrase μονὴν ποιεῖν, which they regard as synonymous with μένειν. But it is, in fact, a more significant expression, denoting a continued abiding. Of course it is to be taken in a metaphorical sense, of an invisible and spiritual presence, and is meant to illustrate the ἐμφανίσω αὐτῷ ἐμαυτὸν at v.
21. In the Old Test. God is said to come to men, when he promises or bestows peculiar benefits on them: also to dwell or remain with those whom he especially favours; as also to leave and depart from those whom he ceases to care for.

Moreover, God and Christ may be said to come to men by the Holy Spirit, whose 'temple is the body of the Saints' (1 Cor. iii. 16, vi. 13), and by whose indwelling they are made an habitation of God.' Eph. ii. 22. By this Spirit the Father and Son dwell in all true Christians.

²⁴. ὁ μὴ ἀγαπῶν—οὐ τηρεῖ] This is meant to affirm the same truth negatively; and consequently there is implied the negative of the proposition at v. 21; i. e. 'he will not have the love of Christ and the Father,' the ἐμφάνεια and the other benefits resulting from thence. In the words following there is again something to be supplied, in order to complete the sense, namely, 'And the doctrine you have heard is not so much mine as the Father's: he, therefore, who denieth me, denieth the Father who sent me, and consequently will lose those benefits.' Οὐκ—ἀλλὰ here (as often) signifies 'non tam—quam,' implying no more than community of command. The full scope of this latter sentence, καὶ ὁ λόγος—Πατρός, is ably drawn forth by Lampe, who compares similar declarations at vii. 16 (where see note). iii. 54.
viii. 26. xii. 49.

²⁵, ²⁶. Here is to be supplied what we find expressed in the less briefly worded passage parallel to this, ch. xvi. 12. The connection, otherwise obscure, will then be sufficiently clear, as thus traced: 'These things have I said unto you, being yet present with you (comp. Luke xxii. 44), [and more could I say, but I do not say them, because ye could not bear them now]; howbeit, when the Spirit of truth, &c. Of διδάξει πάντα
—ὑμῖν the full sense is, 'He whom the Father will send in my name, and who shall be your guide, shall teach you all things that you have occasion to learn, and bring all to your remembrance which, by misapprehension of them, or through human infirmity, you may have forgotten; and thus, by instruction and a recalling to mind of what is learnt, form in you a right understanding in all things.' See more in Calv. and Lampe. Comp. 1 John v. 20, and Col. i. 9. 2 Tim. ii. 7.

The full import here of εἰρήνη is (as Lampe shows at large) peace with God (Phil. iv. 7), peace of conscience, and peace with all God's creatures. Τὴν ἐμὴν εἰρ. seems added by way of further explanation and confirmation of the εἰρήνη just before. The ἐμὴν, taken in reference to the subsequent clause, is emphatical; suggesting that this peace is given by Christ alone, who is our Peace (Eph. ii. 14), since in him alone we have peace with God (Rom. v. 1). The words οὐ καθὼς, &c. are explanatory of the preceding, and suggest a comparison, not between the manner of giving (for καθὼς has often a very lax sense), but between the nature of the gift; the world conferring external, empty, and transitory peace,—Christ bestowing internal and spiritual, stable and solid peace. See Calvin.

—μὴ ταρασσέσθω, &c.] Here we have a repetition of the affectionately consolatory language at v. 1, though somewhat more strongly expressed by a sort of climax; δειλιάω being a stronger term than ταρασσέσθαι. A similar mode of expression occurs at Deut. i. 21, μὴ φοβεῖσθε μηδὲ δειλιάσητε. See also v. 29.

²⁸ Our Lord now concludes with the same exhortation as that with which he had commenced his address; after which, adverting to what he had said of his departure from them, he urges, that their love of him should make them rather rejoice than grieve thereat; and then explains why. He tells them that he is going, not to some distant region of the world (as some of the disciples fancied, xiii. 36), but to the Father, to resume the majesty and glory he had before the creation of the world; and that from Him he would send to the disciples his Holy Spirit, to be their ever present and Omnipotent aider and helper.

—ὅτι ὁ Πατήρ—ἐστί] On the true and full import of these words, see the valuable Annotations of Calv., Lampe, Whitby, and Tittman in Recens. Syn., and sect. iv. of Bp. Bull's Defensio Fidei Nicenæ, and Dr. Pye Smith's Script. Test., vol. ii. 311. Suffice it here to say, that though there may be a certain sense in which the Father may be said to be greater than the Son; yet that could not here have been intended by our Lord. It is an excellent observation of Luther, that the word μείζων is not here used as referring to the Nature or Essence of the Son as related to the Father, but as indicating the particular subordination to the Father in which Christ our Saviour then was, and the cessation of the state of humiliation and entering into his glory which would take place on his being received up to the Father. So, too, it is remarked by Calv., that Christ does not here compare the divinity of the Father with his own, nor his human nature with the Divine essence of the Father, but rather compares his present state with the celestial glory to which he was soon to be received; q. d. 'You would detain me here in this world. But Oh! it is better to depart and be in heaven.' And assuredly this it was that he held out as a matter of rejoicing, that he should dwell with his Father in glory, and with them by the Spirit of truth. Accordingly, the comparison here is only indirect,—namely, as far as respected the work of man's salvation, wherein the inferiority of the Son to the Father is admitted on all hands.

^{29—31} Our Lord next intimates why he had told them beforehand of his death, resurrection, ascension, and the coming of the Holy Ghost,—namely, in order that the combined evidence of the prediction, and the miracles attending its accomplishment, might so confirm their faith, that, as it is said, xiii. 19, they might believe that he was the Person whom he professed to be, even THE CHRIST.

³⁰ οὐκ ἔτι π. λαλ.] As this is suspended on the words ἔρχεται γὰρ, &c., it is plain that the sense requires not will, but shall; q. d. 'I shall not have opportunity to discourse with you.' On the ἔρχομαι τοῦ κόσμου τούτου see note on xii. 31. The words ἐν ἡμοῖς οὐκ ἔχει οὐδὲν are by the best Commentators explained to mean, 'hath no power,' scil. contra, in respect of me, 'will have no power against me,' viz., in frustrating the plan of salvation. But, though that is the general sense, there is a special and inner meaning, which they have failed to draw forth, but which may be supplied from Euthym., who (probably after Cyrill. or Chrys.) remarks, that 'in the case of other persons (mere men) the cause of death is vis; for no one is sinless, and accordingly no one is immortal; but in me (in my case) he the Enemy, the Accuser, hath nothing worthy of death [to charge upon me], for I am sinless.' This represents the true sense—which is also ably drawn forth by Augustine and T. Aquinas—but does not open out the nature of the allusion, which may be a forensic one, by an ellipsis of αἰτίου, which has place in Acts iv. 21, μηδὲν εὐρίσκοντες (scil. αἰτίου) τὸ πῶς, &c., which elliptical word is expressed in Luke xxiii. 14, μηδὲν αἰτίου. And so in Acts xxv. 5, αἰ τι ἐστιν ἐν ἀνδρὶ τούτῳ. Expositors rightly supply αἰτίωμα, which is distinctly mentioned at v. 7. Thus the present seems to be a very brief mode of expression, formed on some more fully expressed forensic phrase, which will probably present itself to some future inquirer.

31. ἀλλ' ἵνα γνῶ] All Commentators seem of opinion that some words are left to be supplied between ἀλλὰ and ἵνα, though what those words are they are by no means agreed. The words to be supplied will best appear by the reference in ἀλλὰ, which is not (as Wolf and others have supposed) to ἐν ἐμοὶ οὐκ ἔχει οὐδέν, but to the words ἐρχεται ὁ τοῦ κόσμου ἄρχων, and to the sense implied in, as well as expressed by them; q. d. 'But [so it is], the Prince of this world is permitted thus to assault me] that, &c., he who maketh his attack is permitted to do it [and I willingly submit to the infliction], in order that the world may [experimentally] know that I love the Father, and whatever he hath enjoined on me that I [readily] do.' This elliptical use of ἀλλ' ἵνα is almost peculiar to the Scriptural writers, and espec. the writings of St. John, e. g. i. 8, 11, 19. iv. 3. xiii. 18. xv. 25. 1 John ii. 19.

—ἄγωμεν ἐντ.] These words are not well conjoined, as they are by some Commentators, with ἐγείρω. preceding. They constitute a 'formula hortationis ad negotium aliquid promptè et strenuè aggrediendum,' as in Matt. xxvi. 46, and Mark xiv. 42, and in both passages the phrase has no little force.

XV. Commentators are not agreed as to the place where the remaining portion (ch. xv., xvi., xvii.) of Christ's discourse was delivered. Many think it was pronounced somewhere on the way from Jerusalem to Gethsemane. But of this there is no proof,—and, from the circumstances and the nature of the discourse, little probability. Nay, the words of ch. xviii. 1, πάντα ἐξηλθε δέου ἡν κήπος, seem to show that the words cannot have been delivered on the road to Gethsemane; nor, as some imagine, at Gethsemane; but rather (according to Glass, Beza, Pearce, Lampe, Doddridge, Knapp, and Tittman) in the guest-chamber, after having risen from table, and previous to his departure. We may, indeed, suppose (with Rosenmüller, in a Dissertation on the internal history of this Discourse of our Lord), that it was pronounced in the Temple; for it would hardly have been safe to have remained so long at the guest-chamber. If this be admitted (and the learned writer goes far to show the probability thereof), we are enabled the better to account for the figure of the Vine; since there would then be a visible object to suggest it; for (as we learn from Josephus) above and around that gate of the Temple, which led from the Porch to the Holy place, there was a richly-carved vine, which served as its border and ornament. This would naturally suggest the parable in question, espec. since the figure of the vine was one frequent in the Scriptures, and the vine above mentioned was considered a symbol.

In this resumption of the foregoing discourse, our Lord (as if loth to part with his faithful followers) enlarges on and further enforces the same topics.

1. In the parabolical comparison in this and the four following verses, Christ represents to his disciples the excellency of his religion, and the nature of the union subsisting between himself and his faithful followers; suggesting the blessings which spring from, and the duties arising out of, that relation. See more in Lampe.

—ἐγὼ εἰμι ἡ ἀμπε. ἡ ἀληθ.] This similitude was not uncommon. It is often used in the Old Test. of the Jewish people and Church, and (as appears from the Rabbinical writers) was sometimes taken to designate the Messiah. It here represents the vital union between Christ and the faithful members of his Church. On the exact import, indeed, of ἡ ἀληθινή some difference of opinion exists. It is best explained by Euthymius, ἡ τὴν ἀλήθειαν καρποφοροῦσα. The force of the Article here is the same as in ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλός, x. 14, where see note. In calling God the γεωργός (i. e. ἀμπελοργός, genus for species) Christ follows the usage of the Old Test. See Isa. v. 1—7. Jer. ii. 21. Ps. lxxx. 8. Our Lord thus represents himself as the Vine (meaning the trunk of the vine) of religious truth,—the Gospel,—and his faithful disciples as the branches from that vine,—all deriving nourishment, and even life itself, from the parent stock.

2. ἐν ἐμοὶ] i. e. belonging to me, namely, considered as the trunk. Supply δὲ, for ὅ ἐστι, like φίλον for ὅ φίλον. Αἶρει, 'taketh away.' Opposed to which is καθαίρει, 'purifies the branch,'—namely, by ridding it of those useless shoots which most abound in the best trees. In this sense purgare is used in Latin. So Hor. Epod. ii. 11, 'Inutileque falce ramos amputans, Feliciores inserit.' As, then, the vine-dresser purifies the vine by lopping off useless branches, and pruning the good ones, so (it is meant) does God purify his Church, by removing the bad and useless members, and spiritually pruning the good ones. Here αὐτὸ is employed, as well as the antecedent, for greater distinctness,—an idiom found in the Classical writers, especially Xen., though chiefly where several words are interposed between the antecedent and αὐτός. See αὐτό· καὶ πᾶν τὸ καρπὸν φέρον, ^c καθαίρει αὐτὸ, ἵνα πλείονα καρπὸν φέρῃ. ^{3 d} Ἡδὴ ὑμεῖς καθαροὶ ἐστέ διὰ τὸν λόγον ὃν λελάληκα ὑμῖν. ^{4 e} Μείνατε ἐν ἐμοί, καὶ γὰρ ἐν ὑμῖν. Καθὼς τὸ κλῆμα οὐ δύναται καρπὸν φέρειν ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ, ἐὰν μὴ μένῃ ἐν τῇ ἀμπέλῳ· οὕτως οὐδὲ ὑμεῖς, ἐὰν μὴ ἐν ἐμοί μένητε. ^{5 f} Ἐγὼ εἰμι ἡ ἀμπελος, ὑμεῖς τὰ κλήματα· ὁ μένων ἐν ἐμοί, καὶ γὰρ ἐν αὐτῷ, ^g οὗτος φέρει καρπὸν πολύν· ὅτι χωρὶς ἐμοῦ οὐ δύνασθε ποιεῖν οὐδέν. ^{6 h} Ἐὰν μὴ τις μένῃ ἐν ἐμοί, ἐβλήθη ἔξω ὡς τὸ κλῆμα, καὶ ἐξηράνθη· καὶ συνάγουσιν αὐτὰ καὶ εἰς τὸ πῦρ βάλλουσι, καὶ καίεται. ^{7 i} Ἐὰν μένητε ἐν ἐμοί, καὶ

— πλείονα καρπὸν] not only more fruit, but 'better' in quality: for the difference between the works done under the Gospel, and those of mere nature, is like that which exists between the fruit of wild trees, and that of cultivated ones.

3. ἡδὴ—ὑμῖν] From ver. 3—17, Christ now suggests the application of the comparison, showing to what kind of vine branches they were to be referred, and the duties suitable to that state. (Lampe.) By καθαροὶ is here meant 'free from wilful error and prejudice,' and therefore capable of bearing spiritual fruit. They were so then in a great measure, and were shortly afterwards to be fully so by the efficacy of the Holy Spirit, soon to be manifested. Hence, in the next verse, Christ exhorts them not to break off the mutual conjunction between them and himself, but constantly cultivate it, as he should on his part preserve it for ever.

4. μένατε ἐν ἐμοί—ὑμῖν] Our Lord here addresses them not so much as disciples, as his future ministers, and, in this capacity, exhorts them to zealously adhere to him,—not only in personal faith and obedience, but in their Apostolic duties. Μένειν ἐν τινι is used of union of thought, feeling, purpose, and action, as at 1 John ii. 6, 24, 27, 28. See more in note, supra vi. 56. The next words, καὶ γὰρ (sub. μενῶ) ἐν ὑμῖν, contain a promise, as the following ones do a precept. And the καὶ is to be taken for καὶ οὕτω, the οὕτω being implied in the apodosis. The substance of the promise is, that 'Christ will abide in them,' importing communion with them by his Holy Spirit, and support and protection to them by the influence of that Paraclete, Whom he should send to them from heaven. See Rom. viii. 9. 1 John iii. 24. iv. 13. The words καθὼς τὸ κλῆμα—μένητε suggests another argument to union, deduced from the highly beneficial effects of it. As the branches receive all their life and vigour from the trunk, so must they adhere to Christ and his injunctions, if they would produce spiritual fruit. Ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ, 'by its own virtue.'

5. χωρὶς ἐμοῦ] Supply ὅντας; for χωρὶς—ὅντας ἀπ' ἐμοῦ. The full sense is, 'apart from me ye can do nothing whatever.' See 2 Cor. iii. 5. Comp. v. 4.

—οὐ δύνασθε ποιεῖν οὐδέν] A very strong negation, by the double negative; and it is still stronger in the reading of MS. B, οὐδὲ ἔν. But I do not find this in any Lamb. or Mus. MSS., though οὐδὲ εἰς, for οὐδέις, is regularly written in the most ancient of them; yet οὐδὲ εἰς recurs in the same MS. (B), infra v. 13. But there no intensity of sense can be intended. Οὐδὲ εἰς occurs, indeed, at 1 Cor. vi. 5, in the text. rec. But there Lachm. edits οὐδέις, from B, C, and 5 other MSS.; as did Tisch. in his 1st Edit.; but in his 2nd he restores οὐδὲ εἰς, which I find in all the Lamb. MSS. However, the style of St. John is quite different from that of St. Paul; and it is doubtful whether St. John was acquainted with the idiom by which an intensity of sense is communicated by οὐδὲ εἰς and οὐδέ ἔν.

6. ἐβλήθη ἔξω] A use of the Aorist used to denote what is done customarily, at any and all times. So James i. 6, ἀνέταιλε—καὶ ἐξήρανε. By τὸ κλῆμα is meant 'the branch' or 'off-shoot of a tree when torn from its trunk, and thus become withered and dry;' and the singular is used the better to suit the singular τις, though it is meant to be taken generally for the plural, as is suggested by the use of the plural αὐτὰ just after. I still continue to retain the τὸ before πῦρ, which I find in all the Lamb. MSS. (except 528), and very many Mus. copies. The Article here is not without its force, as denoting not 'fire' in general, but 'the domestic fire of a house.' Certainly internal evidence is in its favour here, since we may well suppose that ignorance of the true force of the Article (which I have pointed out on Mark ix. 22) occasioned its removal by the Critical Revisers. I have said thus much, because the τὸ, though on good grounds admitted by Matth. and Griesb., was expunged by Lachm., and by Tisch. in his 1st Edit., though restored in his second, on the strong grounds which he specifies. So also Alf. excluded it in his first Edit., though on grounds misstated, but he restores it in his second. There is here, as often in this Gospel, a confounding of the comparison with the thing compared. If regularly traced, the comparison will be, 'As branches once severed from the vine are rejected as useless, and, after being withered, are gathered together, and cast into the fire for fuel; so, if believers abide not in me, they will be rejected from the spiritual fellowship of my Church; and, thus becoming incapable of good, will finally come to utter destruction.'

7. ἐὰν μένητε—γινίσκονται ὑμῖν] We have here another argument for the continuance in this communion between Christ and them, in drawing which the foregoing general enunciation (μένειν ἐν ἐμοί) is further evolved by καὶ τὰ ρήματα—μένειν; and as the former denotes con-

τὰ ῥήματα μου ἐν ὑμῖν μέινῃ, ὃ ἐὰν θέλητε αἰτήσεσθε, καὶ γενήσεται ὑμῖν. ⁸ * Ἐν τούτῳ ἐδοξάσθη ὁ Πατήρ μου, ἵνα καρπὸν πολλὸν φέρητε καὶ γενήσεσθε ἐμοὶ μαθηταί. ⁹ Καθὼς ἡγάπησέ με ὁ Πατήρ, καὶ γὰρ ἡγάπησα ὑμᾶς, μέναιτε ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ τῇ ἐμῇ. ¹⁰ ¹ Ἐὰν τὰς ἐντολὰς μου τηρήσητε, μενεῖτε ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ μου καθὼς ἐγὼ τὰς ἐντολὰς τοῦ Πατρός μου τηρήκα, καὶ μένω αὐτοῦ ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ. ¹¹ * Ταῦτα λελάληκα ὑμῖν, ἵνα ἡ χαρὰ ἡ ἐμὴ ἐν ὑμῖν μέινῃ, καὶ ἡ χαρὰ ὑμῶν πληρωθῇ. ¹² * Αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ ἐντολὴ ἡ ἐμὴ, ἵνα ἀγαπᾶτε ἀλλήλους, καθὼς ἡγάπησα ὑμᾶς. ¹³ Μείζονα ταύτης ἀγάπῃ οὐδεὶς ἔχει, ἵνα τις τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ θῇ ὑπὲρ τῶν φίλων αὐτοῦ. ¹⁴ * Ὑμεῖς φίλοι μου ἐστέ, ἐὰν ποιῇτε ὅσα ἐγὼ ἐντέλλομαι ὑμῖν. ¹⁵ * Οὐκ ἐτί tinuance in, and communion in general,—so this denotes, in particular, adherence in by maintaining the doctrines of Christ once embraced; see more in note at xiv. 12. The benefit promised in ὃ ἐὰν—ὑμῖν is nearly allied to that at Matt. xxi. 21. The 'whatsoever' must, of course, be limited to whatever is necessary for the purpose adverted to in the preceding and following verses,—namely, their bringing forth much fruit, and promoting thereby the glory of God; and on the implied condition, of their abiding in Christ, and keeping his words. Compare Rom. viii. 26. James iv. 3.

8. * Here (as Calvin observes) we have a confirmation of the immediately preceding proposition, that God heareth the prayers of his people, so that they bear fruit, which is his glory.*

—ἰδοξάσθῃ] The Aorist is here used as at ver. 6 (where see note). And ἵνα is for ὅτι, quod, as at iii. 23. iv. 17. We must not take the καὶ (as is done by many) for οὐτω or ὅτε, but rather repeat ἐν τούτῳ from the preceding clause. So xiii. 35, ἐν τούτῳ γινώσκοντες πάντες ὅτι ἐμοὶ μαθηταὶ ἐστέ. By being in, in both passages, meant really being; for we have here an idiom, frequent in the popular style of all languages, by which ἀληθῶς is implied in the context. How, and in what respects, the Father is glorified by the disciples of his Son bringing forth the fruits of holiness and righteousness, &c., see Calvin, Lampe, and Tittm.

9, 10. Christ here proceeds to remind his disciples of his own singular love to them; and holds out for their imitation his own example in doing the work of the Father.

9. In rendering καθὼς καὶ, 'as—so,' we are not to understand equality in degree, but only in kind. The words following, μέναιτε ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ τῇ ἐμῇ are explained by almost all the best Expositors, 'continue in the love of me,' i. e. 'continue to love me.' Some, however, as Calv., Campb., and Bp. Lonsd., understand them in the sense, 'continue to be beloved by me, keep your place in my affections.' By which, it is true, a very good sense arises; but, it should seem, one forbidden by the next words (which may be compared with those at xiv. 23), and by the general scope of the passage, where there is a comparison of the love subsisting between the Father and Christ, and that between Christ and his disciples. Lampe would unite both senses, inasmuch as the expression admits of both; but he should rather have said 'either;' and even then, one is quite agreeable to the context, the other is scarcely so. But to unite both is to act on the false Canon of Cocceius, and some other old Dutch and German divines,—that the words of Scripture actually mean all that they may mean; involving the idea of a manifold interpretation of Scripture;—an error of the dark ages, but happily banished by the growing light of the Reformation. In the next words are mentioned the means by which both of the above may be preserved; namely, by keeping his commandments, after the example which he had set them by doing the will of his Father.

11. ἵνα ἡ χαρὰ—πληρωθῇ] i. e. as the best Commentators explain, 'that my joy in you [at your love, faith, and obedience] may be enduring, and that your joy [continuing in my love] may be complete and perfect;' see xvi. 24, 33. xvii. 13. 1 John i. 4. 2 John 12.—Χαρὰ ἐν ὑμῖν denotes 'joy felt on your account,' and is distinguished by ἡ χαρὰ ὑμῶν.

12. αὕτη ἐστὶν—ὑμᾶς] These words are meant to show what kind of love is evinced by Christ to his disciples, and consequently expected from them in return. Euthymius, after Chrys., thus expresses himself on this passage:—"Ὅρα δὲ θαυμασίαν σιναῖν. διδιδίκαται γὰρ, ὅτι τὸ μῖναι ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ γίνεται ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀγαπᾶν αὐτόν· τὸ δὲ ἀγαπᾶν αὐτόν, ἀπὸ τοῦ τὰς ἐντολὰς αὐτοῦ τηρεῖν· ἡ ἐντολὴ δὲ αὐτοῦ, ἵνα ἀγαπῶμεν ἀλλήλους· ὥστε τὸ ἀγαπᾶν ἀλλήλους, μέναι ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ ἐστὶ καὶ ἀγαπᾶν τὸν Θεόν· καὶ ἀναπληγίμναι πρὸς ἀλλήλους ἐλεῖν ἢ τε πρὸς Θεόν καὶ ἡ πρὸς ἀλλήλους ἀγάπη.

13. μείζονα ταύτης—φίλων αὐτοῦ] The connexion of this verse with the foregoing will appear by supplying, with Bp. Lonsd., the following link in the chain of reasoning ['This love I am about to show, and ye must show the like one to another, and] greater than this can no one show than that he lay down his life for his friends (v. 14). And ye are [now] my friends, and shall be such, if ye perform whatsoever I enjoin you (comp. v. 10).]

14. Here Christ shows how that friendship may be evinced; namely, as in the love before mentioned, by keeping his commandments.

15. οὐκ ἐτί ὑμᾶς—ἐγνώρισα ὑ.] The full sense

ὑμᾶς λέγω δούλους· ὅτι ὁ δούλος οὐκ οἶδε τί ποιεῖ αὐτοῦ ὁ κύριος· ὑμᾶς δὲ εἵρηκα φίλους, ὅτι πάντα, ἃ ἤκουσα παρὰ τοῦ Πατρὸς μου, ἐγνώρισα ὑμῖν. ¹⁶ Ὁὐχ ὑμεῖς με ἐξελέξασθε, ἀλλ' ἐγὼ ἐξελεξάμην ὑμᾶς, καὶ ἔθηκα ὑμᾶς, ἵνα ὑμεῖς ὑπάγητε καὶ καρπὸν φέριτε, καὶ ὁ καρπὸς ὑμῶν μένη· ἵνα ὁ τι ἂν αἰτήσητε τὸν Πατέρα ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί μου, δῶ ὑμῖν. ¹⁷ Ταῦτα ἐντέλλομαι ὑμῖν, ἵνα ἀγαπᾶτε ἀλλήλους. ¹⁸ Εἰ ὁ κόσμος ὑμᾶς μισεῖ, γινώσχετε ὅτι ἐμὲ πρῶτον ὑμῶν μεμίσηκεν. ¹⁹ Εἰ ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου ἦτε, ὁ κόσμος ἂν τὸ ἴδιον ἐφίλει· ὅτι δὲ ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου οὐκ ἐστὲ, ἀλλ' ἐγὼ ἐξελεξάμην ὑμᾶς ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου, διὰ τοῦτο μισεῖ ὑμᾶς ὁ κόσμος. ²⁰ Μνημονεύετε τοῦ λόγου οὗ ἐγὼ εἶπον ὑμῖν· Ὁὐκ ἔστι δούλος μεῶν τοῦ κυρίου αὐτοῦ. may best be expressed by the following paraphrastic version: '[I say friends; for] I no longer style you servants, since the servant [differs from the friend, inasmuch as he] knoweth not what his master is doing (i. e. his plans of action). But you I call friends [and as such I have treated you], since whatsoever I have learned from my Father I have made known to you [thus treating you with the most unreserved confidence]. It is true that our Lord had, up to this time (agreeably to the custom of the Jewish Rabbins), called them servants, though he had not treated them as such. And the term is susceptible of a milder interpretation, considering the connexion of disciple with master; and thus it is interchanged with διάκονος at chap. xii. 26.

By πάντα must (as is clear from xvi. 12. xvii. 26), be understood, in a restricted sense, all things proper for them then to know; since not a few things were kept back for the present.

16. οὐχ ὑμεῖς—ὑμᾶς] This is said to excite them to gratitude and obedience, by showing them that the obligation was all on their side. Render: 'It is not ye who have chosen,' &c.—Ἐκλείγεσθαι may here (as often) be taken, not so much of choice, as of the preference and love which it implies (antecedent and consequent); as Mark xiii. 20. Acts xiii. 17. 1 Cor. i. 27, 28. James ii. 5. Τίθεται, like the Hebr. תָּנַח, and the corresponding terms in most languages, has often, as here, the sense appoint. Ὑπάγητε is not (as it has usually been supposed) pleonastic; but conveys a notion of activity in the discharge of their ministerial functions. For that is what is alluded to by the καρπὸν φέρει. The words καὶ ὁ καρπὸς ὑμῶν μένη point at the ulterior effects of their ministerial labours to succeeding ages, by setting up the Church of Christ, which we know must endure unto the end of the world. Comp. Rom. i. 13. Col. i. 6.

The clause ἵνα ὁ τι—ὑμῖν points at a concurrent purpose with the former, and a common end, 'So that whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he may bestow it upon you.'

17. ταῦτα ἐντέλλομαι, &c.] meaning, that he has issued to them the injunctions he has, with the design that they will so fulfil them, as to be led to love each other; not a vain repetition this of a command enjoined from v. 12 onwards, but a solemn enforcement of the duty, as said for the last time.

18. Having given the above final injunction to mutual love, our Lord suggests an additional reason for its cultivation, inasmuch as they would experience the hatred of the world towards them; and fortifies them against the persecutions, to which they would be thereby exposed, by the consideration, that whatever they may have to endure, is no more than their Master has endured before them.

—γινώσκειτε] Many take this as an Imperative, in the sense reflect, consider. But the usual mode of interpreting it in an Indicative sense is the more simple and natural; q. d. 'Marvel not then—ye well know.' However the point is an open question.

19. The scope of this verse is to intimate the cause of that hatred, and thus to suggest a motive of comfort to them, when they should have to endure it.

—ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου ἦτε] The expression ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου εἶναι signifies 'to be conformed to the world'; as ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ, or ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου, &c. Render: 'If ye had been of the world, the world would have loved [you, as] its own.'

20. εἰ τὸν λόγον—τηρήσουσιν] The sense of these words would seem to be directly contrary to that which the context requires. To remove this difficulty, some think that τηρεῖν is put for παρατηρεῖν. But for such a sense of the word with τὸν λόγον there is no authority. There is less objection to the interpretation of Tittman, who assigns the following sense: 'If they had admitted and observed my doctrine, they would admit and observe yours.' Yet this involves such an anomaly of language, as one must hesitate to ascribe to the Evangelist; because, though inattentive to the nicer idioms of the Greek language, yet he no where so openly sets all rules at defiance. Not to say that the use of the tenses in the antithetical clause forbids this sense. Mr. Alford, indeed, with some show of a discovery, thinks that the words simply mean, "'the keeping of my word, and the keeping of yours," as intimately conjoined.' But this is only evading the difficulty, at the expense of piling down the sense. The difficulty may, I still think, be best removed by considering the use of the affirmative enunciation as dependent on the hypothetical et, meant to imply also its negative; the full sense being: 'If they have observed my doctrine, they will also observe yours; and if (not) they will not observe it; the latter words being here omitted as implied in what follows (v. 21), where the ταῦτα πάντα must include not merely all that is implied in μισεῖν and διώκειν, but also τὸν λόγον μου οὐ τηρεῖν. This view is no novelty, since I find it in Euthym., who had it from Chrys., from whom it was borrowed, Menoch. and Maldon. Thus the non-observance of the doctrine of God is not suppressed with many, nor thrown into the back ground, with Lampe, by being supposed implied in διώκειν. How prominent it might be made will appear from the excellent note of Gerhard, cited by Lampe; and still more from the masterly annotation of Calv., thus:—'Porro ubi de Personis loquutus est, mentionem etiam doctrinæ facit. Nihil enim pios magis conturbat quam dum doctrinam, quæ Dei est, superbe ab hominibus contemni vident. Est enim portentum horribile, cujus aspectus fortissimum quodque pectus labefactare posset. Sed dum ex aliâ parte succurrit, ipsum Dei Filium non minus contumaciæ expertum esse, non est quod miremur, doctrinam Dei tam parum habere inter homines reverentiz.' In loc., vol. iii. p. 291. It is probable that he had floating in his mind, though not digested into form, this principle of the implication of the converse in the use of the affirmative assertion suspended on et.

21. διὰ τὸ ὄνομά μου] Not merely 'on my account,' but 'on account of my very name,' by which they will be called; since, as Lampe proves, it was on account of their bearing the name of Christ (see 1 Pet. iv. 16) that Christians were so bitterly persecuted. This he proves from Pliny, Tertullian, and espec. Athenagoras, as follows:—τὸ τοῖσιν πρὸς πάντας ἰσὺν καὶ ἡμεῖς ἀξιοῦμεν, μὴ ὅτι Χριστιανοὶ λεγόμεθα, μισεῖσθαι καὶ κολάζεσθαι, ἀλλὰ κρίνεσθαι μὴ ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι, ἐπὶ δὲ τῷ ἀδικήματι.

—ὅτι οὐκ οἶδαςι] Importing not an involuntary ignorance, but wilful blindness; q. d. 'because, through their own wilful blindness, they know not God, as him who hath sent me to them.'

22. εἰ μὴ ἦλθον, &c.] This verse is explanatory of the preceding; and Our Lord therein, taking up the preceding οὐκ οἶδαςι, encounters a tacit argument, which might be pleaded in excuse of the persons in question,—i. e. that they sinned from ignorance. This he overrules, by showing that their ignorance and perverseness were wilful, and therefore inexcusable; since sufficient means for the attainment of a knowledge of the truth had been provided, by evidence not only internal but external,—alike in doctrines addressed to them (ἐλάλησα), and in miracles worked before them. Ἀμαρτία is here to be taken, not of sin in general, but of the particular sin in question, that of rejecting the Messiah. From the antithetical clause νῦν δὲ—οὐκ ἔχουσι, &c., it appears that ἁμαρτίαν οὐκ εἶχον must be taken in a qualified sense, to mean, 'they would have been, comparatively, innocent of this offence, or rather, there would have been some excuse for them.'

23. ὁ ἐμὲ μισῶν—μισεῖ] What is here said is meant to stigmatize, under a general assertion, the sinfulness of their conduct in particular,—namely, that their hatred and rejection of him and his mission, and their injurious treatment of him, was, in fact, shown to his Father. At ver. 24 the assertion in ver. 22 is resumed (the words of ver. 23 being in some measure parenthetical); and the proof of Divine mission from miracles is adverted to. Then is drawn the conclusion.

24. εἰ τὰ ἔργα μὴ ἐποίησα, &c.] Here, as Bp. Warburton observes (Works, vol. v. 326), 'our Lord acknowledges that if the credentials of his Divine mission in his miracles had not been given, the unbelieving Jews had been comparatively free from blame.' 'Christ's miracles might (as Doddr. observes) truly be said to be ἀ οὐδεὶς ἄλλος πεποιήκεν, greater than those the prophets had wrought, both in respect to their number, their purpose, and espec. as they proceeded from a self-derived power, and were worked at all times, and in all ways, even in absence as well as presence.'

25. ἀλλ' ἵνα πληρωθῇ, &c.] The best Commentators are agreed that ἵνα is here, as often, eventual; the sense being, 'Now by this having come to pass, the words written in the Law have been made good.' These words were properly spoken of the enemies of David; but as David was a type of Christ, so they are accommodated to the latter (comp. infra xix. 28. Acta. i. 20). The words, indeed, as here quoted, do not exactly correspond with the Sept. or the Hebrew of Ps. cix. 3, since ἐπολέμησαν in the Sept. is in agreement with יגדוּרָה in the Hebrew. But, as μισοῦντές με δωρεάν is found in kindred passages, at Ps. xxxiv. 19, and lxxviii. 4 (Sept.), it should seem that this is not meant as a regular quotation, but is merely a declaration formed on all those three passages.

The only other example of this sense, which has been adduced, is from Exclus. xx. 24; though the use of the word at Galat. ii. 21, comes very near to it.

26. ὅταν δὲ ἰλθῇ—περὶ ἐμοῦ] The connexion here is very obscure,—and, accordingly, has been variously traced, but never quite satisfactorily. The scope of the words is our best guide to ascertain it. Now the object of their being spoken must have been consolation under present evils, and re-assurance in reference to future trials. Thus there is much to approve in the connexion laid down by Calvin, as follows: 'The world will indeed persecute you; your doctrine will be mocked at by some, and be reviled by others; but no violence of men will be able to shake the firmness of your faith, when the Holy Spirit shall have been given unto you, to confirm and establish you by his testimony.' But this representation falls short of the truth, by passing unnoticed the words μαρτυρήσει περὶ ἐμοῦ, which show that the connexion is left imperfect. Bp. Lonsdale traces it thus: 'But though the world hate me, when the Paraclete, even the Spirit of truth is come, he shall bear witness of the injustice of that hatred; and ye also shall be enabled by him to bear similar testimony.' But the last clause yields a very inapposite sense, and the rest of the words keep out of sight the scope of the Speaker,—comfort and re-assurance. The true connexion must be such as proceeds on a reference to the preceding context from v. 20 to v. 25 inclusive, and may be referred both to our Lord and the disciples; q. d. 'But though they hate and persecute you, as they have hated and persecuted me,—though they observe not your doctrine, as they have not observed mine, yet, when the Paraclete shall come,—he shall testify of me, that I came from God, and, consequently, that my doctrine is true,—and of you, that you are real ambassadors from Christ, and teach the true doctrine of God.' Of course this testimony from the Spirit of truth was sealed by the communication of miraculous powers, and supernatural spiritual gifts; so that the Apostles were sealed by God, as their Lord had been (see sup. vi. 27, τοῦτον ὁ Πατὴρ ἐσφράγισεν), and attested as true ambassadors of God.

—παρὰ τοῦ Πατρὸς ἐκπορεύεται.] In laying down the exact force of this term, Commentators generally run into one or other of the two extremes, either of supposing it to denote the eternal procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father (meaning thereby something answering to the eternal generation of the Son), or of assigning to it no more than the sense of ἐρχομαι at John xvi. 7; where that word denotes merely the effusion of the Holy Spirit. Here, if any where, we shall do best to steer a middle course. All that seems revealed in the present passage is, that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, as a messenger from and co-operating with both. See more in Calvin and Lampe.

—μαρτυρήσει περὶ ἐμοῦ] This is explained by almost all recent Commentators of confirming by arguments what has been already taught; meaning, that the Holy Spirit would then cause Christ's person, counsels, and works, to be more and more made known; as it is said ch. xvi. 14, ἐκείνους ἐμὶ δοξάσει, and that the Holy Spirit did so, cannot be denied. But the context will not, as I have shown supra, permit such an interpretation.

27. καὶ ὑμεῖς δὲ—] 'And ye, too, shall bear testimony.' To the testimony of the Holy Spirit Christ here adds that of the apostles and disciples themselves, who were, in all respects, qualified to bear unimpeachable testimony to the person, character, and actions of Christ, as having been with him from the beginning of his ministry; a testimony so much the more weighty, since it was, in the case of some, confirmed by personal miracles. So the Expositors, in general, from Grot. downwards;—but one can hardly imagine why such a testimony should have been thought necessary to be subjoined to the other. It cannot be doubted that Christ intended something more, which has escaped those Expositors; but the deficiency is ably supplied by Calv. and Bullinger, thus:—'Significat Christus non fore ejusmodi Spiritus testimonium quod privatum sibi habeant Apostoli, et quo soli fruantur; sed quod latius se per ipsos diffundat; quia futuri erant Spiritus organa, sicuti loquutus est ipse cum eis. Ac si diceret Christus, Quum dico Spiritum de me testificaturum, id noli sic intelligi tibi quasi ille de me testificaturus sit, vos tacituri: per vosaget omnia, seu organa electa. Nam ideo vos ab initio prædicati Evangelii elegi, ideo vos mihi adhibui, ut de omnibus cum dictis tum factis meis testificari queatis. Ille ergo testimonium perhibebit de me, et vos testimonium perhibebitis; utique quia ille perhibebit, et vos perhibebitis; ille in cordibus vestris, vos in vobis vestris; ille inspirando, vos sonando. Videmus nunc quomodo ex auditu ait idea, et tamen suam certitudinem habeat a sigillo et arrha Spiritus. Quibus non satis nota est humanæ mentis caligo, hi fidem naturaliter ex sola prædicatione concipi existimant. Contra vero, plerisque fanaticis sordet externa prædicatione, revelationes ἐνθουσιασµῶν spirant.'

XVI. The Apostles had doubtless expected honours and distinctions among men from their close relation to Christ; and, had this vain hope been countenanced, their approaching trials might have tempted them to conclude that they had been deceived. Hence our Lord warned them that persecution awaited them, in order to fortify their minds, lest they should be σκανδαλισθῆναι, so disconcerted by the unexpected attacks of evil, as to abandon their Christian profession.

2. ἀποσυναγώγουι π.] Among these trials excommunication (on which see note supra ix. 22) is mentioned first, as being, among the Jews a punishment reserved for crimes of the deepest dye, since it put the persons thus excluded on a level with Pagans.

—δόξῃ λατρεῖαν προσφέρειν τ. Θ.] Λατρεύειν properly signifies 'to serve any one as a slave.' But in the New Test. and Sept. it is always used to denote 'the offering of sacrifice,' or 'rendering worship and service of any kind.' Hence λατρεία denotes 'religious service;' and (espec. as προσφέρειν is a sacrificial term) προσφέρειν λατρείαν will signify 'to offer a sacrifice,' or 'to render a religious service in general.' The sense, then, is: 'he will think he is rendering an acceptable religious service to God;' as Paul did while persecuting the Christians unto death. From the passage of a Rabbinical writer here cited by Lampe (where it is affirmed: 'Omnis effundens sanguinem improborum aequalis est illi qui sacrificium offert'), I am inclined to think that there is at least an allusion (as also, perhaps, in Rom. xii. 1) to the offering up of a sacrifice to God. And this was evidently the opinion of some of the Greek Fathers, from whom Euthym. drew his matter. Accordingly λατρεία is explained by θυσία in Zonar. Lex. in v. But, though service, or worship, may be considered in the light of a sacrifice, yet it is best here to consider λατρ. (with Beza and Tittm.) as used in the sense of 'cultus pro victima.'

3. καὶ ταῦτα—[μὲν] This is meant to trace such conduct to its original source (namely, ignorance of God and of the Son of God; otherwise they would have known how abhorrent from the nature of both is persecution), and to suggest consolation to themselves, as suffering in the cause of God and Christ; see xv. 21.

4. ταῦτα—οὐκ εἶπον] By ἐξ ἀρχῆς is to be understood 'the beginning of Christ's ministry.' Since, however, our Lord had apprised his disciples of the persecutions they would have to undergo on account of their Christian profession, many take the οὐκ εἶπον restrictively, to mean, 'I did not fully apprise you,' &c. Yet this will not be necessary, if the ταῦτα be understood to mean (as it very well may) 'the things which should befall them after their Lord's departure.' Now to these he had no where directly adverted, but only to the evils to be endured while he was with them. This, indeed, is placed beyond doubt by the words following, which suggest the reason why Christ did not do it; namely, either because he was then with them to comfort and support them, and himself to bear the brunt of those trials; or because he was then going to stay with them, and was unwilling to afflict them before the time. In using the expression ὅτι μεθ' ὑμῶν ἤμην Christ, by implication, speaks of himself as already departed.

5. νῦν δὲ ὑπάγω—Ποῦ ὑπάγεις;] These words seem to introduce a new topic, yet one closely connected with and suggested by the preceding,—namely, that of his departure. Thus the δὲ has the adversative force; as in a similarly expressed passage in Eurip. Heracl. 9, Πλαίστων μετίσχων ἰς ἀνὴρ Ἡρακλῆϊ, δὲ ἦν μεθ' ἡμῶν νῦν δ' ἔπει κατ' οὐρανὸν Νυκτὶ, &c. There is, moreover, a brevity of expression, leaving something to be supplied, thus: 'But now it is expedient that I should do, what I forebore to do before this period, because I am no longer going to remain among you, but am going to him who sent me.' The καὶ just after, passed over by Expositors, signifies, 'And [yet], i. e. though I am going;' a signification frequent in St. John's writings. In ἐρωτᾷ is implied νῦν, 'none of you is (now) asking me;' for they had asked previously. The disciples are, however, I conceive, reproved, not so much for not then asking, as for the feeling which occasioned it, and adverted to at v. 5, namely, deep sorrow;—a sorrow which would naturally produce deep silence. Their sorrow, however, was blameable,—as proceeding from want of reflection on the causes of his departure, the place whither he was going, and the purpose of it, though these had been before suggested to them; and therefore our Lord reproves them, but gently, and with an infusion of comfort, by the excuse which he admits for their negligence. See Lampe. To these matters, however, our Lord at vv. 7, 11, adverts, and in plainer terms.

7. Christ here again points out that his departure would be for their advantage; for unless he passed through his sufferings to glory, the promised COMFORTER would not come unto them, and consequently, through the want of that dispensation of the Spirit, they could not be saved. It was, indeed, highly expedient; for the benefits to be obtained thereby were unspeakable.

8.—11. There is in these verses something truly august, as inherent in its subject,—the work of the HOLY SPIRIT on a benighted world, lying in darkness and wickedness (1 John v. 19). The obscurity complained of arises from the depth of the Gospel truths here imparted from the Fountain of Truth; and because they are rather pointed at than expressly drawn forth. The difficulty chiefly hinges on the expression τὸν κόσμον; by which some Expositors understand the world at large; others, the Jewish world, i. e. the Jews only. And, according as they adopt one or the other view, they assign to the passage either a general or a particular sense. The former is maintained by Calvin and most early Expositors, with Lampe; the latter by most of the recent Commentators, especially Kuinoel and Tittman, who explain the meaning to be, that he, the Holy Spirit, will make fully and generally confessed,—what had been hitherto denied or doubted,—1. the sin of those who refused to acknowledge him as the Christ, and who 'by wicked hands crucified the Lord of life;' 2. the righteousness (perfect innocence) of him whom they had thus rejected and put to death; and 3. the condemnation to which he should be amenable who had been the great instigator to this twofold sin,—the prince of this world, Satan. Thus the sense might be expressed as follows: 'He will convict the world (meaning the Jews) of the sin of unbelief; and he will convince them both of my righteousness, and of the victory obtained by me over the Prince of this world.' Yet, so to take κόσμ. is quite gratuitous, and at variance with the context, by which, and the use of the expression, ὁ κόσμος elsewhere in John, and often in Paul, the word must here be used for those who are yet under the power of 'the prince of this world,' undelivered from him by a real conversion from sin and Satan unto God. Besides, it involves no small harshness to take ἡλίχων in two different senses in one and the same sentence. Not to say that the sense convict involves an incongruity; for since, as observes Mr. Rose (on Parkh. in v.), 'whether the world be taken in its unlimited, or in its restricted sense, it is to be its own judge, the sense of ἡλίχων must be to convince, not convict; those two terms, when applied to a fault, only differing in this, that the individual may be himself convinced of his fault, but is convicted of it in the judgment of others.' It will be better, therefore, to adopt the sense convince = 'to bring home to any one's understanding and conscience a truth which he is unwilling to admit;' the former implying the latter, or both senses ('convinced' and 'convicted') may be combined, as in a similar mode of expression at 1 Cor. xiv. 24, ἡλίχεται ὑπὸ πάντων, ἀνακρίνεται ὑπὸ πάντων, where the word has also that double sense; namely, as Alf. says, who adopts this view, 'a convincing unto salvation, and a conviction unto condemnation.' How this ἡλίχων is effected, and to what extent, we learn from the Acts of the Apostles (see Acts ii. 4) and the early Ecclesiastical writers. By ἀμαρτία, if applied to the Jews, must here be understood not only the sin of unbelief, but that of persecuting and crucifying the Lord of life, and endeavouring to suppress 'the word of truth,' as sent from God. Ἀμαρτία, however, cannot, with any due regard to the context, be taken otherwise than as referred to ὁ κόσμος in the above general sense, and thus it will denote sin, but espec. that arising from unbelief. I agree with Stier and Alf., that 'the great opening out of sin to the world, is to show them its root in unbelief; i. e. if Christ be the Son of God,' arising from non-disposition to come unto him and be healed.

The view which I have long taken of the above combination of the senses 'to convince' and 'to convict,' I find confirmed by the suffrage of Archdeacon Hare (in his able work 'the Mission of the Comforter,' vol. ii. note 2), who observes that the Spirit shall convince those who are brought [by his influence] out of the world, and ultimately convict those who continue in it, and thus 'die in their sin.' The same view is taken by Apollinarius, who says, 'ἡλίχων τὸν κόσμον, ὡς ὑπὸ ἀμαρτίας κατακρίμινον διὰ τὴν ἀπιστίαν· ἡ γὰρ πίστις ἀμαρτίαν λύνει, ἀπιστίαν δὲ δίδει· καὶ φαινόμενον ἐν τοῖς πιστεύουσιν τὸ Πνεῦμα κατάκρισις ἦν τῶν ἀπιστούντων· ἰστηριμῶν γὰρ τῆς δωρεᾶς, ἡ ἡλίχωντο τῆς παρούσης (read τῇ παρούσῃ, ec. τῆς δωρεᾶς) τοῖς πιστευούσιν.'

With respect to the meaning of περὶ δικαιοσύνης, many of the best Commentators are agreed that it must be referred to Christ (περὶ denoting, as in the other two nouns, ἀμ. and κρίσ., quod attinet ad); and that, taken in conjunction with the words following, δικαιοσύνη can denote no other than 'the innocence and holiness of Jesus.' The proof of which (adverted to in the words following) was his going to his Father in heaven, evinced by his resurrection, and also by his sending the Holy Spirit with miraculous gifts; see Acts ii. 2 seq. xvii. 31. Rom. i. 4. 1 Cor. xv. 14. But surely the δικ. must not be confined to that of Christ, but, as Stier suggests, be extended, as in the case of the other two terms, ἀμ. and κρίσ., to τὸν κόσμον, to be supplied from the context. This I find confirmed by Calv. in his able note, as follows:—'Tenenda est graduum series, quam ponit Christus. Mundum nunc dicit arguendum de justitia; neque enim justitiam esurient ac sitient homines, imo cum fastidio respiciunt quicquid de ea dicitur, nisi tacti essent sensu peccati. . . . Ceterum justitiam hic intellige, quæ nobis per Christi gratiam communicatur. Eam Christus statuit in suo ad Patrem ascensu: nec immerito. Quemadmodum enim, teste Paulo (Rom. iv. 25) resurrexit propter justificationem nostram, ita nunc ad dexteram Patris sedet, ut quicquid illi datum est potestatis, exercent, et sic impleat omnia. . . . Ideo a convictione peccati secundum hic gradus est, ut convincat Spiritus mundum, quemam vera sit justitia. Nempe quod Christus suo in cælum ascensu vltis regnum constituit, et nunc sedet ad Patris dexteram, ut veram justitiam stabiliat.' The same view is taken by Bucer, who says, 'Non est alius obtinenda justitia modus, quam Evangelium viva fide suscipere; nam qui verè crediderit, verè justificatus est.' As to περὶ κρίσεως, the import of the phrase is not a little disputed, and, indeed, disputable; but it may best be determined by the words following; which show it to be the Divine judgment against all, whether Jews or Heathens, who persisted in rejecting Jesus as the Saviour. The certainty of this is hinted at in ver. 11, by the mention of the condemnation, and putting down, of ὁ ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου, the Old Serpent, Satan, inasmuch as by the manifestation of the Spirit, not only in his supernatural gifts, but also, and still more, in his preventing and supporting graces—adverted to in his appellation Παράκλητος, according to the full extent of the term above laid down. Indeed, what Stier says is very true (and it is the great truth, which is based on the whole of this august declaration of our Lord), that, 'of itself, the world, though it lieth in sin, does not know what sin is,—what righteousness is,—what judgment is; nor can any of these be revealed to any man, except by the Spirit working within him; and it can be fully attained only by the ἄλλοις of the Spirit.' In short, that the words were meant, and ought principally,—and in the only sense important to us in these times,—to be referred to κόσμος in the wide and general sense (as meant of both Jews and Gentiles,—nay, of MAN as he is in all ages), and Παράκλητος of the operation of the Holy Spirit upon the hearts of all, of every age, whether converted or unconverted, though with widely different effects to each (see 2 Cor. ii. 15, 16). I cannot doubt. In confirmation of the above view, as to the general reference in this whole passage, I may appeal to the authority of almost all the Reformers, espec. Luther, Melanch., and Calv., whose matter here is important, though my limits will only allow me to adduce a passage where he adverts to the end and purpose of Christ in bringing forward these words, which might have been left unsaid without being missed either by the hearers or the readers. But the end and purpose, as indicated by him, shows why they were brought forward, and thus affords a key to unlock the mystery, and a clue to the true sense. For, as Calvin remarks, 'Promiserat Spiritum suum discipulis: nunc domi præstantiam ab effectu commendat, quia Spiritus hic non eos modo privatim reget, sustinebit, ac tuebitur, sed vim suam et efficaciam latius diffundet. . . Singularis ergo ejus excellentia describitur, quod Deus hoc modo tribunal suum eriget ad judicandum totum orbem.' That the above view of the extent of sense in κόσμος, and also of that contained in the above representation of the Spirit in his mission, for the benefit of Christians of all ages, was not unknown to the early Greek Fathers, appears from the following passage of St. Cyril: Δεῖ γὰρ πάντας ἡμᾶς κοινωνοὺς καὶ μετόχους γενέσθαι τῆς θείας αὐτοῦ φύσεως, ἵνα ἵδωμεν τὴν οὐρανίου ἀφ' ἧς ζωῆς εἰς εἰρήνῃς μεταστροφῆς: ἀλλ' ἡν οὐχ ἔτι τῶν τούτων δύνασθαι τυχεῖν, εἰ μὴ διὰ τῆς τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος κοινωνίας τε καὶ μεταποιίας· ὃ γὰρ μὴν οὐρανίου τούτων καιρὸς μετὰ τὴν τοῦ Σωτῆρος ἐπιδημίαν ἐστὶ.

¹² πολλὰ] 'many other doctrines;' such as the abrogation of the ceremonial law, the removal of the distinction between Jews and Gentiles; and also, in a general way, the more mysterious doctrines of the Gospel afterwards revealed through the Spirit, towards forming 'the whole truth' mentioned in the next verse.

Πολλὰ ἔχω λέγειν is a popular mode of expression for 'I leave many things unsaid;' why? because ye cannot βαστάζειν, 'carry;' lit. 'stand under' = 'understand,' i. e. so as to receive them, now; an inability arising not so much from weakness of understanding, as from indisposition to admit what was so revolting to their Jewish prejudices. From this use of βαστ. by Arrian and Epict. one might suppose it an idiom of ordinary, perhaps provincial, Greek, but that it occurs in the Rabbinical writers; whence it would seem to be Jewish, or rather Chaldeo Syriac Greek.

¹³ ἐκεῖνος] Spoken emphatically, to denote the Comforter before mentioned, ver. 7. And here we may remark on this proof, among so many others existing in this Gospel, of the personality of the Holy Spirit,—namely, from personal actions being ascribed to him, and the masculine gender being used in speaking of him.

—ὁδηγ. ὑμᾶς εἰς πᾶσαν τὴν ἀλ.] Render, 'will guide you into all the truth, the whole truth' (namely, as regards the subject in question); see v. 12, and comp. Acts xx. 27 (i. e. 'respecting the many things which I have yet to say, but which now ye cannot bear'), the whole system of Gospel truth, πᾶσαν τὴν βουλὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ, Acts xx. 27; i. e. so far as it was fitted for their ministry, τὴν προσήκουσαν γνωρίσθηναι ὑμῖν, as Euthym. after Chrys., remarks; though we are not to limit this with Grot., Le Clerc, and Hamm., to something merely transient, temporary, and external, such as the founding and settling of churches, or the like; for, as Luther well observes, 'The Holy Ghost does not concern itself with things that are within the compass of man's understanding (such as are worldly, temporal, and external, but internal and perpetual); how God's children are to be begotten out of sin and death to righteousness and everlasting life; how we are to fight against and to overcome the devil. It is strange that Tisch. should in his second edition have here admitted into his text ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, though in his first he had adopted with Lachm. εἰς τὴν ἀλῆθ. π., from three very ancient MSS. and some Fathers, though in the teeth of strong internal evidence. There is no reason to reject the reading of the great body of the MSS., all the Lamb. and nearly all the Mus. copies, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version, and retained by Griesb. and Scholz, especially since it is not only the more difficult reading, but conveys a stronger and deeper sense, since 'to be a guide into, or unto, any truth, is more than to guide in the truth, i. e. to teach it;' though the latter may well be implied in the former, as in a passage of Rabbi Eliezer, cited by Lampe, where he says of the Patriarch Joseph, that 'the Spirit of holiness dwelt upon him from his boyhood until the day of his death, and led him into (thus guiding him in) every word of wisdom (comp. Ps. xxiv. 5), as a shepherd guides his flock.'

ἀλλ' ὅσα ἂν ἀκούσῃ λαλήσει καὶ τὰ ἐρχόμενα ἀναγγελεῖ ὑμῖν. 14 Ἐκεῖνος ἐμέ δοξάσει, ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ ἐμοῦ λήψεται, καὶ ἀναγγελεῖ ὑμῖν. 15 Πάντα ὅσα ἔχει ὁ Πατήρ, ἐμά ἐστι· διὰ τοῦτο εἶπον, ὅτι ἐκ τοῦ ἐμοῦ λήψεται, καὶ ἀναγγελεῖ ὑμῖν. 16 Μικρὸν, καὶ οὐ θεωρεῖτέ με· καὶ πάλιν μικρὸν, καὶ ὄψεσθέ με· ὅτι ἐγὼ ὑπάγω πρὸς τὸν Πατέρα. 17 Εἶπον οὖν ἐκ τῶν μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ πρὸς ἀλλήλους· Τί ἐστι τοῦτο ὃ λέγει ἡμῖν Μικρὸν, καὶ οὐ θεωρεῖτέ με καὶ πάλιν μικρὸν, καὶ ὄψεσθέ με· καί· ὅτι ἐγὼ ὑπάγω πρὸς τὸν Πατέρα; 18 ἔλεγον οὖν· Τοῦτο τί ἐστίν, ὃ λέγει, τὸ μικρὸν; οὐκ οἶδαμεν τί λαλεῖ. 19 Ἐγὼ οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ὅτι ᾔθελον αὐτὸν

— οὐ γὰρ λαλήσει ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ, &c.] q. d. 'for his teaching, like my own all along to you, will not be ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ, proprio motu, but such as shall be agreeable to the injunctions of the Father, and therefore absolutely true and Divine. Nay, moreover, he will not only open out to you the whole truth of things past, but also, as need may require, he will show you things which are coming, or, are about to happen; meaning not only what are concerned with the building up of the Church of Christ, but the completion of the system of Divine Truth. And in this point of view we may consider the Holy Spirit as not only the Spirit of Truth, but of Prophecy; for I agree with Stier and Alford that, as the direct fulfilment to the Apostles of leading into the whole truth was the unfolding to them those truths which they have delivered down to us in the Acts of the Apostles, so its complete fulfilment was the giving the Apocalypse, in which these very τὰ ἐρχόμενα here mentioned are distinctly the subject of the Holy Spirit's revelation, and with which his direct testimony closes.

14. ἐκείνος ἐμέ δοξ.—ὑμῖν] 'It is He who shall glorify;' meaning, probably, as Bp. Lonsdale explains, that 'by the truth which he imparts to you he will minister to my glory, for he will impart nothing but what he shall receive of me.' See Acts ii. 33. A yet closer paraphrase will be this:—'Inasmuch as whatsoever he shall show forth (lit. 'make report') unto you he will have received out of my store.' Of course this 'showing forth' is supposed to be imparted, by the inner teaching of the Spirit, to the minds, and impressed by his holy influences upon the hearts, of those in whom he dwells.

15. πάντα ὅσα—ἐμά ἐστι] In this clause, taken in conjunction with the preceding context, we have a clear view of the essential relations of the Holy Trinity, and such as is calculated to establish the truth of the doctrine against the Socinians; for, as says Lampe, 'here are three persons expressly distinguished from each other, and yet among them the closest connexion is said to subsist. The glory ascribed to them is equal; and yet this by no means precludes the supposition that the Son is the Heir of the Father, and the Holy Spirit the Legate of both.'

— διὰ τοῦτο εἶπον] 'Wherefore it is that I (just now) said;' meaning, 'that was the ground of my assertion.'

16—24. Here our Lord, after having cheered his hearers with the promise of another Comforter, even the Paraclete, who should supply his place, recurs to a painful subject, and, hastening to the conclusion of his discourse, he first speaks of his almost immediate withdrawal from them, but opens out a source of comfort, by pointing at the everlasting consolation (2 Thess. ii. 13), suspended on that present mournful separation, reviving them with the assurance that they would shortly see him again, and that subsequently their sorrow would be turned into joy, and a foundation laid for solid and substantial satisfaction.—Οὐ θεωρεῖτε, Pres. for Fut. A most touching form of expression to denote absence by death.—Ὄψεσθέ με is for πάλιν ὄψ. Meant of his visible advent after the resurrection. The next words ὅτι ἐγὼ—Πατέρα seem to be an elliptical mode of expression, of which the full sense is: '[I use this language] because I am going to the Father.' Indeed, though speaking of going away, and then coming shortly, would suggest the idea of only a temporary stay, yet it would not do that clearly enough to be understood until after the event; which is all that our Lord intended. Then it would serve to confirm their faith, as it now cheered their sorrow.

17. τί ἐστι τοῦτο, &c.] It may seem surprising that the Apostles should have failed to comprehend what our Lord had said. But the thing is easily accounted for when we consider the consciousness of his words,—and remember that they were predictive, perhaps intentionally obscure, and only to be understood after their fulfilment. Besides, the Apostles' perceptions were clouded by deep-rooted prejudices as to the temporal nature of Christ's kingdom, and dulled by their excess of sorrow on learning that, whatever might be the full sense of the words, they were, at least, to be deprived of their Lord.

18. τοῦτο—λαλεῖ] Construe, Τί ἐστι τοῦτο τὸ μικρὸν ὃ λέγει; Render: 'What meaneth this little while that he speaketh of?'

— οὐκ οἶδαμεν τί λαλεῖ] lit., 'we know not what he is talking about' (words prob. pronounced aside); prob. a popular mode of expression, equiv. to 'we know not what he means;' like that in Soph. Aj. 265, Πῶς τοῦτ' ἔλαξας; οὐ κἀντοῦ δ' ὅπως λέγεις, words expressing ignorance and yet implying a desire of knowledge, here expressed in the words following, ἤθελον αὐτὸν ἐρωτᾶν. Comp. also Antiphan. Προβλημα, fr. i. 5, οὐκ οἶδ' ὃ τι λήγεις ('I know not what you mean') οὐδὲν λήγεις γάρ, for 'you say nothing' (that I can understand).

19. ἐγὼ οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς, &c.] Render: 'Now Jesus knew that they were desirous to ask him the meaning of what he had said, and accordingly he said unto them, 'What, then, are ye debating about the meaning of what I have just said,—a little while? &c. Our Lord, however, in the next verse does not explain to them what he had said, because they would not have understood the explanation; and therefore only enlarges on what he had said, foretelling what literally took place both as to their sorrow and the world's joy (see Mark xvi. 10. Luke xxiv. 17, as also infra xx. 20. Luke xxiv. 41, 52, 53); though he comforts them at v. 22 by the assurance that their present sorrow would soon be turned into joy, not temporary but lasting, and never to be taken away.

20. ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λίγω ὑμῖν, &c.] Our Lord did not, for the reason above mentioned, give any explanation. And thus his silence may be supposed to imply, 'Yet it is so. What I have said you will find true.' In order, however, to more deeply impress their minds, he points to the circumstances which should accompany the events in question; namely, at the first sorrow of his disciples, and the triumphant exultation of the world; then the grief of the disciples soon afterwards turned into joy.

At καύσεται καὶ θρηνησάτω there is a kind of climax,—since the latter is by far the stronger term, denoting the expression of funeral wailings (comp. 2 Sam. i. 17. Jer. xxii. 20), and meant to intimate their mourning for him as if dead (comp. Luke xx. 27). The term λυπηθ. in the next clause has even greater force, because it denotes that deeply-seated feeling marked by the Poet, 'light sorrows speak; great grief is dumb.'

21. Our Lord here illustrates what he has just said by a simile frequent in Scripture (as Isa. xxi. 3. xxvii. 17. xxxvii. 8. Jer. iv. 31. xxii. 23. xxx. 6), and not unexampled in the Classical writers. See Hom. Iliad, α, 269.

—Λύπην ἔχει μὲν, from the context, denote 'is in pangs,' 'is suffering pangs.'—Ὅρα should be rendered, not hour, but time.—Ἀνθρώπου signifies here a human being, without reference to sex. The woman rejoices, not only from the thing itself, that she has added to the human race, but from its results to herself; for as barrenness was thought a reproach, so child-bearing was considered the reverse; not to mention the pleasure anticipated from the dutiful affection of the child. So Aristotle observes: οὐ πάντῃ εὐδαιμονικὸς ὁ ἄτακτος.

22. αἶραι.] Present Infinitive.—Χαρήσεται ὑμῶν ἡ κ. A strong expression, signifying, 'ye shall feel heartfelt joy.' By τὴν χαρὰν ὑμῶν οὐδεὶς αἶρει ἀφ' ὑμῶν it is meant that their joy should be uninterrupted and permanent; not liable to be taken away, as is all joy subject to human contingencies.

23. 24. Christ here subjoins, what would tend to repress their anxiety for the explanation which he had thought fit not to give them; q. d. 'At that period (namely, the ascension of Christ and the sending of the Holy Ghost) ye will have nothing to ask me;' meaning, in other words, that 'they would have no occasion to put questions' on that of which as yet he had not thought fit to give them a full explanation: for the Holy Ghost would supply them with all necessary information thereupon. Then, on the subject of putting questions, Christ engrafs that of preferring requests; showing that, 'whatever they might have to ask in his name and for his cause, the Father would grant it them.' Here Alf. bids us notice 'the right reading,' i. e. of his text (and Tischendorf's), in which the words ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι are placed, not before, but after ὡς οὖν ὑμῖν, on the authority of only 6 uncial copies, the Sahid. Vers., Origen, and Cyril. But it is far from certain that it is the right reading. The great body of the uncial MSS., together with, as far as I know, all the cursive copies, confirmed by all the Versions but one (an inferior one, and tampered with), confirm the text. rec., and internal evidence is not in favour of the other reading. Alf. endeavours to establish his, as the right reading 'on the gloss of Luthardt'; 'He being the element or region of all communication between God and the Church.' But there is something precarious in such a reason as that for adopting a reading so inadequately grounded. Some proof from SCRIPTURE is requisite to make the reading worthy of serious attention. My own persuasion is, that the reading of those 6 copies arose solely from the carelessness of the writers of some 2 or 3 ancient Archetypes, who, having first omitted ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι, then, as in a thousand other cases of omission, brought the words in at a wrong place. That the words are omitted in some copies we know; and that they were absent from some at a period as early as the time of the Archetypes I speak of, is certain from the poetical Version of Nonnus. That the transposition should occur in Origen and Cyril, adds scarcely any weight to this so called 'true reading'; espec. if we consider the laxity and carelessness, in such things, of the Fathers, especially of one whose evidence in such a case is often in contradiction to his own elsewhere.

²⁴. Ἔως ἄρτι οὐκ ᾔτησ.—μου] Meaning, by this very briefly expressed sentence, 'Up to the present time ye have, indeed, asked of the Father in prayer; but not in my name [as ye shall hereafter do: so that ye may] ask, and ye shall receive; that your joy may be complete, by a full grant of your requests.'

²⁵. In this verse the sense will be best ascertained by adverting to the two antithetical expressions, ἐν παροιμαῖς λαλεῖς καὶ παρρησία ἀναγγελλῶ. As to the former, the term παροιμία signifies not only a proverb, but, as here, whatever is expressed (as proverbs usually were) in figurative language and in an obscure manner, so as not at first to be understood, espec. by the less informed, or less attentive. I would compare with the sentiment, Æsch. Agam. 1154, where Cassandra says, φρενῶσω δ' (scil. ὑμᾶς) οὐκ ἔτ' ἐξ αἰνιγμάτων.

Here, then, our Lord grants that, in his preceding discourses, he had spoken of the subjects in question with more or less of obscurity and enigma. And by the words following, ἀλλ' ἔρχεται ὥρα ὅτε οὐκ ἔτι, &c., he intimates the reason for this,—namely, that to have done otherwise would have been then unseasonable and premature.

By περὶ τοῦ Πατρὸς we may suppose to be meant, 'concerning the perfections and attributes of the Father,' the way of access to him, and his counsels for the salvation of men and the establishment of the Christian Church. The fulfilment of the present promise is alluded to at Luke xxiv. 26—44, and Acts i. 3.

²⁶. καὶ οὐ λέγω—ὑμῶν]. Since Christ has at xiv. 16, promised that he will ask the Father on their behalf, and as we have just after, xvii. 9, seqq., an actual intercession for them, and as Christ is at Rom. viii. 34. Heb. vii. 25, and 1 John ii. 1, said to be continually interceding for his disciples, the sense of the words must be, not what they would at first seem to express, but what has been assigned by the most eminent Interpreters for the last century,—namely, 'I need not say that I shall pray the Father for you, since that you know I will do [nay, there is no need, in another respect]; for the Father himself (αὐτὸς, for αὐτοκείμενος, used by Nonnus) loveth you [and therefore may be presumed to be always ready and willing to bestow on you all needful blessings].' This idiom has the technical name præteritio, and is to be found even in the Classical writers. The scope of what is here said is, as Alf. observes, 'to show that His intercession does not imply their exclusion from access to the Father, but rather ensures that access by the especial love which the Father bears to those who believe in and love his Son.'

²⁸. On the full sense of ἐξῆλθον παρὰ τοῦ Πατρ., 'I did come forth' (as denoting, not 'mission from,' but 'procession from,' God, implying the being with God, and VERY GOD). Comp. iii. 13, 31. vi. 62, and see the note of Lampe in my Recens. Synop.

³⁰. νῦν οἶδαμεν, &c.] Meaning, 'Now we experimentally know that to thee all the thoughts and secrets of men's hearts are open, and therefore we cannot doubt of thy divine mission.'

prehend, mistakenly. There may not be an interrogation. But even if we remove it, it will come to the same thing; since the sense must be, 'So then ye believe,—in which there is all but an implication of interrogation ('do ye?'); and even if not, somewhat of reproof is conveyed; but that is not in the Johannine manner. However, I must retain the interrogation found in several Versions, Syr. and Vulg. and Nonnus, and ably explained by Euthym., who, after saying that our Lord is rebuking their imperfect faith, remarks, that it is as much as to say, ἀρτι πιστεύετε ἰντελῶς; οὐδ' (read οὐχί) ἀρτι, ἐλίσσει γὰρ ὑμᾶς ὁ ἐφιστῶς ἥδη καιρὸν. This, indeed, is required by the very next words, whose connexion with the foregoing is ably traced by Calv., Lampe, and Matt. Henry.

—καὶ οὐκ εἰμὶ, &c.] The kai has here, as often, the sense and yet, standing for kai τοι. And in μετ' ἐμοῦ there is an allusion to the double meaning of the expression. See note on viii. 29.

³³ ταῦτα λελάληκα, &c.] By ταῦτα we must understand, not merely (as has been supposed intended) what was just before intimated of the weakness of their faith, and the slight consequent upon it, but all that has been said in the foregoing discourses.

With respect to the meaning of the next words, ἵνα ἐν ἐμοὶ εἰρήνην ἔχητε, some suppose it to be, 'that ye might be at peace in your minds about me;' by which ἐν ἐμοὶ will be for ἵνα καὶ ὡς περὶ ἐμοῦ, 'as regards me.' Yet this sense, though sufficiently suitable to the preceding, is by no means so to the following context; and moreover, such a signification of ἐν is unauthorized: not to say that the interpretation itself quite dis-spiritualizes the whole passage. From the words ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ θλίψιν ἔχετε it should rather appear, that the peace in question is meant, not as it regarded Christ, but themselves; and thus we may suppose, with the ancient and most modern Expositors, that ἐν ἐμοὶ means 'by faith in me.' This εἰρήνην will denote that tranquillity of mind, consolation, and comfort, which he had so solemnly bequeathed them a little before (xiv. 27), and such as is alone to be attained through Him 'who is our Peace.' See Eph. ii. 14.

For ἔχετε, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἔχετε, from nearly all the uncials, and very many cursive MSS. (to which I add all the Lamb. MSS. except one, most of the Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 17), with the Pesch. Syr. and other Versions; and it is probably the true reading, denoting what our Lord's disciples may expect as their customary state; for, as says our great bard: 'To each his sufferings; all are men Condemned alike to groan; The tender for another's pain, Th' unfeeling for his own.' I should indeed have adopted the reading had I not borne in mind that the words ἔχετε and ἔξετε are so often confounded by the scribes, that in the very best MSS. it is an even chance, not depending on suitability, which shall be found.

—νενίκηκα τὸν κόσμον] This is, as Kuinoel and Tittman observe, the prophetic Preterite for the Future; which is employed when the future event is just about to take place. Νικάω here signifies, as Lampe, Tittman, and Kuinoel have shown, to foil or frustrate, and is a term used of those who rise superior to their enemies, by attaining safety in spite of their endeavours to harm them. Comp. Rom. viii. 37. 1 John iv. 4.

Κόσμος here denotes the unbelieving and persecuting part of the world, combined under their leader the ἀρχὸν τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, to destroy the cause of the Gospel. By saying that He hath overcome the world (for the ἰσὺς is emphatic; q. d. 'I, for my part'), our Lord intimates, that by following his example, and by the same all-powerful aid (that of the Father, see v. 32, with his own and the Holy Spirit's), they might also come off more than conquerors in the day of tribulation and persecution. See Rom. viii. 37. 1 Cor. xv. 57. 2 Cor. ii. 14. 1 John iv. 4.

XVII. After concluding the above impressive discourse,—with which he closed his direct instructions to his disciples,—Christ, in their presence, addresses himself in prayer to the God of all grace and strength; 1) on his own behalf; for his glorification with the Father, v. 1—5; 2) for his disciples, v. 6—19; 3) for all believers in him, both Jews and Gentiles, 19—26, as Mediator and Intercessor between God and man; Judge, to determine the final condition of all men; and Saviour, to bestow life on as many as had been given unto him in the covenant of redemption. See supra x. 16; vi. 37. Of the substance of this Divine effusion it has been truly observed, that had we no other knowledge of Christ than what was thence furnished, it would be sufficient to set forth to our view the supreme dignity of our exalted Redeemer, his unspeakable love to man, and the momentous nature of the work he was effecting.

The intent of this prayer appears to have been ἔδωκας αὐτῷ ἐξουσίαν πάσης σαρκός, ἵνα πᾶν ὃ δέδωκας αὐτῷ, δώσῃ αὐτοῖς ζωὴν αἰώνιον. ³ Ἡ αὕτη δέ ἐστιν ἡ αἰώνιος ζωή, not only to comfort, but to instruct, the disciples; unfolding, as it does, the grand mystery of the Gospel—the instituted means of salvation by the Father and the Son conjointly, and affording an illustrious example to believers in all ages, of pious resignation to the will of God, and devout prayer to God, under all circumstances of peril, tribulation, and affliction; teaching them that, while ‘suffering according to the will of God,’ they should ‘commit the keeping of their souls to Him, as unto a faithful Creator.’ (1 Pet. iv. 19.) From this diversity of purpose we may readily account for the variation of manner observable in different parts of the prayer; for though Christ sometimes addresses the Father as the Incarnate Son of God, yet he sometimes supplicates as man, in quality of man. There is something peculiarly impressive in that portion where he addresses his Father for his Household, the Apostles and Disciples, the foundation of God’s Household, the Church (Eph. ii. 19), that God would preserve them in his name, in the knowledge thereof imparted by him, give them a spirit of unity and concord, and protect them in and from the wicked world, v. 6—19; that they might partake of his glory in heaven, and be supported by his love and presence on earth, v. 24—26; finally, for all future believers, through their word, whether written or spoken by preaching, that they might be endued with the same spirit of unity and concord, and the same zeal for the conversion of the whole world, v. 20—23.

1. ἱηὴς τοὺς ὀφθ.] A gesture like the lifting up of the hands, as an attitude of reverent devotion, of which many examples occur both in the Scriptures and in the Classical writers; so Virg. Æn. ii. 587, ‘At Pater Anchises oculos ad sidera lætus Extulit, et cœlo palmas, cum voce, tetendit.’ But here we must consider it as an exact depicting, by the Evangelist, of that gesture—the uplifted eyes (not hands, for he prays here not as a suppliant, but as a Mediator and Intercessor between God and man) which accompanied the pronunciation of an address the most august that was ever, through the Spirit, put on record, and forming a composition at once the most simple, yet pathetic in expression, though the most profound in sense, and accordingly styled by a great theologian (Zanchius), ‘Fundamentum totius Ecclesie a condito orbe ad finem usque sæculorum.’

—εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν] meaning, ‘upwards,’ ‘in the direction of heaven.’

—καὶ εἶπε] I quite agree with Mr. Alf., where he says (O si sic omnia!) that ‘it is impossible to regard the following Prayer as otherwise than the very words of our Lord himself, faithfully rendered by the Evangelist, in the power of the Holy Spirit. Indeed, if such a promise as that at xiv. 26 was made and fulfilled, then these must be the words of the Lord himself.’ One might expect that with such a composition the ancient Critics would have forbore to tamper; but no such thing. The favourite

Codices of our Critical Triumvirate, B, C, D, L, and a few cursives of the same Family, for καὶ ἱηὴς have ἱάρας, which I find also in 3 Mss. copies, and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, which was adopted by Lachm., and by Tisch. in his 1st Edit., who afterwards recalled the text. rec., which is retained by Alf., who rightly pronounces the other reading ‘an emendation of style.’

—Πάτερ] Not Πάτερ μου, but simply Πάτερ, a simplicity of appellation, which, as Bengel says, ‘ante omnes decuit Filium Dei,’—that great name in which all the mystery of Redemption is included. The best Expositors are agreed that our Lord here prays, in his manhood, for the exaltation of the manhood;—but in virtue of his Godhead, v. 5. See more in Lampe and Schoëtig. and Stier.

—ἐλήλυθεν ἡ ὥρα] Meaning (as at John vii. 30) ‘the decisive and appointed time,’ the time in which the glory both of the Father and of the Son should be reciprocally manifested.

—δόξασόν σου τὸν Τίον] The principal sense here must be, as appears from v. 5, ‘receive him, after his death, resurrection, and ascension, into the glory he originally had in heaven.’ On the nature of that glory, how it was manifested in heaven, developed on earth, and revealed to men; how the Son was glorified by the Father, and the Father was glorified by the Son, in all his attributes, and in the whole work of salvation, see Calvin, Melancthon, and Lampe.

—ἵνα ὁ Τίός σου δοξ. σε] These words, as Stier says, ‘fully prove that the Son is equal to the Father as touching his Godhead; for what creature could stand before his Creator, and utter such words?’

2. καθὼς ἔδωκας—σαρκός, &c.] The Particle καθὼς suggests the reason and cause of the prayer here offered; wherein our Lord refers both his own glory and that of his Father to the work of salvation committed to him.

—ἐξουσίαν πάσης σαρκός] ‘a power over all mankind.’ A Hebraism (see Gen. vi. 3, 12), with an Hellenistic use of the Genitive. On the full extent of this august power claimed by our Lord, Lampe and Tittman show that it involves the governance of all human affairs, the regulation of the vicissitudes of times and places, &c.: all in order to accomplish the work of human salvation; a work committed to him, as the Saviour of men, in order that he who obtained that salvation might be the Giver of it, in order by this sacrifice of himself to atone for the sins of the whole world.

3. αὕτη δέ ἐστιν—Χριστός] In the interpretation of this verse the utmost caution is requisite, since from it senses the very opposite have been sought. It has ever been regarded by the Heterodox as one of their strong-holds, and from this they have adventured to impugn the doctrine of the DEITY OF CHRIST. In order to effectually frustrate their attempt, many Orthodox Commentators, ancient and modern, adopt such a construction of the sentence, as that the words τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν Θεόν may belong not only to the Father, but also to the Son. This they seek to effect in two ways; 1. by inverting the natural order of the words, thus: 'Ut te, et quem misisti Jesum Christum, solum verum Deum agnoscant.' 2. By supposing an ellipsis of εἶναι, and after καὶ supplying ἔμα σοι. But the best Commentators have long been agreed, that this arbitrary transposition and supplying of words involves so much violence, that the interpretation founded thereon is inadmissible. Indeed, as Bp. Middleton observes, 'it could only have originated in a wish to evade the consequences which this text has been supposed to establish.' We must not, then, seek here an assertion of the Deity of Christ, but content ourselves with proving that Christ is not here represented as a mere Legate, much less a mere MAN. That our Lord did not, could not, mean to make such an assertion, is plain both from the passage itself, and from what precedes and follows it.

ἵνα γινώσκωσί σε τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν Θεόν, καὶ, ὃν ὑπέστειλας

In the first place it is proper to ascertain the exact sense of the terms μόνον ἀληθινὸν and γινώσκειν. Now this will mainly depend upon the construction, about which no little difference of opinion exists. There are two classes of Interpreters, who each suppose an ellipsis of εἶναι. But as Bp. Middleton has proved, the exposition of the one class is negatived by the presence of the Article τόν; and that of the other, both by that, and by its involving an unprecedented harshness of construction. It is evident that τὸν μόνον ἀλ. Θ. is in opposition with σε; and we may, either with Lampe, suppose the τόν to mean, 'who art thou,' &c.; or with Bp. Middleton, render, 'as being.' It is, however, most important to ascertain the true import of μόνον ἀληθ. Now many ancient Expositors (as Athanasius, and most of the early Fathers), and, of the moderns, Calv., Zanch., Bp. Bull, Wets., Tittm., Hales, and others, suppose the words to recognize in God the Father a superiority, as being such principally, and κατ' ἑξοχὴν; the Fountain of all Deity; namely, as it is expressed by Athanasius (cited by Bp. Bull), Def. Fid. Nic. p. 264, ὁ ὁὐτος ἀγέννητος, καὶ μόνος πηγὴ θεότητος. Yet, however true may be the doctrine itself (which, however, I would not venture to affirm), yet here it should seem to be out of place. Indeed, one of the arguments which most effectually keep out the heterodox interpretation will go far to exclude this. And to those by whom it has been supported, we may, to a certain degree, apply what Bp. Middleton has said of the Socinian interpreters, who, he observes, 'argue as if in our Saviour's days there had been the same controversy about the nature and essence of the One True God, as arose afterwards; whereas the dispute then was, whether there were a plurality of Gods, or only One; of which the Jews held the latter, and the whole Pagan world the former opinion.' This very circumstance, I would remark, is strongly in favour of an interpretation which has every appearance of being the true one, and has been adopted by some ancient and many eminent modern Expositors (as Lucas Brug., Maldon., Grot., Whitby, Pearce, Schleus., Bp. Middl., Bp. Burgess, and Dr. Pye

Smith), according to which μόνον ἀληθ. is meant in opposition to the false gods of the heathens, who have no real entity; comp. 1 Thess. i. 9. And so Bp. Turton (against Dr. Wiseman) explains it to mean, 'him who is true, or the true One; thereby conveying the idea that while insecurity and uncertainty are inherent in every thing here below, stability essentially belongs to God.' Thus, then (to use the words of Bp. Middleton), the Apostles would be taught that eternal life 'is only to be obtained by a knowledge of the one true God, and of Jesus Christ; thus directing the mind to the truths both of natural and revealed religion.' This I am enabled to confirm from Joseph. Antt. viii. 13, 6, προσκύνουν ἵνα Θεόν, καὶ μίγιστον καὶ ἀληθῆ μόνον ἀποκαλούντες τοὺς δ' ἄλλους δνόματα ὑπὸ φαύλων καὶ ἀνοήτων δόξης πεποιημένα, and Antt. x. 11, 7, where Nebuchadnezzar calls the God of Daniel (Jehovah) τὸν μόνον ἀληθῆ, καὶ τὸ πᾶν κράτος ἔχοντα, i. e. greater than all the gods of the heathens; also from Eurip. Iph. Taur. 919, μόνος μοι σαφὴς φίλος is said by Orestes of Pylades. Nor can any inference be justly drawn against the Deity of Christ from μόνον being here subjoined after Θεόν; for, as Wetstein well observes, such terms as sole, only, or singular, are not opposed to the idea of plurality in the most absolute and exclusive sense, but frequently denote that which is most eminent, distinguished, or excellent. And, as Dr. Pye Smith with equal truth remarks, 'exclusive, as well as universal, terms in Scripture are not to be regarded as necessarily signifying absolutely, but they must frequently be understood with a limitation suggested by the nature and circumstances of the case.' Of this use of μόνος instances occur in Mark vi. 47. John viii. 9. 1 Cor. ix. 6, et al. Indeed, the restricted sense of this term may be well illustrated by those expressions in the Liturgy of our Church, 'Thou only art holy' (said of Christ, but not exclusively of the Holy Spirit); and 'Thou only art the Lord' (also said of Christ, but not exclusively of the Father). Thus it is plain that there is no opposition intended between the Father and the Son, and that the Father is no more said to be the true God to the exclusion of the Son, than at Ja. xiv. 6. xlv. 22. And consequently it is (as Bp. Middleton says) 'frivolous to introduce this passage into the Trinitarian dispute.'

To advert to the import of γινώσκωσι,—the term must, in its full force, denote such knowing and recognizing the Father and the Son to be what they have revealed themselves, cum effectu, and not in mere speculative knowledge,—whether head-knowledge or heart-knowledge,—through the excitement of the feelings,—as shall influence us to worship, serve, and obey them;—such a oneness of will with God (see Cyril, cited supra xvi. 8—11),—as (to use the words of Calv. in allusion to 2 Cor. iii. 18) 'shall transform us to the image of God, from faith to faith.'

Thus the general sense of the passage may be thus expressed: 'This is the way by which they may attain unto eternal salvation,—namely, to know and recognize Thee as the only true God, ἐτελείωσα δὲ δέδωκάς μοι ἵνα ποιήσω· ⁵ καὶ νῦν δόξασόν με σὺ, Πάτερ, παρὰ σεαυτῶ, ⁶ τῇ δόξῃ ἣ εἶχον πρὸ τοῦ τὸν κόσμον εἶναι παρὰ σοί. ⁶ Ἐφανερώσά σου τὸ ὄνομα τοῖς ἀνθρώποις, οὓς δέδωκάς μοι ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου. and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent [as Mediator between God and man]; thus intimating (as Calv. points out) that God is known by the interposition of this Mediator, inasmuch as he is known alone 'in the face of Jesus Christ,' who is his lively and 'express image.' In short, the best comment on the present passage is 1 John v. 20, where see note.

4. σε ἰδόξασα—τὸ ἔργον ἱταλ.] The full sense is, 'I have glorified, and continue to glorify;' for, as Bp. Lonsd. observes, 'our Lord here speaks not only of what he had already done to glorify his Father by his life, but also of that which he was now about to do by his death; which was to be the completion of the work that his Father had given him to do on the earth.' Now this work must not, with many recent Expositors, be interpreted of the work of teaching, but, as Calv., Lampe, and others, have shown, of all that our Lord had done throughout his whole ministerial course, terminating in his death, the crowning act which completed all that he had done both as a Teacher and Exemplar, both as a Prophet and as a Saviour, atoning by the sacrifice of himself for the sins of the whole world.

5. καὶ νῦν δόξασόν με σὺ] The formula καὶ νῦν is here transitive; not, however, as denoting sequence only, but inference, and may be rendered 'now then,' 'accordingly,' = 'since these things are so.' The idiom is often used in the Sept. as introducing requests of grace, as Gen. xxvii. 8, 31, 44. Josh. i. 1. Ruth iii. 11; but it is equally applicable to urging a request for that to which there is a just claim, as here, on the ground of our Lord's perfect fulfilment of the work the Father had committed to him on earth. The glory thus sought is, as Lampe shows, not only the glory which he had with his Father before the creation of the world, but also the glory promised to the person of Christ in the eternal covenant for man's salvation,—the especial glory given to Christ in his mediatorial capacity, i. e. in his twofold nature of God and man, which differs from his glory as God, and his glory as man. A similar view is taken by Dr. Pye Smith, who explains it, somewhat vaguely, of the manifestation of his name, the unveiling of the same moral and spiritual excellence, the same absolute and infinite perfection, in the person and character of the Son of God, to be effected by the extension and success of the Christian religion. For myself, on a point so involved in mystery, and where we can only 'see through a glass darkly,' I would not venture to determine any thing. One thing is clear, and that is,—the pre-existence of the Son of God in glory with the Father before the creation of the world. The emptiness of the Socinian gloss, by which εἶχον is understood of the destination of the Father, has been fully shown by Lampe and Tittm., whom see in my Recens. Synopt.

6.—19. This portion is occupied with our Lord's prayer for his disciples; and that earnest intercessory address is introduced by adverting to that portion of the work that he had performed on earth (v. 4), which consisted in glorifying the name of God, his nature, attributes, and counsel for the salvation of those whom the Father had given to him out of the unbelieving world to be taught by him, and thus brought to salvation; as were the Apostles and disciples present. This, accordingly, naturally paves the way to intercessory prayer for them.

6. σοὶ ἦσαν] Thine; 1. by right of creation and preservation; and 2. by the bond of devoted attachment to thee. Δίδωκας, meaning, 'hast given me them (through the "drawing" mentioned supra vi. 44, where see note), as disciples.'—Τὸν λόγον σου τέτ. means the doctrine of the Gospel, delivered to them through Christ by God the Father; q. d. 'whatsoever thou hast commissioned me to speak.'

7. ἔγνωκαν] lit. 'they have known and do know,' equiv. to they have full knowledge; ἔγνωκα being one of what the grammarians call present-perfects, where a complete action implies a permanent state, as in the instance of τίθηναι, ἡλπινα, supra v. 45; μεμαρτύρηκα, supra i. 34; and λαλάηκα, viii. 40.

8. τὰ ῥήματα δὲ—δίδωκα αὐτοῖς] Comp. supra xv. 15. πάντα δὲ ἤκουσα παρὰ Πατρ. μ. ἐγνώρισα ὑμῖν, where the terms δίδωκ. and ἤκουσ. are tantamount; and, accordingly, in both passages the origin of the disciples' faith is intimated.—ἔγνωσαν ἀληθῶς, 'have truly, assuredly known.' The phrase occurs supra vii. 26, and Acts xii. 11, but not, I think, in the Classical writers, who use ἀσφαλῶς γιν. Thus the faith mentioned just after is represented as reposing on the conviction arising from sure and certain knowledge; comp. supra vi. 68, 69, where in πιστεύετε καὶ ἐγνώκαμεν καὶ ἔγνώκαμεν ὅτι σὺ εἶ ὁ Χριστός, there is this same faith arising from our Lord's having, as Christ, the ῥήματα ζωῆς αἰωνίου, which he had, as is here said, received (by hearing) from the Father. The παρὰ σοῦ ἐξῆλθον here corresponds to the ὁ Χριστός ἐξ ὕδατος τοῦ Θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος there. 'Here,' observes Tittman, 'we must be careful to distinguish the proceeding of Jesus from God, xvi. 28, and coming to the earth, v. 3, from his being sent by God as the Messiah.' However, I am not sure that both these may not be included, one as springing from the other. At any rate, the Apostles' faith comprehends both those heads.

denoted 'the exercise of powerful protection' (such as that spoken of v. 11), and by ἐφύλαξα, watchful care over, including (as appears from the application of our Lord's words, infra xviii. 9), besides the promoting of their eternal salvation, the consulting for their temporal safety. So speaking, our Lord means to say,—that now, being about to leave them, he commits them to the Father,—to afford them that protection and care, which He had done while present with them. On reconsidering the difficult question as to the reading here, whether οὗς, as in the text. rec., or ὧς, as in many MSS., I now see reason to think that the text. rec. probably arose from a Critical alteration. The authority for ὧς is very weighty, comprehending most of the uncials, and many cursives (to which I can add all the Lamb. copies, except two; most of the Mus. copies; and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17), and internal evidence is quite in its favour, since this is not a case where the reading proposed is what breaks all rules of Grammar and construction, and which the context will not permit; for it does admit of a sense,—such as Luthardt and Alf. point out, namely, that by ὧς (for ὧς, per attractionem), is meant the covenant name Jehovah our Righteousness, which the Father has given to Christ. But we may reasonably require some Scriptural proof of this giving, which even if thus based would be brought in here rather violently. Accordingly, I have scrupled to receive the reading, espec. since it may have arisen from the same cause as the ὧς at v. 24, adopted by Tisch. and Alf. See note.

— ἀπώλετο] 'has perished' = 'has come to perdition,' by having fallen away from the faith. There may be, as in Pa. ii. 12, ὁράσας τοὺς παῖδας, μήποτε ἀπολείσθαι ἐξ ὁδοῦ δικαίας, an allusion to the sin of unbelief, and, as there, probably by a metaphor taken from a wayfarer, who, from abandoning his guide, has lost the right path, and comes in danger of destruction. The subsequent expression ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας, is derived from the Hebr. phrase בן חטא, used of the idolatrous Israelites, who were thus apostates from their religion, and hence this expression is very applicable to Judas, who was both a betrayer and an apostate.

— ἵνα ἡ γραφή πληρωθῇ] meaning, 'so that the Scripture may be said to be fulfilled': as applied to this case. On the passage here had in view the Commentators are not agreed. Most think there is only a general reference to the prophecies concerning the passion of our Saviour. Yet there seems a special one; namely, to Pa. xli. 9, and cix. 8, as, indeed, appears from the words of Peter, Acts i. 20.

13. ταῦτα λαλῶ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ] Here our Lord shows that he did not thus earnestly pray to the Father for his disciples, as though he felt alarmed as to their future state, but so spoke that he might relieve their present anxiety.

— ἵνα ἔχωσιν αὐτοῖς] The full sense is, 'that they may [by these words] have their joy in me (i. e. of which I am the object) complete and perfect:' thus alluding to the joy they would shortly experience at his resurrection, ascension, and the sending to them of the Holy Spirit.

14. ἐγὼ δέδωκα αὐτοῖς τὸν λόγον σου] Comp. ver. 8 and note.

— καὶ ὁ κόσμος ἐμίσησεν αὐτοὺς] Here Christ commends his disciples to the Father on another ground; namely, that because of the hatred of the world towards them, they need his help and defence. See infra xv. 18, 21.

15. οὐκ ἐρωτῶ—κόσμον] 'I pray not that thou shouldst remove them.' To better comprehend the purport of the expression, it is proper to bear in mind a remark of Euthymius and Grotius, that 'these words are said in explication of the preceding, and for the sake of the disciples then present, and within hearing.' Thus our Lord means indirectly to enjoin his disciples, under the bitter persecutions they would be called upon to endure, not to wish or pray for death, since he had important purposes for them to answer during many years; at the same time suggesting to them motives for constancy and fortitude, in their being, by his mighty aid, not only defended and preserved, but, through the influence of the Paraclete, comforted under the sorrows which should surround them.

By τοῦ πονηροῦ many Commentators understand the Evil One, referring to Matt. vi. 13, and 1 John v. 19. But as to the first-mentioned passage, we may say, with Horace, 'Nihil agit exemplum litem quod lite resolvit;' for there the sense is as much disputed as here. The latter is, indeed, to the purpose; and we may add 1 John ii. 13, 14. iii. 12. v. 18, 19. Yet all that these passages will prove is, that a masculine sense might, if the context permitted, not that it must, be adopted. That the context rather requires the neuter has been shown by the ablest judges of such a matter, as Estius, Calvin, and Lampe. Thus the object of the prayer will be, 'that they may be preserved from the evil that is in the world (Sin), and the malice of its agents (Satan and his instruments); so that the two senses merge into each. However, the passages of John strongly confirm the masculine sense (of Satan); and since there is, as Bp. Lonsdale observes, a peculiar propriety in the prayer, that the disciples, while they remained in the world should be kept [by the Power from on High] from the power of Satan, described in xii. 31. xiv. 30, as

 ἐν σοὶ, ἵνα καὶ αὐτοὶ ἐν ἡμῖν ἐν ὧσιν ἵνα ὁ κόσμος πιστεύσῃ ^{John 1. 9.} & 2. 24.

'the Prince of this world,' I must finally determine in favour of the mascul. sense.

17. ἁγιάσον αὐτοὺς, &c. From praying for their preservation under trials and troubles, Christ proceeds to pray for their preservation in the discharge of their Evangelical office. Ἀγιάζειν, like the Hebr. וּפָרַד, signifies properly 'to separate,' or 'set apart to some office ecclesiastical;' and 'to consecrate to the worship of God, or to the concerns of religion:' thus ἁγίος came to denote 'a person so set apart,' or 'consecrated,' and is in Scripture used especially of Prophets or Priests, both being said ἁγιάζεσθαι. It is, however, also said to be used of the appointment by the Father of the Son to the work of human salvation by his incarnation (see x. 36), and to which our Lord is said to have devoted himself. But how, it may be asked, are we to understand the term, as applied to the Apostles? Some assign as the sense, 'Set them apart unto the promulgation of thy truth' (i. e. the Word of the Gospel, 'which (it is then added by way of explanation) is the Truth.' Others, 'Sanctify them (namely, by cleansing them from sin, and freeing them from the power of sin, through the operation of the Holy Spirit) unto the promulgation of thy Faith.' This latter interpretation is preferable, as being called for by the fact, that the Apostles required far more than to be set apart to the ministry: not to say that in the term itself there seems an allusion to the Πνεῦμα ἁγίου, the all-efficacious Agent in the matter. And this use of the word, 'to sanctify,' 'consecrate,' is of frequent occurrence both in the Sept. and the New Test., as 1 Thes. v. 23. In this sense I must finally acquiesce; and still more as to the term in the next verse, ἁγιάζω ἑμαυτὸν. But the distinction in the use of the same term, as applied to the disciples, and to our Lord, is to be carefully marked. As to the former, they were, in the strict sense, 'to be sanctified,' 'made holy,' by the above means, and were set apart for their holy function by a long course of preparatory training. As to the latter, no setting apart, much less training, was necessary; the self-consecration of our Lord being immediate and complete, by his entire submission to the will of Him whom he addresses as ἅγιε Πάτερ. The words following, ἡγιασμένοι ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, must be explained in the same manner as those at ver. 17, ἁγιάσον αὐτοὺς ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ σου, q. d. 'that they also may be sanctified and consecrated to the discharge of their sacred office.' Meaning, not only that they should have in Christ an example of this devoted service, but that they should be sanctified and consecrated thereto by the effect of Christ sanctifying himself. For, as Calvin well remarks, 'our Lord thus points out the fountain from whence flows that sanctification, conveyed to us through the teaching of the Gospel [and the aid of the Spirit, Ed.],—namely, because he hath consecrated himself unto the Father, that his holiness might reach unto us.'

20—26. Now commences the concluding portion of the prayer, on the scope of which a considerable difference of opinion exists; not only as to the persons who may be supposed to be objects of this prayer, but, still more, whether what is here said should be referred to Christians of that age, or of all ages. And according as either of these views be adopted, so have the leading terms, δέξαι, &c., been interpreted. It should seem that by τῶν πιστευόντων (which all the best Editors are agreed is to be read instead of πιστευούσων, and which I find in almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies) are meant not only the believers in general of that age (as distinguished from the Apostles), but (the term being proleptic) those of every age to the end of time, even all who should be converted by the Gospel of Christ, the foundation of which was laid by the Apostles.

At ver. 21 our Lord prays that they may be kept in God's name, and sanctified in his truth; also that they may be united to each other and to God, by a union as close as that which subsists between the Father and the Son (see x. 30, and note, and 1 John i. 3), i. e. in being of one mind, will, and purpose, being united to the Father and the Son by the Holy Spirit, proceeding from both Persons, working in them.

—ἵνα ὁ κόσμος—μὴ ἀπίστευται. The exact scope of these words has been discussed at large by Expositors, espec. by Thom. Aquin., Maldonat., and Lampe; but to no very good purpose. The same may be said of the recent foreign Expositors; the truth being in the one case overstated, and in the other all but lost amidst false distinctions and fine-spun sophistry. The simple truth meant to be put forth by our Lord seems to be this:—'So that the world, mankind in general, of every age, may be induced to believe that Thou hast sent me; so that, as many as need it, may be brought to conversion, and to the embracing of the truth as it is in Jesus.' The ἵνα points at the result and tendency of this unity among each other of believers; q. d. 'It will be an evidence of the truth of Christianity, and, by recommending it to the world at large, be a means of bringing many to embrace it.' Very weighty is the following remark of Euthym. :—οὐδὲν γὰρ οὕτως ἐμελλεν ἐμποδίζεσθαι τῇ κηρύγματι, ὥς τὸ διεσχίσθαι τοὺς κήρυκας, τῇ τε διαφορᾷ τῆς πίστεως, καὶ τῇ πρὸς ἀλλήλους ἀπειθείᾳ ἐπειδὴ, μαχομένῳ, ἐρού-

At ver. 22 a difference of opinion exists as to who are the persons prayed for. Some say, Christians in general; others, the Apostles. And each class of Expositors interpret the δόξαν there according to their respective views; the former understanding it of the reward laid up in heaven for the righteous. But thus, it is urged on the other side, the expression δέδωκα will have to be taken for δώσω, which is the more harsh, as δίδωκε, the next word but one, cannot but be taken in a preterite sense. They, therefore, suppose by δόξαν to be meant 'such a part of Christ's mediatorial glory, imparted to them by the Holy Spirit, as was suitable to the purposes they were to accomplish, including, of course, the working of miracles in establishment of the truth of the Gospel.' Accordingly, they take the next words, ἵνα ὥσι τετελειωμένοι, &c., to advert to the mode of exercising such high gifts, —namely, with that perfect union with themselves, and with the Father and the Son, which exists between the Father and the Son. This, however, is a most facetious sense, and not at all agreeable to the context. Nor is the difficulty involved in the enallage of tense so great as to need being removed in so violent a manner. We have only to suppose that our Lord here spoke by anticipation, by adverting to a thing future as if past. Most harsh, indeed, were it to suppose the subject in this verse to be different from that in the two preceding ones. The persons here meant were, it should seem, faithful Christians in general, and in all ages. As to the δόξα here, I am now induced to adopt the view taken by Lücke and Stier, very nearly the same as what I formerly adduced from Lampe, namely, that it is the glory of Christ, 'as the only begotten Son' (supra i. 14) full of grace and truth,' which, by virtue of his exaltation, and the unity of believers through the Spirit, will be theirs.

²³ ἐγὼ ἐν αὐτοῖς—ἐμοί] Expressing, as Stier and Alf. point out, not so much the similarity of their unity to that of the Father and the Son, as its actual existence by Christ abiding in them, and the Father in Christ. So Euthym., after Chrys., well explains it to mean, 'Ἐγὼ ἐν αὐτοῖς μένω, καὶ σὺ ἐν ἐμοί· τοῦτ' ἐστίν, ἐγὼ καὶ σὺ ἐν αὐτοῖς μένωμεν.' Theophyl., too, explains it, ἐγὼ ἐν αὐτοῖς εἰμι, σὺ δὲ πᾶν ἔχω ἐν ἐμαυτῷ ὥστε καὶ σὺ ἐν αὐτοῖς εἶσαι. But Euthym. suggests an important distinction proper to be made, remarking, 'Ἀλλ' ἐγὼ μὲν ἐν αὐτοῖς θιασπερῶν (Divino modo) διὰ τὴν πίστιν· σὺ δὲ ἐν ἐμοί πατροπρωτῶς (paterno modo) διὰ τὴν φύσιν. With the phrase τετελ. eis ἐν, comp. 1 John ii. 5. iv. 12, 18. From which it seems to be a locutio pragmatica, meaning, 'that they may be perfectly united into (so as to form) one Body, made of that perfect union which subsists between Me and Thee.' Of course γινώσκῃ must denote that complete knowledge which results from Faith founded on full conviction. And we must mark, that here, and in the parallel passages, supra xiii. 35. xiv. 31, this union is bound up in Love, as GOD is Love.

At ver. 25 there is manifestly a transition to the Apostles; the οὗτοι being said δεικτικῶς. Our Lord finally commends them to the care and protection of the Father.

²⁴ Θέλω ἵνα, &c.] The expression θέλω may best be rendered 'celim, I would;' for there is no reason to suppose that more was meant than that ferveat and importunate desire for the glorification of his faithful followers, which dictated the present Prayer itself.

²⁵ Ὁ Πάτερ δίκαιε] The full force of the epithet δίκαιε, here used emphaticè, is ably drawn forth by Lampe, and also its suitability pointed out, which may be expressed popularly, with Matt. Henry, thus:—'When our Lord prayed that his disciples might be sanctified, he calls him "Holy Father;" when he prays that they might be glorified, he calls him "Righteous Father;" for it is a crown of righteousness which the righteous Judge shall give. God's righteousness was engaged for the bestowing of all that Good, which the Father had promised, and the Son had purchased.' Accordingly what I have said on the accommodation at ἀγνι, v. 11, quite applies here. As to the ὁ κόσμος σε οὐκ ἔγνω, I do not see how the righteousness of God can (as Alf. says) be witnessed by that. The clause is brought in as put in contrast with the next; and the plea urged for the disciples is (as Matt. Henry says) to show that the disciples greatly needed what Christ prays for, because of the necessity of their work, and its extreme difficulty—that of bringing light to those who shut their eyes to the light. Thus we may express the sense in paraphrase thus:—'Righteous Father, the world hath not known Thee [as I know, and have known and manifested Thee and thy counsels]; but these (meaning the disciples present) have known, and do know, that Thou hast sent me; therefore, preserve and support them!' On the expression οὐκ ἔγνω, see supra viii. 27, 28.

XVIII. 1—11. Matt. xxvi. 48—56. Mark xiv. 43—52. Luke xxii. 48—53. The Evangelist now proceeds to record the Passion of our Lord, touching lightly on what had been recorded by the preceding Evangelists, and adding certain circumstances omitted by them; thus strongly confirming the truth of what had been before written, and, in the circumstances which he himself records, plainly taking that truth for granted. (Lampe.)

1. χειμάρρου] A poetic expression; χειμάρρος being properly applied as an epithet to ποταμός, and also used as a substantive, to denote a winter-torrent that flows in the rainy season only, and is dry in summer; which is the case with Cedron, of which Dr. Robinson says that it is always dry, except in the rainy season after very heavy rains.

— τοῦ Κέδρων] So for text. rec. τῶν Κέδρων I have edited with Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., and Alf., from 3 uncial and 1 or 2 cursive MSS., 5 of the important Versions, and some Fathers, and Joseph. Antt. viii. 5, l. ix. 7, 3, confirmed by internal evidence. The mistake might easily have arisen from the scribes not understanding the form as an indeclinable noun, formed from the Hebr. קֶדְרוֹן, alluding to the dark colour of the stream. The argument for the text. rec. derived from the occurrence of τῶν Κέδρων in two passages of the Sept. is of no force, since the scribes were as likely to make the mistake there, as the scribes here; and I doubt not that τοῦ Κέδρων will be found in some of the copies. That Matthæi should have so strenuously, though unsuccessfully, maintained the reading of the text. rec. can only be accounted for from his acting too often under the influence of prejudice. As to Tisch. retaining the text. rec., I would not ascribe it, with Alf., to pedantry, for there is no ostentation of ponderous learning, which he possesses not, in so doing. It arose, probably, from mere caprice, and a wish to show himself wiser than Lachm.; though, in fact, it merely affords another signal proof, to the very many he had before shown, of his want of true critical sagacity, especially by his incompetency to weigh the force of internal evidence. I cannot, indeed, add a single MS. of either the Lamb. or Mus. copies in confirmation of the reading τοῦ Κέδρων, but from the false reading in the MS. D, τοῦ Κίδρον, a slip of the scribe, we may infer that τ. Κέδρον was an itacism for Κ—ων.

As to the κήπος (called Gethsemane) it was a plot of ground probably occupied partly by olives (hence its name), and partly as a garden, or nursery, and was probably provided with a cottage for the occasional sojourn of the κηπουρός, xx. 15, doubtless friendly to, if not a disciple of, Jesus. As to the situation; the plot of ground now pointed out seems to be the true site, because it is the same as that ascertained as early as A.D. 326 at the desire of the Empress Helena. The position fixed by Euseb., πρὸς τὰ ὄρη τῶν Ἐλαιῶν, is confirmed by Luke xxi. 37, εἰς τὸ ὄρος, though its actual site seems to have been a little way up the rise of the Mount.

3. τὴν σπείραν] This term, as meaning lit. 'a band of men,' might denote a military detachment; but, from the circumstances of the case, we may suppose it to have been a small detachment from the Roman cohort which garrisoned the Castle of Antonia at the great Festivals, to preserve order. From the use of the Article it would seem that the band consisted of the detachment from the cohort then on duty at the Temple, and placed at the disposition of the High Priest and his colleagues for any emergency that might arise.

— μετὰ φανῶν καὶ λαμπ.] Here some misconception has arisen, for want of due discrimination between the terms φανῶν and λαμπ. The best founded view seems to be this—that λαμπάς never signified 'a lantern,' but only 'a lamp, or torch;' also that φανός, while it originally signified 'a torch,' came afterwards to mean 'a lantern;' not, however, such as is now in use, but merely a rude utensil to hold or keep in a light; such, in fact, as those travelling lanterns, described as now in use in the East by Pococke and Niebuhr, cited in Parkh. Lex.—λαμπ. here, and also in Rev. viii. 10, and Judg. xv. 4, 5, Sept. Plato, p. 372. Hdtan. iv. 2, 20, signifies torches. That both lanterns and torches were in use among soldiers, appears from Dionys. Hal. ix. 40 (cited by Lampe and Wetstein) ἱστῶντες ἅπαντες ἐκ τῶν σκεπνῶν ἀδρόσι, φανούς ἔχοντες καὶ λαμπάδας. It was, indeed, usual for such corps as the one in question (which was a corps on guard) to carry (as in the present instance) both arms and lanterns, or torches. So Thucyd. iii. 23, speaking of the piquet-guard of the Peloponnesians, says, καὶ ἐν τούτῳ οἱ τριακόσιοι αὐτοῖς ἠνεφύοντο λαμπάδας ἔχοντες. In proof of the extreme antiquity of the custom, I would refer my reader to Sir G. Wilkinson's Ancient Egypt, vol. iii. p. 113, where there is a copy of a sculpture found at Alabastron in Egypt (above 3000 years old), which represents a guard of soldiers, seemingly a piquet-guard, one of whom, in the front rank, and seemingly the leader, holds in his hands a battle-hatchet and a small lantern, very much like our night-lantern, hung at the end of a stick with a bend at top, from which the lantern is suspended.

4. On εἰδὼς πάντ. τὰ ἐρχ., see note on Matt. xxvi. 48. Ἐξελθὼν is not so much for προσελθ. (the more usual term in Class. writers), as used, probably with reference to some kind of bowyer in the garden, whither our Lord had retired for prayer, and from which he issued in order to meet those who came to apprehend him.

6. ἀπῆλθον—ἔπισσον χαμαί] In accounting for the effect thus produced on the soldiers, the earlier and the more recent modern Commentators take very different views. The former here suppose miraculous agency; the latter, with the exception of Tittman, recognize none, attributing the circumstance to the natural awe of the soldiers at the sight of so celebrated a Person; in confirmation they adduce what they call parallel instances from various ancient writers; Val. Max. ii. 19, 3. Arrian, Exp. Alex. v. p. 314. Those, however, are cases of quite another kind; and the mode in which they account for the occurrence is very unsatisfactory. Their supposition, that this falling to the ground was an act of reverence, is quite gratuitous, and devoid of probability. If we confine ourselves simply to the plain words, and consider the actual circumstances of the case, we can hardly fail to see that something is here suggested far surpassing the ordinary, and rising to the preternatural. There is little reason to doubt but that an undefinable, but supernatural, power was exercised, such as in many similar instances recorded in Holy Writ; as, for example, that at Acts ix. 4, where the persecuting Saul is described as being 'struck to the earth' as θεόμαχος, as well as struck with blindness. Mr. Alf. is put to great straits to know how to deal with this passage, so that, after first saying that he believes the occurrence to have been the result of the superhuman dignity of our Lord's person, and the majestic calmness of his reply, he, a little farther on, says he regards it rather as a miracle consequent upon what Christ said and did, than as wrought by him. A most jesuitical distinction, to which he never would have resorted, except from being in a complete puzzle, from which he might have been spared by considering that we are not called upon to explain the how as respects the fact. The air of the passage plainly points at the supernatural; and accordingly this is no fit occasion for a minister of the Gospel to weave fine-spun sophisms, since the passage is one of those many, where it is folly curiously to inquire, and presumption to determine.

9. Ἵνα πληρωθῇ, &c.] 'So that thus was made good, or verified, the words' of xvii. 12.

10. μάχαιραν] Denoting, not so much 'a sword,' as the short falcion (lit. 'battle-knife,' as opposed to the domestic knife) worn by the side of the sword, and used to cut, as the other was chiefly to thrust. See Hom. II. γ. 271, and Hdt. ii. 61.

—ἔπαισε τὸν—δούλον] By the δούλος of the High Priest is, I agree with Mr. Green, meant, κατ' ἐξοχὴν, 'one who was at the head of the Jewish officials, and who, from being on that account conspicuous, was singled out by Peter.'

11. τὴν μάχ. σου] The Pronoun is absent from all the most ancient uncials, and very many cursives (to which I add 6 of the most ancient Lamb., and many of the Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16 and 17), and is cancelled by Lachm. and Tisch., also by Alf., who traces its origin to the parallel passage of Matth. But internal evidence draws two ways; for it was quite as likely to have been thrown out by the ancient Critics, to improve the Grecism. And when we consider that St. John was more likely to use the pronoun than (as pure Grecism might require) to leave it understood, we can scarcely doubt its genuineness, espec. since most of the ancient MSS., which omit the σου, omit it also at the passage of Matth.; indeed, the same Family of MSS. very often omit the σου. This sometimes happens from the variety in position of the word.

54. The interrogation, accompanied with a double negation, involves a strong affirmation, and the whole is expressive of perfect acquiescence in the will of his Father.

12—24. Portion peculiar to John, and narrating what I now consider as the preliminary hearing of our Lord before Annas.

15. καὶ ὁ ἄλλος μαθητής] Here no little difficulty has been found, to account for the Article. To regard it, with many, as redundant, rather evades than removes the difficulty; and to cancel it, with Erasmus, Bengel, and Vater, is most rash, because the evidence for its omission is so very slight, only that of four MSS.; and that of Versions is but slender. Indeed, as Bp. Middleton observes, 'it is far easier to account for the omission of the Article in a few of the MSS., supposing it to be authentic, than for its insertion in almost all of them, supposing it to be spurious; for the apparent difficulty which might operate as an inducement in the one case, would be a powerful discouragement in the other.' We must therefore retain the present reading, and explain as we best may. Now almost all Commentators, ancient and modern, are agreed that by the other disciple the Evangelist means himself; and with reason: for though Grotius, Lampe, and Pearce deny this, they are as unsuccessful in proving it not to have been St. John, as they are in fixing on any other disciple. The Evangelist never mentions himself by name, and yet he has described the whole of what took place in the hall of Annas, &c., so circumstantially, that we cannot but conclude that he was, as ecclesiastical tradition attests, present. 'Supposing, then (remarks Bp. Middleton), that St. John himself is meant by ὁ ἄλλος μαθητής, it may not be impossible to assign something like a plausible reason why he should call himself the other disciple.' This phrase (continues the learned Prelate) obviously implies the remaining one of two persons, who not only were, in common with many others, disciples of Christ, but between whom some still closer relation might be recognized to exist; and if it could be shown that Peter and John stood towards each other in any such relation, the term the other disciple might not unfitly be used, immediately after the mention of Peter, to designate John; espec. if, from any cause whatever, John was not to be spoken of by name. Now it does appear that a particular, and even exclusive friendship, existed between Peter and John. The same expression, ὁ ἄλλος μαθ., occurs in John xx. 2, 3, 4, 8; from which it may be inferred that this phrase, when accompanied with the mention of Peter, was readily, in the earliest period of Christianity, understood to signify John. This I find confirmed by the suffrage of Mr. Green, p. 224, who, after adducing the three circumlocutions used by John, to avoid the mention of his own name, remarks that the one here employed must have been intelligible to those whom he addressed, as being familiarly applied to him; though, from what circumstances this arose must ever remain unknown. The subsequent words, ὁ δὲ μαθ. ἴκ. ἦν γνωστός τῷ ἀρχ., repeated at the next verse, were applied to show how it happened that a person in so comparatively humble a station, should have got admittance to the high-priest's private apartment. Now γνωστός may mean simply 'known to;' but it may also mean 'an acquaintance of,' as in Æschyl. Choeph. 706. Soph. Herm. Ps. lxxvii. 8. Neh. v. 10; and this is demanded by the expression in the next verse, γνωστός τοῦ ἀρχιερέως, if at least the reading of the most ancient MSS., as edited by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., be, as it may be, the true reading.

16. τῇ θυρωρῇ] This office, though it was among the Greeks and Romans confined to men, was, in the greater simplicity of Jewish manners, chiefly exercised by maid-servants.

18. εἰστίκεισαν δὲ οἱ δοῦλοι, &c.] Render: 'Now the servants and the officers were standing (having made a fire of charcoal [in a chafing-dish], for it was cold) and warming themselves; and Peter was standing by and warming himself.' Εἰστ. is Pluperf. for Imperf., as often in the best writers from Homer downwards. So Luke xvi. 20, εἰβίβλητο. In this way, too, it is rendered by all the ancient and the best modern Latin Translators; though, I believe, by no English one. Ἀνθρ. must, from the nature of the case, have the full sense above expressed. Certainly the fuel (ἀνθρακιά) was not coal, but charcoal. So Plutarch, Or. Mor. p. 693, A. (cited by Wetstein), ὁ σοφὸς Ἀναξαγόρας—ἰπνύνει τὴν ἀνθρακίαν (commended the invention of the chafing-dish) ὅτι καπνὸν ἔξω καταλιπώντες, οἰκάδε πῦρ κομίζουσιν. And so Hippocrates and other writers use ἀνθρακιά to denote a chafing-dish with the charcoal in it; which (though Commentators have failed to perceive it) is certainly the sense infra xxi. 9, βλῖπουσιν ἀνθρακίαν κειμένην, as is plain from the κειμένην, which means set or placed, according to the use of the word in the best writers. So Herodot. i. 181, κλίνη κίσται, and iv. 81, κίσται χαλκήϊον. There, however, the Translators have so little understood the import of κειμένην, that they have most of them passed it over; and some Critics have conjectured καιομένην, but needlessly. Finally, I have placed the words ἀνθρακίαν πεποικότες, ὅτι ψύχος ἦν, in a parenthesis, by which the sense is much cleared. Certainly there ought to be a stop after ὑπηρέται, though not one of the Editors has seen this, except R. Stephens. That, indeed, is evident from πεποικότες standing, as it does, without the Article.

²¹ For ἐπερωτᾷς and ἐπερώτησον, Lachm. and Tisch. edit, from several uncial and cursive MSS., ἐρωτᾷς and ἐρωτήσων; while Mr. Alford edits ἐρωτ. and ἐπαρωτ., a course certainly wrong; the other not certainly, but probably, right, as will appear from note on Mark viii. 25.

²² ράπισμα] See note at Matt. xxvi. 67.

classical, and is confined, besides the New Test., to the Sept., where it occurs several times.

29. ἐξῆλθ. οὖν ὁ Πιλ.] 'Pilate, accordingly, went out to them;' i. e. because they could not go in to him, for the reason just mentioned.

30. εἰ μὴ ἦν—σοι.] We may remark a sort of pertness in the answer, occasioned, probably, by their chagrin at finding themselves disappointed in their object; which was to bring Jesus there for condemnation, not for trial; as they found, by Pilate's preliminary interrogation, was going to be the case. In this point of view Pilate's answer (31) is quite suitable.

31. λάβετε αὐτόν ὑμεῖς.] 'Take ye him and punish him;' q. d. 'I cannot do a thing so unheard of in the Roman law, as to condemn a person unheard.' The words ἡμῖν οὐκ ἐξεστίν, &c., involve the long-disputed question, whether the Jews had still the power of inflicting capital punishments, or whether it had been taken away. This has of late been more deeply investigated than heretofore, and more ably handled by Lücke, vol. ii. p. 736, and espec. by Friedlieb in his History of Christ's Passion, § 31, who, after disentangling much of the perplexity which had before enveloped the subject, has presented the most lucid and coherent account yet propounded of the matter as follows:—'In the Roman Provinces generally the Proprætor, or Proconsul, conducted judicial proceedings. But Judea, which belonged to the province of Syria, was an exception. There was a Proprætor cum potestate, who exercised the right of judicial cognizance. Jerusalem, however, possessed the privilege of judging all lighter causes before the three-and-twenty, and heavier causes, with the sole exception of judicia de capite, before the great Sanhedrim; so that none but those reserved cases remained for the Procurator. Pilate seems to have judged these cases at his visits during the Festivals; which would fall conveniently for the purpose, it being the custom in Jerusalem to execute great criminals at the Feasts.'

32. Ἦν ὁ λόγος—πληρωθῆ, &c.] Some of the Commentators are of opinion that the sense is: 'Thus was made good the words, &c. But it is not necessary to deviate from the usual import of this formula; for, as our Lord had predicted the manner of his death (Matt. xx. 19. xxvi. 2. John xii. 32, sq.), so, as Biscoe remarks, the meaning of what is here said seems to be, that the Jews themselves, however unwittingly, fulfilled this prophecy when they declined passing sentence on Jesus by their own law; crucifixion being not a Jewish, but a Roman punishment. Had the Jews asked permission to execute Jesus as a violator of their law, they would have obtained it; in which case he would have been stoned as a blasphemer; and thus his prophecy, that he should die by crucifixion, would not have been fulfilled.

34. ἀφ' ἐαυτοῦ.] 'proprio motu;' meaning, 'from thy own knowledge or suspicion of my having been concerned in seditious practices, or from the suggestion of others,' as was really the case. See Luke xxiii. 2.

35. μήτι ἐγὼ Ἰουδαῖός, &c.] The full sense is well expressed by Kuinoel in the following paraphrase: 'No; I have not asked thee of my own thought from private reflection; I have found nothing hitherto in thee which would afford any colour to such a charge as thine enemies advance; but it does not hence follow that thou art innocent. Of thy guilt or innocence I know nothing. I am not a Jew, to know or care about such things as are involved in the charge of thine accusers. It is on the representations of thy countrymen and the Chief Priests that I examine thee. What hast thou done to afford ground for this accusation?'

36. ἡ βασιλεία, &c.] The full sense is ['I am a king, it is true, but] my kingdom is not a temporal one [but entirely spiritual]. If my kingdom had been of this world, I should have collected about me vast numbers of my countrymen. These would have defended me against the attacks of my Jewish adversaries. But as I have done nothing of this sort, it is plain that my kingdom is not of such a nature as at all interferes with earthly governments, or affords any colour to this charge of sedition.

— σὺ λέγεις, &c.] The full sense is, 'Thou sayest that I am a king; it is very true: I am a king.' Σὺ λέγεις signifies it is so; a phrase of entire assent and affirmation. The formula is quite Jewish, and often found in the Rabbinical writers. Our Lord now proceeds to show the nature of his kingdom, and in what sense he is a king. He is come, not to reign, but to bear witness to the truth; meaning, that of the Gospel, to promote, confirm, and establish it. The introductory expressions are worthy of note. By adding to εἰς τοῦτο γένειν, implying that he was born to this Kingship, the other words καὶ εἰς τοῦτο ἐλήλυθα εἰς τὸν κ., there is not a confirmation of his incarnation, but a plain intimation (such as we often find) that he came into the world from another state of being.

— ἵνα μαρτυρήσω τῇ ἀληθείᾳ] For illustration of this peculiar phrase, comp. supra v. 33. xvii. 17, in both of which passages by τῇ ἀληθείᾳ is meant 'the truth in its full reality'; and by ὁ τῆς ἀληθ., just after is meant not, as several recent Expositors explain, 'he who is a true dealer with his own heart,' but, as at 1 John iii. 19, 'he who holds this absolute truth in its utmost fullness, and especially as regards that primary one of God and his Son Jesus Christ, and all that they have designed and done for the salvation of Man,' as at viii. 31. xiv. 6, 17. xv. 26. xvi. 15.

³⁸ τί ἐστὶν ἀλήθεια;] The exact force of this question has been disputed. Some take the meaning to be: 'What is truth to me? what care I about truth?' Yet this,—besides being a sense not fairly to be elicited from the words,—is such as involves great improbability. For though, from the account Josephus gives of Pilate (whose administration he represents as one continued series of venality, rapine, tyranny, cruelty, and whatever could disgrace a ruler, whether in his judicial or magisterial character), it cannot be imagined that he cared at all about truth; yet that he should have chosen thus openly to disclaim all regard to it, cannot well be supposed. It should rather seem that by this question, 'What is truth?' he meant to say (with a reference to the endless disputations of Philosophers on the subject), 'Ay, but what is truth? Can it ever be found?'

To this question, which, however, was not really such, since it involves a strong negation, our Lord, knowing the spirit in which it was put, gave no answer; and Pilate, not caring to receive any, 'again went forth to the Jews.'

³⁹, ⁴⁰. Now follow the transactions recorded in Luke xxiii. 5, seqq. and Matt. xxvii. 12, seqq. What is related here and in Matt. xxvii. 15, seqq. Luke xxiii. 14, seq. and Mark xv. 8, took place after Herod had sent Jesus back to Pilate. See the note on Luke xxiii. 16. Matt. xxvii. 15.

XIX. 1. ἔλαβεν—καὶ ἐμαστύγ.] How it came to pass that Pilate directed this scourging, and with what purpose, appears from Luke xxiii. 21—23, where it would seem that the order was prompted by a merciful intention; and, therefore, this scourging ought not to be regarded as the usual scourging preliminary to capital punishment.

δαίων! καὶ ἐδίδουν αὐτῷ ῥαπίσματα. ⁴ Ἐξῆλθεν οὖν πάλιν ἔξω ὁ Πιλάτος, καὶ λέγει αὐτοῖς· Ἴδε, ἄγω ὑμῖν αὐτὸν ἔξω, ἵνα γνῶτε ὅτι ἐν αὐτῷ οὐδεμίαν αἰτίαν εὗρίσκω. ⁵ (Ἐξῆλθεν οὖν ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἔξω, φορῶν τὸν ἀκάνθινον στέφανον καὶ τὸ πορφυροῦν ἱμάτιον.) Καὶ λέγει αὐτοῖς· Ἴδε, ὁ ἄνθρωπος. ⁶ ^b Ὅτε οὖν ^b Ἰσὼς 2. 12. εἶδον αὐτὸν οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς καὶ οἱ ὑπηρέται, ἐκραύγασαν λέγοντες· Σταύρωσον, σταύρωσον! Λέγει αὐτοῖς ὁ Πιλάτος· Λάβετε abandoned. I suspect that they were brought in by Critics, who thought that they would make the narrative more graphic, and that they introduced the words as being suggested by Matt. xxvii. 29, and also by the phrase προεῖλον. τιμὴν εἶπε in Matt. iv. 3. Mark xiv. 45. Luke xxiii. 52. John xii. 21. Acts ix. 1. However I know not a single example of ἐρχομαι πρὸς αὐτόν, for προσέρχεται αὐτῷ. It is quite incredible that the words should, as Alf. pronounces, have been 'erased, because not understood;' since the meaning is abundantly clear. As to 'the mock reverential approach,' which Mr. Alf. says the words denote, that was evidently in the mind of the above-mentioned Critics who thought it would complete the picture.

4. ἔξῆλθ. οὖν πάλιν. ἔξω] Here οὖν marks sequence, denoting continuation, and may be rendered 'thereupon;' for want of seeing which, and to remove a tautology with the beginning of the next verse, some ancient Critics (as we find from A, B, K, L, X, and a few cursives) changed οὖν into καὶ, which was injudiciously adopted by Lachm. Other Critics were content with removing the οὖν (as we find from D and a few cursives), which was cancelled by Tisch., Ed. 1, but restored in Ed. 2. The καὶ was adopted by Alf. in his first Ed., but rejected and the οὖν restored in his second. 'En Criticorum nostrorum levitatem!' It is, however, of more importance to consider the debated question, with what intent Pilate came forth again to the Jewish assemblage, and pronounced the words ἴδε, ὁ ἄνθρωπος! Many Commentators think it was to excite the pity of the multitude; while others recognize in this a purposed mockery, and an act of derision. It is, indeed, difficult to pronounce on a question like this, where we have such scanty means of judgment; but the latter view seems quite inadmissible, for it does not seem to have been the wish, as it could not be the interest, of Pilate to insult the Jewish authorities. The former is the best founded view. Pilate had, it seems, hoped he should satisfy the multitude (if not the Priests and Scribes) by the infliction of ignominious corporal punishment, and the permission of personal degradation the most extreme. I am induced to think that in bringing Jesus forward to the people, the words of introduction were meant to excite pity, intimating that the miserable Object of their persecution had already suffered enough, and was sunk too low to render any further proceedings against him as an Impostor unnecessary, seeing that he was already 'a broken idol.' And as pity so readily accompanies contempt, so might contempt introduce pity.

6. σταύρωσον, σταύρωσον] In very many MSS.,—including most of the Lamb. and Mus.

copies,—Versions, Fathers, and early Editions, is added αὐτόν, which is received by almost every Editor from Weist. to Scholz. But it is so difficult to account for its omission in far more than half of the MSS. (many of them very ancient), and so easy to account for its insertion, that I dare not follow their example. In such kind of exclamations the pronoun is often omitted. Out of very many examples which I could adduce, one must suffice: Pseudo-Eurip. Rhes. 685, Παῖε, παῖε.

—λάβετε αὐτόν ὑμεῖς] These words must not be taken, with many Expositors, as a real permission to crucify Jesus, for, besides that Pilate knew that crucifixion was not a Jewish punishment, that permission was not given till afterwards (v. 16). The words are merely those of vexation at the attempt to make him a tool of their malice and hostility, which he thus refuses to be; q. d. 'I will be no party to such a proceeding; I can be none, seeing that, as I have formally announced, I find no fault in him; i. e. as to the crime which you lay to his charge,—of stirring up rebellion' (see supra xviii. 38). That the Jews themselves did not consider Pilate's words as a permission to crucify Jesus, is plain, since they now wave their former charge, and put forth that which they had held back at first, lest Pilate should decline to entertain such a charge,—namely, blasphemy; implying that, though Jesus might not have been guilty of any capital crime according to the Roman law, yet he had committed an offence against the Jewish law, by which his life was forfeited. In saying 'by our law,' they alluded to such passages of the Pentateuch as Lev. xxiv. 16. Deut. xiii. 11. xviii. 20, which denounce death on all pretenders to a Divine mission. However, in preferring this charge of blasphemy, they, by using the words ἔαυτόν ὕψιν Θεοῦ ἰσθίσειν, only increased the alarm which had already arisen in Pilate's mind; and the name ὕψιν Θεοῦ might remind him of the ominous message he had received from his wife. Pilate had already started back from taking Jesus' life, from a full persuasion of his innocence; and though his feeling might not amount to a true fear of acting unjustly, yet, such as it was, it was greatly increased, so as to become a feeling of awe at One who claimed to be superhuman. Hence his question to Jesus (v. 9) on re-entering the Prætorium, πῶς εἰ σὺ; which cannot mean, as some Expositors suppose, 'of what country art thou?' for he knew him to be from Galilee; nor, as others, 'What is thy descent and parentage?' for that were nothing to the purpose; but, 'What is thy real origin? Is it super-human, and connected with a Divine nature?' But, whether Pilate so understood the expression ὕψιν Θεοῦ (for I would now, with all the Critical Editors, remove τοῦ, which I find absent from almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies), or not, certain it is that the two appellations by which the Saviour of Israel was called, namely, Messiah (which implied, they thought, Kingship), and Son of God (which expressed his Divine nature and union with God), afforded the Chief Priests an opportunity of shifting the charge as they found it suited their purpose, that of pressing the charge either of sedition, or of blasphemy. As to Pilate's interrogation, our Lord was pleased to return no answer, inasmuch as his conduct did not entitle him to any; and, partly, because an answer to the interrogation, in the usual acceptation of the words, Pilate could scarcely need; and in any other sense it would have been little intelligible to him, and have only led to further questions,—all superfluous, since our Lord knew that he had made up his mind to deliver him up to the fury of the Jews.

11. By δεδομένος ἀνωθεν is meant 'something decreed in the divine counsels,' or 'something coming to pass by the determinate counsel of God.' Acts ii. 23. Comp. James i. 17, ἀνωθεν ἰστί, and see supra iii. 31, also Ἐλιαν, cited by Wetstein, καὶ ταῦτα μὴν λόγῳν ἰστί δῶρα φύσεως, ἀνωθεν αὐτοῖς δοθέντα. The full sense of the passage is this, 'Thou couldst have no such power, as thou hast, over me [being such a One as I am], except it were permitted thee from on high—for some special purpose of Divine Providence—to exercise this power; accordingly (such being the case) he who delivered me up to thee for condemnation (i. e. the High Priest and his colleagues) is more guilty of the sin (than thou, who art the instrument of their malice).' How great their sin was, is evident; inasmuch as they had deliberately erred, with God's own word before them; thus closing their eyes to the light.

12. This penetrating insight into his thoughts, and candid judgment of his conduct, seems to have much affected Pilate for the moment, and (ἀκ τούτου, 'from this time') he henceforward seriously studied how to save Jesus. The Jews, however, perceiving that he was studying every method of releasing Jesus, and paid little attention to their second charge of blasphemy,—as not falling under his cognizance,—now return to their first alleged crime, which especially belonged to the Procurator, namely, that of sedition, and treason against Caesar.

—οὐκ εἰ φίλος τοῦ Κ. J.] 'thou art not well affected to Caesar.' So Arrian, Epict. iii. 26. τὸ Καίσαρος μὴ εἶναι φίλον. Jos. Antt. xiv. 8. 1. The implied threat was not to be despised, espec. under Tiberius, who, as we learn from Suetonius and Tacitus, was most suspicious, and punished with death any offence that bordered on the crimen læsæ majestatis, which he regarded as 'omnium accusationum complementum.'

—πάν ὁ βασιλέα α. π.] Render: 'Whoever maketh himself king,' i. e. 'setteth up for,' 'represents himself as.' So viii. 53, τίνα σιαυτὸν σὺ ποιεῖς;—Ὁ ἀντιλέγει τ. Κ. the lit. sense is, 'gainsays,' 'opposes his claim to allegiance,' = 'is Caesar's opponent, claiming the allegiance due to him.'

13. ἐκάθισεν] A forensic term, signifying sate for judgment; i. e. 'to pass judgment.' At Λιθόστρωτον supply ἰδαφος, which is expressed in 2 Chron. vii. 3. This was a pavement formed of pieces of marble or stone of various colours; such as were called vermiculata, and tesselata. A sort of luxury which had arisen in the time of Sylla, and had extended even to the most remote provinces. Julius Caesar (as we learn from Sueton., Vit. 46) carried about with him in his expeditions pieces of sawn marble and variegated stone with which to adorn his Prætorium, on which the βῆμα was placed. The fashion seems to have been brought from the East at the Roman conquests in Asia. It had probably long been in use there. So Aristeas, ap. Euseb. Præp. Evang. p. 453, says of the Temple at Jerusalem, τὸ δὲ πᾶν ἰδαφος λιθόστρωτον καθίσταται.

14. παρασκευὴ τοῦ πάσχα] i.e. the eve or vigil of the Sabbath, when preparation for its celebration was made.

— ὥρα δὲ ὥσει ἔκτη] On the seeming discrepancy between this account and that of the other Evangelists, see the note on Mark xv. 25.

— Ἴδε, ὁ βασιλεὺς ὑμῶν] These words, and the subsequent ones, τὸν βασιλέα ὑμῶν σταυρώσω are to be viewed in the same light as those supra 12, but with this difference—that, although they were a natural expression of Pilate's disgust at their flagitious conduct, they may have been selected as being capable of another interpretation, which might tend to ward off even the suspicion of his loyalty to his Sovereign. But, be that as it may, Pilate by so expressing himself drew forth from the Jewish Rulers, as the mouthpiece of the populace, that public and final rejection of Jesus as their King; so expressed as even to recognize the right,—which they all privately disavowed,—of Cæsar to be their king; which, however, brought about the rejection of their nation by God, their only true King, 'the King eternal,' &c. 1 Tim. i. 17.

16. ἀπήγαγον] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. read ἀγαγον, with 6 uncials and many cursives (to which I add all the Lamb. copies but two, and most of the Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16); and, as internal evidence is quite in favour of the word, it may be the true reading, and the other a correction, since ἀπάγειν is the more appropriate term. Yet compound verbs are not unfrequently found changed into the simple by the Scribes.

17. βαστάζων τὸν σταυρόν] As those about to suffer crucifixion were usually obliged to do.

So Artemid. ii. 56, ἵσκει γὰρ καὶ ὁ σταυρὸς θανάτω, καὶ ὁ μέλλων αὐτῷ προσηλουσθῆαι, πρότερον αὐτὸν βαστάζει.

19. τίτλον] Τίτλος answers to the Latin titulus. Thus τίτλος meant simply a board fastened to any thing by way of notification. Here it denotes that board (painted white, with an inscription in black letters) which was fixed up publicly, to indicate the cause of any one's condemnation; see Hesych. in Σαῦς, and Aristoph. Vesp. 848. The custom of affixing these τίτλοι to a malefactor about to be executed, is an Oriental one of the most remote antiquity, and still retained in the East, especially in Turkey, where the τίτλος is called Yafsa, a writing.

22. ὁ γέγραφα, γέγραφα] Mr. Alford here pronounces that the first Perfect denotes the Past Active; the second, that it was 'complete,' 'unalterable.' But this is rather worthy of a pedantic schoolmaster, than of a true Critic, who would not fail to see that the formula was, as Lightfoot long ago pronounced it, and as all judicious Expositors since have regarded it, as a popular mode of expression, denoting a resolution not to alter the thing that has gone out of one's lips. Lightfoot says that it is common in the Rabbinical writers, and adduces examples. It is not confined to the Hebrew, but occurs in all languages (e. gr. 'what is said is said; 'what is done is done'). But it is essential to the very purpose of the expression that the tense thus used here should be taken in the same, and not in two different ways. Here the formula well expresses blunt reproof of meddling interference.

24. ἵνα ἡ γραφή πληρωθῇ] Meaning, as the best Commentators are of opinion, 'Thus was fulfilled the Scripture (i. e. Ps. xxii. 18), which saith.' It has been disputed whether the verse of this Psalm was meant to refer to Christ or not. Most recent Interpreters think it was not; taking it to relate solely to David, and to have reference to the rebellion of Absalom. Thus they regard the words as merely introduced by application and accommodation to the present purpose. But though it be true that the form ἵνα πληρωθῇ ἡ γραφή sometimes means, that such a thing so happened, that this or that passage would appear quite suitable to it; yet as this and other passages of the Psalms cannot be proved to have been fulfilled in the case of David, whereas this, and other parts of the same Psalm, were minutely fulfilled in that of Christ; and, what is more, as the Evangelist plainly regarded the Psalm as prophetic, and the words as fulfilled in Christ, the former view is the only one that can be tolerated; as has been fully proved by Lampe, Hoffm. on the Quotations, vol. i. 268, and Vitring. Sac. vol. i. 419.

26. γύναι] A form of address implying deep respect and affection, as will appear from what is said on John iv. 21.

— ἰδοὺ ὁ υἱός σου] i. e. 'regard him as thy son,' and so just after, ἰδοὺ ἡ μήτηρ σου, 'regard her as thy mother.' Thus commending the two persons, whom he most dearly loved, to the care and affection of each other; as it were, bequeathing his mother to the care of him whom he had loved as a brother, that he might pay to her the affectionate attentions of a son. Compare Lucian, Tox. C. 22, ἀπολαίπῳ Ἀρισταίῳ τὴν μητέρα μου, τρέφειν καὶ γηγορομαῖν.

28. εἰδὼς—ὅτι πάντα ἤδη τετ.] 'knowing that all things (namely, what he had to do and to suffer before death) were now accomplished.'

— ἵνα τελειωθῇ, &c.] Notwithstanding what many recent Commentators allege, it is plain from what Lampe and Hoffm. have urged at large, that the Evangelist did not mean merely to accommodate the passage; but to show that it was prophetic of Christ, and was now fulfilled, at least in its principal scope. As to the argument that the imprecations at ver. 22 et seq. of the Psalm show it not to be prophetic, it is very inconclusive; for it is not necessary to suppose the whole Psalm prophetic of Christ. See note supra ver. 24.

29. σκευὸς οὖν ἔκειτο ὄξους μεστόν· οἱ δὲ πλῆσαντες σπύγγον ὄξους, καὶ ὕδατος περιθ.] Some of the most ancient MSS., and several Versions (as the Ital., Vulg., Coptic, and Sahidic, with some Latin Fathers), read σκευὸς ἔκειτο ὄξους μεστόν· σπύγγον οὖν μεστόν τοῦ ὄξους ὕδατος περιθ., which has been received into the text by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But this is very uncritical. Had the reading been the original one, how, we may ask, could so plain a reading, and with nothing to stumble at, have been altered? whereas the common reading was likely to be tampered with,—and accordingly it was in various respects. Some Critical Revisers cancelled the οὖν as worse than useless (not perceiving its force, which is best represented by our word now), while others transposed it, placing it between σπύγγον and μεστόν; others, again, scrupling at the recurrence of the word ὄξους without the Article, inserted τοῦ, by which the tautology is removed. The same Critics, it seems, stumbled at the expression πλῆσαντες σπύγγον (which, indeed, is so unusual, that I have noted it no where else), and, ingeniously enough, got rid of it and the tautology in ὄξους, by reading σπύγγον οὖν μεστόν τοῦ ὄξους. But after this alteration the καὶ became worse than useless, and accordingly was removed from the text in the same MSS. Upon the whole, nothing is plainer than that the above reading is wholly factitious; and, accordingly, the text. rec. (which I find in all the Lamb. and Mus. copies) is to be retained, as having every mark of truth, external and internal. Its extreme antiquity is attested by the circumstance of its being found in the Pesh. Syr. Version, and all the most ancient MSS., except the B, I, X, for the Alexandrian has it, with only the omission of the οὖν, which was marked as probably to be cancelled by Griesbach; though without any reason, since the particle is used here, as frequently elsewhere in the N. T., especially in the Gospel of St. John (e. g. xii. 1 and 9. xviii. 19, 25, 28, 33. xix. 5, 31. xxi. 5), with a connective and also a transitive force, like igitur in Latin, nun in German, and now in English, as marking (to use the words of Passow) mere external connexion; and thus denoting transition from what precedes to what follows, and thus continuation of what was carried on. On the whole I would render thus: 'Now there was standing by,' or 'placed by,' according to custom (see note on John ii. 6), 'a vessel full of vinegar; whereupon they, having filled a sponge with vinegar, and wound it about a stalk of hyssop, brought it to his mouth,' 'adponerunt ei us ori'; not, as the Vulg. renders, 'obtulerrunt'.

29. ὑσώπῳ περιθέντες] To remove the difficulty which so puzzled the early Expositors to understand how a low and creeping herb like hyssop could yield a stalk long enough to be used as a reed to reach to the mouth of Jesus, we have only to bear in mind that there are several species of the hyssop; one of which (and no doubt the one here meant) has a woody reed-like stalk, sometimes of two feet in length, and which is mentioned by the Rabbinical writers as bound up in bundles for firing. See more in Lightfoot and Schoettg., and in Salmasius' Epist. de Hyssopo, also in Origen, in Comm. Ὑσώπῳ, then, is here put for καλὰμῳ ὑσώπου (hence called by Matthew and Mark καλὰμῳ, as being rough and reedy); and this, if of the length above mentioned, might easily enable a person to reach the mouth of Jesus on the cross, which, as I have shown on Matt. xxvii. 32, was so low, that the feet of the crucified person were not more than a foot and a half from the ground. Περιθέντες signifies 'having put it around,' 'wound it around.' Thus the word is used in the LXX. to express the Hebr. קשר, 'to tie to,' in Prov. vii. 3. And Arist. Theism. 387, uses περιθεῖν for ἐπιθεῖν.

30. τετέλεσται] 'it is accomplished.' This is with reason supposed by some Expositors to refer to what is said at v. 28, where our Lord, perceiving that all the predictions respecting the circumstances attending his death were accomplished except one,—the tasting of the vinegar,—says, 'I thirst.' That prediction accordingly being fulfilled by tasting it, he exclaims, 'It is accomplished;' by which is meant, that all things had been now (by the tasting of the vinegar) accomplished,—had been appointed for him both to do and to suffer. The whole of what our Lord had undertaken was done; all was over; and the τέλος had arrived, as the harbinger to the joy which was set before him at the now all but accomplished work of man's redemption. In so very comprehensive a term as this, there are many bearings in which it would have place (though the above are the principal), for which I must be content to refer my readers to the admirable analytical view of Lampe.

I must not, however, omit to observe, that this use of the verb in the Passive is very rare in the Class. writers, and almost confined to the Poets, as Homer, Hesiod, Pindar, and Æschyl.; and it is somewhat unfrequent in the Sept., the only apposite examples being Isa. lv. 11, ἵσως ἀν' τελειοθῇ ὅσα ἂν ἠθέλησα. Esdr. i. 1, τοῦ τελειοθῆναι λόγον Κυρίου, 'fulfilled.' In the New Test. its use is confined to St. John, here and often in the Revelation, as x. 7, ἐτελείσθῃ τὸ μυστήριον,—a fact strongly confirmatory of St. John's being the writer of the Apocalypse.

—κλίνας τὴν κεφαλὴν] As those do who are just expiring, espec. when the head has been, as in this case, kept erect by violence. See Virg. Æn. xi. 829.

—παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα] This and the expression of St. Matthew, ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα, suggest the idea of 'a placid, peaceful, and resigned dissolution,' and were therefore used by the pious among the Hebrews to denote that 'the soul is rendered back unto God,' its original author, to dispose of according to his good pleasure.

31. ἵνα μὴ μείνῃ—ἐν τῷ σαββάτῳ] Had that not been the case, it was forbidden by the Jewish law to permit the dead body of an executed malefactor to remain unburied after sunset, at which time the corpse was taken down for burial. So Joa. Bell. iv. 5, 2, ὥστε καὶ τοὺς ἐκ καταδίκης ἀνασταυρωμένους πρὸ δύνους ἡλίου καθελὲν τε καὶ θάπτειν. Considering that none could be taken down till they were dead, we may justly suppose, with many Commentators, that this breaking of the legs was done purely for the purpose of accelerating death (a view certainly favoured, and almost required, by the context); and not, according to the opinion of Grot., Michaelis, and Kuin., to fill up the measure of their torments. The same thing was sometimes done among the Romans for this same purpose,—to hasten death. So Cic. Phil. 13, 12, 'in proverbii loco dici solet, perire eum non posse, nisi ei crura fracta essent.' Ammian. Marc. xiv. 9, 'fractis cruribus occiditur.' From some passages of the Classical writers, cited by Wetst., it seems that the thing was done by striking the legs just above the ankle with a heavy iron mallet.

—παρασκευῇ] Namely, the προεβάστα-

τον. — ἡν—μεγάλῃ ἡ ἡμέρα] 'the day was a very solemn festival;' being not only an ordinary Sabbath, but the extraordinary one on the 15th of Nisan. For ἡμέραν, very many MSS., Versions, and early Editions have ἐκείνου, which is received by almost all Editors, in deference to whom I have now adopted it, especially since I find it in all the Lamb. (except 2) and in most of the Mus. copies, with Trin. Coll. B, x. 17.

κατεαγῶσιν αὐτῶν τὰ σκέλη, καὶ ἄρθῶσιν. ³³ Ἦλθον οὖν οἱ στρατιῶται, καὶ τοῦ μὲν πρώτου κατέαξαν τὰ σκέλη, καὶ τοῦ ἄλλου τοῦ συσταυρωθέντος αὐτῶν ³⁴ ἐπὶ δὲ τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἐλθόντες, ὡς εἶδον αὐτὸν ἤδη τεθνηκότα, οὐ κατέαξαν αὐτοῦ τὰ σκέλη· ³⁵ ἀλλ' εἰς τῶν στρατιωτῶν λόγχῃ αὐτοῦ τὴν πλευρὰν ἔνυξε, καὶ ἐκ τῆς ἐκείνης ἐξῆλθεν αἷμα καὶ ὕδωρ. ³⁶ Καὶ ὁ ἑωρακὸς μαρτυροῦν, καὶ ἀληθινὴ αὐτοῦ ἐστὶν ἡ μαρτυρία· καὶ οἱ οὐκ οἶδεν ὅτι ἀληθὴ λέγει, ἵνα ὑμεῖς πιστεύσητε. ³⁷ Ἐγένετο γὰρ ταῦτα· ἵνα ἡ γραφὴ πληρωθῇ· Ὅς τοῦ οὐ συντριβήσεται

Numb. 9. 12.

34. Some difference of opinion exists as to the purpose of the Evangelist in this attestation. It has been generally supposed that he meant to establish the fact of the real death of Christ; while some (as Dr. Burton) think it was his intent to refute the Docetæ, who held that Jesus had not a real body, but was only a phantom. But the former is the more probable. As to the phenomenon itself, the earlier Commentators in general regard it as miraculous; but the researchers of modern pathologists have established the fact, that the effusion might have taken place in any case, being the natural consequence of such a wound; and that it is, under all circumstances, decisive evidence of the actual death of the person. Medical writers are, indeed, not quite agreed whether by αἷμα καὶ ὕδωρ be meant the small portion of water found in the pericardium, called lymphæ, or (which is more probable) the sanguineous and aqueous liquor found in the cavities of the pleura after a mortal wound, or that follows a stab in the pleura, when the pericardium has been pierced, which is always mortal; consequently a proof that if Christ had not been already dead, this wound would certainly have extinguished the last remains of life; which was doubtless the intent of the soldier.

35. καὶ ὁ ἑωρακὸς—ἡ μαρτυρία] The full sense is, 'And he who was an eye-witness [to the circumstance] (namely, John himself) testifieth to the truth of this asseveration, and his testimony is true: yea, he is conscious that he speaketh the truth, so that ye may fully believe (relying on his testimony) the reality of the death of Jesus (that he really suffered in the flesh).'

36. ἐγένετο γὰρ ταῦτα] The γὰρ refers to a clause omitted; q. d. '[And believe ye well may]—for all these things were done, so that thereby the Scriptures,' &c.

—ὅς τοῦ οὐ, &c.] Not a few recent Commentators are of opinion that the passages of the Old Test. (Exod. xii. 46. Numb. ix. 12) in which it is enjoined, that 'not a bone of the lamb shall be broken,' are not prophetic, and had no reference to Christ. 'There are (say they) no vestiges in the Old Test. of the Paschal lamb being considered as a type of Christ; nor did the Evangelist mean to so represent it. He only applies the passage to our Lord, and compares Christ with the Paschal lamb; intending to denote, that 'in the institution of the Paschal lamb something had been enjoined similar to what would, by Divine interposition, take place in the case of Christ; by which Providence, therefore, it happened that his bones were not broken.' But that the Evangelist did mean to represent the Paschal lamb as a type of Christ, and consequently that such must be the only true view, no person who fairly considers the words can doubt; and if any such should doubt, let him read the convincing proof in Hoffm., ubi supra, pp. 272—5. What can offer so probable a reason for the otherwise unaccountable injunction, that not a bone of the Paschal lamb should be broken, as that it might point to the sacrifice of that lamb as a type of the sacrifice of Christ?

There is evidently a correspondence between the type and antitype. And as the passage referred to at the next verse, in the margin, is (as Lampe and Hoffm. prove) plainly prophetic of the piercing of the Redeemer's side, so we have here both a correspondence of type and antitype, and a fulfilment of prophecy, viz. of the piercing. With respect to the circumstance at v. 37, 'looking at him whom they have pierced,' it was partly fulfilled at the first advent of our Lord, at the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish state, and will be finally, and more signally, fulfilled at the last advent, the day of judgment; which seems especially alluded to at Rev. i. 7. As to the seeming discrepancies in the above two passages (namely, Exod. xii. 46, and Zech. xii. 10), suffice it to say, that the former is, properly speaking, no citation at all, but only a report of the sense. The other is a quotation; and although it differs considerably from the Sept., it agrees with the Versions of Aquila, Theod., and Symm.; from which it may have been taken by John; or he may himself have so translated it, since he does, by no means, invariably follow the Sept., as Hoffm. has evinced. As to the rendering of the Sept. κατερχόμεντο, it has been proved to have arisen from a mistake in the Hebr. letter γ for ρ, which has very often occurred elsewhere. That the Evangelists have given the true sense of the Hebr. לֹא יִשָּׁבֵר is ably shown by Dr. Henderson on the passage of Zech., and, indeed, it is now admitted by the German Rationalists themselves. One might, indeed, have expected that St. John should have brought in the μ of the Sept., especially as it is found in the Hebrew; but, in fact, it is implied, since in εἰς τὴν ἕξιν we have, as Hoffm. shows, a brief mode of expression, which, when evolved, and expressed in full, will stand thus:—'Et respicient ad me, ad eum, quem transfixerunt.' Compare a similar construction, supra vi. 29. Hoffm. has ably evinced that here, as in the former passage of the Old Test., we must interpret the expression of an actual, and not a figurative fulfilment. He concludes his discussion with the inαὐτοῦ. 37 * Καὶ πάλιν ἑτέρα γραφή λέγει "Ὁψονται εἰς ^{z Zech. 12. 10.} ὃν ἐξεκέντησαν.

39. ὁ ἐλθὼν πρὸς τὸν Ἰ. &c.] Render: 'he who had formerly gone to Jesus by night.'

— σμύρνης καὶ ἀλόης] The σμύρνα here mentioned is (as we learn from Dioscorides and Pliny) the juice of a certain tree in Arabia, from which, on the trunk being bored, exudes a kind of gummy liquid, which is caught on mats, &c.; and, as we learn from Hdot. ii. 82, was used in embalming. The ἀλόη here spoken of is supposed not to be, what has been generally imagined, the herb aloes, from which a bitter juice is expressed, but an aromatic tree, which is also called agalluchum, and the hylalos, whose wood was likewise employed by the Egyptians for embalming corpses. At all events it should seem (as the best Commentators are agreed) that we are not to suppose the myrrh and aloes (or the latter at least) to have been in a liquid state (namely, the distillation from the trees), but to have been the wood of those trees, dried and pulverized. This, indeed, appears by the great weight of the spices (100 lb. troy weight). The body could not have been regularly embalmed, since there was not time sufficient for that; but spices and unguents were brought to wash and anoint the body, and to envelop it in aromatic drugs.

— ὡς λίτρας ἑκατόν] Instead of ὡς, not a few MSS. and early Editions have ὡς, which is received by Griesb. and others down to Scholz. I have followed their example, though the reading is uncertain; since St. John uses both ὡς and ὡς in this sense. The quantity of spices here mentioned has been thought by some incredibly great; and they propose some other signification of λίτρα. But there is no reason to abandon the common interpretation; for the chamber in which our Lord's body was deposited would, according to the common custom, have to be completely perfumed; and no inconsiderable part would probably be reserved for the funeral; since, on such occasions, immense quantities of spices were burnt; especially when great respect was meant to be shown to the dead. So Jos. Antt. xv. 3, 4, notices the great quantity of θυμιάματα (meaning 'the odour of burnt spices') at the funeral of Aristobulus. And so, speaking of Herod's funeral (Antt. xvii. 10), he says that there were fifty ἀρωματοφόροι.

40. ἔδησαν αὐτὸ—ἀρωμάτων] After having embalmed the corpse for several days, they swathed it in linen rollers, or bandages, closely enfolding and wrapping it in that bed of aromatic drugs with which they had enveloped it.

41. καὶ ἐν τῷ κήπῳ μνημεῖον] According to a custom of the Jews, and also of the Greeks and Romans, to have sepulchres in their gardens. Thus the mausoleum of Augustus was erected in a garden.

42. διὰ τὴν παρασκευὴν, &c.] Since the day (Friday) was verging to a close, and the Sabbath was at hand, they (for greater dispatch) laid Jesus, for the present, in the sepulchre, which was near at hand, that they might observe the Sabbatical rest.

XX. 1. ἡρμένον] Not, 'taken away;' but raised, 'heaved up and away from' the mouth of the sepulchre, where it had been rolled, Matt. xxviii. 2. Mark xv. 46. The Arab. and Coptic Versions have well represented this sense. The huge stone (a piece of rock) might be rolled onwards, and thus placed on the mouth of the sepulchre; but it could not be removed without being heaved up out of the mouth, as the ἐκ expresses, which does not, as Grot. supposes, stand for ἀπὸ.

2. τρέχει οὖν, &c.] It may seem strange that Mary Magdalene should have gone in such haste to Peter and John, and that she should have arrived, though first at the sepulchre, after the party which went later. But Mary was later probably, because she went to seek Peter and John at their house or lodging (for, from v. 10, it would seem that they lived together, or, at least, were near neighbours) and finding them not at home (they having gone to the common place of assemblage of the eleven), was obliged to wait for their return,—which was after they had received the second party that reached them first, and, like the rest of the eleven, treated them as bearers of an idle tale. After which, it seems, they went home, and found Mary Magdalene waiting for them.

4. ἔτρεχον δὲ οἱ δύο, &c.] Render: 'Now the two began to run (set off a-running) together,' i. e. at the same time and in concert [but did not keep together] for, &c. 'the other disciple outran Peter.'

—προῖδρ. τάχ.] There is in τοῦ Π. a blending of two constructions,—τρεχ. τάχ. τ. Πέτρον and προῖδρ. τ. Π. With the former comp. Tobit xi. 2, προῖδρ. ἐμπροσθεν τῆς γυναῖκος σου, and Luke xix. 4, προδραμὼν ἐμπροσθεν; with the latter, Xen. Cyr. v. 2, 4, προδραμόντες—τῶν ὀπλιτῶν, 'outrunning.'

7. χωρὶς ἐντετυλυμένον εἰς ἓνα τόπον] The construction is ἐντετ. εἰς ἓνα τόπον χωρὶς. The participle has a sensus prægians, i. e. 'rolled up and placed.'

On this circumstance it is well remarked by Racine (in his observations on particular passages of Scripture), that 'the linen clothes thus placed and disposed apart from one another, plainly showed that the body had not been carried away by thieves. Those who steal are not observed to do things in such a quiet orderly manner.'

8. καὶ ἐπίστευσεν] Either 'believed' what Mary Magdalene had told him and Peter about the removal of Jesus' body from the sepulchre; or rather, as I am now inclined to think, with some eminent Expositors, and Mr. Alford, from Luthardt, that Jesus was actually raised from the dead; thus embracing with full mental assent, though for the first time, the fact of the resurrection. Mr. Alford's remark, that πιστεύειν is not used in the former sense in John is quite true, and confirms the latter view. One should expect that John would be the first (for as to Peter, there is some doubt whether he had as yet received it) to embrace this grand truth, the foundation of the Gospel. "He did this," as observes Luthardt, "on ocular testimony before him; for as yet, οὐδέπω γὰρ, neither he nor Peter so knew the Scripture as to be a priori convinced of the certainty that it must and would be so!"

10. πρὸς ἑαυτούς] lit. 'to themselves,' meaning 'each to their respective abodes;' of which peculiar sense examples are adduced by the Commentators, as Luke xxiv. 12, ἀπῆλθε πρὸς ἑαυτόν. Joseph. Antt. viii. 4, 6, πρὸς αὐτοὺς ἕκαστος ἀπῆλθεν. Numb. xxiv. 25, ἀπῆλθε πρὸς ἑαυτόν. I should regard it as a Hellenistic idiom, did it not occur in Polyb. v. 93, 1, &c. πρὸς ἑαυτούς. Thus it would seem to be an idiom of the common Greek dialect.

15. εἰ σὺ ἐβάστασας αὐ.] Meaning, it should seem, 'if thou hast been concerned in his removal.' The term βαστάζειν properly signifies to bear; 2ndly, to bear away, remove; the nature and purpose of the removal being determined by the context. It is, however (like ἀναίρειν), espec. applied to the removal of a corpse for burial. So Eurip. Alc. 724, γίροντα βαστάζειν νεκρόν. El. 1223, σῶμα βαστάζω τόδε.

Mary, it seems, thought the corpse had been removed to some other place of burial by some friend of Jesus, with the knowledge, if not assistance, of the gardener; and she was anxious to know where.

17. μὴ μου ἄπτου, &c.] On the purpose of this address, and consequently on the exact sense of the words themselves, some difference of opinion exists. The expression ἄπτισθαι, of itself, may well denote an act of dutiful reverence. A use of the word which may be illustrated from Eurip. Phœn. 910, μὴ πῖλαμβάνου, where the Schol. explains by μὴ μου ἄπτου. But as to the purpose of the address,—the connexion between the prohibition itself and the reason for it—it is involved in a veil of obscurity, which hardly admits of being quite withdrawn; but, in order to feel our way to the true sense, we must steer quite clear of what cannot be such. Accordingly, I agree with Mr. Alf., that the two renderings of ἄπτου to be guarded against are, 1) 'to lay hold of, in order to retain,' as if the sense were equiv. to μὴ με κράτει. 2) 'to lay hold of, in order to worship,' though it might seem countenanced by Matt. xxviii. 9. The latter sense would here have to be obtruded by force; the former would proceed on taking for granted what cannot be proved. The solution can only be arrived at by ascertaining what it was that caused this prohibition from our Lord. It was probably called forth by some action and gesture of Mary—a movement forwards, or an attitude, which seemed preliminary to embracing as an act of devout observance. This our Lord mildly forbids; but why, we are quite in the dark. It may be, as Stier and Alf. think, because the action would be unsuited to the time, and the nature of the appearance; q. d. (with Alf.) 'Do not thus; for I am not restored finally to you in the body;—I have yet to ascend to the Father.' But that only wraps the thing up in a greater mystery. I confess that I prefer the view taken long ago by

Grotius in his paraphrase thus:—'Id non licet, quum tantum οικονομικῶς ad fidem vestram roborandum, me do conspicendum;' q. d. 'I now make myself visible to you for a particular purpose (see Suicer. Thea. Eccles. in οικονομικῶς et οικονομία), which has been already answered by your viewing me; consequently, waste not time, which may be devoted to a far more important purpose, and one of immediate urgency (espec. since the right season for such devout observance has not yet arrived, for I have not yet ascended to my Father), but proceed forthwith, and tell my brethren that I am on the point of ascending to him who is my Father and your Father, my God and your God;' thus speaking for their encouragement and reassurance. He says not, 'ascend to heaven;' but, in order to remind them of the relation in which he stands to God, and they to him, he says, 'to my Father;' thus signifying that he who 'was from the beginning with God,' is going to act as their Mediator with God, who would now become their Father and their God,—not by creation only, but by the spiritual paternity implied in the Gospel covenant. By thus saying 'my God,' he speaks in accordance to the expression just before—'my brethren, as partakers of the same human nature with them,' and, because 'he is not ashamed to call them brethren' (Heb. ii. 11), therefore calls him, who is 'their God,' 'his God.'

19—29. Our Lord's sudden appearance to the disciples assembled together. Comp. Luke xxiv. 36—49. Mark xvi. 14—18.

19. τῶν θυρῶν κεκλ.] On this circumstance a wide difference of opinion exists among Commentators. Some (including the ancient Interpreters generally, and many earlier modern Expositors) understand by this that our Lord miraculously penetrated through the closed doors; others, consisting chiefly of the recent modern Commentators, suppose him to have entered merely in an ordinary way, after knocking and being admitted. Of these two views, the former supposes a sense which cannot be shown to exist in the words, and which would have required διὰ τῶν θυρῶν κεκλεισμένων. The latter view, however, is by no means to be tolerated; for surely no unbiassed person can attentively peruse this passage, and the similar one at ver. 26, without being sensible that something far more than an ordinary entrance is intended to be understood; otherwise, indeed, there would have been no occasion for the words τῶν θυρῶν κε-

κλεισμένων, which were evidently meant to intimate the kind of appearance, as entirely unaccountable in the ordinary way. As to making them (as the Commentators last mentioned are compelled to do) a mere isolatio temporis (q. d. 'at door-shutting time'), is to suppose a use quite unauthorized, and which is, moreover, precluded by the close connexion of the words with the following ones, ἔπου ἦσαν οἱ μαθηταὶ συνηγμένοι, the sense being, 'the doors having been closely fastened [of the place] where they were assembled together.' Why? namely, διὰ τὸν φόβον τῶν Ἰουδαίων, for those words are to be connected not with συνηγμένοι, but with κλεισμένων, being intended to show why the doors were thus secured, doubtless by bolts and bars. Comp. Acts v. 23, τὸ δαματῆριον. Eurip. Bacch. 652, κλείειν πάντα πύργον. Æschyl. Suppl. 934, πόλιν πύργων μηχανῇ κεκλεισμένην. Such being the sense of the words, they undoubtedly point to something miraculous, as, indeed, is demonstrated by what follows at v. 30,—just after narrating the repetition of the same case, πολλά—ἄλλα σημεῖα ἐποίησεν Ἰησοῦς ἐνώπιον τῶν μαθητῶν—but in what way I would not venture to say. Some of the best Expositors (as Calv., Grot., and Tittm.) are of opinion that our Lord caused the doors to preternaturally open of themselves; as the angel, Acts v. 19, 23, 'opened the doors of the prison' in which the Apostles were confined; see also Acts xii. 4—10. It may have been so; but it may, notwithstanding the philosophical difficulty which has been raised by Whitby and others, have been in the other way,—except that it could not be through the closed doors, which the words used will not permit,—which involves no greater difficulty than is involved in our Lord's occasionally withdrawing himself preternaturally from mortal sight. "Both (as Mr. Alf. truly observes) might alike be done by that supernatural power dwelling in him, by which his other miracles were wrought." In whichever way the appearance was effected, we may well suppose that by thus effecting it miraculously our Lord intended to afford to his disciples one other proof of his Divinity. As to the words used on making his appearance, εἰρήνη ὑμῖν, it was, indeed, an ordinary form of address by way of courteous salutation. See Luke x. 5. xxiv. 36; but as here used, it has a peculiar force and authority, being, as Tittm. observes, to be understood cum effectu. Comp. supra xiv. 27. xvi. 33; and see Euthym. However, our Lord's commencing his address to them in his usual form would immediately assure them that it was indeed their Lord and Saviour who was addressing them: with the same view he immediately showed them his hands and his side; after which our Lord repeats εἰρήνη ὑμῖν, but now in a fuller and more significant sense, as a solemn benediction, adverting to the blessed fruits and effects of his death and resurrection; thus making it serve to introduce to their attention the great things which he is just going to say; and, in that point of view, the mention of this 'peace' would be peculiarly appropriate, since the ministers and stewards of the mysteries of God are the messengers of that peace, to publish peace to the world, 'good tidings of salvation,' Is. lii. 7; and to whom that peace is committed as a trust, to be by them transmitted to all the sons of peace, Luke x. 5, 6. Accordingly, he thus aptly introduces the commission which he now gives to them, in the words of which the καθὼς—καί, 'as,' 'so also,' advert to the grounds thereof; q. d. 'As my Father has sent me with full authority to establish his Church on earth, even so send I you, with like authority, and for the same end' (see supra xvii. 19; and comp. Matt. xxviii. 18, 19, and note); thus intimating that, his apostleship being now closed, it was to be continued by this solemn sending forth of them. It is scarcely necessary to say, that since Christ's mission included various momentous purposes, such as could have no parallel with the sending of the Apostles, we must refer the words καθὼς—καί solely to those points which were similar; on which see Lampe.

22. ἐνεφύσησεν αὐτοῖς] This is to be regarded, not so much as an effusion of the Holy Spirit, in fulfilment of the promise of the Paraclete, which is forbidden by supra xvi. 7, and xx. 17, as a symbolical act, by which, in a great measure, our Lord was pleased to confirm and illustrate (by a significant sign, see supra xiii. 8. Matt. xxvii. 24. Jerem. xxvii. 2) the promise before made; for the words λάβετε Πνεῦμα ἅγιον can only be understood as a present promise of a future benefit—and perhaps foretaste—a symbol of that which should very shortly be communicated,—namely, on the day of Pentecost, when it was formally and substantially bestowed. So that, as Christ had been inaugurated in his office by the Holy Spirit at his baptism, they should, in like manner, be then baptized with the Holy Ghost. I am induced to agree with Stier, Luthardt, and Alf., that, as the presence of the Lord among them now was but a partial and temporary fulfilment of his promise of returning to the disciples, so the imparting of the Spirit now, by a partial intimation of his influence, was not merely a symbol, but a temporary foretaste of that which they should receive at the day of Pentecost. So that, as Luthardt observes, 'the relation of this saying to the effusion of the Spirit is the same which ch. iii. bears to Baptism, ch. vi. to the Lord's Supper, and ch. xvii. 1 to the Ascension.'

words (on which see note on Matt. xvi. 18, 19) our Lord formally confers on his Apostles—and through them on the ministers of the Gospel in every age—authority to certify those who should embrace the offer of the Gospel, that their sins were forgiven them; and to declare to those who should reject that offer, that they were still under the guilt and condemnation of sin. Though intended principally for the Apostles, yet it must be meant to be extended to those who should succeed them in carrying on the same holy work. In the full belief that the authority here given was not, as some say, limited by our Lord to the first ministers of the Gospel, but that it belongs to those who are duly appointed to the same ministry even unto the end of the world (see Matt. xxviii. 20, and note), the Church of England, in her Form for the Ordination of Priests, uses the form of words recorded in this and the preceding verse as having been used by our Lord for the purpose; so that those who are thus lawfully appointed, are fully authorized to pronounce (for the terms ἀφῆται and κρατῆται are to be taken declaratively) forgiveness of sins, or the contrary. I agree with Mr. Alford, that 'the gift belongs to those who are lawfully sent to minister in the Churches; not, however, by successive delegation from the Apostles—of which there is, in the New Test. at least, no trace—but by their mission from Christ, the Bestower of the Spirit for their office, when orderly and legitimately conferred upon them by the various Churches.'

24—29. Portion peculiar to John.

24. εἰς ἐκ τῶν δώδεκα] So said, because the regular number of members in any body is made use of to designate the name of the body, even though the number may not at the time be complete. As to the absence of Thomas (οὐκ ἦν μετ' αὐτῶν) on such an occasion as the present, it can hardly, considering the temperament of the person, be ascribed to any thing but a feeling bordering on abandonment of hope.

25. Ἐλεγον οὖν αὐτῷ, &c.] Though the Evangelist has expressed himself with great brevity, we are not to suppose but that the disciples told Thomas the whole of what had taken place; as indeed is clear from the words of his reply.

— τὸν τύπον τῶν ἥλων] i. e. the mark or impression made by the nails. So Athen. p. 585, τοὺς τύπους τῶν πληγῶν ἰδοῦσα. Philo, p. 99, τοὺς τύπους τῶν κ. τραυμάτων. Jos. Bell. iii. 9, 3, τῶν Ἀνδρομάδας διερῶν τύποι. He means to say, that 'unless he have the testimony of both sight and touch as to the identity and real bodily presence of Jesus,' &c. That Beza and Grot. should have approved of, and Lachm. edited τόπον, from A and four cursives, is another strong proof of the necessity of Palaeography, and competent experience in collating, to the Critic. Had they known how perpetually the scribes confound τύπος and τόπος, those Editors would have judged otherwise. In fact, internal evidence is quite in favour of τύπος, and only the rarity of the use, of which I have adduced examples, caused the blunder.

26. μεθ' ἡμέρας ὀκτώ] i. e. on the eighth day, or the day-week from our Lord's resurrection, and from his former appearance to his disciples; and, in both cases, on the first day of the week. Hence this day was called the Lord's day, both because our Lord by his resurrection on that day, and by his repeated appearances to his disciples, after his resurrection, on that day, had been pleased so signally to honour it.

— ἦσαν ἔσω] Probably an idiom of the ordinary Greek, found in the Sept. and the later Classical writers for ἐν οἴκῳ, though by the ἔσω there may be a reference to the closed chamber before mentioned. In our Lord's expressions, φέρει τὸν δάκ. and φέρει τὴν χεῖρα, there seems an allusion to the expression of Thomas to the Apostles, εἰάν μὴ βάλω τὸν δάκ. μ. and βάλω τὴν χεῖρα.

27. ἄπιστος] for μὴ πιστεύων. This active sense is rare in the Classical writers; yet it occurs in Thucyd. i. 68. 1. Æschyl. Theb. 873. Prov. xxviii. 25. The use of πιστός for πιστεύων is still more rare; yet it is found in Theogn. 283. Soph. Œd. Col. 1031.

28. ὁ Κύριός μου, &c.] How decidedly these words attest the Divinity of our Lord, none have been disposed to deny, except those who have made up their minds to reject the doctrine itself. So necessarily, indeed, does this follow from the words, according to their plain and obvious import, that those who refuse to acknowledge Jesus ἐώρακάς με, [Θωμᾶ,] πεπλούτευκας μακάριοι οἱ μὴ ἰδόντες, καὶ πιστεύσαντες.

1 John 1. 1-4.

XXI. 1 Μετὰ ταῦτα ἐφάνέρωσεν ἑαυτὸν πάλιν ὁ Ἰησοῦς

as their Lord and their God, are compelled to resort to the expedient of taking these words, not as a solemn address, but as an empty formula of admiration, as the ancients said, Hercules! or Jupiter! and the moderns Good Lord! Good God! &c. &c. To which it has been well replied by Dr. Pye Smith (Scrip. Test. vol. ii. p. 263), that 'to use the Divine name as an exclamation of surprise, however usual among heathens, and even some Christians, was by no means the custom of the Jesus, among whom outward reverence for the name of the Deity was most punctiliously observed.' Such a sense, too, is forbidden by the words of our Lord's reply; in which Christ commends the faith of Thomas, though he gently reproves the tardiness with which it was rendered. Finally, the circumstance of the words being introduced by the formula εἶπεν αὐτῷ (the other mode would reject αὐτῷ) shows that they cannot be a mere exclamation of surprise, but an address, wherein the Nominative with the Article is used for the Vocative, as at xix. 3, and often in the New Test.; in short, 'an address which (to use the words of Bp. Middleton) though in the form of an exclamation, amounts to a confession of faith, and was equivalent to a direct assertion of our Saviour's Divinity.' Accordingly, we are on all accounts constrained to take the terms in their proper import, and full measure of signification, — MY LORD AND MY GOD; — a combination of the two Sacred names forming the strongest representation of Divine Majesty of which the language is capable. The testimony, then, is clear, and the authority irrefragable: nay, by not refusing the name of God, now first applied to him by the Apostles, our Lord virtually takes it to himself, as 'thinking it (to use the words of the Apostle) no robbery to be equal with God.' And thus our Evangelist, towards the close of his Gospel, furnished the same testimony, with which he had commenced it, to the Godhead of the incarnate ΛΟΓΟΣ.

29. Θωμᾶ] This, not found in very many MSS., including almost all the Lamb. and Mus. copies, and opposed by internal evidence, is with reason cancelled by the Critical Editors.

— μακάριοι οἱ μὴ ἰδόντες, &c.] The term μακάριος must here be understood comparatively, for our Lord did not mean to affirm, that those who believe without seeing, would be preferred to those who believe on the evidence of sight; but only that where the effects of that faith were equal, it argued greater simplicity, candour, and wisdom, to yield to a reasonable evidence without seeing, than could be argued from merely having believed on sight, after sufficient evidence of another kind had been proposed.

30. π. δ. σημεῖα ἐποίησεν] Since some difficulties not easily surmountable are involved in understanding σημεῖα to mean 'tokens' and 'proofs' (or 'evidences') of our Lord's having risen from the dead, I am now induced to take σημεῖα, in its most general sense, for 'miracles'; which is more agreeable to ἐποίησεν than the other; though, at the same time, considering that μὲν οὖν is a conclusion from all that had been before said in the Gospel, it should seem that John intended those σημεῖα to be viewed in the light of 'evidences' of the Messiahship of Jesus; and consequently this may be regarded as a 'locutio prægmanis,' involving, besides the ordinary import of the phrase, the result thereof, evidences of his Messiahship.

XXI. The doubts raised as to the authenticity of this Chapter by Grotius, Le Clerc, and Heumann, and recently by many German Expositors, as Credner, Lücke, &c., have been fully shown by Lampe, Kuin., Tittm., and Weber, to be founded neither on internal evidence nor external authority. Allowing the Chapter to be (what the objectors say) an Appendix to the foregoing accounts, yet might not the Evangelist have good reason to add something to his Gospel, as we know St. Paul did to certain of his Epistles, especially that to the Romans? As to the objection, that 'the circumstances recorded are not of sufficient consequence to have come from the Evangelist,' that is mere matter of opinion; and it were presumptuous to sit in judgment on the words of inspiration, which these must certainly be considered, since not the slightest external evidence has ever been adduced to invalidate their authenticity—they being found in all the MSS.; to which I add all the Lamb. and Mus. copies. As to certain peculiarities which are supposed to exist therein, we are to bear in mind, that our Lord, after his resurrection, no longer held intercourse with his Disciples in the way he had done before his death, nor treated them with the same familiarity; nay, that he bore himself as one already withdrawn from human society, and soon to depart in order to enter upon 'that glory which he had with the Father before the world was.' In fact, Mr. Alford fully acknowledges its Johannine origin, and admits that John's hand is every where plain and unmistakable. He believes it, however, to have been added some years after the completion of the Gospel, partly to record the important miracle of the second draught of fishes, and the interesting account of the sayings of the Lord to Peter; but principally to meet the error, which was becoming prevalent, concerning himself. In order to do this he enters into minute details as to the number of fishes, the circumstances preceding the conversation, and the very words of the Lord himself. All this is very natural; and that the portion was added after the rest is not improbable, since it bears on its face the characteristics of an additamentum. But I cannot think it probable that it was added some years after the rest, since the reasons for its addition adduced by Mr. Alford, though good in themselves, would be likely to occur to the Evangelist much sooner than after the lapse of several years. He would be likely to make the addition as soon as he learnt the error, which was growing prevalent concerning himself; and that was not likely to be long. But Mr. Alf. was led into this opinion by taking for granted, what cannot be proved,—a second manner, and a later style, also a simplicity produced by the decline of life, meaning probably the senility of the diction. This Mr. Alf. grounds solely on the use of οἰμαί at v. 25, a very narrow foundation on which to erect an hypothesis, but which he might have confirmed by what Aristotle says in his Rhet. ii. 15, where in depicting the traits of age, with the hand of a Theophrastus, he says that old men are fond of using the word think; so, says he, οἰονταί, ἰσασί δὲ οὐδέν, and they say nothing παγίως. But there was here no room for fixedness of assertion, but the contrary. And as the Particle οἰμαί is very often used as a softening of what might seem an over-charged statement, so here the verb οἰμαί might be adopted for that very reason. Accordingly, the argument advanced by Lücke, Credner, and Davison, against the authenticity of the two last verses, from the hyperbolical and exaggerated tone,—foreign to the simple modesty of the Evangelist,—is the less to be justified.

1. ἐφάνέρωσεν ἑαυτ.] lit. 'showed himself as risen from the dead;' and so infra v. 14, ἐφανερώθη = ἐφάν. ἑαυτ. Such passages as John i. 31. 1 John i. 2. Mark xvi. 12, 14, and several others, are of a somewhat different character, denoting only 'to be made publicly known.'

2. ἦσαν ὁμοῦ] 'were together,' in ordinary society, not 'assembled' for religious exercises, as in Acts ii. 1, and xx. 18, in some very ancient copies. The former is the usual acceptance, and occurs in the later Class. writers. Who the two other disciples were we are not told; and whether they were Apostles is uncertain.

VOL. I.

3. ὑπάγω δλ.] 'I go, am just going a fishing,' implying 'intention,' as supra viii. 27, and still more in the following ἐρχόμεθα, an idiom probably of the ordinary Greek; though occasionally found in the later Greek writers.—Ἐνέβησαν, which I adopted with all the Editors from Griesb. downwards on very strong authority, I find also in almost all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies; and internal evidence is in its favour. From this minute circumstance we may infer that the disciples were returning to their usual occupations; to continue them from that time until the period at which the Lord had appointed to meet them in Galilee at the Pentecost.—ἀνέβη, was prob. an error of the scribes; and the words are frequently interchanged.

—ἐπίασαν οὐδέν] We may be allowed to suppose that on the present occasion (as in the similar case recorded at Luke v. 5, between which there is a strong correspondence) it was so ordered by Divine providence, that nothing should be caught the night before, in order to make still more remarkable the miracle which should follow.

5. παιδία] Comp. 1 John ii. 18, and supra xiii. 33, τικνία. Thus παιδίον and τεκνίον were terms of kindness or affability, used by elderly persons or superiors to those with whom they conversed.—Προσφάγιον properly denotes what is eaten along with bread as a condiment, though (like δνάριον) it was generally used, as here, of fish. From Chrys. and Wetst. it appears that τί ἔχετε was a phrase employed by those who inquired of fishers or hunters what they had taken. So at Aristoph. Nub. 731, ἔχεις τι; the Scholiast remarks, Τῇ τῶν ἀγριῶν λίξει χρώμενοι· τοῖς γὰρ ἀλιεῦσιν ἡ ὀρυθαγριναῖς οὕτω φασίν· ἔχεις τι;

6. βάλετε εἰς τὰ δεξιὰ μέρη] They probably thought the unknown looker on acquainted with their craft, and had, with the keen penetration of an adept, discovered some sign on the right side of the vessel, by which he conjectured that the fish were collected together there.—Εὐρήσετε is a technical term of the piscatory art (expressed with the usual brevity of such phrases) common to all languages.—Ἀπὸ, in this sense, 'on account of,' is not a Hebraism, but found in the best Class. writers, from Thucyd. downwards. Comp. Dion. Hal. i. 74, ἀπὸ λύπης καὶ μετανοίας τῶν πειραγμένων.

• Acts 10. 61. 12 ὁ Δέγει αὐτοῖς ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Δεῦτε ἀριστήσατε. οὐδεὶς δὲ

7. ὁ Κύριός ἐστι.] John might well make this inference (which is contained in the Particle οὖν) from the prodigious draught, which would bring to his mind the incident recorded at Luke v. 1—6, and set him to examine more narrowly the countenance of the Stranger.

— ἐπενδύτην.] From the researches of Salmaas, Lampe, and Fischer, this appears to mean, that upper linen tunic used by Greeks, Romans, and Jews, and called by the Romans superaria, corresponding to our waistcoat, but much longer, and worn between the inner tunic (the interula or piducula of the Romans, and the χιτωνίσκος or ὑποδύτης of the Greeks) and the surtout, upper garment, or cloak. It seems, from Euthymius, to have been in this case the ordinary fisherman's coat, consisting of a sort of full frock without sleeves, reaching only to the knees, and bound round the middle by a belt. Exactly resembling the dress of the Arabian peasants, as described by Capt. Keppel (Journey from India to England), vol. i. p. 87, 'a large brown shirt (coarse as sackcloth) with open sleeves, extending down to the knee, and bound round the loins with a leathern girdle.' The ἱκανός. Peter, — who had been before γυμνός, 'only in his shirt,' — put on, and girded. Peter, we may suppose, did not plunge into the sea, in order to swim ashore (for he could not swim), but only stepped out of the boat, in order to wade thither. In his haste he would not stay to go as the other disciples did; who proceeded more leisurely by the cock-boat belonging to the bark, at the same time drawing with them to the shore the net full of fishes. — τῷ πλοιαρίῳ is wrongly rendered, 'in a little ship,' rather went on shore 'by the skiff, or cock-boat.' See note on Mark vi. 32. The other disciples came to land in that way, because there would not, it seems, have been depth of water sufficient for the fishing bark itself. Accordingly they came to shore by the cock-boat, bringing moreover the net full of fishes with them, — not, however, on board of the boat, for there probably would not have been room, and accordingly they fastened the end of the net to the poop of the boat, and so dragged it along, more conveniently for their passage to as far on shore as the depth of water would enable the boat to go.

8. τὸ δίκτυον τῶν ἰχθύων.] Supply μεστόν, which is expressed at ver. 11. This idiom, in nouns of capacity, is found in all languages, chiefly, however, in the popular or colloquial phraseology.

9. βλέπουσιν ἀνθρακίαν κειμένην.] See note supra xviii. 18. This might, indeed, be accounted for without supposing miraculous agency; but from the air of the passage it should rather seem that the fire and food were not only provided by Christ, but provided miraculously, as the draught of fishes had been a little before. What is there for the Rationalist Expositors to stumble at? What difficulty in such a fire and fish being provided miraculously by him who had all nature at his disposal, and all angels at his bidding? Both of the miracles were probably intended to teach them, by symbolical actions, that their Lord could, and would, abundantly supply the temporal as well as spiritual necessities of his disciples. I have shown, supra xviii. 8, that the conjecture of some Critics, καυόμενον, is needless, and that the text rec. κειμένην, set, or placed, has reference to the circumstance of the fire of charcoal being put into an iron vessel like our chafing-dish. This is plain from a passage of Plut. Sympos. vi. 7, ὁ σοφὸς Ἀνάχαρσις ἐπὶ τὴν ἀνθρακίαν, i. e. 'commended the [invention of] the chafing-dish.' And so Hippocrates and other writers use ἀνθρακία to denote a chafing-dish with charcoal in it. The next words καὶ ὀψάριον ἐπικείμενον, signify, 'and fish lying thereon;' i. e. on the chafing or broiling-dish. The whole is quite graphic, and attests the minute accuracy of an eye-witness.

12. δεῦτε ἀριστ..] A form of expression, probably usual on such occasions, and which we may suppose to have been customarily used by our Lord himself. A circumstance which would further strengthen the impression of the disciples, ὅτι ὁ Κύριός ἐστι. As to ἀριστ. see my Lex. in ἀριστον, and ἀριστάω. It must mean the morning meal, whatever it may be called, a late breakfast—or our lunch, and taken about 11 o'clock.

— οὐδεὶς δὲ ἐτόλμα, &c.] There is some difficulty connected with ἐτόλμα, — for, if taken in its full sense, it would seem little agreeable to what follows, εἰδότες ὅτι ὁ Κύριός ἐστι, — to avoid which, Heins, Kuin., and Tittm. suppose ἐτόλμα used pleonastically. But, rather than resort to such an unsatisfactory mode of disposing of the difficulty, it were better, with Gatak. and Lampe, to take ἐτόλμα in the sense voluit, meaning that 'no one cared to ask him.' But even this is an uncritical paring down of the sense, and forbidden by various passages of a parallel nature to the present, such as Matt. xxii. 46, Mark xii. 34, οὐδὲ ἐτόλμησέν τις ἐπρωτῆσαι αὐτόν. Accordingly, bearing in mind the feelings of awe which the disciples had of late entertained towards our Lord, it may be best to reject the principle both of pleonasm and modification of sense, which are excluded by the strong term subjoined, ἐξετάζειν, which signifies 'to examine rigidly by interrogation'; see Demosth. p. 1124, and Xen. Mem. i. 2, 36, and regard the sentence as standing, by a certain brevity of expression characteristic of the Evangelist, for 'no one of the disciples ventured to strictly put the question, Who art thou? [nor, indeed, was it necessary] as knowing.' &c.

¹⁴ τρίτον meaning, 'the third time' recorded in this Gospel; for it appears from Matt. xxviii. 16, seq. that he had appeared to them five times before. Or we may understand 'the third time' of showing himself to his disciples collectively.

¹⁵—²³. Sayings of our Lord after the foregoing meal; for it would seem that no conversation took place at the meal, for the reason above adverted to.

¹⁵. πλείον τούτων]. Some (as Whitby, Pearce, and Bp. Middl.) by τούτων understand 'these things,' namely, the nets, boats, and other implements of his trade; q. d. 'Dost thou prefer my service to these thy secular employments?' But to this frigid sense it has been well objected by Dr. Jortin, that Peter might love his Lord more than those, and yet not love him much. The true meaning seems to be (what the words in their obvious sense would suggest), 'Dost thou love me more than those thy fellow-disciples do?' An interpretation which was adopted by all the ancient, and all the most eminent modern Commentators. In this question our Lord may be supposed to have alluded to the profession of superior attachment to him, which Peter had made on a former occasion (Matt. xxvi. 33); 'though all men should be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended.'

It is observable that though our Lord asks the question thrice, probably to impress the injunction the more strongly on Peter and the other Apostles (intending it, however, for all Pastors of every age), yet the admonition which each time follows it up is not quite the same; for βόσκειν signifies simply 'to feed,' 'provide with pasture'; ποιμαίνειν, both 'to feed' and 'to tend'; the former being especially applicable to the ἄρνια (or young, inexperienced professors); and the latter to the πρόβατα (or more advanced and mature professors). As Christ was the chief Shepherd (1 Pet. v. 4), so Peter and the other Apostles were to be shepherds. And the notion of tending necessarily carries with it that of guiding and governing.

¹⁶. Σίμ. Ἰ., ἀγαπᾷς με;] Similarly in Alexia ap. Athen. p. 244, where ἐστράττια, φιλεῖς; ἀπὸν με; where ἀπὸν implies an affirmative answer, q. d. 'I presume you do'; as in Soph. Trach. 417, τὴν ἀλχημάλτων κατόισθ' ἀπὸν;

¹⁸. ἀμὴν ἀμὴν λέγω σοι, &c.] By these words (probably suggested by the circumstance of Peter's girding himself, after having changed his clothes, as we may suppose he did after having come on shore thoroughly wet) our Lord intended, it should seem, in a most impressive manner (with which comp. Acts xxi. 19) to intimate to the Apostles what he would have to say νυν σεαυτὸν, καὶ περιεπάτεις ὅπου ἤθελες· ὅταν δὲ γηράσῃς, ἐκτενείς τὰς χεῖράς σου, καὶ ἄλλος σε ζώσῃ, καὶ οἴσῃ ὅπου οὐ θέλεις. ¹⁹ Τοῦτο δὲ εἶπε, σημαίνων ποίῳ θανάτῳ δοξάσει τὸν Θεόν. καὶ τοῦτο εἰπὼν λέγει αὐτῷ· Ἀκολουθε μοι. ²⁰ Ἐπιστραφεὶς δὲ ὁ Πέτρος βλέπει τὸν μαθητὴν, ὃν ἰγγάπα ὁ Ἰησοῦς, ἀκολουθοῦντα, ὃς καὶ ἀνέπεσεν ἐν τῷ δείπνῳ ἐπὶ τὸ στήθος αὐτοῦ, καὶ εἶπε· Κύριε, τίς ἐστὶν ὁ παραδιδούς σε; ²¹ Τοῦτον ἰδὼν ὁ Πέτρος λέγει τῷ Ἰησοῦ· Κύριε, οὗτος δὲ τί; ²² Λέγει αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς· Ἐὰν αὐτὸν θέλω μένῃν ἕως ἔρχομαι, τί πρὸς dergo in his cause, as introductory to the final and solemn injunction to follow his example.

To advert to the particular import of the prediction, the words ἔχωννες σεαυτὸν, καὶ περιεπάτεις ὅπου ἤθελες are evidently a figurative mode of expressing the possession of youthful vigour, and perfect freedom of action. The next words, ὅταν δὲ γηράσῃς—θλίψῃς, are by most Expositors, ancient and modern, supposed to allude to crucifixion; while several recent Commentators recognize a reference solely to the helplessness of age. But that view, besides yielding a sense very frigid, and by no means suitable to the occasion, is forbidden by the words οὐ θέλεις. Yet whether the words can fairly be thought to refer to the crucifixion itself, may be doubted; for though the expressions, ἐκτενείς τὰς χεῖράς σου, καὶ ἄλλος σε ζώσῃ, be correspondent thereto, since the crucified person would have to stretch out his arms to be nailed to the cross bars; yet that is supposing him to be already there, and not being taken, 'where he would not wish to go,' to the place of execution. Hence Kuinoel and Tittman maintain that the words only predict that Peter should die a violent death. And, indeed, the words following, τοῦτο δὲ—Θεόν, cannot be proved to have reference to more than martyrdom, by whatever death. Yet those expressions, and espec. the subsequent admonition, ἀκολουθε μοι, rather suggest the idea of death by crucifixion; and, as the universal testimony of antiquity establishes it as a fact, that Peter did suffer martyrdom by crucifixion, I am inclined to think, with Casaubon, Scaliger, Lampe, Wetstein, and Ernesti, that there is a reference, not to actual crucifixion, yet to the preparation for it, in which the criminal was compelled to put his neck into a furca, of the form Π, called 'patibulum'; his hands being extended and bound to the transverse horns (to represent, by a significant action, the punishment he was about to suffer): and who after being thus carried, as it were in procession, to the place of execution, was then actually crucified. As to the obscurity which this interpretation supposes to exist in the words,—that is by no means greater than might be expected in a prediction not intended to be fully understood until after the event; when it would prove as great a support to the Apostle, as it must before that time have been a source of alarm and dismay.

From the question put by Peter at ver. 21, it is manifest that he understood his Lord's expressions, of a violent death by the executioner; but what kind of death he did not understand; and in his 2nd Epistle, i. 14, though he speaks with uncertainty, yet he plainly alludes to a violent death. To advert to a point of philology:—The use of νέωτερος here occurring as a Substant. derived from the Adject. (just as our Substant. younger from the Adject. younger) is found in the purest Class. writers, as Thucyd. vi. 12, and Eupol. Taxiarch. fr. xii. 3, ὅτι αὖ νέωτερος.

—ἔχωννες σεαυτὸν] q. d. 'wert not bound by others,' alluding to the compulsory binding of the hands to the cross. In the ἐκτενείς τὰς χεῖρας we have words quite graphic, and intended to complete the picture. Render: 'Thou wilt stretch forth thy hands (namely, for another to bind thee), and another will bind thee and carry thee; for the words being a prophecy require the rendering will, not shall; and to this prophecy there seems a reference in 2 Pet. i. 14.

19. δοξάσει τὸν Θεόν] An expression designating martyrdom, by having been a witness faithful unto death. See Rev. xx. 4.

20. ἐπιστραφεὶς] It seems that Peter, though he was aware of the figurative sense intended in ἀκολ., yet thought it safer to observe the direction in the literal one, and therefore follows his Master. Then, turning about and seeing John also following, and thereby showing his comprehension likewise of the meaning of Jesus, he feels a curiosity to know whether John, his friend and companion, would accompany him in death, and therefore asks οὗτος δὲ τί (scil. ποιήσει); which may mean, 'What shall he do?' i. e. suffer (for ποιῶ has often the sense of πάσχω); i. e. 'What shall be his fate?'

22. ἐὰν αὐτὸν θέλω, &c.] Here, again, the sense is obscure, for the very same reason as before, and consequently has led to a great variety of interpretations; all of them more or less erroneous. To ascertain their true import,—the scope of the words, and their plain force, both separately and conjointly, must first be ascertained. Now it is evident that our Lord intended a gentle rebuke to Peter for his curiosity on a subject which did not concern himself, and into which it was not proper for him to pry. And as τί πρὸς σέ was (as appears from the Classical illustrations of Wetstein and Kypke) a frequent form of repressing vain curiosity, the chief sense intended seems to be that assigned by Euthymius, 'Do thou mind thine own concerns.' As, however, τί πρὸς σέ is accompanied by the words ἐὰν αὐτὸν θέλω μένῃν ἕως ἔρχομαι, something more is evidently meant, however obscurely expressed. And considering that the force of this kind of phrase is to put a negative on any question asked, and that the scope of Peter's inquiry was, to know whether John too would suffer martyrdom, the words may justly be supposed to contain, together with a mild reproof for the liberty taken in putting such a question, an obscure intimation that he would not suffer martyrdom, but continue alive up to—what period? TILL I COME. But what are we to understand by this coming? Certainly not (what many have supposed) his final coming to judge the world; q. d. 'If I should choose for him not to die at all, what would that be to thee?' That would, I apprehend, be making the expression more enigmatical than its wording will justify. The coming of Christ must rather denote the coming of Christ in power to execute vengeance on the Jewish nation. That John lived up to, and far beyond, the entire completion of Christ's judgments on the Jewish nation, we have full evidence. Since, however, the disciples did not at that time know of this advent of our Lord, but only of the final one, it is no wonder that they should then have understood it of the other, and consequently supposed that John would not die at all.

σέ; σὺ ἀκολουθεῖ μοι. ²³ Ἐξῆλθεν οὖν ὁ λόγος οὗτος εἰς τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς, ὅτι ὁ μαθητὴς ἐκεῖνος οὐκ ἀποθνήσκει. Καὶ οὐκ εἶπεν αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς, ὅτι οὐκ ἀποθνήσκει· ἀλλ' ἐὰν αὐτὸν θέλω μένειν ἕως ἔρχομαι, τί πρὸς σέ;

²⁴ Ὁὗτός ἐστιν ὁ μαθητὴς ὁ μαρτυρῶν περὶ τούτων, καὶ ^{m ch. 19. 28.} γράψας ταῦτα· καὶ οἶδαμεν ὅτι ἀληθὴς ἐστιν ἡ μαρτυρία αὐτοῦ.

24, 25. Several eminent Critics and Commentators, even those who receive all the rest of the Chapter, regard these verses as not from the Evangelist, but an addition from another hand,—probably John the Presbyter. This they are induced to suppose, partly from the change of person in οἶδαμεν, and partly from a fancied dissimilarity to the style in the preceding verse. But it is strange that they should not have seen that, if the rest of the Chapter be (as it certainly is) from the Evangelist, so must at least the clause οἶστος—γράφας ταῦτα; for this would be indispensable to form any conclusion; and that these verses were meant to do so is pretty clear. But if that clause be St. John's, so probably must the next, since it is strongly confirmed by an altogether kindred passage at xix. 35. Nor is there any such difficulty in the change of person at οἶδαμεν, as to be fatal to the authenticity of the clause; since it may be taken, not per enallagen, as many contend (for propriety would rather require οἶδα), but, as some eminent Critics maintain, communicative, i. e. to include the disciples and first Christians in general; q. d. 'It is known.' In short, from whom can this clause and the next verse have proceeded, if not from St. John? 'From the Bishops of the Churches of Asia,' say the first-mentioned Critics. But the Evangelist's assertion could not need the support of their testimony. Besides, the singular οἶμαι in the next verse (which cannot be taken for enall. because it is no where so used in the Scriptures; and because thus there would be no construction) forbids this notion. Are we, then, to consider v. 25, as an addition by some hand different from that of the preceding clause? Certainly not; for surely there would seem to be no need of any addition, at least not to the reader; though the writer might see the thing in a different view. Upon the whole, there is not, I think, the slightest reason for supposing that the verse came from any other than the Evangelist, who seems to have intended it as a corollary to what was said at xx. 30.

The words οὐδὲ αὐτὸν οἶμαι—βιβλία are an Oriental and hyperbolical mode of expression (to represent that the miracles, and the remarkable actions and discourses of Jesus, were exceedingly numerous); of which many examples are adduced by the Commentators from the Scriptural and the Classical writers. To which I could add others. But it is of more importance to advert to a passage of Scripture, namely, Amos vii. 10, οὐ δύναται ἡ γῆ χωρεῖν πάντας τοὺς λόγους αὐτοῦ, 'the land cannot contain all his words.' Now the words may have been in the mind of the Evangelist, if, at least, which Dr. Henderson ably maintains, 'contain' be the true sense of the Hebrew, יָצַח. The hyperbole is a strong feature of resemblance in both passages.

I must not omit to observe that at ver. 24 the τούτων has reference to the events of this Chapter, and the ταῦτα to those of the rest of the Gospel. At ἄλλα πολλὰ is plainly to be supplied ἃ οὐκ ἔστι γεγραμμένα ἐν τῷ βιβλίῳ τούτῳ. To these ἄγραφα allusions are occasionally found; and on them let the reader, if he can, see the learned and curious, but very rare tract of Zornius 'De ἀγράφοις Christi dictis.' Numberless, however, as were the actions of our Lord which were left unrecorded, we have reason to acquiesce in the Providence of him who 'doeth all things well.' Every important purpose, in a work meant for the people at large rather than for the learned and critical, is accomplished by the Gospels in their present state. Had they contained all the words and actions of Christ, or even any considerable part, they would have been, as the Evangelist perhaps means to intimate, too voluminous for a manual adapted to ordinary use. Enough is recorded to direct our faith and regulate our practice; more would have been superfluous, and in some respects (from the multitude of questions and unprofitable speculations to which, judging from what we see is now the case, they would have given rise) might have defeated the main purpose in view,—the making men 'wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus.'

I. ¹ ΤΟΝ μὲν πρῶτον λόγον ἐποιήσάμην περὶ πάντων, ὃ
Θεόφιλε, ὧν ἤρξατο ὁ Ἰησοῦς ποιεῖν τε καὶ διδάσκειν, ² ἄχρι

THIS highly important book forms the grand connecting link between the Gospels and the Epistles, being a sort of Appendix to the former, and Introduction to the latter; and as it is exceedingly illustrated by both, so it throws back great light on both; and indeed it is indispensably necessary to a right understanding of both; accordingly, it is justly termed by Chrysostom 'an exceeding great treasure.' That St. Luke was the author of this book is plain, both from what is said at the commencement of it, as compared with that of his Gospel, and from the strong similarity of its style as compared with that of the other work; insomuch that the two were, by some ancient writers, regarded as forming two parts of the same general work. As to the personal history of the writer, see Introduction to his Gospel. The unvarying testimony of Tradition, as to St. Luke being the writer of this book, is confirmed by what we read of Luke in St. Paul's Epistles. It is next to certain that the same person was the writer of both the books,—the general similarity of composition and diction being striking. Accordingly, words and phrases are continually occurring in the present book either peculiar to the two books, and not found elsewhere, or in a great measure found only in those. Considering the persons for whom my work is chiefly intended, I do not consider it necessary to enter into long arguments in order to overturn the various hypotheses which have been started by several German writers of the Rationalistic school, to destroy or weaken the evidences of St. Luke's being the author of this book as well as of the Gospel that bears his name. Those readers who have a taste for such cases may find a board spread abundantly in Dr. Davidson's Introduction, and with no niggard hand in Mr. Alford's. Suffice it here to advert to the terms peculiar to the writer,—favourite terms, or such as might be expected from St. Luke, according to what we know of him both from St. Paul and from the testimony of antiquity. I advert especially to the intimations occurring occasionally in this book, and in the Gospel, in the descriptions of diseases, and which show that the writer was one well acquainted with the subject, and quite conversant with the technical phraseology of the medical art. To the same class may be referred those numerous nautical terms which occur up and down, and always, we have high authority for pronouncing, used with great exactness, and evincing—as Mr. Smith, in his interesting work on the Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, bears testimony—that the writer was one quite as well acquainted with technical sea terms, and the habits of seamen, as a laudeman, though one well accustomed to the sea, could be expected to be. Of course this and other similar points of detail will abundantly prove that the present work could not have been, what the German writers above alluded to represent, in a great measure a compilation, from the numerous notices of others, by some unknown author. As to the questions at what time, and at what place, the book was written;—on the former of these points see Canon Tate's able Dissertation (Cont. Hist. App. E, § 3, p. 166—170), where he says much to prove, that, consistently with other facts, the only time which can be allowed for Luke's writing and publishing the Acts must be fixed after St. Paul's first and before his second imprisonment at Rome, and during his last apostolic progress; probably (as he shows, from a minute investigation of circumstances) some time in the course of A.D. 63. He has endeavoured to fix the place where the book of the Acts was written at Caesarea, where Luke would be enabled to form the work under the same advantageous circumstances in which he had, a few years before, written his Gospel. After all, however, this is a matter of doubtful disputation; and the learned Canon has not been so successful in fixing the place as the time. I rather agree with those who think that Rome was the place where the book was drawn up. Mr. Alford has, I apprehend, gone far to establish this on grounds of high probability, nearly approaching to certainty. As to the date, there is little difference between the two estimates; for Mr. Alford fixes it at the spring of A.D. 63, and the Canon seemingly at the autumn of A.D. 62.

ἡς ἡμέρας ἐντειλάμενος τοῖς ἀποστόλοις διὰ Πνεύματος ἁγίου, οὓς ἐξελέξατο, ἀνελήφθη. 3 ° Οἱς καὶ παροέστησεν ἑαυτὸν ζῶντα, c. ch. 12. 21.

I would not venture to determine any thing. But I am inclined to think, with Mr. Alford, that this book was finally finished at Rome, and among the disciples there. The recent arrival of the Apostle at Rome, and the leisure which succeeded to it,—a leisure that, considering the lengthened period during which the Apostle's cause would be likely to remain undecided, might continue for some time,—would afford the Apostle an opportunity of rendering important assistance to St. Luke in digesting and arranging the materials,—which he had probably long been collecting for the present work, so as at last to expedite the completing and sending it forth,—especially since the threatening prospect of the Church's affairs, at a period when the Emperor Nero had grown more and more ferocious, might well warn both the Apostle, and his faithful disciple (who alone was with him, 2 Tim. iv. 11), that the long lowering political storm was soon likely to burst, which would expose the Church to the direct assaults of heathen persecution; and accordingly, that whatever materials had been collected should be forthwith arranged and speedily sent forth, or the faithful might never have the benefit of them. As to the canonical authority of the present book, it is closely connected with that of the Gospel; on which see the Introduction thereto. For the Chronology of the events therein (which has been the subject of much discussion among the learned, but forms no part of the plan of this work), suffice it to refer the reader, who wishes to enter deeply into the subject, to the Treatises of Anger, Lips. 1833, and Wieseler, Gotting. 1848, or to the Epitome of their contents in Dr. Davidson's Introduction to the New Test. vol. ii., and to Mr. Alford's Tabular representation of the Chronology.

To advert to the three other topics connected with the book, 1) for what readers, and with what object written; 2) the sources of its narrative; 3) the genuineness of the work, and the date of its text.—On the first of these topics there is no need to dilate. The immediate purpose of this book, like that of the Gospel, was of course the information of the venerated friend of the writer, Theophilus. It is at its commencement styled, by implication, a δευτέρου λόγου, thus forming a continuation of the πρώτου λόγου, the Gospel; and accordingly the specification of the purpose of writing prefixed to the Gospel, ἵνα ἐκγινώσκῃς ἀσφάλειαν, must have been meant also for this book. But though each work is described as written for Theophilus, yet it was only such as being inscribed to him. Each must have been meant for all such inquiring Christians generally, whether Jews or Gentiles, as should feel an interest in the origin and progress, the gradual development of the religion which they professed, being intended, as Dr. P. Smith expresses it (Scrip. Test. vol. iii. p. 5), “to give a collection of most important particular memoirs referring to the commencement of the Christian dispensation; detailing some events in the history of the Churches at Jerusalem and Antioch, and occupying the latter half with many interesting transactions of St. Paul.”

In short, the purpose of this book seems to have been mainly two-fold; 1st, to give an authentic account of the fulfilment of the promise of the Father, by the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost; and the results of that august event, both in the miraculous powers and supernatural gifts bestowed by the Spirit on the first preachers of the word and professors of the Gospel; and the dispersion of the Gospel among both Jews and Gentiles. 2ndly, to present such an authentic narrative of the early progress of the Gospel, as should establish the full claim of the Gentiles to be admitted into the Church of Christ—a claim even yet disputed by the Jews. Furthermore, in a general way, to afford matter of confirmation to various accounts in the Gospel, and supply irrefragable evidence of the Divine origin of the Christian religion.

To advert to the sources;—much has been said by the German writers, and their condenser, Mr. Alf.; πολλὰ μὲν ἰσθλὰ μαρτυρεῖται, πολλὰ δὲ λυγρὰ. But even such portions as the former require more “bolting and sifting to the very bran” than I can at present bestow. A few such remarks as at present have occurred to me must suffice. It seems not improbable that (as Mr. Alford supposes) of Paul's last voyage and shipwreck a regular journal was kept by Luke, and the particulars set down during the winter months spent at Malta; or, rather, as I would suggest, that memoranda, journal-wise, of the voyage were set down at the time; and, as soon afterwards as occasion would permit, were enlarged and digested, and then laid up for future use. I am also inclined to think, with Mr. Alf., that, during that long stay at Malta, the purpose, already previously formed, of framing a δευτέρου λόγου, was ripened, and partly carried into effect, under the influence and direction of the Holy Spirit, together with the counsel and aid of St. Paul. Of course the above account of the voyage (ch. xxvii.) would be the first written portion of the book. I agree with Mr. Alf., that at any time during that or the subsequent travels, or during the two years spent at Rome, Luke may have filled in those parts of the narrative of events, which occurred during his absence from Paul, from the oral dictation of the Apostle. See more in Alf., from whose researches it would appear, that if Cæsarea was not, as Canon Tate thinks it was, the place where the present book was drawn up, yet that there, and in the neighbourhood, up to the period of Paul's apprehension, much important matter was derived from the Apostles at Jerusalem, James and others, and gathered for his Gospel, and not a little for the early part of the δευτέρου λόγου,—the Acts.

I agree with Mr. Alf., that in the Speeches of Peter recorded in the Acts there are sufficient peculiarities to identify them as the sentiments and diction of the Apostle of the Circumcision, while at the same time there is enough of Luke's own style and expression to show that the whole has been carefully worked over [rather, worked up into form, and polished in the phraseology] by his hand. As to the question canvassed by Mr. Alf., whether Luke used any written documents in forming the former part of the Acts,—

I am disposed to admit that it may have been so; and that ch. ii. has some appearance of having been derived from a memoir drawn up by trustworthy persons. The Letters, ch. xv. 23—29 (xxiii. 26—30), must have been such; also some of the Discourses, as that of Peter, xi. 5—17, inasmuch as they contain expressions foreign to Luke's style; and so also in the other speeches of Peter, containing many points of similarity to both the Apostles' Epistles. Whether Luke had at this time met with Peter personally is, Alf. thinks, very questionable. It is, however, far from improbable, though here not recorded, or even alluded to. I agree with Mr. Alf., that for the contents of ch. vi. and viii. (if not for some events previous to ch. vi.) Luke rested much on the authority of Philip the Deacon (one of the Seven Evangelists, xxi. 8), from whom he would gather not a little for the first part of the Acts, which is occupied in narrating the events that happened at Cæsarea. Accordingly, when Luke was there, and in that neighbourhood, for some time at the period above mentioned, he could not fail to gather much information from trustworthy authorities. As to the sources of the important Apology of Stephen, ch. vii.; the narrative of the conversion of Saul, ch. ix.; the awful death of Herod Agrippa, ch. xii.; the Discourse to the Ephesian Elders, xx. 18—36; the Apology before the Jews, xxi. 1—22; the Apology before Felix, xxiv. 10—21; the Apology before Agrippa and Festus, xxvi. 1—29, all these will be briefly treated on in the Commentary at the several places. As to the conclusions deduced by Mr. Alf. from his examination of those speeches, to one of them I entirely accede; namely, that they are not in any case composed by Luke for the speaker [as in the Greek and Latin historians], but are really in substance as they were uttered by the speakers, being for the most part written down in the very words uttered. To another conclusion, that 'the diction of the speeches was more or less modified by Luke's hand,' I find nothing to object, except to the term 'modified;' for which I would prefer 'corrected in Grecism.' But at the third, that 'the differences apparent in the greater or less amount of editorial diction in the different speeches correspond to the alleged occasions and mode of delivery there,' I pause, because in such discussions it is hardly possible for the examiner not to draw too much from his own imagination, and in many ways to attempt that which it is hardly possible to fully accomplish.

—To advert to the genuineness of the book, and to the style of its text. On the former, suffice it to say that not a few of the earlier Fathers,—as Ignatius, Irenæus, the Lyonnesse Fathers (in their Epistle to the Churches), Clem. Alex., and Tertullian, recognize it as a part of the Canon of Scripture, and often quote it as the work of St. Luke.

As to the state of the text;—that found in D and E of the uncial MSS., together with those of the same Family in the cursives, is distinguished by very many interpolations, some of considerable length, espec. those found in D. A few only of these are worthy of note, as having some semblance of genuineness; while the far greater number are plainly derived from marginal Scholia, or from critical alterations suggested by corrupt Latin copies. Indeed, as to the whole question concerning those insertions, even Mr. Alf. admits that 'considerable doubt hangs over it.' For myself I have always thought that, with very few exceptions, they are unauthorized and presumptuous interpolations; and my collations of all the Lamb. and all the Mus. copies of this book, and the long and laborious study which I bestowed, both at the time of collation and since, have only served to confirm my former opinion. There is one feature, in a critical point of view, very remarkable in this book, namely, the east number of various readings,—greater than in any other book of the New Test., except the Apocalypse; somewhat greater than even in St. Mark's Gospel. To produce this state of things many causes have contributed, some widely differing from those which occasioned the same effect in St. Mark's Gospel, and which it would be foreign to the present occasion to enter into at large. As to the four reasons suggested by Mr. Alf., in one I am ready to concur, namely, that in places where ecclesiastical order or usage was in question, insertions or omissions were made to suit the habits or views of the Church in after times; and also that in passages where St. Paul is relating over again to different audiences the details of his miraculous Conversion, one passage is in some copies found pieced from the other, so as to produce verbal accordance,—a case exactly similar to what occurs so often in the Gospels. But this is chiefly found in the cursive MSS. of a late period; rarely in the more ancient. As to the other two reasons, where he remarks that in the many backward references to the Gospel history, and anticipations of statements and expressions occurring in the Epistles, Correctors have tried their hands at assimilating, and, as they thought, correcting the various accounts; and where the narrative simply related facts, any act or word apparently unworthy of the apostolic agent is found modified, for the sake of decorum; in the former of these reasons there is some truth; but in the latter very little, and that mixed with exaggeration; and the blame, to whatever amount it rises, attaches far more to the Codices, which Tisch. and Alf. take as their especial guides in forming their text, especially D, E, F, G; as will abundantly appear from the critical notes which I have interspersed, and which have been, from the limited extent of the work, confined to a comparatively few passages, generally of some importance. I must not conclude without adverting to the style of this book, which is neat and perspicuous, and differs not materially from that of the later Greek writers in the Alexandrian and the κοινή διάλεκτος, bearing a similarity to the style of Diod. Sic. or Arrian. As to the speeches of St. Peter and St. Paul, 'there is in them (as a most competent judge of such a matter, the very learned Valcknaer, says), if not the finish of composition found in the Greek orators, a simple dignity in the historical parts, and a grandeur in the didactic, to which it were impossible to add aught.'

1. 1—3. Introduction to the work. Here we have that irregular use of μὲν, without a δὲ in the apodosis, which is also found at Rom. i. 8. x. 1. 2 Cor. xii. 12, and sometimes in the Classical writers; on which see examples in Matthiæ, Kühner, and Winer, Gr. N. T.; though the δὲ might have been expected with τὸν δὲ οὖν, in order to place the one in due order with the other. But Luke chose to unite one with the other by a recapitulation of the concluding account in the Gospel, so as to introduce the commencing one of what may be termed its sequel, or continuation. There is a very similar Introduction to a Dissertation of Philo, Quod omnis liber probus, commencing with ὁ μὲν πρότερος λόγος ἦν—ἡ Θεοῦτος, &c., where, in like manner, the latter member of the sentence, together with the δὲ, is wanting. Λόγος, in the sense, narrative of words or actions, history, as here, occurs often in the Class. writers, and also in the New Test. at Acts v. 24. John iv. 39. Hence historians were anciently called λογηποιοί; and λόγον ποιεῖσθαι signified to compose a history. By πάντων must be understood 'all things necessary'; see John xx. 30, seq. xxi. 25, with due limitation, so as to denote 'all things of due importance,'—since Luke has, in his Gospel, omitted many discourses and transactions recorded by the other Evangelists. 'Ἦρξάτο' is supposed by the Commentators to be pleonastic, as in Mark vi. 7. Matt. xii. 1, and other passages. But it is, properly speaking, never pleonastic. In several of those passages it signifies, 'took in hand;' and in others, including the present, it has an intensive force, intimating the great labour and difficulty of the work undertaken.

2. ἄχρι ἧς ἡμέρας—ἔξελέξατο] The true construction and sense is, ἐντεταλόμενος διὰ Πνεύματος ἀγ. τοῖς ἀποστόλοις οὓς ἐξελ.: and render, 'until the day, when having, by the authority and with the co-operation of the Holy Ghost, given all necessary directions to the Apostles whom he had chosen, He was taken up [into heaven].' Comp. Luke xxiv. 51.

3. παρίστησεν εἰ. ἧ.] 'sese exhibuit,' 'proved or evidenced himself to be alive.' A use of παρίσταναι occurring also at xxiv. 13, and frequently in the Classical writers. Τεκμηρίους, 'clear and evident proofs;' ὀπτανόμενος, from ὀπταίνωμαι, cognate with ὀπτομαι, is rarely found elsewhere, except two or three times in the Sept. Δι' ἡμερῶν τισσ., meaning, at intervals during that period, though on no less than eight different occasions; 1. to Mary Magdalene and the other Mary (Matt. xxviii. 1—9); 2. to the two disciples on their way to Emmaus (Luke xxiv. 15); 3. to Peter (Luke xxiv. 34); 4. to ten of the Apostles (Thomas being absent) (Luke xxiv. 36. John xx. 19, 24); 5. to the eleven Apostles (John xx. 26); 6. to seven of the Apostles in Galilee, at the sea of Tiberias (John xxi. 4); 7. to James (1 Cor. xv. 7); 8. when the Apostles and Disciples were assembled together, and when he led them out as far as Bethany (Luke xxiv. 50); from whence he ascended to heaven in the presence of above 500 brethren at once, 1 Cor. xv. 6.

4—11. Last discourses of our Lord.

4. συναλιζόμενος] MSS. A, B, C, D, E, and several cursives, with some Lamb. and Mus. copies, have συναυλ., which is preferred by some Critics, but without reason; since it is evidently a gloss on the received reading, which is rather difficult, and therefore variously interpreted. The only true sense of the word (derived from ἄλσις, confertim, 'being collected, or assembled, with [them],') as in Hdot. i. 62, and v. 15. Constr. ἀλιζόμενος σὺν αὐτοῖς, παρήγγειλεν [αὐτοῖς]. In the words following there is a transition from the oratio directa to obliqua. τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν τ. Π., i. e. 'the promised gift of the Father' (Joel ii. 28) spoken of just after,—that of the Holy Spirit. Thus they were περιμένειν, 'to wait about (circa),' 'to wait for;' the περι imparting an intensity of sense.

5. ὑμεῖς δὲ βαπτισθ.] Thus adducing the words of John the Baptist as reported Luke iii. 16; in order to intimate to them, as Mr. Alf. observes, that 'as John's mission was accomplished by baptizing with water, so now the main end of his own Baptism, with the Holy Ghost, was just being accomplished.' Calvin well remarks, that our Lord here speaks of the Pentecostal effusion as being the baptism with the Holy Ghost, because it was quasi totius Ecclesiæ communis baptismus, representing the future work of regeneration on individuals, just on the point of commencing.

6. οἱ μὲν οὖν συνελθ.] Meaning the persons denoted by the expression συναλιζ.—αὐτοῖς supra. Εἰ, num., 'whether,'—as we use in common language 'if' for 'whether.' The idiom, as infra vii. 1, may here have arisen from the blending of the oratio directa with the indirecta; for, according to the rules of regular composition, it would have been written ἐπηρώτων εἰ ἀποκαθιστάνει, or ἀποκαθιστάνοι, as Mark vii. 23, ἐπηρώτα αὐτὸν, εἰ τι βλάπτει, and Acts xvii. 11, ἀνακρίνοντας, εἰ ἔχοι ταῦτα οὕτως.

That the words ἐν τῷ χρόνῳ τούτῳ are not, as has been supposed, pleonastic, is plain from the answer to the question, which, though not direct, has yet an evident reference to these words; nay, as Mr. Alford observes, the stress of the question is in those words. The sense intended to be conveyed is simply, 'Is the time now come for thy restoring; and is this the very season for it?' The Apostles seem then to have thought that Christ would forthwith restore the kingdom of Judæa to its former greatness, and would conjoin therewith the spiritual kingdom spoken of by the Prophets (see Is. i. 26. ix. 7. Jerem. xxiii. 6. xxxiii. 15, 17. Dan. vii. 13, seq. Hos. iii. 4, seq. Amos ix. 11. Zech. ix. 9); and accordingly, that the Gentiles who expected salvation must first embrace Judaism.

7. Our Lord was pleased to return no direct answer to their inquiry, because such was unnecessary; rather informing them of what it was really important for them to know. The words may best be rendered, 'It is not yours' (i. e. your part, or province) 'to know the times or seasons; which [= 'for those'] the Lord hath set [or 'kept'] in his own power' (i. e. 'reserved at his own disposal'). The terms χρόν. and καιρ. are admitted to be not synonymous; but to say, with Meyer and Alford, that καιρός is always 'a definite, limited space of time, and involves the idea of transitoriness,' so far from elucidating, rather darkens the sense. Καιρός (as Lennep says) from κάω, passio, means a point, and, as applied to time, a point of time, ἀκμή τοῦ χρόνου, which view is placed beyond doubt by Plato, p. 414, A, who there defines καιρός by χρόνον ἀκμή πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον, 'the point of time in respect of opportunity for doing a thing.' So that here καιρός is said per opamothesis, or the former term, (unless there be a Hendiadys by ἢ being put for καὶ), as in Diog. Laert. l. v. 3, 7, κατὰ τοὺς χρόνους καὶ καιρούς. There was, it is plain, a gentle rebuke for indulging a vain curiosity to know what the Lord had chosen to keep to himself. Comp. Soph. in Teret fragm. v., Θνητὴν δὲ φύσιν χρὴ θνητὰ φρονεῖν, Τούτου κατειδόμενος ὅς οὐκ ἴσθις, Πλὴν Διός, οὐδεὶς τῶν μολλόστων Ταμίας, ὅτι χρὴ τεταλίσθαι.

8. 'Eos revocat tam ad Dei promissionem quam ad mandatum; quod optimum frandis curiositati remedium erat. Jubet ergo discipulos patienter expectare quod Deus promittit, et intentos esse ad munus, quod Deus inunxit consequendum.' Calv. Hence it was, as Theoph. and Beza say, both a promise and a prediction.

By δύναμις is meant, as the following words prove, spiritual power of every kind, the δύναμις ἐξ ὕψους promised Luke xxiv. 49; whether the miraculous gifts of the Spirit are here adverted to (as Whitty thinks) is much to be doubted.

— ἔσεσθέ μοι μάρτυρες] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit μου, from 4 uncial MSS. and others, as Scholz says; but where they are I know not: I find not one in Mill, Wets., or Griesb., and not one in the Lamb. and Mus. copies. Its absence is confirmed by xiii. 31, and Rom. i. 9. Phil. i. 8, though in those passages the MSS.

fluctuate between μου and μοι, though Tisch. retains μου, and Lachm. once edits μοι. However, μοι here is strongly supported by xxii. 15, where there is no var. lect.; and the Pesch. Syr., Vulg., and Arab. Versions here support μοι, and such is probably the true reading at Phil. i. 8, and Rom. i. 9; for the dative better suits the absolute construction than the genit. In the case of εγγίμεν, as in Acts v. 32. xiii. 31, the γενίτ. is preferable.

The ἕως ἐσχάτου (scil. μέρου) τῆς γῆς was probably understood by the Disciples of that part of the East only, namely Syria. But our Lord, doubtless, meant it of the whole world (see Pa. xix. 5. Isa. xlix. 6, and comp. Matt. xxviii. 19), intimating the order of its propagation, agreeably to his Father's promise, Pa. ii. 8, of 'giving Him the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession.'

9. καὶ νεφέλῃ ὑπέλαβε] 'and [then] a cloud received him.' In ὑπέλ. there is a significatio pragmatice for ὑπῆλθε καὶ ὑπέλαβε, 'susceptum abstatuit'; comp. Herodot. i. 24 (cited by Wetstein), τὸν δὲ δελφίνα λέγουσι ὑπελαβόντα ἐξινεῖκα ἐπὶ Ταιναρον.

10. ἀτενίζοντες ἦσαν] 'were fixedly gazing at it.' Ἀτινίχ. must be construed, not, as Kuinoel directs, with πορευομένων, but with εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, as is plain from the other passages of the New Test. where the word occurs.

— ἐν ἐσθῇτι λ.] Lachm. and Tisch. edit, from 3 uncial MSS. and 3 cursives, ἐσθήσεις λαοκαίς, seemingly confirmed by Luke xxiv. 4, ἐν ἐσθήσεσιν ὁστρον; yet there Lachm. himself edits ἐν ἐσθῇτι ὁστρον, from some of the most ancient MSS., but without reason; for the plural form may very well have been there used, since, however rare, it is found also in Philo, t. ii. 158; Strabo, p. 155, and other writers referred to by Dindorf in Steph. Thes. in v.; to which might have been added 2 Macc. iii. 33, ἐν ταῖς ἐσθήσεσιν ἰσπολισμένοι. If St. Luke intended here (as in his Gospel, xxiv. 4) to use the plur., he might have written ἐσθῆσι, as in Euseb., a form occurring in Diodor. and some MSS. of Strabo, and the Epitome of Athenaeus. And thus the reading ἐσθῇτι might easily arise from error on the part of the scribes; though considering that ἐν ἐσθῇτι λαμπρῶ occurs again at x. 30, sine var. lect., and is found in James ii. 2, and especially since it is supported by all the MSS. except a very few, confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Version, it is probably the true reading.

is in some measure inherent in ἵστηναι, but which is usually expressed by something further added, as in a similar passage of Aristoph. cited by Valcknaer, τί πάσχει, ἄνδρες; ἵστατ' ἐκ-παπληγμένοι.

— οὕτως ἐλεύσεται.] Namely, visibly and on the clouds; see Dan. vii. 13; and comp. Matt. xxiv. 30; see also Bengel's note.

¹⁴ σὺν γυναιξί.] Render, not (with some) 'their wives,' but 'the women;' many of whom, however, were the wives of the Apostles or disciples, and the rest consisted of those who had followed Christ out of Galilee, and ministered to him of their substance.

¹⁵ ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ταύταις.] Namely, one of the ten days intervening between the Ascension and the feast of Pentecost.

— For ἦν τε MSS. C, D⁸, and 1 cursive, No.

16, read ἦν δι, to which Scholz adds, 'et alii;' but, as on a recent occasion, the good Professor was writing without thought. No other MS. is adduced by any other of the Editors; and of the Lamb. and Mus. copies not one has δι. It is, however, of no consequence; since, though δι be more suitable, yet internal evidence is against its authenticity, and the reading arose, I doubt not, from critical alteration. In fact, the use of the simple copula τι, where we should expect some other Particle, is of very frequent occurrence in this book. Instances, however, are not wanting in the Class. writers, especially Thucyd. At ὄχλος it should seem that the Article cannot well be dispensed with, though the collators have not added it from any copies; and I can only adduce one,—Mus. 5115. However, I suspect that Luke wrote τ' ὁ, and thus the ὁ being joined with τ would be taken for s.

— By ὄνομ. are meant the names of persons on the list of disciples (comp. Lucian Necyom. 4, τινα ὄχλον ὀνομάτω, though there the sense is, 'a multitude of names'); and, accordingly, I cannot approve of the alteration of reading by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. just before of ἀδελφῶν for μαθητῶν, from only MSS. A, B, C, and 5 cursives, with the Vulg., and other later Versions; to which I cannot make any addition from Lamb. and Mus. copies. Μαθ. ought to be retained, as being found in all the MSS. but 8, and having the support of the Pesch. Syr. and Arab. Versions, and, what is more, as we have seen, being favoured by the context. Alford's notion that μαθ. was an alteration to remove a tautology, is a vain supposition.

¹⁶—26. In this address Peter proposes to the disciples the choosing of another Apostle, in the room of the Judas Iscariot, to complete the original number. He reminds them that the words, not so much of David, as of the Holy Spirit speaking by David, had been fulfilled. Of which fulfilment he adduces Ps. lxi. 25, and cix. 8, as examples—probably having in mind also Ps. xli. 9, and lv. 12—and intimates, that as Scripture has been fulfilled in the one case, so it now remains to be fulfilled in the other, by the business for which they were then assembled. The terms πληρωθ. and προεῖπε περι will not permit us to suppose, with many recent Commentators, that what is said by David of his treacherous companion is here, on account of the coincidence of the cases, only applied, by accommodation, to Judas; but we must suppose, at the least, with Grot. and others, that what was prophesied by the Holy Spirit was meant primarily of David's enemies and treacherous companions; but, secondarily and typically, of Christ's enemies and treacherous friends. However, with regard to the former of the two passages, the formula allegandi will not admit of this limited view; and words of the same Apostle, v. 16, ἰδοὺ πληρωθῆναι τὴν γραφὴν ταύτην ἣν προεῖπε τὸ Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον διὰ στόματος Δαυὶδ περὶ Ἰούδα τοῦ γενομένου ὁδηγοῦ τοῖς συλλαβοῦσι τὸν Ἰησοῦν, quite forbid it: whence it is quite clear, as Hoffm. shows, 1) 'Psalmum hunc, ex communi Ecclesie Judaicæ suffragio Petri tempore pro prophetico habitum fuisse, in quo Spiritus S. prædixit eventura tempore N. T.; 2) 'Quum Petrus expressè assertit Spiritum S. per os Davidis, ista περὶ Ἰούδα, de Juda Proditoris, prædixisse, cum eorum sententia id conciliari nequit, qui sensum litteralem Davidi, et mysticum saltem Christi vindicant.' As to the latter passage, the formula allegandi here, as in the other, forbids the sense of accommodation, and further, as Hoffm. well observes, 'Accuratè etiam in Judam quadrat hæc predictio; unde Petrus mox v. 21, ista ex hoc loco concludit: uti prior Scripture locus Pa. lxix. per interitum Judæ impleri debuit, ita et alterum Pa. cix. de translatione muneris ejus in alium impleri jam oportet, ut scilicet ἔταρος divino consilio jam designatus, et nunc a nobis per sortem explorandus, illi succedat.' Hence, as Grot. truly observes, the ancient Church called this Psalm the Iscariotic, and used it in the Form for the deposition of Bishops from their Episcopal Order. That Peter was able thus authoritatively to speak of Scripture and the Divine purposes before the effusion of the Holy Spirit at the Pentecost, may be ascribed to the peculiar gift involved in the ἐμφύσησι imparted to the Apostles, recorded in John xv. 21, where see note.

17. ὅτι κατηριθ. There is in ὅτι causal (as often in γάρ causal) a reference to something left to be supplied by the hearer, or reader; so here, 'for [betrayer as he was] he was numbered up with us, and received the appointment to this ministry, or office.' According to this explanation there is a reference to, and what may throw light on the terms, ἡ ἑταυρία αὐτοῦ, and ἡ ἐπισκοπή αὐτοῦ, which were evidently in the Apostle's mind.

For σὺν, Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit. ἐν, from 6 cursives. Scholz adds, 'et multis aliis;' but those many seem, as on other occasions, to be all but imaginary. I cannot find one recorded by any other Editor, and not one in the Lamb., Mus., or Trin. Coll. copies, nor do I think the word genuine. Alf., indeed, pronounces the σὺν to be 'a correction for better Greek.' But so far from that being the case, I cannot find a single instance of καταριθ. followed by σὺν in any Class. writer, but with ἐν a host, from Plato downwards. The reader need not now be told that this is one of the Critical corrections so perpetually occurring in those uncials and cursives.

18. The best Expositors are agreed that this and the next verse are parenthetical, and to be regarded as the words, not of Peter, but of Luke; who thus introduces some circumstances respecting this treachery; namely, what see Judas made of the wages of iniquity, and what was his end. The obscurity of which the Commentators complain has been chiefly occasioned by the sense at v. 17 being not sufficiently developed. If the Apostle had subjoined the words ἐξ ἧς παρίβη, πορευθῆναι εἰς τὸν ἴδιον τόπον, which he does afterwards at v. 25, all would have been plain. It is evident that he had them in his mind. Mr. Alf., indeed, positively asserts that v. 18 cannot be regarded as inserted by the Evangelist, for these reasons, 1) that the place would be most unnatural for a historical note; 2) that the αἰς οὖν forbids the supposition; 3) that the style of the verse is rhetorical, and not narrative. Of these reasons the 1st and 3rd are of very little weight; and the 2nd, considering the irregular use of the Particles in the New Test., does not amount to much, and is overbalanced by the fact, that the next verse is evidently from St. Luke; and since v. 18 is closely connected by καὶ, it must go with the preceding verse. Were it a parenthetical insertion by St. Luke, the καὶ would be worse than useless. But Mr. Alf. was induced to broach this novelty in order to induce his readers to 'see clearly that Luke could not have been acquainted with the Gospel of Matthew at this time.' But credat Judæus Apella! As to the alleged discrepancy, see my note on Matt. xxvii. 5, in my Recens. Syn. and my present work, where the reader will, I trust, find it not so irreconcilable as to compel him to embrace Mr. Alford's view as to the matter in question.

18. ἐκτίσαστο] i.e. 'was the means of its being purchased,'—namely, with the money received from the chief priests. For the best Commentators are agreed that this is to be referred to that idiom of Scripture, by which an action is sometimes said to be done by a person, who was only the occasion of its being done. Comp. Gen. xlii. 38. Exod. xxiii. 8. 1 Kings xiv. 16. Jer. xxxviii. 23. Rom. xiv. 15. 1 Cor. vii. 16. 1 Tim. iv. 16. If this be thought too harsh, the expression may be considered as a figurative catachresis, by which Judas might be said to have bought the field with the wages of iniquity, by receiving such wages as might have bought the field, had he lived. So Achmet Oneirocrit.: 'Si quis viderit, quod inveniit vel eunerit plurimas oves lac præbentes, inveniet opes et gaudium et servos pro ipsarum ovium numero.' Comp. 2 Kings v. 26, which is quite to the purpose.

— πρηνὲς γινόμενος ἐλάκησε &c.] Here πρηνὲς γ. means, 'tumbling headlong'; ἐλάκησι is for διεβράγῃ, as in Aristoph. Nub. 409, ἢ δ' ἀνιφύσατο—ἴτα διαλακῆσα, and Pac. 318 and 385, λακῆσομαι, 'cracked and burst,' burst with a crack.' So Acta Thomæ, § 33, ὁ δὲ δράκων φυσήσας ('being blown up,' viz. by the poison he had drunk) ἐλάκησε καὶ ἀπίθανα καὶ ἐξεχύθη ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἡ χολή. Theod. Stud. p. 405, ἐλάκῃσας πρηνῆς. Chrysa. p. 768, μέσον λακῆσας ἀπώλετο. Comp. Cholin, fol. 56, 2, 'Ararnus quidam vidit hominem qui de lecto in platam decidit, et ruptus est ejus venter, et viceris ejus effluerunt.'

20. Of the two clauses of this verse, the first is taken from Pa. lxi. 26, with only a slight variation. It is a highly figurative mode of expressing utter destruction; since that any one's house should become a perpetually deserted abode, is a very lively image of utter ruin. Ἐπαυλις (corresponding to the Heb. קִנְיָה) denoted originally 'a shepherd's hut,' but afterwards came to denote a habitation generally. So Apoll. Rhod. Arg. i. 800 (cited by Valcknaer), Δήμου—πῖρθισκον ἑπαυλίας.

The latter clause is taken from Pa. cix. 8, where ἐπισκοπὴ denotes 'the superintendence of any thing done, a charge, or office;' with allusion to that of Apostleship, formerly held by Judas. That both the passages, and espec. the former, are to be considered as strict fulfilments of prophecy, has been shown supra v. 16. Mr. Alf., while he acknowledges that Pa. lxi. is eminently a Messianic one, adopts the view which is there shown to be untenable,—that the literal sense is of David, and the mystical of Christ. The mystical reference to the Messiah he represents as if resting 'on the universal Canon of Old Testament interpretation;'—a very precarious sort of view.

— λάβοι] Lachm. and Tisch. read λαβίτω, from 4 uncial MSS. and a few others. But the authority for it is insufficient, espec. considering that λάβοι is found in the Sept., though λαβίτω is supported by the Hebrew original, which Luke may have intended to follow, but which the Critics may have brought in from the Sept.

21. The Apostle now proceeds to declare more expressly what steps they should take in the matter.

— δεῖ οὖν] 'Accordingly,' 'such being the case;' 'Judas' place being vacant, it is necessary by the will of God, that another should take it.'

— τῶν συνελθόντων] Supply ἐκ, or ἀπό. Render: 'of those who have associated with us,' 'formed part of the same society.' In εἰσῆλθε καὶ ἐξῆλθε we have an idiom formed on the Hebr. נָסַח וְנָסַח and equiv. to versatus est; and which is a condensed mode of expression for ἐν φ᾽ εἰσῆλθεν ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, καὶ ἐξῆλθεν ἀφ' ἡμῶν, occurring also Eurip. Phœn. 543, ἐς οἶκον—εἰσῆλθε, ἐξῆλθε, scil. ἐξ οἴκων. Eur. Hel. 1183, ἐξίων τέ κ' αἰσίων δόμων, from which passages and the present it is plain that this idiom involves a sense of what is caducary in the course of life.

22. ἀρξάμενος ἀπό] This idiomatic use of the Participle, recurring at viii. 35 and x. 37, is found in Luke xxiii. 5, and xxiv. 27, 47, but not elsewhere in the New Test., except in the disputed portion of John viii. 9; also in Sept., Gen. xlv. 12, and often in the Class. writers.

23. ἔστησαν] 'set up, proposed,' as we say 'nominated.'

24. καρδιογνώστα πάντων] 'searcher of all hearts.' It has been doubted whether this should be referred to God the Father, or God the Son. Certainly the appellation is not unfrequent in the Old Test., Josephus, and Philo, as applied to the former. But that it is equally applicable to the latter, appears from John xvi. 30, where see note. See also John i. 48—50. ii. 24. vi. 69. xxi. 17. Apoc. ii. 23. Κύριος is an usual appellation of Christ our Saviour; and besides that the reference in question is confirmed by the connexion with ver. 21, there would be a peculiar propriety in the eleven addressing this prayer to their now glorified Lord, as being the Head of the Church, and He who originally appointed the other Apostles.

— ἀνάδειξον] 'declare.' It is well observed by Chrysostom, 'that they do not say ἐλέξαι, but ἀνάδειξον τὸν ἐκλεγέντα, because every thing has been known and determined by God long before it has even entered into the thoughts of men.' Comp. Joseph. Antt. vi. 5, 6, ἐγὼ μὲν ἀπώδειξα (for ἀνέδ., 'have appointed') τοῦτον, ὃν αὐτοὶ (ὁ Θεὸς) ἐξελέξατο. The reading at the end of the verse, which I have adopted with all the Critical Editors, from Wets. downwards, on strong authority, I find also in all the Lamb. and almost all the Mus. copies, also in Trin. Coll. B, x. 16.

25. τὸν κλῆρον τῆς διακονίας τ. καὶ ἀποστ.] 'the appointment to this ministry.' This is exegetical of τῆς διακονίας just before. Παρέβη, 'abandoned, deserted'; by a metaphor taken from a traveller who deserts the right road (comp. 2 Pet. ii. 15),—a very rare use of the word, of which I know no other example except in Joseph. Antt. xiv. 9, 2, οὐδὲν πρὸς Ὑ. εὐνοίας καὶ πίστει παρέβη.

— πορευθῆναι εἰς τὸν τόπον τ. ἰδ.] These words have been variously explained; but the common interpretation (by which τὸν τόπον τὸν ἰδίον is taken to mean the place suited to him,—namely, the place of destruction) seems to be the true one; as being recommended by its simplicity, and its suitableness to the usage both of the Jewish and Heathen writers, and confirmed by several passages of the Apostolical Fathers; e.g. Ignat. Epist. ad Magn. c. v. Clem. Rom., Ep. 1 ad Corinth., p. 24, ed. Wotton. Polycarp, Ep. ad Philipp. c. ix. So also the Rabbinical writer, Basl Turim, on Numb. xxiv. 25, who says, 'Balaam ivit in locum suum,' i. e. Gehenna.

26. ἔδωκαν κλήρους] The exact mode in which they cast the lots cannot be determined; various being the methods by which the ancients practised the sortilegium. They used to cast slips of parchment, or pieces of the tabulae scriptoriae, with the names inscribed, into an urn. And this kind of sortitio most Commentators here understand. Now the lots are said to be theirs on whom the lots are cast, and to fall upon him who comes off successful in the sortitio. Συγκατεψηφίζουσιν properly denotes 'to choose by common suffrages,' and then 'to number with,' or 'unto,' συγκαταριθμεῖν. This deciding of a doubtful matter by casting lots was understood to be a mode of obtaining the will of the Almighty; and was, therefore, from the earliest times, resorted to, in the creation of kings, or the appointment of priests. Comp. Lev. xvi. 8. Num. xxvi. 54. Josh. xiii. 6.

— αὐτῶν] Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. edit αὐτοῖς, from four uncial MSS. and seven others. And, indeed, internal evidence may seem to be in favour of the reading; though I do not yet see how a very satisfactory sense can be elicited from αὐτοῖς; for the lots were not given to the persons on whom the lots were cast, but to those who had to put them into the urn, and to super-tend their taking out; unless, indeed (as Beza supposes), the lots were cast by the persons themselves by the casting of dice. But that needs proof; and the sense thus arising is not sufficiently weighty: whereas αὐτῶν yields an excellent sense. The lots, or pieces of parchment inscribed with their names, might popularly be called theirs, because they were each to determine which should be called to the apostleship, and the fortunate lot might fall upon, i. e. 'to the advantage of' the person who came off successful in the lotting.

II. 1—4. The descent of the Holy Spirit on the disciples at the day of Pentecost.

1. ἐν τῷ συμπληροῦσθαι] See note on Luke ix. 51. At Πεντηκοστῆς the Commentators suppose an ellipsis of ἡμέρας or ἰορτῆς. But there is perhaps no ellipse at all; Πεντῆς, having become by use a substantive. On this feast see my Lex.

— ἦσαν ἅπαντες] Meaning, according to some, the Apostles only; but rather, with others, the disciples at large, mentioned at i. 15. For (as Kuinoel observes) the subject at i. 15 is the assembly of the 120 disciples whom Peter addressed, and from whom Matthias was taken into the Apostolic body; while the eleven Apostles are only mentioned en passant. Now with the predicative, which is destitute of a subject, the subject immediately antecedent, and not that of which mention was made en passant, but professionally, ought to be taken. This, too, is clear from ἅπαντες, not οἱτοί, being used. Indeed, the absence of the rest of the disciples on so solemn a festival cannot be supposed. Instead of ὁμοθυμ., MSS. A, B, C, and one cursive, with the Vulg., Copt., and Æthiop. Versions, have ἦσαν ὁμοῦ ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ, which reading has been received into the text by Lachm. and Tisch., ed. 1, but on insufficient grounds; for ὁμοῦ is evidently a mere gloss on ὁμοθυμ., ὁμοθυμ. being occasionally used for ὁμοῦ, as in Job iii. 18. Philo, p. 613, 982, espec. when joined with πάντες or ἅπαντες, so that the two words mean all-together, omnes. But that cannot be the sense here, since the context points at unanimity of purpose rather than identity of place.

2. ὥσπερ φερού. πνοῆς β.] This use of φέρισθαι and its compounds, to denote 'the rushing of violent winds' sweeping along like a hurricane, and associated with the adjectives πολλὰς and βίας, often occurs in the Classical writers.

— τὸν οἶκον] Doubtless the ὑπερώς, supra i. 13, where see note.

3. ὁφθ. αὐτ. διαμεριζ. γλ. ὡσεὶ περ.]

αὐτοῖς διαμεριζόμεναι γλώσσαι ὥσπερ πυρὸς, ἐκάθισέ τε ἐφ' ἓνα ἕκαστον αὐτῶν. ⁴ Καὶ ἐπλήσθησαν ἅπαντες Πνεύματος ἁγίου, καὶ ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἑτέραις γλώσσαις, καθὼς τὸ Πνεῦμα ἐδίδου αὐτοῖς ἀποφθέγγεσθαι. ⁵ Ἦσαν δὲ ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ κατοικοῦντες Ἰουδαῖοι ἄνδρες εὐλαβεῖς ἀπὸ παντὸς ἔθνους τῶν ὑπὸ τὸν οὐρανόν. ⁶ Γενομένης δὲ τῆς φωνῆς ταύτης, συνήλθε τὸ πλήθος, καὶ συνεχύθη ὅτι ἤκουον εἰς ἕκαστος τῇ ἰδίᾳ διαλέκτῳ λαλούντων αὐτῶν. ⁷ Ἐξίσταντο δὲ [πάντες] καὶ ἐθαύμαζον, λέγοντες πρὸς ἀλλήλους· Οὐκ ἰδοὺ πάντες οὗτοί εἰσιν οἱ λαλοῦντες Γαλαῖοι; ⁸ καὶ πῶς ἡμεῖς ἀκούομεν, ἕκαστος τῇ ἰδίᾳ διαλέκτῳ ἡμῶν ἐν ᾗ ἐγεννήθημεν,—⁹ Πάρθοι καὶ Μῆδοι καὶ Ἑλαμίται,

Mark 16. 17.
1 Cor. 12. 10.

Not 'distributing,' which would require διασεχισμένοι, nor 'distributed,' which is not agreeable to the context, but 'distributing,' 'dividing themselves,' as lambent flames of fire, of a tongue-like shape. Expositors got wrong by not perceiving that διαμερ. is not a Passive, but Middle reflex., on which see Kühner's Gr. Gr., p. 398, to whose examples many might be added from the New Test. As to the construction, the mistaking of which set many Expositors wrong, ἐκάθισα does not belong to γλώσσαις, still less τοῦ πυρὸς; but we must supply ἐκάστη, to be taken from ἕκαστος, as follows: ἐκάθισα (scil. ἐκάστη τῶν γλωσσῶν) ἐφ' ἓνα ἕκαστον αὐτῶν. Thus the full sense will be: 'and there were seen as it were tongues of fire, distributing themselves, and settling upon them, one on each.'

These appearances,—not to be ascribed to natural causes, but preternatural,—are to be considered symbolical; representing emblematically, 1. the power and purifying effects of the Holy Spirit (see Matt. iii. 11); and 2. the gift of tongues, the first-fruits of the Spirit.

4. ἤρξαντο λαλεῖν ἑτέραις γλώσσαις] Meaning, languages other than those which they were acquainted with; i. e. such as they were ignorant of, and which are specified at ver. 8—11.

—ἐδίδου α. ἀποφθέγγεσθαι] 'gave them power to speak out,' 'show forth.' Ἀποφθέγγεσθαι is used, even in the Class. writers, both of 'deep and sententious,' and also of 'divinely inspired and prophetic language.' So Jambli. de Myst. iii. 17, ἵνα τῶν ἐνθεοῦσιν τινα ἀνθρώπων τοιαῖ (ὁ Θεός) μετὰ σοφίας λόγον ἀποφθέγγεσθαι,—and Plutarch, de Pythiæ Otac., p. 405, πρῶτον μὲν, ὥσπερ εἰρηται τὰ πλείστα, κακίαια καταλογάδην ἀποφθέγγονται,—and p. 268, ἀποφθέγγεσθαι λόγια καὶ χρησμοφθεῖν τοῖς ἱερῶτασι. So, too, Philo de Joseph., p. 543, relates that, on his having interpreted dreams to Pharaoh, the king said to him, οὐ γὰρ ἀνὺ Θεοῦ ταῦτ' ἀποφθέγγεσθαί μοι δοκεῖς.

5. ἄνδρες εὐλαβεῖς] 'religious men'; εὐλαβῆς being here (as also at Luke ii. 25, and infra x. 2) synonymous with εὐσεβῆς, though the two words properly differ in sense; εὐσεβῆς (as Tittman, de Synon., shows) signifying that reverence of God which is exerted in actions, and especially in acts of worship; while εὐλαβῆς points at the mind itself, and denotes one who is fearful of offending God, whether in word or deed. Hence εὐλαβῆς answers to the German 'Gottesfürchtig,' and our God-fearing; εὐσεβῆς, to our pious, or devout. Both may here be included. They were εὐλαβ., 'God-fearing' persons, because men of real piety, based on heart-religion.

—ἀπὸ παντὸς ἔθνους τ. ὕ. τ. ο.] This is a general, not an universal proposition; and consequently to be taken with due limitation and modification, as merely denoting the various parts of the civilized world, and those known to St. Peter's hearers especially, from each of which there were some, more or less, present at this time.

6. τῆς φωνῆς ταύτης] What particular voice is here meant, has been variously disputed. Some, most improbably, refer it to the ἦχος at ver. 2; while others regard φωνῆς as put for φήμης, by a use occasionally found in the Sept.; thus supposing ταύτης to stand for περὶ τούτου. Since, however, φωνή used for φήμη no where else occurs in the New Test., we may best understand φωνῆς of the noise (ἦχος) produced by the assembled disciples, praying, or conversing, together.—συνεχύθη, 'were thrown into confusion and agitation.' See my Lex. in v. This was their first feeling; their second, we find, was utter amazement.

7. πάντες] This is absent from A, C, D, and many cursives, and has been cancelled by Matth., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., but retained by Griesb.; rightly; at least, there is no authority to warrant more than bracketing the word, which seems not absent from more than about 20 of Mill's, Weta., and Matthæi's MSS. As to Scholz's et alii multi, that kind of testimony from Scholz is of little or no weight. I find it absent from only two,—one Lamb. and one Mus. copy. It could not be, as Alf. says, introduced, though it might be omitted, through negligence. But it might also be cancelled by Critics, who thought the word an overcharged assertion. The full sense is: 'They were amazed at hearing persons, nearly all of one country, and that a rustic and illiterate one, all speaking foreign languages, and addressing each of them in his own tongue.'

8. ἐν ᾗ ἐγεννήθημεν] This seems to be a popular phrase for τῇ ἐγγενεῖ, 'native.' In the words following supply οὗτας. Render: 'We, I say, who are Parthians, Medes, &c. At ἀκούομεν there is a repetition, in order to clear the sense long suspended by the interposed portion at vv. 9, 10, and now evolved.

9. Ἰουδαίαν] What this name can here have to do in a list meant to be composed of foreign nations, it is not easy to see. And as to what has been urged by some in its defence, it proceeds on the supposition that the language of Judæa was a different one from that of Galilee; whereas there is great reason to think that the latter differed from the former only as the English of Middlesex differs from that of Somersetshire. Upon the whole, it is plain that Ἰουδαίαν cannot be accounted for in any satisfactory way, and must (as it has been by the most eminent Critics) be regarded as corrupt; though probably to be emended from some hitherto uncollected MSS. In the mean time I have little doubt that the true reading is, according to the conjecture of Barthius (which had also occurred to myself), Ἰδουμαίαν, — a very similar word to the common reading; for Δ and Μ are perpetually confounded; and part of the M being faded off, would leave a Α; and the abbreviation for δου is often very like to ου. In fact, the words Ἰουδαίαν and Ἰδουμαίαν are often confounded, especially in the MSS. of Josephus. By Idumæa we may understand that tract of country situated on the other side of Jordan and the Dead Sea, and East of Judæa, which was sometimes called Arabia Petrea; and this mode of appellation often occurs in Josephus. And we know that Damascus was now in possession of Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea. There is, indeed, the greatest reason to think that the territory subject to him also extended to that part of Arabia which was N.E. from Judæa, and would thus be almost continuous with Mesopotamia. And it is plain that the countries are mentioned in geographical order, from N.E. to S.W. If Ἰδουμαίαν be adopted and received into the text, I would point and read as follows: Μεσοποταμίαν Ἰδουμαίαν τε, καὶ Καππαδοκίαν, Πόντον τε καὶ Ἀσίαν. At any rate, for Πόντον καὶ τὴν Ἀσίαν I would read, Πόντον τε καὶ Ἀσίαν: for no other name of country in this list has the article, and τε καὶ has twice before occurred in names of countries contiguous. Alf., indeed, remarks that he 'can see no difficulty' in the term 'Judæa' here; and he suggests a mode of taking Ἰουδαίαν, which will justify the reading of the copies; but that is only getting rid of one difficulty for another and greater, and might be ably described by the term 'shifts of interpretation,' which he, at v. 16 supra, politely ascribes to 'high-minded men,' and into which they are, he avers, drawn by maintaining a bad cause.

10. τὰ μέρη—κατὰ Κυρ.] Meaning, it should seem, the district of Libya pertaining to Cyrene (μῆρ. being said of a territory, in respect to, κατὰ, its capital). Thus it will denote what Pliny calls the Lihya Cyreniaca, and others, as Josephus, Pentapolis, from its five cities, in all of which, espec. in the metropolis Cyrene, there were many Jews.

— οἱ ἐπιδημ.] 'sojourners,' as opposed to native inhabitants. So Athen. p. 361 (cited by Wetstein), οἱ Ῥῶμην κατοικοῦντες, καὶ οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες τῇ πόλει. Accordingly, by οἱ ἐπιδημοῦντες Ῥωμαῖοι are to be understood Romans, whether of Jewish birth or proselytes (i. e. such as had either been made citizens of Rome, or Roman proselytes to Judaism) who were sojourning at Jerusalem.

11. τὰ μεγαλεία] See note on Luke i. 49.

12. διηπόρουν] 'were utterly at a loss.' By πάντες are meant the persons just mentioned, namely, all, both the foreigners and foreign Jews, to whom are, in the next verse, opposed the Ἴσραῖοι, meaning those of Judæa.—Τί ἂν θέλοι τοῦτο εἶναι; is a popular idiom, denoting, 'What should this mean?' i. e. How has it arisen? So Hdot. i. 78, τί θέλοι σημαίνειν τὸ τίμα;

Tisch. edits, from MSS. A, B, διηποροῦντο. But the authority for this reading is very insufficient (the Lamb. and Mus. MSS. all have διηπόρουν), and internal evidence is against it, considering that the active form occurs in Luke ix. 7. Acts xi. 24. x. 17, since v. l. In fact, the τὸ arose from an error of the scribe, who, having ἐξίσταντο yet in his head, subjoined the τὸ. Alf., as well as Tisch., adopts διηποροῦντο in his var. lectt., but carelessly leaves διηπόρουν in his text, and characterizes it as 'a correction to more usual form.' He leaves it undetermined whether the Alex. MSS. has δ—το or διηπόρουν, espec. as the Doctors (Scholz, Lachm., and Tisch.) disagree. I can assure him that the Alex. MSS. has διηποροῦντο; and a very slight knowledge of Palæography, with some acquaintance with MSS. themselves, and not mere reports of them, would have made him see what immediately struck me, how the reading arose in those two copies only; for I cannot find that it is in any other.

13. Instead of χλευάζ., a few ancient MSS. (to which I add 2 Lamb., 1 Mus., and Trin. Coll. B, x. 16, and some Fathers), have διαχλ., which is received by almost every Editor from Griesb. downwards, but without sufficient reason; for the external evidence in favour of the new reading is weak, and the internal evidence by no means strong, inasmuch as simple verbs are not unfrequently changed into compounds, to communicate a stronger sense, or for greater elegance; and some compounds into simples, through carelessness of scribes. And χλευάζω occurs more than once elsewhere in this book, and often in the LXX.; διαγλ. no where, either in the New Test. or the LXX.

— γλαύκους.] Not, new-made wine (which is the proper signification of the word), for that is forbidden by the time of year; but new, and consequently 'sweet wine,' which is very intoxicating. See Is. xlix. 26. And so γλαῦκος occurs in Job xxxii. 19, and sometimes in the Class. writers; e. g. Lucian, t. iii. 65. Athen. p. 176, and often in Plutarch.

14—36. The Speech of Peter. 'Luke gives us here the first sample of the preaching of the Gospel by the Apostles, with which the foundation of Christian preaching, as well as the Church itself, appears to be closely connected. We discover already in this first sermon all the peculiarities of apostolic preaching. It contains no reflections nor deductions concerning the doctrine of Christ,—no proposition of new and unknown doctrines, but simply and entirely consists of the proclamation of historical facts. The Apostles appear here as the witnesses of that which they had seen; the resurrection of Jesus forming the central point of their testimony. It is true, that in the after development of the Church it was impossible to confine preaching to this historical announcement only: it gradually became invested with the additional office of building up believers in knowledge. But, nevertheless, the simple testimony to the great works of God, as Peter here delivers it, should never be wanting in preaching to those whose hearts are not yet penetrated by the Word of Truth.' (Olshausen in loc.)

17—21. These verses are a citation from Joel ii. 28—32 (in the Hebrew, iii. 1—5), but with some slight, though unimportant, variation both from the Hebrew and the Sept. The chief difference is in ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις being used for μετὰ ταῦτα. However, ἡμεῖς, rendered by the LXX. μετὰ ταῦτα, is admitted by Jarchi, Abenezra, and Kimchi to be equivalent to the Hebrew words which correspond to ἐν ταῖς ἐσχάταις ἡμέραις in other passages of the LXX. That the two phrases are identical in meaning is clear from a comparison of Jer. xlviii. 47 with xlix. 6, and Isa. ii. 2. As to the words λέγει ὁ Θεός, they form no part of the quotation, but are an insertion by the Evangelist, to indicate the Person who says this. The two last clauses of ver. 17 are merely interchanged in their order. At ver. 18, γὰρ, found, however, in the Alex. MS., is inserted, which strengthens the sense; καὶ γὰρ signifying quoniam, as both in the Classical writers and in the Sept. The words καὶ προφητεῖουσιν are added (from the preceding context) by way of explanation. Finally, at ver. 19, the words δῶκε καὶ ἔσται are supplied, to develop the sense; especially as they are often found joined to ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς in the Old Test. See Exod. xx. 4. Josh. ii. 11.—Ἀπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος is said to be for πνεῦμα, as in the Hebrew. But it rather seems to be a slight alteration adapted to the sense rather than the words, meaning (by an ellipsis of μέρος) a portion of my Spirit. What kind of spiritual effects are meant, is clear from the following verses. 'Ἐκχεῖν' is, like the correspondent terms in Greek and Latin, used to suggest the peculiar effluence of the gifts, of course spiritual, imparted. The Jewish Interpreters themselves admit that the passage contains a highly figurative description of the state of things which shall precede and accompany the coming of the Messiah; namely, by an extraordinary outpouring of the Spirit upon all flesh; though they understand it of all classes of society, notwithstanding it evidently was intended of all nations mentioned in general. The influence of the Spirit here foretold must designate (as Dr. Henderson, in his note on the passage of Joel, has ably shown) not only the extraordinary and supernatural gifts of the Apostolic age, but also the ordinary graces of the Spirit, in their strengthening and saving influences on the souls of all true believers. He observes that "the Apostle's quotation introduced by τοῦτό ἐστι 'this is the fact,' rather 'phenomenon,' as Hoffm., which is the more necessary, since, as Hoffm. remarks, the Apostle emphatically points at the thing present, justly regarded as something august. See also v. 39 (where Peter plainly intimates that this was the fulfilment of the prediction by Joel). In fact, the words of the Prophet had just been read in the Pentecostal service of the synagogues." See Dr. Henderson's Biblical Researches and Travels in Russia.

17. προφητῶν.] This must, in the full sense, signify 'speaking under Divine inspiration,' namely, by prophesying (in the strict sense of the expression), including the lesser degrees of the προφητεία (see Rom. xii. 6. 1 Cor. xii. 10. xiii. 2), which were preaching and teaching the truths of the Gospel. The next clause intimates that God would also reveal his will to both old and young, in a manner which should partake of the προφ. just before mentioned, by visions or dreams.

The terms προφητεία καὶ ὄρασις are sometimes synonymous; but here ὄρασις is equivalent to ὁρατότης: in either of which terms an appearance is presented to the person, whether waking or by trance; whereas ἐνύπνιον is always a dream, in which something is preternaturally suggested to the mind. And here we should render, σουσιν οἱ υἱοὶ ὑμῶν καὶ αἱ θυγατέρες ὑμῶν καὶ οἱ νεανίσκοι ὑμῶν ὁράσεις ὄψονται, καὶ οἱ πρεσβύτεροι ὑμῶν ἐνύπνια ἐνυπνιασθήσονται. ¹⁸ Καὶ γε ἐπὶ τοὺς δούλους μου καὶ ἐπὶ τὰς δούλας μου, ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ἐκείναις, ἐκχεῶ ἀπὸ τοῦ πνεύματός μου, καὶ ^b Joel 2. 20. προφητεύσουσι. ¹⁹ ^b Καὶ δώσω τέρατα ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ ἄνω, καὶ σημεῖα ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς κάτω, αἷμα καὶ πῦρ καὶ ¹ Matt. 24. 20. ἀτμίδα καπνοῦ. ²⁰ ¹ Ὁ ἥλιος μεταστραφήσεται εἰς σκότος, καὶ ἡ σελήνη εἰς αἷμα, πρὶν ἢ ἐλθεῖν τὴν ἡμέραν Κυρίου τὴν μεγάλην καὶ ἐπιφανῆ. ²¹ ^k Καὶ ἔσται, πᾶς, ὃς ἂν ἐπικαλέσῃται τὸ ὄνομα Κυρίου,

'shall dream visions,' i. e. shall see visions in dreams. Thus at 1 Sam. iii. 1, ὅρασις διαστῆλουσα denotes a distinct revelation by supernatural appearance, in opposition to the less direct revelation by dreams or otherwise. With respect to the present passage, the ὅρασις was fulfilled in the case of St. Paul; the ἐνύπνια in that of St. Peter. Finally, what is said at ver. 19 was remarkably fulfilled by the communication of the Spiritual Gifts, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles and in St. Paul's Epistles, especially 1 Cor. xiv. But I have shown supra that the ordinary gifts are by no means to be excluded, though not mentioned, for, as Hoffm. says, the extraordinary are promised that the ordinary may be expected.

For ἐνύπνια MSS. A, B, C, D³, and about 16 cursives of the same family, read ἐνυπνίους, which is adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. But external authority is insufficient (for I can only add Trin. Coll. B, x. 16); and internal evidence is equally balanced. 'Ενύπνια may have been derived from the Sept.; but it is not likely that it should have been introduced into all the copies except a comparatively few. I rather suspect that ἐνυπνίους was a Critical correction, meaning 'by dreams.' Indeed in the Trin. Coll. MS. there is ἐν ὑπνίους, whence I infer that in the original there was ἐν ἐνυπνίους, so that the reading may have originated in a marginal Scholium.

19. δώσω τέρατα ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ ἄνω] By οὐρ. is meant the sky, as opposed to ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. Comp. Dan. vi. 27, ποιεῖ σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. The next words ο ἥλιος—eis αἷμα are to be referred to the τέρατα ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, preternatural appearances (of a bloody and fiery kind = portenta, prodigies portending bloodshed and fire, as we say 'fire and sword') in the sky, that displayed the finger of God. The ἀτμίδα καπνοῦ (alluding to the smoke of burning towns) is graphic, and completes the picture of devastation. 'Promissionem sequitur comminatio, et recte Petrus hanc imminet sermoni alius salutis pleno, quoniam etiam mixtum erat Auditorium ejus. Adorant enim εὐλαβεῖτε, v. 5; adorant quoque emphatica, v. 13.'

20. ὁ ἥλιος μεταστραφήσεται εἰς σκ.] See note on Matt. xxiv. 29, where we have the same imagery, and admitting of the same explanation.

— ἡ σελήνη εἰς αἷμα] By αἷμα is here to be understood that obscure sanguineous hue, which the sky assumes when the atmosphere is filled with the smoke arising from fires; designating the lurid appearance which it presents when smoke and flames are thrown up by earthquakes. Comp. Rev. vi. 12. viii. 8.

— τὴν ἡμέραν Κυρίου τὴν μεγ. καὶ ἐπιφ.] Meaning, a day notable for the visitation of God's punishment on the guilty, and therefore terrible, as the Hebrew is rendered; though the former sense is assigned to the word יום in other passages. The very same words occur in Mal. iv. 5, and are rendered in the same way in the Sept.

19, 20. All that we can infer from these verses is, that the events in question will take place at 'the times of the Messiah.' But whether they are to be referred to the first advent of our Lord, at the destruction of Jerusalem, or to his second, at the day of judgment, Commentators are not agreed. They are very similar to, and admit of, nay, perhaps require, the same mode of explanation as Matt. xxiv. 29. Luke xxi. 25; where see notes; so as to be referred to both advents. As to the literal and primary fulfilment at the first advent, none who are conversant with the faithful, alas! too true, account given by Josephus of the horrible circumstances which preceded the destruction of Jerusalem, can fail to see, that the figurative language here employed is not overcharged, but only sets forth the awful condition of the inhabitants of Judæa at the period in question. But the final and full accomplishment of these prophecies will probably not take place before the consummation of all things. In order that all the faithful may profit by the implied warning, 'Be ye always ready, for ye know not the time when your Lord appeareth,' weighty is the remark of Hoffm., 'nimirum judicium Dei in tempore, quæ judicium æterni quasi prelude sunt, describi solent cum prospectu ad hoc, quia per illa nos de hoc admonitos vult Deus.'

21. πᾶς—σωθήσεται] If the double reference be brought in here, the primary application of the prophecy may be supposed 'to contain,' in the words of Dr. Henderson, 'a gracious promise, that, however terrible might be the final catastrophe in which the unbelievers should perish, provision would be made for the safety of those who believed in the Messiah. And Church history records its fulfilment: by the escape and preservation of the Christians at the final catastrophe of Jerusalem.' But, as I have always supposed the second coming to be especially meant, I am inclined to think that it is alone intended, which I agree with Alf. is required by the whole tenor of the Apostle's application of the prophecy. See the admirable note of Calvin, of which the following extract contains the pith:—'Sicuti Deus minis ac terroribus nos tanquam ignavos asinos ad querendam salutem instigat; ita postquam cælum et terram tenebris involvit, modum tamen ostendit, quo salus ante oculos nostros affluat, nempe, si ipsum invocabimus. Est enim diligenter notanda hæc circumstantia. Si Deus salutem simpliciter promitteret, hoc jam quidem est magnum; sed longe majus est, dum inter multiplices mortis abyssos eam promittit.' 'Quum omnia,' inquit, 'confusa fuerint, et exitii formido omnia occupaverit, tantum invoke me, et salvi eritis.' 'Quando, itaque, nemo excluditur ab invocatione Dei, omnibus aperta est salutis janua. Nec aliud est quod nos ab ingressu arceat, quam propria infidelitas.'

22—23. Peter's further address to the Jews. After having pointed out to them, in the effects they had been witnessing with such amazement, the fulfilment of the prophecy of Joel concerning the effusion of the Spirit in the days of the Messiah, and demonstrated to them from the prophecy that a Redeemer had been promised, who should 'save to the uttermost' his faithful worshippers, the Apostle proceeds to turn their attention to the grand subject and main purpose of his discourse,—showing that JESUS OF NAZARETH, whom they have crucified, is that Personage (proved to be such by his resurrection to life), and pointing out the purposes for which he was raised from the dead. On this is engrafted a notice of the validity of the general evidence in favour of Jesus's Messiahship, and the nature of that evidence. Then there is subjoined, that this Jesus it is, thus raised and invested with supreme dignity, who hath procured this plenteous effusion of the Holy Spirit, as attested by the effects which they now see and hear. Of him, too, it is added, the words of Ps. cx. 1, are meant, which their own Rabbins referred to the Messiah. Hence (the Apostle concludes) they may be assured that this Jesus, whom they have crucified, is the Lord and Christ appointed of God.

But to consider the passage in detail, the Apostle addresses them by the conciliatory appellation Israelites. Ναζωραῖον is subjoined to Ἰησοῦν, because, in mentioning his name thus formally, it was proper to add what had, indeed, become an ordinary appellation. See Mark xvi. 6. Acts iii. 6. x. 38.

22. ἄνδρα ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀποδεδειγμένον εἰς ὑμᾶς δυνάμει, &c. The construction is: ἄνδρα ἀποδ. εἰς ὑμᾶς ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, scil. ἀπόστολον εἶναι,—for such is the reference, as appears from Heb. iii. 1, κατανοήσας τὸν ἀπόστολον τῆς ὁμολογίας ἡμῶν, Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν. The full sense is, 'a person demonstrated to you as being shown to be an ambassador from God by miracles, signs, and wonders.'

23. τῇ ὥρισμένῃ βουλῇ καὶ προγν. The best Commentators are agreed, that τῇ ὥρισμ. βουλῇ means 'the determinate decree,' and consequently immutable counsel of God.

—ἔκδοτον λαβόντες]. The strong significance of the term ἔκδοτον I have already pointed out, as denoting the being given over to any one to suffer what he pleases to inflict. In the words following, Lachm., Tisch., and Alf. have cancelled λαβόντες, on the authority of some of the most ancient MSS. and several Versions. But λαβόντες is, Valckn. observes, though not necessary to the sense, yet not to be ejected from the context, it being one of those Participles which are so used by the Greek writers (especially Sophocles) as to seem superfluous, while they generally add some force, and suggest the idea of a sort of celerity of action.

—διὰ χειρῶν ἀνόμων]. Render: 'by the hands of persons without law,' meaning Pilate and the Roman soldiers, called ἀνομοί as being Gentiles. See 1 Cor. ix. 21. 1 Macc. ii. 43. The above rendering is supported by the authority of the most eminent Expositors, and that of the ancient Versions, such as the Pesch. Syr. and Vulg., and, of modern ones, those of Wickliff, Tyndale, and Wakefield. As to the common rendering, by which χειρῶν ἀνόμων is connected with ἀνείλετε, this involves no little harshness; for we should thus have a form of expression only suitable to poetry, and thus, for ἀνόμων, ἀνομίαν or παράνομον would rather have been used. And, though ἀνομοί is used for παράνομοι, yet it is only of persons. The reading χειρὸς, adopted by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf., on the ground that χειρῶν is a gloss, is evidently itself a mere alteration, proceeding from certain early Critics, who, we may suppose, stumbled at χειρῶν as unclassical. And undoubtedly no pure Greek writer would have written χειρῶν, since that has the objection of involving an uncertainty of construction; hence, it seems, they altered χειρῶν to χειρὸς. The words διὰ χειρῶν are meant to anticipate a certain objection, q. d. 'We did not nail him to the cross and put him to death.—No; but ye did this through the medium of others, your tools, and those whom least ye should have selected, οἱ ἀνομοί.' Προσπήξαντες, scil. σταυρῶν, is added, to show that the putting to death was by the most cruel and ignominious mode. I cannot find, any more than the learned Markland, that προσπ. is any where else used of crucifying; but there is no reason why it should not have been so called in the ordinary Greek dialect, just as αἶψα and εὐθὺς in the later Latin writers. Προσηλασμένους would have been used by a purer Greek writer, and occurs in Plato and others of 'crucifying'; but I suspect that Peter used a somewhat coarse

έστησε, λύσας τὰς ὠδῖνας τοῦ θανάτου, καθότι οὐκ ἦν δυνατόν
 κρατεῖσθαι αὐτὸν ὑπ' αὐτοῦ. ²⁵ Δαυὶδ γὰρ λέγει εἰς αὐτόν Προωρώμην τὸν Κύριον ἐνώπιόν μου διὰ παντός, ὅτι ἐκ δεξιῶν μου ἐστίν, ἵνα μὴ σαλευθῶ. ²⁶ διὰ τοῦτο εὐφράνθη ἡ καρδία μου, καὶ ἠγαλλιάσατο ἡ γλῶσσά μου· ἔτι δὲ καὶ ἡ σὰρξ μου κατασκηνώσει ἐπ' ἐλπίδι.

 οὐδὲ δώσεις τὸν Ὅσιόν σου ἰδεῖν διαφθοράν. ²⁸ Ἐγνώterm (as we should say, fixed him up) to characterize the violence of the action. Since writing the above I have ascertained that προσπ. for 'crucifying' does occur elsewhere. So Hesych. explains προσῆλυσαν by προσέπηξαν and ἔτρωσαν (read ἔστρωσαν, an abbreviation of ἑσταύρωσαν). Hesych. elsewhere explains προσέπηξαν by προσῆλυσαν, doubtless a mere var. lect. However, it seems to have been properly a technical term of carpentering for 'to fix up.' So Clem. Alex. Protr. 951, has τὰ δι' ἀγάλματα προσκαθηλῶνται καὶ προσπῆγνυται, 'were nailed up and fixed up.' Hesych. explains προσπῆγματα by μῖρος τι τῆς νιῶς, meaning, I suspect, the carphorads (like our lockers) fixed up in the cabin of a ship.

— οὐκ ἦν δυνατόν, &c.] Meaning, 'morally impossible,' i. e. consistently with the circumstances of the case, the dignity of his person (as being 'the Prince of life,' iii. 15, and having life in himself, John v. 26; see also John x. 18), the nature of his undertaking, the accomplishment of the work for which he came on earth, the purpose of God the Father, and the prophecies of Scripture.

— εἰς αὐτόν 'concerning,' or 'with reference to,' him; 'as often in the Class. writers. See also Eph. v. 32. The εἰς here has the force of reference, whether direct or indirect; and the full meaning intended seems to be this: 'David saith [of himself] with an eye to Him,' intimating that what David said of himself he said with an especial reference to another, intending it to be referred, though primarily to himself, yet secondarily, and in the most eminent sense, to Christ.

Some Expositors, indeed, interpret the reference of Christ alone, which, however, is forbidden by the scope of the Psalmist, which requires that the reference to David should be retained as a secondary one. This view is, indeed, the one taken by Calvin, who, after an able discussion of this 25th verse, concludes as follows: 'Non præcisè uno verbo negat Petrus verè id fuisse in Davide impletum, sed obliquè tantum significat. Cæterum ita de Christo vaticinium est David, ut et sibi privatim aptaverit consolationem, et extenderit ad universum ecclesiæ corpus. Neque verò negandum est, de se ipso Davidem hic locutum, sed quatenus in Christo, quasi vitæ speculo se intuebatur. Primus ergo respectus in Christum: inde ad se, aliosque fideles, oculos convertit.' This view I find confirmed by Hoffm., who ably vindicates the above reference. Assuredly, as indeed Alford admits, David's words here, as spoken of himself and his circumstances, would only be true, in their highest and literal sense, of the great 'Son of David,' who was to come. David often spoke concerning himself; but the Spirit who spoke in David εἰς τὸν Χριστόν.—ἵνα μὴ σαλ., 'that I should not be shaken in courage, nor succumb under calamity.'

²⁶ διὰ τοῦτο εὐφράνθη ἡ καρδ. μου] This and ἠγαλλιάσατο ἡ γλῶσσά μου are meant to denote extreme joy, both that which is inwardly felt, and that which is outwardly expressed.

The διὰ τοῦτο refers to the reason for this exultation,—which was, that he should be preserved amidst the sorrows that were coming upon him, and could look forward with joy to the triumph which awaited him; see Heb. xii. 2.

²⁷ εἰς ᾄδου] scil. δόμον, or οἶκον; see notes on Matt. xvi. 18. Luke xviii. 23. v. 31. Οὐδέ δώσεις, 'nor wilt thou suffer.' For δίδως, like the Hebr. נָתַן, denotes sometimes not a physical, but a moral giving by permission.—Τὸν Ὅσιόν σου. This is usually rendered, 'thy pious worshipper'; a sense which may very well suit David, but not CHRIST, with reference to whom the sense must be, 'me who am pre-eminently the Holy One; and thine, as united to thee in the Godhead.'—ἵδαιν διαφθοράν, 'to experience putrefaction,' i. e. to lie so long in the grave as to be exposed thereto.

²⁸ ἠγνώρισας—ζωῆς] Render: 'Thou hast made known (i. e. opened out) paths of life,' i. e. the means of avoiding permanent death, and attaining unto life and glory; or, as referred to David, life everlasting. The next clause adverts to the state of glory, and the fulness of joy which should succeed to that 'earthly race which was set before him; after which he should sit down at the right hand of God, and be blessed with his immediate presence.

ρισάς μοι ὁδοὺς ζωῆς· πληρώσεις με εὐφροσύνης μετὰ τοῦ προσώπου σου. ²⁹ Ὁ Ἄνδρες ἀδελφοί, ἔξον εἰπεῖν μετὰ παρῆρησίας πρὸς ὑμᾶς περὶ τοῦ πατριάρχου Δαυὶδ, ὅτι καὶ ἐτελεύτησε καὶ ἐτάφη, καὶ τὸ μνήμα αὐτοῦ ἐστὶν ἐν ἡμῖν ἄχρι τῆς ἡμέρας ταύτης. ³⁰ Προφήτης οὖν ὑπάρχων, καὶ εἰδὼς ὅτι ὅρκῳ ὤμοσεν αὐτῷ ὁ Θεὸς, ἐκ καρποῦ τῆς ὁσφύος αὐτοῦ [τὸ κατὰ σάρκα ἀναστήσειν τὸν Χριστὸν,] καθίσαι ἐπὶ τοῦ θρόνου αὐτοῦ, ³¹ προιδὼν ἐλάλησε περὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως τοῦ Χριστοῦ, ὅτι οὐ κατελείφθη ἡ ψυχὴ αὐτοῦ εἰς ᾄδου, οὐδὲ ἡ σὰρξ αὐτοῦ εἶδε διαφθοράν. ³² Τοῦτον τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἀνέστησεν ὁ Θεός, οὐ πάντες ἡμεῖς ἐσμεν μάρτυρες. ³³ Τῇ δεξιᾷ οὖν τοῦ Θεοῦ ὑψωθείς, τὴν τε ἐπαγγελίαν τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος λαβὼν παρὰ τοῦ Πατρὸς, ἐξέχεε τοῦτο ὃ νῦν ὑμεῖς βλέπετε καὶ

29. The Apostle now proceeds to propound an argument, resting on the position that the Messiah is meant in the Psalm in question; and he does this by tacitly encountering an objection which might be made; q. d. 'These are the words of David, and are to be understood of him.' In answering which the Apostle introduces the mention of David in highly reverential language, calling him Patriarch. 'I may be permitted (says he) freely to tell you concerning the Patriarch David, that he both died and was buried, and his sepulchre remains unto this day;' [indeed remained, as Jerome testifies, in the time of the emperor Adrian;] and as David died, was buried, and his body experienced corruption, so it follows that, in the passage adverted to, he could not have spoken of himself.

30. In this and the next two verses the Apostle clinches the argument. The sense may be thus expressed: 'Now, he being a Prophet (i. e. one endowed with a supernatural knowledge of future events), and, in that quality, knowing that God had sworn a solemn oath to him, that from the fruit of his loins (i. e. from his posterity) Christ should, as to his human nature, descend, in order to sit on his throne; he, foreseeing this event, spoke (in the passage in question) of the resurrection of Christ, when he said that his soul, &c. On this promise see 2 Sam. vii. 11, 16, and the other passages adduced in the references. The expression ὅρκῳ ὤμοσα, as applied to God, of course denotes only his fixed and immutable purpose;' q. d. 'sacrosanctissime promissit.'

The words τὸ κατὰ σάρκα—Χριστὸν have been cancelled by Grießb., Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but on very slender authority—only that of 2 uncials certain, A and C, B uncertain, one D 2 m.; but that the MS. had the words originally is clear from the Latin Version. As to the cursive MSS. adduced by Mill, Tisch., and Alf., they are but 3,—Barb. 1, No. 95, and 143, and of which the Barb. 1 is of very suspected authority. The 95 and 143 rest only on the very slender authority of Scholz. As to the alii added by Tisch. and Alf., from Scholz, they (as my readers may imagine from previous experience) are all but imaginary; and I cannot add one from the Lamb. and Mus. collections, and the Trin. Coll. MS. The authority, indeed, of the Versions—consisting of the printed Syriac (Peschito), the Vulg., Coptic, Æthiopic, Armenian, and Arabic—may seem adverse to the words. But as to the first, though the printed Syriac has them not, yet the MSS., I am informed, have. And the authority of the Vulgate, which might seem weighty, is, in fact, far otherwise in cases like the present, where it is unsupported by the ancient Italic; and that the words were read in that Version, is plain from what is brought forward by Sabatier; see Matthæi. Again, the authority of the Fathers against the words, or, indeed, against any words, is never very weighty—and here is any thing but determinate; since, while some of them adduce the verse without the words, others (as Theophyl., Theodor., and Chrys., and Euseb. in Pa. xv.) cite it with them. Indeed, it may be said that the evidence of Fathers, in cases like the present, of words supposed to have been inserted, is the less to be relied on, since citing, as they perpetually do, from memory, they often omit words, espec. such as are not to their purpose. As to internal evidence,—after weighing it carefully afresh, I readily grant that it is against the words; but, in a case like this, where external authority is almost wholly in favour of the words, internal evidence, even if decidedly adverse (which it is not), would not authorize more than bracketing them.

32. τοῦτον τὸν Ἰ. &c.] The evidence for Christ's resurrection is now adverted to, and that by a reference not only to the positive testimony of the Apostles, disciples, and other eye-witnesses (as contrasted with the want of evidence for the assertion of the Jews, that he did see corruption, and did not rise), but to that testimony of his resurrection, and consequent Messiahship, which was afforded by his exaltation to the right hand of God; by his having obtained, agreeably to the promise, the sending of the Holy Spirit and the copious effusion of His gifts,—producing effects such as they now saw and heard, and which, by their miraculous nature, attested the Divine character of him who procured them.

33. τῇ δεξιᾷ οὖν τοῦ Θεοῦ ὑψωθείς] 'Therefore being exalted to the right hand of God,' i. e. to the height of dignity and majesty, declared and constituted Lord and Messiah (namely, by his resurrection and return to heaven). See ver. 36; and comp. Phil. ii. 9, seq.

34. οὐ γὰρ Δαυὶδ, &c.] The Apostle's argument is this: 'That David speaketh not concerning himself, but the Messiah (see ver. 25, et seq.), is manifest from what he says Pa. cx. 1, where he speaks of a Lord who was to be at God's right hand till all his enemies were subdued. For that patriarch himself is not raised from the dead, and ascended into the heavens to sit at God's right hand; therefore he must have spoken this of some other person; namely, of Jesus Christ, who hath brought about this which ye now see and hear.'

The concluding words of the quotation ('until I make thine enemies, &c.') suggest the inevitable destruction they would bring upon themselves, if they continued to reject the Saviour.

36. Here we have the conclusion,—that this same Jesus, whom they had crucified, was the divinely-constituted Lord and Christ.

—πᾶς οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ] In πᾶς οἶκ. there seems to be a breach of the canon of Bp. Middl., according to which we should render 'every house of Israel;' which cannot be the sense. Mr. Green, however (Gr. N. T. p. 195), is of opinion that 'the above canon is infringed only in appearance, not in reality, since οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ is used as a proper name, as appears from the expression τὰ πρόβατα τὰ ἀπολ. οἴκου Ἰσραὴλ in Matt. x. 6. xv. 24.' And this is confirmed by Thucyd. iii. 57, 2. ὅμας ἐκ παντὸς τοῦ Ἑλληνικοῦ (scil. ἔθους) ἰελαίνεσθαι.

37—44. Here are described the effects produced on the people by the above discourse.

37. καρ. τῇ καρδίᾳ] 'were pierced to the heart.' Κατανοῦσθαι is here, as often, used figuratively of the emotions of violent grief, or deep remorse, whether expressed outwardly, or felt inwardly; see Gen. xxxiv. 7. Pa. cviii. 16, Sept. Eccles. xii. 12. xlvii. 20; also in the Class. writers, as Simplicius on Epict., ὡς τοῦ μὴ πάντως νενικρωμένους νύττειναι ἐκ τῶν λόγων, and Plutarch, de Animi Tranq. p. 476, where he says the conscience of evil doers τῇ ψυχῇ μεταμίλειαν αἰμάσσουσιν αἰ καὶ νόσον αὐτὸν ἐναπολείπει.

38. μετανοήσατε] This repentance must, of course, be supposed to imply a total change of mind and heart (see my Lex.), by an abandonment of their former preconceived opinions, and by acknowledging Jesus to be the Christ, and embracing his religion by baptism, looking unto him alone for remission of sins, and the gift of the Spirit, now sent forth (see Matt. xxviii. 19, and note), and thereby engaging to observe all his injunctions both of faith and practice. We are, however, to bear in mind, that the above-mentioned internal change of heart and purpose is (as Calv. observes) here insisted on, as meet to be testified by admission into the number of Christ's disciples.

—βαπτισθῆτω ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰ. Χρ.] As contradistinguished from John's baptism of repentance unto faith; see ch. xix. 4. The expression βαπτίζεσθαι ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι τινος is equiv. to εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τινος (which could not here have been used without involving tautology), or ἐν ὀνόματι τινος. In all such cases the preposition denotes dependence on, devotedness to, and obedience to (as 1 Cor. x. 2, βαπτίζεσθαι εἰς τὸν Μωϋσῆν), and should be rendered, not into, but unto, implying, however, the into, as referred to the benefits and blessings thereby imparted. Ὀνομ. Χρ. is thought to be for Χριστῷ; but there is rather a reference to the words of Christ at Matt. xxviii. 19, containing the form in baptism,—wherein ὄνομα is by no means without force,—espec. since this is the first mention of an administration by Christ's disciples, of baptism in this full sense.

—λήψετε τὴν δωρεὰν τοῦ ἁγίου Πν.] This δωρ. τ. ἁγ. Πν., being the fulfilment of the promise of the Spirit, and considered as the result of the baptism before-mentioned, in its full import, must be taken in the most general sense, of such a measure of the Spirit, whether ordinary or extraordinary, as might be suited to the case of each person individually. See John iv. 10.

39. πᾶσι τοῖς εἰς μακρὰν] This is by many recent Expositors taken to mean the Jews dispersed abroad among the nations. But it must mean the Gentiles, as appears from Eph. ii. 13, 17, where by οἱ μακρὰν are denoted the Gentiles, also designated as 'aliens from the commonwealth of Israel.' And it is no sufficient objection to say, that Peter was as yet unacquainted with the truth,—that the Gentiles were to be admitted into the Christian covenant. For it appears that the Jews did not deny that the Gentiles were to be admitted to the Messiah's religion, but they thought they could alone become such by becoming proselytes to the Jewish faith. This sense, indeed, seems required by the words following; unless we suppose that the Apostle had here in view the dispersed of Israel, as well as the strangers from the covenant of promise; i. e. both the dispersed Jews, and the Gentiles, who, as yet, stood afar off.

The words ὅσοι ἐν προσκαλίσει Κύριος ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, seem added further to develop the sense of τοῖς μακρὰν; q. d. 'All, I say,—even as many as the Lord our God may call upon,' a very rare sense of προσκ., but occasionally also occurring in Joseph. Antt. xii. 1, 1, [invite to embrace 'the glorious gospel of Christ.']

40. διμαρτύρετο καὶ παρ.] 'did he earnestly charge and exhort;' see 1 Tim. v. 21.

—σώθητε ἀπὸ τῆς γ. &c.] 'Be ye saved,' meaning 'suffer yourselves to be saved,' by embracing 'the salvation now held out to you,' and thus being put into the way of salvation. Σκολιὰς signifies perverse, and generally wicked, by a metaphor taken from what is crooked, as opposed to straight. The phrase is borrowed from Deut. xxxii. 5, γινεῖς σκολιά καὶ διεστραμμένη.

With respect to the doctrine hence to be inferred, suffice it to say, that the air of exhortation, here observable, implies at once the necessity for exertion, and also that the power of exertion is present with man to 'work out his salvation.'

41. ἀσμένως] This word is not found in 4 uncials (A, B, C, D), and one cursive (No. 19), several Versions, and some Fathers, and is cancelled by Lachm., Tisch., and Alf.; but the authority is insufficient, espec. as internal evidence is rather in favour of the word, which was less likely to have been, as Alf. supposes, introduced as an explanatory gloss on ἀποδ.—which did not need it,—than to have been expunged by Critics who thought it was unnecessary and overcharged. Besides, ἀσμένως is used by St. Luke with ἰδίζαντο, ch. xxi. 7; though there adopted by all those three Editors, these very MSS., and many others read ἀρδίζαντο, retaining ἀσμένως, which is found in all the copies. Can there be a stronger case for the genuineness of ἀσμ. here? Though even had the parallel expression not existed, it would have been rash to cancel what is supported by all the MSS. except five (for the et alii of Scholz, though paraded by Tisch. and Alf., is, as too often, worthless; I suspect it was founded on the Barb. l. of Mill, though it is now acknowledged that the Barb. readings are of as little worth as the Velezian), confirmed by the Pesch. Syr. Vers., and with internal evidence by no means against it.

—ἐβαπτίσθησαν] This earliest baptism—that of regeneration—had at least one remarkable feature,—namely, that it was conferred merely on the profession of repentance, and the acknowledgment of Jesus as the Messiah; so that the necessary catechetical instruction did not precede, but follow baptism: if, indeed, there was any instruction in doctrine as yet,—which the German writers and Alf. think there was not. The baptism itself must, from the nature of the case, as to the first baptism on so vast a scale, have been by affusion, or sprinkling; since the immersion of 3000 persons involves the highest improbability.

42—47. Having recorded the amazing increase to the members of the visible Church, the Apostle takes occasion to characterize the mode of life and habits of those primitive Christians, not exactly at this very time, but a little afterwards.

42. ἦσαν προσκαρτ. τῇ διδαχῇ τῶν ἀποστ.] Comp. Matt. xxviii. 20, and see note. By προσκαρτ. τῇ διδαχῇ he intimates that they continued steadfastly to adhere to that profession which they had so suddenly taken up.

—τῇ κοινωνίᾳ—προσευχαῖς] On the sense of the words considerable difference of opinion exists. Many eminent Expositors, ancient and modern, take κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου of the Eucharist; which opinion may seem confirmed by the preceding τῇ κοινωνίᾳ; that term being frequently used of the Lord's Supper. Thus they in general take τῇ κοινωνίᾳ καὶ τῇ κλάσει, by a Hendiadys, for 'the common participation of the Eucharistic bread broken and distributed.' Some, however, understand κοιν. of association for religious purposes: while most of the recent Commentators understand by κοιν. social intercourse; and by τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου, the exercise of mutual hospitality; which, they think, is supported by the expression κλῆν ἄρτου at ver. 46. But that sense is little agreeable to the context, which certainly requires something far more. Nor is there any authority for such a sense of κοινωνία in Scripture; nor perhaps of τῇ κλάσει τοῦ ἄρτου; for ver. 46 (to which they appeal) may very well bear another sense. Some, again, join κοινωνία with the words preceding, namely, τῶν ἀποστόλων, q. d. 'in intimate society with the Apostles'; a construction very harsh, and a signification quite unauthorized. It must undoubtedly be taken with what follows; and τῇ κοιν. καὶ τῇ κλάσει seems put, by a hysteron proteron, for τῇ κλάσει καὶ κοιν.; or, by hendiadys, for 'by a common participation of bread broken.' Now this might be understood of the Eucharist; yet as ver. 46 undoubtedly has reference to the same subject, but certainly cannot be so understood, as appears from the words following; so it should seem that in both that passage and this we are to understand the common participation of meals, taken in communion and religious thankfulness, and followed by prayer; in short, the living, as far as was practicable, as one Family. We must not here bring in, with some, the Agapæ; for those were only before the Eucharist, and were probably not yet in being; having, it should seem, originated at a somewhat later period, when the custom of having all things in common,—practicable only in a small society,—was discontinued; and, in the place of it, was substituted a formal communion at the above-mentioned Agapæ.

43. πάσῃ ψυχῇ] 'every person,' i. e. of the multitude at large, mentioned at ver. 46, who had not yet become believers. Φόβος, 'reverential awe,' at the effects of the recent effusion of the Spirit.

44. ἦσαν ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό] This is generally taken of 'being collected together for divine worship.' And although the great number (3120) of the disciples has been urged as an objection to that view, yet we need not suppose all to have been assembled at the same time. Besides, as Mr. Alford suggests, 'a large portion were persons who had come up for the Feast, and who would by this time have returned to their respective homes.' Nevertheless it seems also thereby intimated, that the body of believers kept together, as a society, apart from the Jews.

—εἶχον ἅπαντα κοινά] The earlier Commentators, in general, understand by this an entire community of goods; while many recent Expositors think that the words are to be taken only in a very limited popular sense, such as that of the adage πάντα κοινά, denoting great charity and beneficence. The next verse, however, excludes such a view, though it does not necessarily imply an absolute community by distribution. Some of the rich, it seems, sold their property in part, in order to have more to give immediately to their poorer brethren; but the money accruing from thence (as is plain from infra iv. 32. v. 4. xii. 12) did not cease to be at their own disposal. That all did not sell their property is evident from the fact, that there were soon afterwards rich and poor among the Christians; see ix. 36. xi. 29. xx. 35. 1 Cor. xvi. 1. Eph. iv. 28. In fact, it is plain that this so called intercommunity of goods was voluntary, limited in extent, and produced by the peculiar circumstances of the infant Church at Jerusalem,—composed as it was, in a great measure, of foreign Jews sojourning there, and detained by the natural wish of acquiring a thorough knowledge of the religion which they had adopted; and yet whose funds might, by their detention so much longer than they had expected, have fallen short, and thrown them on the charitable assistance of their richer brethren. As to the native Jews, the poorer converts were peculiarly objects of consideration to their richer brethren; since all charity on the part of those who adhered to the Jewish religion would be denied them,—and they would have scrupled to partake of the relics from the Temple sacrifices, which were distributed to the poor. Nay, their means of supporting themselves might occasionally be taken from them by bigoted employers or customers. Under these circumstances no relief or aid could be expected, except from their Christian brethren, who therefore, it seems, agreed not only to contribute much of their ready-money, but occasionally, as need might require, to sell part of their possessions; and, in general, were induced by the admonitions of the Apostles to regard their wealth as a common stock (see iv. 32), held in trust for the benefit of their poorer fellow Christians. See Olsh., Stier, and especially Meyer, who remarks that 'this state of things is only found in the Church at Jerusalem, no trace of it being discoverable elsewhere; and not even in Jerusalem as enforced by rule, but originating in free will, so gradually as to become an understood custom, though it was by no means compulsory on individuals, and did not long continue.' See more in my Rec. Syn., where I have shown at large that although both the Pythagoreans and the Jewish Essenes had a community of goods (see Jambl. de Vit. Pyth. vi. 17, p. 59. Joseph. Bell. i. 2, 12. Antt. xviii. 1, 5. Philo. p. 601 seqq.), yet that this practice was not adopted in imitation of the Essenes, since the circumstances were widely different,—inasmuch as among the Essenes there was an absolute community of goods, and no property whatever. Besides, it does not appear that the early Christians had any connexion with the Essenes, though they might be favourably disposed towards them; espec. as probably not a few converts had come over from them; which circumstance must have had an unfavourable after effect on the opinions and practices of the first Christians. The working of this leaven may be traced in those false teachers (so annoying to Paul), who preached up unnatural denial, and excessive austerities, systematically dissuading, and preventing matrimony. See 1 Tim. iv. 3. That this was done by the Essenes we know from the testimony of Josephus, ubi supra. I agree with Meyer and Alf., that the practice arose from a continuation, and application to the now increased number of disciples, of the community in which our Lord and his Apostles had lived before.

45. κτήματα] The term properly denotes possessions or property in general; but here it must be understood of the bona immobilia (lands and houses), as ὑπάρξεις (for the more Classical τὰ ὑπάρχοντα) may be of the mobilia (personal property).

—καθότι ἂν τις χρ. εἶχε] 'as every one ('any individual') had need.'

46. προσκαρτ.] Προσκ. is put for προσκ. ταῖς προσευχαῖς, which occurred a little before. Render: 'They persevered in attending the Temple service every day,' i. e. (as is implied) at the stated hours of prayer (see iii. 1); assembling probably in Solomon's porch (see v. 12).

—κλῶντές τε κατ' οἶκον ἄρτον] This is by many understood of the Eucharist, or at least of the Λόγος which preceded the Eucharist; while others understand it of common meals taken by companies at certain houses in rotation. And certainly there is much to countenance this in what follows. Yet, if we consider the preceding words, it will seem more probable that the meals in question were the charitable and religious meals, taken in common, treated of supra ver. 42. At κατ' οἶκον supply ἕκαστον; meaning, probably, though not certainly, 'in groups assembled at different houses;' for no one apartment would be now large enough to contain the whole.

— ἐν ἀγαλλίᾳ καὶ ἀφελότητι καρδ.] This phrase denotes the disposition of mind in the partakers, whether rich or poor, respectively; ἀγαλλίᾳ being intended chiefly of the latter, and ἀφελότητι, principally, though not exclusively, of the former. However, the chief stress is to be laid on ἐν ἀφελ., by which is denoted sincerity both in the givers and the receivers; in the former, shown by single-minded liberality; in the latter, by sincere and unaffected gratitude. Comp. Wisd. i. 1, ἐν ἀγαθότητι καὶ ἀφελότητι καρδίας. The one class was, it seems, as far removed from grudging or ostentation, as the other was from envy or ill-will.

47. αἰνοῦντες—λαόν] This may signify, in a general way, 'They were [in their mode of life] much occupied in prayer and songs of praise by the Spirit, and were in favour with the people.' Since, however, αἰνοῦντες is grammatically connected with μεταλαμβάνον, it seems better to suppose the sense to be, 'And these common meals (namely, those mentioned supra ver. 42) they held with prayer and praise to God; and by the use of these spiritual exercises, and by their general conduct, they were in favour with the people at large,' i. e. all except the Rulers, the Priests, and their party.

— προσετίθει τοὺς σωζομένους] On the exact sense of these words considerable difference of opinion exists. Our authorized Version renders 'those that should be saved;' but it is now almost universally agreed that this mode of rendering cannot be admitted, since it would require, not σωζομένους, but σωθησομένους. So Plato, Theat. p. 176, ο σωθησομένοι. Jamb. Vit. Pyth. § 201, τοὺς σωθησομένους τῶν νίων. Plut. Moral. 74; where Wyttenb. remarks, that the use of σώζεσθαι, in that and other passages in Plutarch, 'convenit cum illa apud scrip. ecclesiasticos frequentata, "servare se, salutem ac felicitatem animo a vitiiis purgando vel integro servando consequi."'
The version in question must therefore be rejected; not (as Wets. thinks) because it introduces a Calvinistic doctrine, but because such a sense cannot be shown to be inherent in the words. The sense 'had been saved,' which some Anti-Calvinistic Commentators propose, is equally inadmissible. See supra 40, and Rev. xxi. 24. If we keep close to the propriety of language (which, where a doctrine is concerned, we are bound to do), we cannot, I still think, do better than render, 'those who were being saved'—'who were in the way of salvation,'—those who hearkened to the earnest injunction, ver. 40, 'Save yourselves from this perverse generation,'—namely, by withdrawing from community with them, renouncing Judaism, seeking admission into the Christian Church by baptism, and thus being 'saved from their sins by the washing of regeneration,' and put into a state of salvation; whereby, through the grace of the Holy Spirit, imparted under the Gospel, they might be actually saved both from the guilt and the power of sin. Accordingly, as Mr. Alford observes, 'nothing is implied by this to answer, one way or the other, the question, whether all these were finally saved?' it being only asserted that they were in the way of salvation when they were added to the Church. Thus at 1 Cor. i. 18, and 2 Cor. ii. 15, we have τοὺς σωζομένους opposed to τοὺς ἀπολλυμένοις,—the former as being, after embracing the Christian faith, in the way of salvation,—the latter in the way of perdition.

III. This seems meant to connect with ii. 43; vv. 44—47 being in some measure parenthetical. St. Luke now returns to what he had been saying about many miracles having been worked by the Apostles; and of these he adduces one by way of example,—namely, that of a cripple from his birth, vv. 1—10.

1. Ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ must here mean together, in company, and be taken after ἀνέβαινον, 'were going up.' MSS. A, B, C, and a few cursives of the same Family, and some of the Fathers, join ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ to the last verse of the preceding chapter; and that position is adopted by Lachmann and Tischendorf (ed. 1 and 2), and by Alford. This, however, involves no little harshness, both as regards the position of the formula (for no instance do I know of ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ separated so far from its verb, and placed last in the sentence, except in Ps. lxi. 9, and 2 Sam. ii. 13. xii. 3), and its suitability to the foregoing, where it is not needed, may be doubted. On the other hand, it is highly suitable to the words following, the sense being, that 'they were going up together (i. e. at the same time, and in company, see note on Mark vii. 14) to the Temple.' And this is much confirmed by infra xiv. 1, ἵγνιντο δὲ—κατὰ τὸ αὐτὸ εἰσελθεῖν αὐτοὺς εἰς τὴν συναγωγὴν; also by Jos. Antt. xvi. 8, 6, ἐποήσαντο δὲ συνδικὰς εἰς Ῥώμην ἰλθεῖν, καὶ μέχρι Ἀντιοχείας ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ παρῆλθον. This signifi. is very frequent in the Sept., as Esd. iv. 3. Ps. xl. 7. lxx. 11. lxxxi. 5. Wolfius, indeed, adduces some reasons, but inconclusive, why the words may be thought not to belong to chap. iii. But he himself admits that the reasons for joining them with chap. iii. are not weak. Dr. Mill has maintained the same position as Wolf, but has urged it with more success; and the sense he lays down is not unsuitable. Yet it does not arise naturally from the words. The use of the expression ἐπὶ τὸ τὸ ἱερὸν ἐπὶ τὴν ὥραν τῆς προσευχῆς, τὴν ἐννάτην. ² Καὶ τις ἀνὴρ, χωλὸς ἐκ κοιλίας μητρὸς αὐτοῦ ὑπάρχων, ἐβαστάζετο διὰ ἐτίθου καθ' ἡμέραν πρὸς τὴν θύραν τοῦ ἱεροῦ τὴν λεγομένην ὠραίαν, τοῦ αἰτεῖν ἐλεημοσύνην παρὰ τῶν εἰσπορευομένων εἰς τὸ ἱερὸν. ³ Ὃς, ἰδὼν Πέτρον καὶ Ἰωάννην μέλλοντας εἰσεῖναι εἰς τὸ ἱερὸν, ἡρώτα ἐλεημοσύνην λαβεῖν. ⁴ Ἀτενίσας δὲ Πέτρος εἰς αὐτὸν σὺν τῷ Ἰωάννῃ εἶπε· Βλέψον εἰς ἡμᾶς. ⁵ Ὁ δὲ ἐπέειχεν αὐτοῖς, προσδοκῶν τι παρ' αὐτῶν λαβεῖν. ⁶ Εἶπε δὲ Πέτρος· Ἀργύριον καὶ χρυσίον οὐχ ὑπάρχει μοι· ὃ δὲ ἔχω, αὐτὸ with προσετίθει, harsh as it is, may indeed seem somewhat confirmed by a passage of Micah ii. 12, ἐκδιξομαι τοὺς καταλοιπούς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ θῆσθαι (for προσθ.) τὴν ἀποστροφὴν αὐτοῦ. But I suspect that the true punctuation there is, Ἰσραὴλ ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ, this transposition of the formula being common in the Sept. Moreover, in the Hebrew original the adv. πρὶ is rightly construed by the most eminent recent Commentators with the preceding, not the following, as it was by the framers of the Syr. and Arabic Versions, and of the Chaldaee Paraphrast. Its connexion with γάρ is clear, because ὡς simply means (as Rosenm. observes) 'ponam,' 'reddam,' 'I will make him,' as in Gen. xli. 18, ὡς ἔγωγε ἡνὶ γνῶ, 'I will make him a great people.' It must, therefore, be taken with γάρ. But, to return to the passage before us;—the harshness of construction in προσετίθει ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ is not to be obviated by a critical legerdemain of German philology; and, what is more, the circumstance of the persons being 'together' was not necessary to be mentioned (having been before indicated), and is here quite beside the purpose. Why Doddr. should think the circumstance of Peter and John going up to the Temple in company too little important to be recorded, especially considering that the same circumstance is recorded of Paul and Barnabas (xiv), I am quite at a loss to see. It is certain that there was a decided like-mindedness between the two Apostles, and hence we find them going together to the tomb of Jesus; and that they should go both together to the Temple of the Lord (as did Paul and Barnabas, xiv. 1) is what might be expected from those who would be always ready to use the words of the Psalmist, lv. 15, and cxii. 1.

2. ἐκ κοιλίας μητρὸς] for ἐκ γυναικὸς. See John ix. 1. Ἐκ γαστρὸς occurs in the Pseudo-Theogn. v. 307.—Ετίθουν. The sick and poor were, both among Jews and Gentiles, usually laid, or placed themselves, at the portals of the Temples, to ask charity of the worshippers; though sometimes at the gates or doors of rich men. See Luke xvi. 20, and note.

—τὴν θύρ. τ. λ. ὠραίαν] Which gate of the Temple is here meant, the Commentators are not agreed. Most of them suppose it to have been the Eastern gate, leading from the Court of the Women to that of the Israelites, which was overlaid with Corinthian brass (a material far more valuable than gold itself, and wrought with exquisite art); also called the gate of Nicanor, and of which mention is made in Jos. Bell. v. 5, 3. vi. 5, 3. It has, however, been shown by Wagen-seil, Bengel, and Walch, that this involves much of improbability. Hence the learned have for some time been generally agreed that the gate here meant is that which was called Susan, from γῶω (the lily), so called διὰ τὴν ὠραιότητα. Indeed, old Constantinople had a gate so called; and ὠραία would be a good representation in Greek of γῶω in Hebrew. Of the reasons given for the above supposition, the most weighty are, 1. that, after the healing of the cripple, Peter and John repaired to Solomon's Portico, which (as appears from Joseph. Ant. xx. 8, compared with xv. 14) was very near the gate Susan. 2. This lame mendicant would doubtless choose a place where he would be likely to get most alms, and that would be where most persons might be expected to enter. Now at the gate Susan there was a far greater concourse of people than elsewhere; since there were the tubernacles, in which wine, salt, flour, oil, doves, and other things necessary for sacrifice, were sold.

3. ἢ. λαβεῖν] Here, as often, after verbs of asking, λαβεῖν is thought pleonastic; and, accordingly, the ancient Critics, as we learn from the var. lect., omitted the word. But it is not so much pleonastic, as a vestige of the verbosity of ancient phraseology, very frequent in the Hebr., and not unfrequent in the ancient Greek writers, whether of prose or verse, as espec. Homer and Hæd.

4. ἀτενίσας] used as at Luke xxii. 56; see note.—Βλέψον εἰς ἡμᾶς. 'Non ita loquitur Petrus quin de consilio Dei certus sit: et certus his verbis singulare aliquod et insolitum beneficium sperare jubet. Quæri tamen potest, an facultatem habuerint edendi miracula quoties liberet. Respondeo, sic ministros fuisset divinæ virtutis, ut nihil suo arbitrio vel proprio motu tentarint, sed Dominus per ipso egerit, quum ita expedire noverat. Hinc factum est ut unum sanarint, non autem promiscue omnes. Ergo, quemadmodum in aliis rebus duceam ac directorem habebant Dei Spiritum, ita etiam in hac parte. Ideo priusquam claudum surgere jubet Petrus, coniecit in eum ac defixit oculos. Talis intuitus non caruit peculiari Spiritus motu. Hinc fit, ut tam secure de miraculo pronuntiet. Porro excitare hoc verbo claudum voluit ad recipiendam Dei gratiam: ille tamen nihil quam elemosynam expectat.' (Calv. in loc.)

— ἵστασθαι βάσεις κ. τ. σφ.] Hereby αἱ
 βάσ. are not meant the soles of the feet, on which the feet rest in standing or walking; which denotes the bony part from the toes to the heel inclusive, on which the σκέλος supported by the σφυρά, rests in walking. Or, to express the thing with more technical exactness, after Galen and Gorreus ap. Steph. Thea. ed. Par., the βάσεις denote the astragali on which the tola tibia, consisting of the κνήμη and the περόνη, rest as on a sure foundation in walking. By τὰ σφυρά are meant 'the ancle bones, whose firmness is indispensable to enable the σκέλος and βάσεις πρὸς. to perform their office. I have said so much, because the matter has been imperfectly treated by Expositors, and in order to point out the peculiar kind of infirmity which made the man a cripple from his birth; in which also we trace the pen of a physician, who understood the nature of the case, with which he had doubtless made himself acquainted, in order accurately to describe it. The hand of 'Luke the physician' may also be traced in the brief but expressive words describing the result of the cure, where ἐξαλλόμενος means 'leaping forth,' or out of the chair on which he was seated, thus denoting (graphiēd) the headlong eagerness of incipient action, and implying the joy accompanying it. This peculiar use of the word is so rare, that I know of only one ex.—Aristot. Prob.

 ii. 31, ἐξάλλονται 'desiliunt' (οἱ ἀγωνιῶντες) καὶ οὐδέποτε ἡρμούσι, though for the figurative sense I may refer to Is. lv. 12, Sept., οἱ βουνοὶ ἐξάλλονται, προσδεχόμενοι ὅμας ἐν χαρᾷ. It is of no importance to remark that, in this action, as recorded by the sacred writer, we have no other than a fulfilment of what had long ago been prophesied in Is. xxxv. 5, 6, τότε ἀνοιχ-θήσονται ὀφθαλμοὶ τυφλῶν, καὶ ὅσα κωφῶν ἀκούσονται, τότε δλεῖται ὡς ἱλαφὸς ὁ χυλός, τραγὴ δὲ ἵσταται γλῶσσα μογιάλων. I need scarcely say that in the second and fourth of these particulars, adduced by way of example, there is an evident fulfilment of what is recorded in Mark vii. 32, of the case of the κωφὸς μογιᾶλος, where see note. In fact, in these verses of Is. (5, 6) the marvellous works of our Lord are plainly predicted (our Lord himself being the Interpreter in Matt. xi. 4, 5, where there is a plain allusion to this passage of Is.), wonders of power wrought in men's bodies, and even greater wonders in men's souls,—and meant to be included—by which, through the Holy Ghost, the spiritually blind were enlightened; those deaf to the call of God and Christ, were made to hear clearly; those utterly impotent to every good work, were made by Divine grace, through the Spirit, not only able to move in the work of righteousness, but to be eagerly engaged in it, and joyful to carry it forward.

¹². ἀπεκρ. πρὸς τὸν λ.] 'made [this] address expressions are mentioned; and the rendering yields a forced sense. The best Expositors have been long agreed on the rendering 'addressed'; and it is confirmed by the Sahid., Copt., and Æthiop. Versions. The address, however, might be intended as an answer to their thoughts and feelings.

— δυνάμει [‘any means in our power, whereby we could effect this;’ or, perhaps, in allusion to magical art, to which some might ascribe the cure of the lame man.]

— εὐσεβείᾳ [‘piety,’ personal righteousness, as if efficacious, and sufficient to obtain it from God, as a reward of merit.]

— πεποικη. τοῦ περιπ. The same peculiar construction recurs infra xxvii. 1, and in both cases, and others of that kind, there is no need to resolve the Particip. into its cognate Adject. and the Particip. οῦσι. To suppose an ellipsis of περὶ is only an evading of the difficulty, which is best removed by regarding τοῦ as = eis τὸ ὥστε, in cases where it is put for the simple Infinit., at least where the purpose or result is implied. The use of ‘for’ with the Infinitive in our old authors, and still in the mouths of the vulgar, exactly corresponds to the above idiom. It is, indeed, found in Wycliffe’s Version here.

13, 14. The Apostle now suggests the real cause of the cure, calling their attention to Christ. The general meaning is, that ‘the purpose of God, in the miracles which he ordained to be wrought by the Apostles, was to show forth the glory of his Son Jesus Christ.’ Hence it follows, that men are here not to extol Peter, or any one else. It is CHRIST only who is to be exalted. See John iii. 30. (Calvin.)

13. ὁ Θεός—ἡμῶν] The repetition of ὁ Θεός is emphatical; and the mention of the God of their fathers was introduced to show that they taught no new religion which should alienate them from the God of Israel.

— ἔδωκε [‘glorified,’ by his resurrection and ascension.]

— τὸν παῖδα α. [I.] I am now induced to think with Pisc., Bengel, Nitzsch, Olsh., Stier, and Alford, that παῖδα here means not ‘Son,’ but ‘Servant,’ of course in the Messianic sense, which the word in the Septuagint at Isa. xl.—xlv. signifies. It is, however, remarkable, that in all the ancient Versions it is rendered by ‘Son.’

— ὃν ὑμεῖς μὲν παρῶ.δ.] The μὲν, which I have here, with all the Critical Editors, admitted on strong authority, I find confirmed by all the Lamb. and most of the Mus. copies, and Trin. Coll. B. x. 16. It was removed by those shallow Critical Revisers, who were ignorant of the idiom by which μὲν is used without a δὲ following; on which see Matthijs’s, Kuhnert’s, and Winer’s Grammars. We may notice the tact with which Peter, after gratifying his hearers by the expression ὁ Θεὸς τῶν πατ. ἡμῶν, slides into severe reproach.

— κρίναντος ἰ. π. [‘when he had decided [in his own mind] to let him go;’ ‘had,’ as we say, ‘made up his mind,’ ‘was fully disposed’ so to do. So Luke xxiii. 16, π. οὐν αὐτὸν ἀπολύσω.]

14. ὑμεῖς δὲ—ἡρνήσασθε] The language is very strong, and pointed by antithesis, nay, the very Pronoun is emphatic, thus bringing the charge home to the very persons addressed; q. d. ‘You are the persons who disowned, refused to acknowledge, as Messiah, One who eminently sustained that character,’ as (κατ’ ἐξοχήν) τὸν Ἅγιον καὶ Δίκαιον, ‘the Holy and Just One,’ a designation of the Messiah (as at iv. 27. Rev. iii. 7. John x. 36) formed on ὁ Ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ, which occurs at Mark i. 24. Luke iv. 34, and John vi. 69. In the words following καὶ ᾔτησασθε, &c., there is an indirect contrast between the Holy and Just One and the base and sinful,—between the Lord of life and the destroyer of life by murder. It need not, however, be supposed to import that Barabbas had actually committed murder, since it appears to have been sometimes used to denote one who would not hesitate at any crime however atrocious, of which Casaub. on Athen. col. 398, adduces several exx. On comparing the accounts in the Gospel with this, we find that he is so called here as having been engaged in an insurrection against the Roman authority, in the course of which violence and commotion had been produced, out of which arose murder. As to Barabbas being called ἁσπότης by St. John, there is no discrepancy, since that was the name given to revolvers by the Romans, 2 Cor. xi. 26, brigands.

— τὸν ἀρχηγὸν τῆς ζωῆς] Must be understood to denote not solely the Author of life and immortality, by being the first to rise from the dead, but, in a metaphorical and spiritual sense of ζωῆ, to signify eternal life, salvation; for the phrase is equiv. in sense to ἀρχηγ. τῆς σωτηρίας at Heb. ii. 10 (where see note), and Heb. xii. 2. However, the main proof of this sense of ζωῆ rests on John xiv. 6, where our Lord says to the Apostles, ἐγώ εἰμι ἡ ζωῆ (meaning both the resurrection and the life, as it is said John xi. 25), from which it will plainly appear how the senses of ζωῆ and σωτηρίας coincide.

16. καὶ ἐν—αὐτοῦ] Render: ‘and his name (i. e. the power accompanying the invocation of his name), through faith in his name (in ᾧ) hath made strong, or sound, this man whom ye see and know.' The next words are further explanatory of ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει τ. ὄνομ. αὐτοῦ; and by ἡ πίστις ἡ δι' αὐτοῦ is meant that faith of which Christ is the giver as well as the object; comp. 1 Pet. i. 21; which is the best comment on this passage. The term ὁλοκλ., meaning 'complete soundness,' 'good health'; as in Isa. i. 6, and sometimes in the Class. writers, serving to further explain ἰσχυρίωμαι.

17. οἶδα ὅτι κατὰ ἄγνοιαν ἐπράξατε, &c.] When we consider the numerous miracles of our Lord, and the other ample proofs which the Jews had of his being the Messiah, it may seem difficult to understand how they could be said to have done what they did through ignorance. To remove this difficulty, some would refer the words ὥσπερ καὶ οἱ ἄρχοντες ὑμῶν, not to ἄγνοιαν, but to ἐπράξατε, in the sense, 'I know that through ignorance ye were induced to do as your rulers did.' But this is violating the construction, and forcing on the passage a sense not inherent in the words. Besides, the ignorance in question extended to both classes. Nor is there any occasion to resort to such a harsh method, since the expression may be taken as said populariter, and consequently need not be too rigorously interpreted, but only supposed to mean, 'I am aware that you did what you did, under the influence of error, prejudice, and other carnal passions.' The Apostle does not mean that this ignorance was without blame,—far from it; for as it resulted from pride, prejudice, and worldly-mindedness, and was co-existent with ample means of information, it was highly criminal; yet though criminal, he intimates it admitted of some extenuation, inasmuch as there was some degree of ἀγνοία in all the classes of persons; and that was by all the Class. writers regarded as a great extenuation. See Eurip. Hip. 1334. Thucyd. iii. 38, where see my note. For the character of the Apostle's expressions is extenuatory,—by the use of the expression ἀδελφοί,—οὐ, and even the νῦν, on which see my Lex.—as were the words of his Lord, when interceding for his murderers: Πάτερ, ἄφες αὐτοῖς· οὐ γὰρ οἶδασιν τί ποιοῦσι, Luke xxiii. 34.

18. ὁ δὲ Θεὸς—ἐπλήρωσεν οὕτω] q. d. 'But, however, God hath used that ignorance for good, by permitting that you should commit this crime; and moreover, since thus would be fulfilled the declarations of the Prophets concerning the calamities with which the Messiah should be oppressed.' There is no hyperbole, as Kuin. and others suppose in πάντων, since even the Jewish Rabbins acknowledge that 'all the Prophets prophesied of the Messiah.' However, I am induced to think, with Stier and Alf., that the Prophets are regarded (in this popular and familiar mode of speaking) as one body, actuated by one Spirit, in bearing testimony to God's purpose—that HIS CHRIST should suffer.

19. We have now the application (introduced by οὖν, q. d. 'such being the case') of the whole discourse; in which the Apostle exhorts them to repentance and newness of life, by a true conversion of the heart. For as μεταν. denotes 'change of mind,' so does ἐπιστρέφω, the 'change of conduct' resulting therefrom, and inseparable from true conversion. See Bp. Bull's Harm. Ap. p. 9.

—εἰς τὸ ἔξαι. ὑμῶν τὰς ἁμ.] 'to be cancelled by pardon.' Ἐξαλείφω signifi. 1. to wipe off, as oil from any thing; 2. to wipe off characters chalked on a board, or traced on a slate; 3. to obliterate any writing, whether on waxed tablets, or written on parchment, either by scratching out, or crossing out. And, as crossing out accounts in a ledger implies that the sums are discharged, or the payment forgiven, so the word came to mean, in a figurative sense, to forgive offences, as in Ia. xliii. 23, ἐγὼ εἰμι ὁ ἐξαλείφων τὰς ἀνομίας σου; also 2 Macc. xii. 42, and Eccles. xlv. 20. And Lysias, cited by Wetstein, ὅπως ἐξαλειφθεὶς αὐτῶν τὰ ἁμαρτήματα.

—ὅπως ἂν ἔλθωσι, &c.] Ὅπως ἂν is by most modern Expositors taken to mean when, or after that (for ἐπειδὴ); by others it is interpreted until, i. e. 'waiting until.' The latter rendering, however, involves a harsh ellipsis; and as to the former, though examples of ὅπως as used to denote time are frequent, yet not with ἂν, and only as used of time past. Indeed, the sense thus arising is far from satisfactory. Hence it is better, with the Syr., and many eminent Commentators, from Luther downward, to take it in the sense, in order that, as Luke ii. 35. Matt. vi. 5, et alibi. Render: 'in order that the times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord'; i. e. 'that ye may see with joy the time which the Lord hath appointed as the period of refreshing.'—Ἀνάψυξις denotes, 1. a regaining one's breath after it has been interrupted; 2. a breathing-time from some labour, a rest from trouble, or deliverance from evil generally; 3. (by implication) the 'satisfaction,' or 'pleasure,' occasioned by such a change. What particular period is here designated, Expositors are not agreed. It must, of course, be at the coming of the Messiah; but some refer that to his coming at the destruction of Jerusalem; others, to his coming at the end of the world; and others, again, his coming in the Millennian reign. As to the first view, it is, I apprehend, untenable. The third has been ingeniously, but not satisfactorily, maintained. It seems safest to adopt the second;

by which the ἀνάψυξις of the present passage will be that especial period of rest and joy at the coming of the Messiah in his glory. But, to touch on a point of criticism,—the reading προκεχειρ. for προκεχειρισμένον, which I receive, with all the Critical Editors, I find confirmed by all the Lamb. MSS. except one, and almost all the Mus. copies, also Trin. Coll. B, x. 16. The text. rec. could not have arisen, as Alf. imagines, from gloss, but arose from a blunder of the Scribes. The sense is, 'Him, who was of old destined as your Messiah, even Jesus.'

21. ὃν δεῖ οὐρανὸν μὲν δέξασθαι, &c.] Of these words the true scope is to anticipate a possible objection,—that if Jesus had been the Messiah, he would have continued on earth, at least after his resurrection, and then founded his kingdom, to reign perpetually. See John xii. 31, and note. To this the Apostle indirectly replies, that it was necessary (i. e. for the purposes mentioned at John xvi. xvii. and xviii.) that for the present he should abide in Heaven, there to remain till the time of restoration; literally, 'that heaven should so receive, as to retain him, and not earth;' the general sentiment being, that, 'removed from the sight of men, He is conversant with God, having been raised to supreme majesty and blessedness.' See 1 Pet. iii. 22. Of course implying that he is THE MESSIAH.

— ἄχρι χρόνων ἀποκαταστάσεως π.] Ἀποκατάστασις (properly signifying 'a restoration of any thing to some former state;' and, by implication, for the better) is capable of several interpretations,—according to the view taken of the foregoing verse,—the most probable of which seems to be, that it is the ἀποκατάστασις spoken of in Matt. vii. 11 (where see note), what is called elsewhere the παλιγγενεσία, Matt. xix. 28, which, indeed, is the frequent subject of Prophecy from its very origin. On the expression τῶν ἁγίων προφ. see note at Luke i. 70, which passage will serve to confirm the insertion here of τῶν, introduced, on strong grounds (confirmed by the Lamb. and Mus. copies), into the text by the most eminent Editors; and also the cancelling of πάντων by Griesb., Scholz., Tisch., and Alf., which, however, is less certain.

22—26. The connexion of these verses would seem to be as follows: 'Moses announced the Messiah; and all the Prophets, from Samuel to our own days, have foretold those times of restoration. Now, to you belong these prophecies, and the promise given to Abraham, that in his seed should all the nations of the earth be blessed. To you God hath sent his Son Jesus Christ, and on you he would bestow blessedness, if you would but lay aside your carnal views, and turn from your evil ways. Repent, therefore, and be converted; acknowledge Jesus as the Christ, and receive his religion, lest ye suffer worse consequences of your obstinacy and unbelief.'

22. ὅτι προφήτην ὑμῖν ἀναστήσει, &c.] By quoting these words of Moses the Apostle means to say, 'that they should hearken to Christ, as the Prophet "like unto" Moses, of whom Moses predicted.' For that the passage has reference to CHRIST cannot be doubted, since St. Peter affirms it, as does also St. Stephen, Acts vii. 37. Indeed, there will be no difficulty in so doing, if we consider the chief scope of it, in which (as Schoettg. observes) the peculiar points of resemblance are intimated at the ὡς αὐτόν, 'like unto himself;' namely, 1. in being the minister of a new covenant, as Moses was of the old, which the Prophets (especially Jeremiah) had distinctly announced should be done away; 2. in His close communication with God; for, as Moses conferred much with God, that and far more did Jesus Christ, who was in the bosom of God his Father. That the passage must have reference to CHRIST (whether Moses himself was aware of it or not), has been ably evinced by Hoffm., vol. ii. p. 42 seqq., 1) from the passage of Acts vii. 37, and John i. 45. v. 46, where it is intimated, 2) because the Prophet promised in the Old Test. is styled ὁ προφήτης, Matt. xxi. 11. John vi. 14; or προφ. μίγας, Luke vii. 16. See v. 26. xiii. 23, 32. Luke vii. 16, comp. with Rom. i. 3. ix. 5; 3) that the Jews of that age understood that the prophecy announced CHRIST, appears from Matt. xxi. 4. Luke vii. 16. John vi. 14, and especially from the discourse of Stephen, infra vii.; so that both Peter and Stephen certainly considered the Prophet named by Moses to be the MESSIAH. The most ancient Fathers of the Church, as Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Lactantius, Eusebius, Athanasius, and Augustine were of that opinion; 4) that it is not meant of any one Prophet, from the use throughout the whole context of the singular, without any plural suffix, as when nouns collective are used; 5) because, if taken of Christ, that will better correspond to the occasion and scope of the context; and this Hoffm. has fully shown. Though the passage before us is not an exact quotation; yet the variations that occur are not such as to affect its fidelity as a free paraphrase. In the first verse the words are placed in another order, and εἰς is altered to ὑμῖν, in order to put the case still plainer to those addressed. And so indeed Moses evidently meant it. After ἀκούσεσθε the words κατὰ—ὑμᾶς are added by Peter to show the extent of the injunction. In the next verse, though the variations are greater both from the Hebr. and the Sept., yet the general sense of both is expressed; for (to advert to the principal discrepancy) the ἔγω εἶπα and ἐκ τῶν χειρῶν ἐγὼ αὐτοῦ mean, 'I will require it at his hands,' i. e. I will punish him for it (namely, his disobedience). Thus the words ἐξ ὧν ἐκ τοῦ λαοῦ (denoting utter extermination) are meant to illustrate a somewhat obscure phrase, and to point to the nature and extent of that punishment, the greatest known under the Jewish law.

²⁵ ὡς γάρ τινες οἱ υἱοὶ κ. τ. λ.] The ὡς γάρ τινες is emphatic, as meant to apply what has been said to his hearers, as inheritors of the promises given them through the prophets; accordingly they were spiritual children of the Prophets, the fellow-partakers with them of those promises and of the Covenant, for υἱοὶ τῆς διαθ. there is a Hebraism, formed on the Hebr. בן with a Genit., denoting participation, as here and in Luke xx. 36, υἱοὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως. Indeed examples of the expression 'Sons of the Covenant' often occur in the Rabbinical writers.
